C to them of all such things as they had lost, or else would with condigne punishment haue chastised the insolencie of your souldiers: which you would seeme to couer with the tearme of militarie wantonnesse or brauerie; an excuse scarce currant amongst children. For although offences are in all places greeuous, yet ought they most of all so to be deemed in martiall affairs. What I pray you, would you haue me to take it for a lasciuiousnesse in your men of war? especially when I had receiued so great losse, when as you might with a word first haue restrained them from doing of it, and at your pleasure corrected them after the deed was done. Wherefore (most excellent Mahomet?) take you also in good part these our tearmes, which you haue accustomed hitherto most gloriously to giue and sell vnto vs, whilest you alwaies couer your reach with some excuse or shew of right. As for that in excusing me vnder colour of old acquaintance and friendship you inuey against the Venetians, verely you do them wrong: for why those good, iust, and
D vertuous princes are not to be slandered by you, as seducers of me or others, Beside, what need that inuincible state to enter into counsell with me, or (as it pleaseth you to say) to allure me to fall at ods with you, or to prosecute you as their enemie? Who of themselues, yea (I say) of themselues alone, when occasion shall require, are able to dare you in plaine battell, and to abate your pride. Further, whereas you aduise me to reiect their friendship, your labour is therein but lost: for what man is so desperat, or hated of his subiects, that would not chuse rather to erre with that most honourable Senat, than to be in the right with you? especially I, who haue of long time beene confederat with them, and am of all others vnto them most deere: which you for all that had no regard of, but (according to your vntrustie dealing) breaking in sunder the bonds of peace, spoiled and wasted their territorie in PELOPONESVS. Neither can your great threats terrifie me, which you after the Turkish manner thunder and poure out against me, ex-
E cept I will be ouerruled by you: for it is the part of an Albanese both to endure when need shall require, and also to doe such things as beseeme a man of courage. You cannot make me afraid, being but a small prince, with my honourable friends the Venetians. And what are you? so great an emperor of the East and of the West, and of all parts of the World, as you vainely tearme your selfe? Truly you make me smile, and other Christian princes laugh you to scorne, in vsurping falsely to your selfe the stately stile of the emperour of the World. What possesse you in ASIA the greater? verely nothing. Is all yours in ASIA the lesser? not so. What haue you in EVROPE? except THRACIA, MYSIA, part of GRECIA, and PELOPONESVS, with the Isle of MYTILENE. As for AFRICKE, you neuer set your foot therein. Is this to be emperour of all the World? But suppose, suppose (I say) worthie Mahomet, that all from the farthest part of the Ocean were yours, you ought not therefore so to swell, as to contemne all others. Cease to boast, and F learn now (if you can) the speciall but true examples of humaine fragilitie. Where are now the Assyrians, which sometime swayed the world? Where bee the Medes? where the Persians? and to be short, where are the Romaines, the great commanders of all? Verely, Tamerlane the Scythian king (called the terror of the world) was far greater than you: who in triumph drew before his chariot thy great grandfather Baiazet in chains: who had before gained so many victories, whom neuertheless he ouerthrew in the plains of ARMENIA, with three hundred thousand Turks, hauing in his armie (as is reported) twelue hundred thousand men, greater than Xerxes or Darius, whose armies couered the seas, and dried vp the riuers before them as they went, yet for all this (noble Mahomet) they are all cast out by him that casteth out all nations, the finger of the highest hath brought them all to nought. Wherefore learne to know your selfe to be a man also. Trust not too much to the multitude of your souldiers, and strength of your armies: for oftentimes great and puissant armies haue beene ouerthrowne with farre lesse, as all histories beare witnesse: whereof it is commonly said, Thou shalt not praise the valour of the Generall, before he be brought to the triumph. And doe you not thinke Mahomet, that God will fauour the better cause? You know, you well know, that all your kingdome is violently gotten, that it is wrongfully and vniustly possessed: for which cause I am not afraid not only to withstand you when you shall come, being so great a Prince; but also valiantly and courageously to dare you into the field, and by the power of God both to hope for and haue a notable victorie ouer you. We haue souldiers also, which know how to vse their weapons, to march before their enemies, and how to beare themselues in the heat of the battell. Wherefore, to that you say vnto me for the new confirming of the former league, you labour now but in vaine to circumuent me with such faire gloses, I haue your faith in such distrust, and your friendship in detestation: for as much as you cunningly and subtilly, after the manner of your ancestors, whatsoeuer you doe, or whatsoeuer you promise vnto me, it tendeth all to no other end than to thrust me out of my kingdome. Yet thus long I haue by Gods helpe well escaped all your policies, all your crafts and deceits. But I hope there will in short time be an end of all these matters, when all your sleights and deuises shall not ease you, neither your working head or Turkish pride any thing profit you. It is not I alone that so much stomacke you, there commeth after me a great number of Christian Princes: Behold, the whole chiualrie and glorie of the Christian commonweale is in armes, and comming against thee with all their force: all the Kings and Princes of Christendome haue combined themselues together, with the great Bishop, against thy state, and will in short time be present to destroy thee and thy kingdome. Wherefore (worthie Mahomet) I haue thought it good in regard of our old friendship (although the same hath by you beene greatly empaired and violated) to forewarne you of all these things, that you might gather your wits together, and in time prouide for the safetie of your selfe and of your kingdome. You see the force and power of so many great Princes, from which whether you can escape or no, I know not: yet you may, if you will follow my aduise, you may I say make both your name and empire of great, greater, of famous most renowned, of fortunate most happie and blessed; if casting off from you the grosse errours of the Mahometane superstition, you will embrace the faith and truth of Christ Iesus, and at length haue regard of your soules health. And you which excell all your predecessours in highnesse of spirit and pregnancie of wit, suffer not your selfe and your subiects as it were by inheritance to be longer blinded in your wilfull errours: but doe that (as a wise Prince) of your owne accord, which otherwise you will shortly of necessitie be constrained to doe. To say, Had I wist, hath euer beene accounted a great disgrace from the mouth of an Emperour. At length amend and measure your selfe. Behold, Almightie God doth offer you meanes, whereby you may quiet the whole state of your kingdome, and all our Kings and Princes loue, honour, and reuerence you. Neither let the ambitious desire of soueraignty or immoderate care of those things you possesse, trouble you from so doing: For whatsoeuer you haue vniustly and vnlawfully vsurped, the Christian Princes will grant, confirme, and establish vnto thee, as if they had beene your owne by ancient inheritance. So shall you be a true Monarch indeed, and rule and raigne lawfully, if you shall embrace this faith, and worship God aright: which so soone as you shall feele the sweetnesse of, you will be sorrie that you knew it no sooner, you will greeue at the time you haue lost, and vtterly detest and abhorre all that filthie superstition which the most filthie false Prophet Mahomet hath left amongst you. From our campe the 26 of May 1463.

With these letters Scanderbeg dismissed the Turks embassadour. About which time he receiued letters from the great Bishop, That he accompanied with the Christian Princes, would without delay come ouer into EPIRVS with a strong armie of valiant Christians, to ioine their forces with his against the common enemie of the Christian religion: exhorting him in all their names to denounce warre against the Turkish King. Which thing Scanderbeg most ioyfully vndertooke: and without delay with all his power brake into the Turks dominion, burning and destroying the countrey before him as he went: from whence he returned laded with the spoile there gotten.

When Mahomet had perused Scanderbeg his letters, and certainly vnderstood of the great preparation made against him in ITALIE, as also of the great spoile of late made by Scanderbeg, he became exceeding melancholie, as a man much troubled in mind, which daily more and more

A more increaſed: for that he ſaw not the wonted cheerefulneſſe in his men of warre, but all full of heauineſſe and deſpaire, as if they had beene men alreadie vanquiſhed. Neuertheleſſe, he ſpeedily tooke order for the leuying of a great armie; fortifying his cities and ſtrong holds, leauing nothing vndone that was poſſible, for the aſſurance of his ſtate. And to repreſſe the furie of Scanderbeg, ſent Seremet Baſſa with fourteene thouſand ſouldiers to lie vpon the borders of EPIRVS, with charge only to attend vpon him. Who mindfull of his charge came into MACEDONIA, vnto the citie OCRIDA, now called ALCHRIA, in the very confines of MACEDONIA towards EPIRVS, and there lay with his armie; ſome part thereof lodged in the citie, and the reſt in places more conuenient neere about the ſame.

B The comming of the Baſſa, as alſo the manner of his lying, was not vnknowne to Scanderbeg, who deſired nothing more than to be doing with him. Wherefore he ſecretly in the night marched towards OCRIDA with twelue thouſand ſouldiers, and being come within three miles of the towne, lay cloſe in ambuſh, & vpon the breaking of the day ſent out 500 horſemen towards the enemie, vnder the conduct of Peicus Emanuel, and Petrus Angelus, two valiant and expert captaines, to draw him if they could into the field. But Scanderbeg had before commanded them, that if the enemie did come forth to fight, they ſhould make but ſmall reſiſtance, but retire backe as if they had fled, and ſo to traine him on to the place where the armie lay. Which was ſo well performed by the two skilfull captaines, that the Baſſa with all his power was according as they could haue wiſhed, drawne into the field, and brought to the very place where

C Scanderbeg lay: Who ſuddenly riſing vp with all his armie, aſſailed the Turks on euery ſide, and ſlew them as deere encloſed in a toile. In this battell ten thouſand of the Turks were ſlaine, the treaſurer of the armie with twelue other of great marke were taken priſoners, and brought bound to Scanderbeg, who were preſently ranſomed for 40 thouſand duckats. Ten thouſand Turks ſlaine.

Scanderbeg hauing obtained the victorie, returned with triumph into EPIRVS, daily expecting the comming of the great armie out of ITALIE: but fatall deſtinie, the mightie controller of mens higheſt deſignes, had not ſo appointed. For when Pius the great Biſhop had out of all parts of Chriſtendome aſſembled a great armie (wherof the greateſt part were voluntarie ſouldiers) and all things were now in ſuch readineſſe, that he had put himſelfe vpon the way, and was come to

D ANCONA, a citie vpon the ſea ſide (where Chriſtophorus Maurus duke of VENICE came vnto him, with ten gallies well appointed, to haue accompanied him in thoſe warres: and all men were now in expectation of ſome great matter to haue beene done) ſuddenly he fell ſicke of a feuer, and died in the yeere 1464. Whereupon the armie was forthwith diſperſed, and all that great preparation fruſtrated, to the exceeding griefe of many Chriſtian Princes; and no leſſe ioy of the Turks, who now reioyced to ſee themſelues deliuered of ſo great a feare.

About this ſame time, Victor Capella chiefe perſwader of this warre betwixt the Venetians and the Turks, was by the Senat ſent Generall of their forces at ſea, in ſtead of Lauretanus, whoſe yeere was then expired. He hauing receiued the charge from Lauretanus, and ſayling out of EVBŒA, in ſhort time tooke from the enemie the citie of AVLIS in PELOPONESVS, ouer againſt CHALCIS, and alſo the citie of LARSVM in the gulfe of THESSALONICA, with the Iſle of HIMBER.

E Afterwards landing his men by night at PYRÆVS, he ſuddenly ſurpriſed the citie of ATHENS (now called SETHINÆ) ſometime the mother of learning, and moſt noble citie of GRÆCIA; and from thence carried away with him into EVBŒA all the people he there found, as his priſoners, together with the rich ſpoile of that citie. Whileſt he lay in EVBŒA, he was perſwaded that the citie of PATRAS in PELOPONESVS would be deliuered vnto him by the Chriſtians that dwelt therein, if he did but ſhew himſelfe before it. Whereupon he departed from EVBŒA, and comming into the gulfe of PATRAS, landed 4000 footmen vnder the leading of Barbaricus, and 200 horſemen, of whom one Nicholaus Ragius was captaine. Barbaricus marching toward PATRAS, was come within a mile of the citie; when many of the horſemen, and of the vntruly mariners, diſorderly ſcattering abroad, neglected the intended ſeruice, and ſought The Venetians attempting to win Patras, receiue great loſſe

F after pillage all about the countrey. The Turks garriſons taking this opportunitie, ſet vpon them with their horſemen, and ſo eaſily ouerthrew them, being ſcattered and out of order. At the firſt encounter, Barbaricus himſelfe was ſlaine: Ragius captaine of the horſemen was taken, and aliue empailed vpon a ſharpe ſtake. Of all them that were landed, ſcarce a thouſand were left, who ſaued their liues by flying vnto the gallies. With this ouerthrow Victor the Venetian Admirall was greatly diſcomfited; yet hauing conceiued ſome hope of better ſucceſſe, in few

daies after attempted againe to haue taken PATRAS, but with like hap as before. For hauing G loſt a thouſand of his men about the city, and the reſt glad to take their refuge to the fleet, he was conſtrained with great diſhonour to depart thence. And ſo full of ſorrow and heauineſſe returning into EVBŒA oppreſſed with melancholy, there ſuddenly died.

The Venetians deceiued of the great hope they had conceiued of the generall preparation made againſt the Turkes, and much troubled with the hard proceeding of their warres againſt ſo mightie an enemie: by their embaſſadours ſolicited Mathias, not long before choſen king of HVNGVRIE, to ioyne in league with them, and to take vp armes againſt the common enemie: offering preſently to furniſh him with a great ſumme of money, beſide a large yearely pention for the maintenance of thoſe warres: for which hee ſhould to his power by land de- H fend all their territorie betwixt the Rhetian Alpes, and the Adriatique, againſt the inuaſion of the Turke.

This Mathias ſurnamed Coruinus, was the yonger ſonne of the moſt famous captaine Io. Huniades, whoſe elder brother Vladiſlaus, a gentleman of ſuch courage as might well ſhew whoſe ſonne he was, being not able to diſgeſt the iniuries and diſgraces done vnto him and his brother, by Vlricus countie of CILIA, and vnckle vnto Ladiſlaus the yong king of BOHEMIA and HVNGARIE; for the deſpite he alwaies bare vnto their father Huniades, ſlew the ſame Vlricus at ALBA REGALIS, euen in the kings court. Which outrage the yong king was glad for the preſent to winke at, and alſo to grant him pardon; as hauing taken away the man, whoſe immoderat power well ſtood not with the kings ſafetie: but in deed fearing the citizens of ALBA & the men of war, I who exceedingly fauoured the ſonnes of Huniades for their fathers ſake. For all that, Ladiſlaus returning into BOHEMIA, cauſed both the ſons of Huniades vpon the ſudden to be apprehended; and moſt cruelly executed Vladiſlaus, being then about ſix and twentie yeares old. Mathias the yonger brother was kept in priſon, expecting nothing elſe but to be partaker of his brothers hard fortune: as vndoubtedly he had, had not Ladiſlaus the yong king vpon the ſudden, as hee was vpon the top of his marriage with Magdalaine the French kings daughter, by vntimely death beene taken away. After whoſe death, the Hungarians for the loue they bare vnto the remembrance of Huniades, by a militarie election, choſe this Mathias his youngeſt ſonne, then in priſon at PRAGE, to be their king. Whereof Pogebrache (who after the death of Ladiſlaus, of Matthias of a priſoner. choſen king of Hungarie. an old gouernour had made himſelfe the young king of BOHEMIA) hauing ſpeedie intelligence K as he was ſitting at ſupper, ſent for Mathias his priſoner, and when he was come, commaunded him to ſit downe at the vpper end of the table: whereat the young gentleman being then but about eighteene yeares of age, and ſore abaſhed, beganne to craue pardon. But when the king would needs haue it ſo, and that he was ſet; the king to quiet his troubled thoughts, willed him to be of good cheere, for that he had good newes to tell him. Good newes, ſaid he, if it would pleaſe your maieſtie to grant me libertie. Yea that, ſaid the king, and more to: and then ſaluting him by the name of the king of HVNGARIE, brake vnto him the whole matter, how that he was by the generall conſent of the Hungarians, choſen their king. And ſo in few daies after, married vnto him his daughter: which done, he furniſhed him with all things fit for his eſtate, and royally accompanied him into HVNGARIE, where he was with great ioy and triumph re- L ceiued of the Hungarians: ouer whom he afterwards glorioufly raigned for the ſpace of eight and thirtie yeares. In which time, he notably enlarged the kingdome of HVNGARIE, and became a farre greater terrour vnto the Turkes, than euer was his father Huniades. And therewithall (which is not to be accounted in the leaſt part of his praiſes) was alwaies a great fauourer and furtherer of good letters, and ingenious deuiſes.

But to returne againe to our purpoſe, Mathias hauing well conſidered of that the Venetians had requeſted: anſwered them, that they had many times before in like caſe refuſed to giue aid vnto the Hungarian kings his predeceſſours: yea and that more was, thought it a thing not reaſonable, that any ſuch thing ſhould be requeſted at their hands; foraſmuch as they then receiued no harme from the Turke, but were in league and amitie with him: ſo that the Hun- M garian kings wanting their helpe, had many times receiued greater loſſe from the Turke, than otherwiſe they ſhould haue done, if they had beene by them aided. Yet for all that, he was content to forget all ſuch vnkindneſſe, and to grant them what they had requeſted: promiſing the next Spring to inuade the Turkes dominion, and according to their requeſt, to take into his protection all their territorie betwixt the Rhetian Alpes, and the Adriatique: which thing hee

moſt

A moſt honourably performed. For with the firſt of the Spring he paſſed ouer Danubius at BELGRADE with a puiſſant armie, and raſed the forts which the Turks had built thereabouts; and ſo entring into SERVIA, laid all the countrey waſte before him: and afterwards laden with ſpoile, returned home, carrying away with him twentie thouſand captiues. Neither ſo reſted, but with great good fortune maintained great warres againſt Mahomet during all the time of his raigne: and afterwards againſt Baiazet his ſonne alſo, wherein he moſt commonly returned with victorie: ſo that it is of him as truely as briefly written, That no Chriſtian king or chieftaine, did more often or with greater fortune fight againſt the Turkiſh nation, or had of them greater victories.

B Mahomet deliuered of the great feare he had before conceiued of the generall preparation of the Chriſtian princes againſt him; determined now to worke his will vpon ſuch as were neereſt vnto him, and afterward not to forget them that were farther off. The proceeding of Scanderbeg, with the late ouerthrow of SERREMET with his armie in EPIRVS, ſtucke in his ſtomacke: in reuenge whereof, he now ſent one Balabanus Badera, a moſt valiant captaine, with fifteene thouſand horſemen, and three thouſand foot, to inuade EPIRVS. This Balabanus was an Epirot borne, a chorles ſonne of that countrey: and being of a boy taken captiue of the Turks, as hee was keeping of his fathers cattell, and of long time brought vp in ſeruitude amongſt them, framing himſelfe both to their religion and manners; after long ſeruice, got the credit of a good common ſouldiour. But when as at the taking of CONSTANTINOPLE, it Mahomet ſendeth Balabanus to inuade Epirus.

C was his fortune to bee the firſt man of the Turks armie that gained the top of the walls, and entred the cittie; hee was for that peece of ſeruice, euer afterwards of Mahomet greatly eſteemed: and beſide his other great preferments, now ſent Generall of his armie into EPIRVS. Who as ſoone as hee was come to ALCHRIA (a citie vpon the frontiers of that countrey) ſent manie rich preſents to Scanderbeg, making ſhew as if hee had beene deſirous peaceably to lie vpon the borders committed to his charge, without farther purpoſe to trouble his countrey: yet in deed waiting nothing more than ſome notable opportunitie, ſuddenly to doe him the greateſt miſchiefe he could. But Scanderbeg well ſeeing into the malice of the man, reiected his faigned friendſhip and gifts, and in deriſion ſent him a ſpade, a mattocke, a flaile, with other ſuch inſtruments belonging vnto husbandrie: willing him to take in hand thoſe

D tooles, and to follow his fathers trade of life, and to leaue the conducting of armies vnto men of greater skill and better place. Which diſgrace Balabanus tooke in exceeding euill part; purpoſing in himſelfe, if euer it lay in his power, to be thereof reuenged. Wherefore knowing that Scanderbeg with a ſmall power lay not farre off vpon the frontiers of his kingdome, he determined ſuddenly in the night to ſet vpon him before he were aware of his comming, and ſo if it were poſſible to ouerthrow him: but Scanderbeg hauing knowledge thereof by his ſcouts, ſet forward in good order to haue met him. When Balabanus perceiuing that he was diſcouered, ſtaied vpon the way, and encamped within two miles of Scanderbeg: who had then in his armie but foure thouſand horſemen, and one thouſand and fiue hundred foot, but all choiſe men and moſt expert ſouldiours: and then lay in a large pleaſant valley called VALCHAL. At the farther

Balabanus goeth againſt Scanderbeg.

E end whereof Balabanus lay alſo encamped, neere vnto a rough and wooddie hill which encloſed that part of the valley. Whileſt both armies thus lay within view one of another, Scanderbeg well conſidering the ground the enemie had taken, and that it was like he would offer him battell, with cheerefull ſpeeches encouraged his ſouldiours: ſtraitly charging them vpon paine of his diſpleaſure, that if the enemie vpon the fortune of the battell, ſhould chance to flie or to retire, they ſhould not in anie caſe purſue them farther than the ſtraits of the hill whereby the enemie lay: gheſſing too truly, that hee would in ſo conuenient a place leaue part of his armie in ambuſh, as a ſure refuge to truſt vnto whatſoeuer ſhould befall. When he had thus encouraged and inſtructed his ſouldiours, he riſe with his armie, and in good order retired vnto the riſing of an hill, which was a good way behind the place where he before lay; of purpoſe

F to haue the aduantage of the ground, if the enemie ſhould follow to giue him battell. Balabanus ſeeing him retire, and the ſmall number of his armie, thought verily that he had fled for feare: and therefore to ſtay him who ment nothing leſſe than to flie, ſet forward in great haſte. The Turks thinking vpon ſo great aduantage to haue found no great reſiſtance, followed after Scanderbeg as if they had had him in chaſe; and by that time they were come to the place where hee ſtaied, were by their haſte greatly diſordered and out of aray. Scanderbeg his old truſtie ſouldiours ours nothing diſmaied with the haſtie comming and hideous clamour of the Turks, receiued G them with great courage: ſo that there began a fierce battell, with much ſlaughter on both ſides, which for a great while ſtood doubtfull. Yet ſuch was the inuincible courage of Scanderbeg his reſolute ſouldiours, that the Turks (who as then fought in great diſorder) were at laſt put to flight: and with much ſlaughter chaſed vnto the ſtraits of the mountaine, where Scanderbeg had before commaunded his men to ſtay. But certaine of his beſt and principall captaines forgetting what he had ſaid vnto them; and led on (whether with the heat and furie of the battell, or rather with ineuitable deſtinie is hard to ſay) vnaduiſedly purſued the enemie into thoſe ſtraits, whereof they were by Scanderbeg before warned, and charged that they ſhould not enter: where they were on euerie ſide beſet with their enemies, ariſing out of ambuſh: and after they had H a long time deſperatly fought as wild beaſts encloſed with hunters, at laſt oppreſſed with multitude, were there togither taken and brought to Balabanus; by whom they were forthwith ſent to Mahomet to CONSTANTINOPLE. Who as ſoone as he heard of their taking, is reported with great reioycing to haue ſaid: Now am I ſure that the ſtrength of Scanderbeg is broken. The names of the principall men which were there taken, was Moſes Goſemus of DIBRA, the greateſt captaine of EPIRVS next vnto Scanderbeg himſelfe; Giuriza Vladerius, Scanderbeg his kinſman; Muſachius, Scanderbeg his nephew by his ſiſter Angelina; Ginius Mu-ſachius; Ioannes Perlatus, who valiantly defended SPETIGRADE againſt Amurath; Nicholaus Beriſius; Georgius Chucca; and Ginius Maneſſius: whereof euerie one of them was able to haue conducted a great armie, and might worthely haue beene accounted amongſt the grea- I teſt captaines of that age. The taking of theſe worthie men brought ſuch a generall ſorrow and heauineſſe vpon EPIRVS, that the victorie was nothing accounted of, euerie man lamenting the loſſe of ſuch notable leaders. Scanderbeg carefull of their deliuerance; preſently ſent an Embaſſadour to Mahomet, requeſting that he might redeeme his priſoners; either by exchanging of others for them, or elſe for ſuch raunſome as it ſhould pleaſe him to ſet downe. But hee knowing them to be Scanderbeg his beſt Captaines, would neither exchange them for others, nor graunt that they ſhould be raunſomed for any gold: but after he had vſed them with all the diſpight he could deuiſe, cauſed them all by little and little, to be ſlaine quicke: in which miſe-

rable torment they liued fifteene daies, and ſo died. Scanderbeg hearing thereof, was therewith rather encouraged than diſcouraged: and in reuenge thereof, with fire and ſword entered into K
the Turks dominion, ſparing nothing that he could either burne, or poſſibly by anie other meanes deſtroy.

Mahomet glad of the taking of theſe notable men (although they were bought with the liues of manie of his people) commended Balabanus highly, as the onely man that knew how to fight againſt Scanderbeg: and in reward of his good ſeruice, ſent him diuers rich gifts, with commaundement to repaire againe his armie, and to proceed in his warres ſo happely begun.
Which thing Balabanus with all diligence performed. Yet truſting more vnto his pollicie, than his ſtrength; lying at ALCHRIA, ſent againe diuers rich preſents to Scanderbeg, as deſirous to liue in peace by him: but ſeeking indeed to bring him into ſecuritie, and ſo ſuddenly (if it were poſſible) to entrap him. Which thing Scanderbeg well perceiuing, reiected his faigned L friendſhip togither with his preſents, as ſent from a baſe peiſant. Whereupon Balabanus entered into a new deuiſe, and by ſecret meanes, with great rewards corrupted Scanderbeg his ſcouts, whereof ſome were Balabanus his kinſmen, though it were to Scanderbeg vnknowne. By which practiſe, he had vpon the ſudden in the night oppreſſed Scanderbeg, lying encamped in ORO-NYCHEVM, if Scanderbeg himſelfe (who commonly ſpent moſt part of the night in carefull watch) going about the campe, had not in the ſilence of the night a farre off perceiued the com-ming of the enemie by the noiſe of his horſes: and thereupon with wonderfull celeritie putting his armie in ſuch order as he beſt could, was readie to receiue him; and at laſt after a great fight, put him to flight: and hauing him in chaſe, ſlew moſt part of his armie, Balabanus himſelfe with a ſmall remnant hardly eſcaping. M

Now when Mahomet vnderſtood that Balabanus was ouerthrowne, and his armie loſt, hee was in doubt, whether to ſend another Generall, or elſe againe to prooue the fortune of the old. But after hee had well conſidered, that Balabanus was a right valiant Captaine, and one that well knew the countrey of EPIRVS, and withall a mortall enemie to Scanderbeg: hee reſolued to ſtaie vpon him, and not to ſend anie other. So committing to his charge fourteene thouſand

A thouſand horſemen and three thouſand foot, ſent him againe to inuade EPIRVS: and the more to encourage him, promiſed to make him king of that countrey, if he could ſubdue Scanderbeg. Balabanus with this armie comming to ALCHRIA, and ſtill in vaine plotting how hee might circumuent his warie enemie; after his wonted manner ſent diuers preſents to Scanderbeg; which he ſtill ſcornefully refuſed. Three moneths he lay ſtill at ALCHRIA, with nothing more troubled than with his owne thoughts: but finding nothing that pleaſed himſelfe, hee determined to aduenture by plaine force to ſubdue him. And vpon that reſolution marched with all his armie into the great plaines neere vnto SFETIGRADE, whither Scanderbeg came with his armie alſo, which then conſiſted of eight thouſand horſemen and fifteene hundred foot: with which ſmall
B power hee refuſed not to ioyne battaile with Balabanus, being in number two to one. But after they were come to handie blowes, to haue ſeene Scanderbeg his men fight, a man would haue ſaid them to haue beene rather raging lyons than men, they ſo furiouſly aſſailed their enemies, without regard of perill or danger, as men nothing afraid to die. Scanderbeg with great skill gouerned that battaile, carefully prouiding for euery danger: himſelfe valiantly fighting in the head of his battaile, but not without care of the reſt, ſtill ſending ſpeedie releefe where moſt need was, and bringing in freſh ſupplies in ſtead of them that were wounded or ſlaine, performed all the parts of a moſt worthie cheefetaine and valiant ſouldior: where moſt perill was, there was he ſtraight, and at his preſence danger fled, as if victorie had attended vpon him. But whileſt he thus fought in the middeſt of his enemies, his horſe fortuned to be ſlaine vnder him, and falling
C down with him, ſore bruſed one of his armes, wherof he complained long time after. The Turks ſeeing him downe, preſſed on fiercely to haue ſlaine him: but he was quickly reſcued by his owne ſouldiors, and remounted. And forthwith encountering with one Sultman, a great commaunder in the Turks armie, ſlew him in fight hand to hand: whereupon ſuch a terrour fell vpon the Turks, that they began to retire, and after a while to betake themſelus to plaine flight. Scanderbeg purſuing them with ſuch execution, that of that great armie few eſcaped with Balabanus to carrie newes home.

The battell of Sfetigrade betwixt Balabanus and Scanderbeg.

Balabanus now thrice vanquiſhed by Scanderbeg, and in the laſt battaile hauing loſt what hee could looſe, except he ſhould haue loſt himſelfe, returned to Mahomet at CONSTANTINOPLE, of whom he was ſharply rebuked for the great ouerthrowes he had ſo often receiued. At which
D time Balabanus at firſt gaue place to the kings furie: but afterwards when the heat was ouer, he with a large diſcourſe cunningly excuſed himſelfe, imputing all thoſe his miſhaps vnto the appointment of God, and the fortune of warre: and in the end told Mahomet plainely, That it was but in vaine to ſend ſuch ſmall armies into EPIRVS. But if it would pleaſe him at once to ſend two valiant Captains with a puiſſant & ſtrong armie, who deuiding the ſame betwixt them, and entering at one time into diuers parts of EPIRVS, might ſpoile the countrey before them, and encloſe Scanderbeg betwixt them, if he ſhould aduenture to giue either of them battaile, being before reſolued neither of them to offer him battaile, or yet to accept of the ſame being by him offered, except the other were alſo at hand: and ſo by mutuall conſent to vndertake him, but neuer ſingle. By which courſe he promiſed vnto him an eaſie and aſſured victorie: for as much as
E it were impoſſible for any man ſo beſet, and as it were on euery ſide coupt vp with his enemies, either to eſcape, or yet to make any great reſiſtance. This perſuaſion of Balabanus ſo well fitted the tyrants humor, that he appointed Balabanus himſelfe to be the man to put his own deuiſe in execution: giuing him commiſſion to leuie ſuch an armie as he ſhould thinke ſufficient for the performance of that ſeruice: and withall to aſſociat vnto himſelfe for his companion which ſoeuer of his captaines as he pleaſed. Balabanus according to his commiſſion, tooke muſters of the men of war, and made choice of fortie thouſand good ſouldiors, and choſe one Iacup Arnauth, (otherwiſe called Iames the Epirot, becauſe he was alſo borne in EPIRVS, a valiant captain) to be his companion: whom he ſent with ſixteene thouſand ſoldiors by the way of THESSALIA and GRECIA into EPIRVS, commaunding him in no caſe to ioyne battaile with Scanderbeg, vntill
F he himſelfe were alſo come into the countrey with the other part of the armie. And ſo ſetting both forward, Balabanus taking the neerer way through THRACIA and MACEDONIA, came firſt into EPIRVS with twentie thouſand horſemen and foure thouſand foot, and encamped in the valley of VALCHALL. Scanderbeg both by his eſpials and letters from his ſecret friends in the Turks court, hauing certaine intelligence of all Balabanus his intent and purpoſe, had in readineſſe againſt his comming a ſtrong armie of eight thouſand horſemen and foure thouſand foot, all choiſe ſouldiours. And now hearing that he was come into EPIRVS, and encamped in VALCAAL, ſent out three eſpials to diſcouer in what order he lay: one of which ſpies was Balabanus his kinſman (but not ſo knowne to Scanderbeg) by whoſe perſuaſion the other two when they had taken full view of Balabanus his army, and ſhould haue returned to Scanderbeg to haue giuen intelligence of that they had ſeene, like falſe traitors went ouer to Balabanus, and diſcouered vnto him all that they knew concerning Scanderbeg: hoping therefore to receiue ſome great reward, as their fellow had before borne them in hand. Scanderbeg maruelling that his eſpials returned not again as they were appointed, and doubting that they had been by the enemie intercepted, and vſing many times in matters of ſuch importance to truſt himſelfe beſt, preſently went out with fiue luſtie ſouldiours, and rid forth to diſcouer the manner of the enemies lying. Balabanus like a craftie fox, miſtruſting that Scanderbeg deceiued of his firſt eſpials would for like purpoſe ſend forth others, laied certain horſemen in ſecret ambuſh in diuers places, to intercept them if it were poſſible. Theſe horſemen lay not ſo couert, but that they were in good time deſcried by Scanderbeg and his followers (who with Argus eies, pried into euerie buſh and thicket as they went) before he was altogether fallen within their danger: and yet but ſo that he came to handie ſtrokes, where Scanderbeg & his followers oppreſſed with multitude, were glad to flie as faſt as they could into the next wood, the Turks horſemen following them at the heeles. It fortuned that as they were flying, a great old tree was fallen croſſe the way, which Scanderbeg putting ſpurs to his horſe, leapt ouer, with one of his men after him; the other foure not able to get ouer, turned back vpon the Turks, and there fighting were ſlaine. One of the Turks which ſo hardly purſued Scanderbeg being well mounted, forced his horſe to leape the tree, and ſtill followed after Scanderbeg: who looking backe and ſeeing but one, turned vpon him and ſlew him: the other Turks hauing ſlaine foure of Scanderbeg his men which could not get ouer the tree, returned. And Scanderbeg accompanied but with one of his followers, came back again to his campe; and there with all ſpeed put his army in readineſſe to go againſt Balabanus before the comming of his companion, with the other part of his army. Vpon which reſolution, after he had with cheerfull perſuaſions encouraged his ſouldiours, and filled their minds with hope of victorie, he ſet forward, and came with great ſpeed into the valley of VALCHAL where Balabanus lay. Scanderbeg had deuided his army into foure ſquadrons, whereof Tanuſius had the leading of one, Zacharias Groppa of another, the third was committed to Peicus Emanuel, and Scanderbeg himſelfe conducted the fourth. So ſetting forward, he ſent before certaine companies of harquebuſiers, and archers, to prouoke the enemie and to draw him foorth vnto battell. Balabanus alſo ſhewed himſelfe with his army in ſeemly order before his tents, but there ſtood faſt and would not ſtirre, expecting continually the comming of his fellow. Which Scanderbeg perceiuing, and that he ſought but to dallie out the time, and as one vnwilling to fight had againe retired his army into the ſafetie of his trenches; drew neerer and neerer vnto him, continually skirmiſhing with ſuch as he ſent out, daring him into the field, and brauing him vnto his trenches, in ſuch ſort as if he would haue forced the ſame, and by ſtrong hand haue fet him out thence. Whereat the Turks fretted and chafed exceedingly: inſomuch, that they were readie to riſe againſt their Generall, becauſe he would not lead them forth to battell, but ſuffer them to be ſo diſgraced. Balabanus mindfull of that he had promiſed vnto Mahomet his great lord and maiſter, did what he might to haue deferred time: but when he ſaw that his fellow came not, and that he could no longer delay the matter; being ſo continually aſſailed and braued by Scanderbeg his ſouldiours, that his Turks therewith prouoked, were readie oftentimes to haue iſſued out without his direction, and now no remedie but that he muſt needs fight; placed his men in good order, and ſo went out of his trenches to giue battell, himſelfe leading the left wing thereof: where betwixt him and Scanderbeg was made a fierce fight, many falling on both ſides. But Scanderbeg ſtrengthned with the old garriſon of CROIA, and the moſt expert ſouldiors of DIBRA, preuailed vpon the Turks and forced them to giue ground, yet ſtill keeping their order. The fight was ſo great in this part of the battell, that in other places they ſtood almoſt ſtill as lookers on, expecting the doubtfull fortune of their Generals: Which thing Scanderbeg perceiuing, drew certain troups out of the right wing, where as he ſaw was leaſt danger, which ſpeedily fetching a compaſſe about, charged the ſide of the enemies army; and again withdrawing themſelues, & with wonderful celeritie wheeling about, ſet vpon the back of them that fought in the left wing: ſo that the Turks there fiercely charged both before and behind, by the moſt valiant ſouldiours of Scanderbeg his ſcouts traiterouſly flie to Balabanus.

G H I K L M

A of Scanderbeg his army, fell in other places with a great ſlaughter. Balabanus with exceeding courage gainſtood his enemies, ſo long as there was any hope left: but when he ſaw the fortune of Scanderbeg to preuaile, and all about him to become deſperat, he made ſhift for himſelfe, and fled out of the battell as faſt as he could. The reſt of the army, being in other places before troubled and diſordered, fled alſo, ſome one way, ſome another, euery man as his fortune led him. Some few that followed Balabanus eſcaped: the reſt were for moſt part either ſlaine or taken priſoners.

Scanderbeg had ſcarcely well breathed himſelfe after this victorie, and diuided the ſpoile amongſt his ſouldiers; but that newes was brought to him in poſt from the Lady Mamiza his
B ſiſter, then lying at PETRELLA, that Iacuppe Arnauth was by the way of BELGRADE come into EPIRVS with an army of ſixteene thouſand horſemen, burning and deſtroying the countrey before him, and then lay encamped in the plaines of TIRANNA the leſſe. When Scanderbeg to proue the minds of his ſouldiers, had cheerfully imparted vnto them ſuch newes, as was like to be the beginning of new labour and perill; they were therewith nothing diſmaied, but ready to follow him with ſuch cheerfulneſſe of countenance and mind, as if they ſhould haue gone to ſome great feaſt or banquet: reckoning of them, but as of the remnant of a diſcomfited army. This cheerfulneſſe of his ſouldiers, Scanderbeg tooke as an aſſured token of his good ſucceſſe: and hauing all things in readineſſe, preſently ſet forward, and in ſhort time came to the place where the enemie lay. Iacuppe hearing of his comming, remoued his campe into a corner of the C plaine of TIRANNA, neere vnto a little hill, as a place of more ſafetie for his armie to lie in. Scanderbeg taking the plaine, encamped his armie in the ſame place from whence Iacuppe was but a little before departed, where he reſted one whole day. The next morning to terrifie his enemies (who as yet had not heard of the ouerthrow of Balabanus) he cauſed diuers of the Turks heads which were ſlaine in the late battell (which he had brought for that purpoſe) to be caſt before the trenches of the enemy, and withall, diuers of them which were taken priſoners to be ſhowne: Which Iacuppe beholding, in great deſpaire ſaid, I ſee the euill hap of Mahomet. Immediatly after, Scanderbeg ſent forth 500 horſemen to skirmiſh with the Turks, commanding them ſo ſoone as they were charged by the enemy to retire, if happily they might ſo be drawne into battell: which fell out accordingly. For Iacuppe now ſeeing his fellow was not to be looked for, and willing
D alſo without farther delay to trie his fortune, came readily into the field, and began a fierce battell: which endured not long, for Scanderbeg perceiuing in what part of the armie Iacuppe was, bent his greateſt force that way, and ſingling him out, with his owne hand ſlew him. Wherewith the Turks being diſcouraged, forthwith betooke themſelues to flight, and in flying, were for moſt part ſlaine or taken. Thoſe which eſcaped the preſent furie of the ſword, ſtragling through the countrey by thicke woods and blind wayes, were by the countrey people either ſlaine or taken priſoners. In theſe two battels were ſlaine of the Turks foure and twentie thouſand, and ſix thouſand taken. And of Scanderbeg his men, were loſt about a thouſand. Scanderbeg and his ſouldiers were ſo wearie of the ſlaughter of the Turks, that when it was told him the next day, that Balabanus was fled but with one cornet of horſemen, and might eaſily be ſurpri-
E ſed, if he were well purſued: he ſaid, O let ſome of our enemies liue to report their owne ſlaughter and our victorie. After that Scanderbeg had in this ſort vanquiſhed theſe great captaines, he preſently entered into the frontiers of the Turks dominions, and roaming vp and downe at his pleaſure without reſiſtance, made hauocke of all that came in his way. And after returning to CROIA with victorie, brake vp his armie, and gaue his ſouldiers leaue to depart, euery man to his owne dwelling.

Iacup ſlaine by Scanderbeg, & his armie diſcomfited.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Mahomet had with great rewards procured two Turks to 1465 vndertake to kill Scanderbeg. Theſe traitors came vnto Scanderbeg as fugitiues, making ſuch ſhew of the deteſtation both of Mahomet his tyrannicall gouernment, and vaine ſuperſtition, that they were both of Scanderbeg and others reputed to be in deed the men they deſired to be ac-F counted: and ſo after they had learned the principles of the Chriſtian religion, were by their owne deſire baptiſed. But treaſon againſt Princes whom God hath in his moſt mightie protection, cannot be long couered; much leſſe without his great ſufferance performed. So fortuned it, that theſe two falſe diſſembling traitors, expecting nothing but opportunitie to performe their diueliſh deuiſe, vpon ſome occaſion fell at variance betwixt themſelues, & in their heat, let ſome ſuch words fall, as being taken vp by ſome there preſent, drew them both into ſuſpition: and thereupon being ſtraitly examined, it was at laſt by them confeſſed, that they were ſent by Mahomet of purpoſe to haue ſlaine Scanderbeg : for which their treaſon they were both preſently executed, as they had right well deſerued. When Mahomet vnderſtood that Balabanus was ouercome, Iacup ſlaine, and both their armies almoſt quite deſtroied, he after his impatient manner fell into a great rage, and became as a man almoſt franticke: and afterwards calling together his great Baſſaes, reſolued by their aduice, not to ſend any moe Generals againſt Scanderbeg, but to goe himſelfe in perſon with ſuch an armie as ſhould at once make an end of his warres in EPIRVS for euer. Hereupon commiſſions were directed through all his kingdome, and an armie raiſed of two hundred thouſand men: whereof Scanderbeg hauing certaine aduertiſement, G fortified all his cities and ſtrong holds, eſpecially the citie of CROIA, vpon the fortune where- H of, depended the whole ſtate of his kingdome. Into this citie he put a ſtrong garriſon of his moſt valiant and faithfull ſouldiers; and throughly furniſhed the ſame with all things neceſſarie for the enduring of a long ſiege: and left one Balthaſar Perduci (a graue and worthy captaine) gouernour thereof. With like care he prouided for the ſafetie of his other cities, and tooke order that the country people were either receiued into the ſtrong townes, or elſe conuayed into other places of refuge: and left nothing abroad in the countrey for the Turks to prey vpon, as he had in like caſe done long before, at the comming of old Amurath to the ſiege of CROIA, as is before in his life declared.

By that time that Scanderbeg had ſet all things in order, his old friend Balabanus with eightie thouſand horſemen (the forerunners of Mahomet his armie) was entred into EPIRVS, and ran- I ging ouer the countrey two dayes, came and ſate downe before CROIA: Vpon whom the gouernour at his firſt comming, made many braue ſallies. In few dayes after came Mahomet with his huge armie, and there encamped alſo. Who at his firſt comming ſummoned the citie, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him, vpon ſuch vnreaſonable condit ons as it pleaſed himſelfe (as the manner of the Turke is:) whereunto the worthy gouernour returned him no other anſwere, than by continuall thundring ſhot into his campe. Whereupon Mahomet cauſed ſuch ordinance as he had, to be planted for batterie; and commanded other new to be caſt, of ſuch mettall as he had for that purpoſe brought in maſſe: all which he did rather to ſtrike a terror into the minds of the defendants, than for any great hope he had of taking the citie by force; knowing by his owne experience, that it was a place almoſt impregnable. Whileſt Mahomet was thus K buſied and little or nothing preuailed, Scanderbeg lying abroad in the woods and mountaines with a ſmall armie of moſt valiant and couragious ſouldiers, continually cut off the forragers of Mahomets armie, and ſuch as brought in victuall or neceſſaries for his campe: and many times in the night, ſuddenly brake into one quarter or other of the Turks great campe with great ſlaughter, and with continuall alarums neuer ſuffered them to reſt in quiet. Mahomet ſeeing his armie to decreaſe daily, and no hope of winning the citie but by famine, which would require a long ſiege: and fearing alſo to make that ſame place againe famous by ſome notable miſchance, which might happen vnto himſelfe vnder the wals of CROIA, as had before vnto his father Amurath; determined to returne himſelfe to CONSTANTINOPLE, and to leaue Balabanus with a great part of his armie to continue the ſiege. Vpon which determination he committed L the charge and ordering of the whole matter for the continuing of the ſiege to Balabanus, ioyning vnto him eight of his moſt expert captaines; yet ſo, as that they ſhould be all at Balabanus his command. And ſo leauing with him three and twentie thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers, and with euery one of the other eight captaines ſeuen thouſand moe, departed himſelfe with the reſt of his armie from CROIA towards CONSTANTINOPLE. But by the way as he went he tooke from Scanderbeg certaine ſmall forts, and with faire promiſes corrupting the Gouernour of a place called CHIDNA, wherein eight thouſand of Scanderbeg his ſouldiers lay, had the ſame deliuered into his power, vpon his faith before giuen, That all the ſouldiers with the reſt of the people ſhould in ſafetie depart thence. But after the tyrant had them in his power, without regard of faith or promiſe, he cauſed them all moſt cruelly to be cut in peeces, ſparing nei- M ther man, woman, nor child, to the great griefe and weakening of Scanderbeg, who had not at any time before receiued ſo great a loſſe. And after he had ſo raged, he in great melancholie returned vnto CONSTANTINOPLE.

Scanderbeg diſdaining to haue his chiefe citie beſieged by Balabanus, ſometime one of the baſeſt of his fathers ſubiects : and yet finding himſelfe vnable to releeue the ſame, for as much

A as his ſouldiers were with continuall wars ſore waſted, and his warie enemies lay ſo encamped, as that they were not but by a ſtrong armie to be remoued, ſent vnto the Venetians and other the confederate Princes of ALBANIA, ILLYRIA, and DALMATIA, praying of them aid now at his need againſt that enemie, which preuailing againſt him, would forthwith ſet vpon them. All which Princes promiſed forthwith to ſend their ſuccours. At the ſame time alſo he paſſed ouer into ITALIE ſecretly, and diſguiſed in ſimple attire, came to ROME, to craue aid of Paulus the ſecond of that name, then great Biſhop: by whom he was honourably entertained, but obtained nothing of that he came for; ſo cold was his holy deuotion: onely at his departure he gaue vnto Iunetrio, Scanderbeg his treaſurer, a poore almes of three thouſand duckats.

B Scanderbeg returning into EPIRVS, found all ſuch aid ready as was promiſed from the confederate Princes, but eſpecially from the Venetians, which was for moſt part drawne out of their garriſons of SCVTARI, DRIVASTO, ALYSSA, and DIRRHACHIVM: ſo that he had in few daies in his armie thirteene thouſand foure hundred choice ſouldiers. With this ſtrength he marched towards CROIA: but vnderſtanding by the way, that Ionima was within a daies iourney comming with a new ſupplie to his brother Balabanus, he drew out certaine troupes of his beſt horſemen: and coaſting ouer the countrey in the night, ſuddenly came vpon the Turks, and put them to flight; where amongſt others, Ionima himſelfe, with his ſonne Hedar, were taken priſoners, whom he ſhewed the next day in bonds to Balabanus. This exploit ſo happily performed, he with all ſpeed returned to his armie: and ſo marching to CROIA, by plaine force driue the C Turks from the mountaine CRVINA, their greateſt ſtrength, and neereſt to the citie of CROIA. Which thing when Balabanus ſaw, he with certaine troupes of horſemen rid euen to the gates of the citie, perſwading the defendants to yeeld the citie, making them in the name of his maſter ſuch offers and promiſes as he thought might moſt moue them. But they nothing regarding his words, but rather incenſed with his preſumption, ſallied out vpon him, and enforced him to retire: but he therewith enraged, and halfe mad for anger, came vpon them with a freſh charge, thinking by plaine force to haue driuen them backe into the citie. In which skirmiſh he was by one Georgius Alexius with a bullet ſhot quite thorow the throat; and feeling himſelfe mortally wounded, ſetting ſpurres to his horſe, ran as faſt as he could to his campe, where he preſently fell downe from his horſe and died. The Turks diſcouraged with the death of their Generall, and D the comming of Scanderbeg, riſe the ſame night, and with great ſilence retired themſelues vnto the plaine of TIRANA, about eight miles from CROIA. Scanderbeg the next morning entring the forſaken tents of the Turks, found therein great ſtore of corne and other victuals, which he cauſed to be forthwith conueyed into the citie, and in great triumph followed after himſelfe, to the great ioy and comfort of his late beſieged ſubiects: whom he highly commended for their fidelitie, and bountifully rewarded according to their deſerts. The ſame day he ſent certaine companies of ſouldiers to take the ſtrait paſſages whereby the Turks muſt needs paſſe in their returne out of EPIRVS: which when the Turks vnderſtood, they ſent two meſſengers vnto Scanderbeg (who ſeemed to be men of good account in the armie) offering in the name of the reſt of the captaines and commanders, to deliuer vnto him their horſes and armes, ſo that they E might in ſafetie depart with their liues. Which their requeſt Scanderbeg propounding vnto his counſellors and captaines, was by them diuerſly diſgeſted. In concluſion, they receiued this anſwere from Scanderbeg himſelfe, That as they came into his countrey without his commandement, ſo ſhould they not by his leaue depart thence. The Turks receiuing this ſhort anſwere by their meſſengers, and conſidering that they muſt needs in that bare country in ſhort time periſh, either with famine or with the ſword; the very ſame night departed from TIRANNA, and in the dead time of the night entering the aforeſaid ſtraits, by plaine force deſperatly brake through and eſcaped, but not without their great loſſe: for whoſe eſcape the common ſouldiers murmured greeuouſly againſt Scanderbeg, and were not without much adoe appeaſed. In ſhort time after, Scanderbeg recouered all ſuch places as Mahomet had before taken from him, and put to F ſword the ſouldiers he had left for the keeping of the ſame: which done, he brake vp his armie, retaining only two thouſand horſemen and a thouſand foot for the defence of his frontiers.

Scanderbeg ſurprizeth Ionima the brother of Balabanus, and Hedar his ſonne.

The Turkiſh Tyrant hearing of the euill ſucceſſe of his affaires in EPIRVS, as that his Generall was ſlaine, CROIA releeued, his armie diſcomfited, and all that he had done, brought to nought; fretted thereat exceedingly, and was therewith ſo much greeued, that he could not for a ſeaſon eat or drinke or take reſt, his diſcontented thoughts ſo much troubled him. In the end, to reme- 1466

die the matter, he reſolued the next Spring to goe againe in perſon himſelfe with a moſt puiſſant G armie into EPIRVS, and ſo if it were poſſible, to make a full conqueſt thereof: of which his purpoſe Scanderbeg vnderſtanding, prouided for his comming, as he had in former time. The Spring being come, Mahomet according to his former reſolution, with a mightie armie entred into EPIRVS, and there with exceeding labour & charge firſt repaired or rather reedified the old ruines of the citie of VALMES, wherein he left a ſtrong garriſon, of purpoſe to trouble that part of the countrey. From thence he marched to DIRRACHIVM (now called DVRAZZO, but of old time EPIDAMNVM) a cit e vpon the ſea coaſt, then in the poſſeſſion of the Venetians, famous for many things in the time of the Romane empire, but eſpecially for the flight of the Romane Senate thither, and their entertainement there in the time of the ciuil wars betwixt Cæſar and Pompeius. H
This citie Mahomet thought to haue taken vnprouided, and ſo vpon the ſuddaine to haue carried it; but was therein much deceiued, finding it ſtrongly fortified and manned both by the Venetians and Scanderbeg. Where when he had there ſpent ſome time, and to his great loſſe in vain attempted the citie; he riſe vpon the ſuddaine: and retiring into EPIRVS, came and ſat downe againe before CROIA, of purpoſe by his ſuddaine comming to haue terrified the citizens: and vainely perſuaded, that he had left Scanderbeg in DIRRACHIVM, for that in the aſſailing thereof he had diſcouered many of Scanderbeg his men, and thereby ſuppoſed him to haue beene there alſo; the greateſt cauſe why he ſo ſuddenly riſe and came to CROIA. At his firſt comming he offered great rewards and large priuiledges vnto the citizens, if they would forthwith yeeld vp their citie; otherwiſe he threatned vnto them all the calamities of warre, vowing neuer to depart I thence before he had it: whereunto he receiued no other anſwere out of the citie than was ſent him by the mouth of the Cannon, or brought him by many moſt braue ſallies. Scanderbeg in the meane while continually moleſting his campe, and euery night falling into one quarter or another thereof. Mahomet taught by experience, to what ſmall purpoſe it would be for him to lie there long, riſe with his armie, and marched againe to the ſea ſide to a place now called the head of REDON vpon the gulfe of VENICE, not farre from DIRRACHIVM, where Scanderbeg had begun to build a new citie called CHIVRILL, not yet finiſhed: which Mahomet in deſpight of the man, raſed downe to the ground. After that, hearing that many of the Epirots were retired into the mountaines, he went to ſeeke them out, and was with great loſſe by thoſe mountaine people repulſed: Scanderbeg ſtill following him at the heeles, and awaiting all oportunities, K daily cut off part of his armie. So that at laſt the tyrant deſpairing of any good to be done in that expedition, was glad to depart out of EPIRVS, hauing atcheeued nothing worth his comming, and ſo full of diſcontentment and melancholie returned into CONSTANTINOPLE.

After all theſe great troubles, Scanderbeg rid ouer moſt part of EPIRVS, to view the ſtate of his kingdome, and ſo at laſt came to LYSSA (a citie of the Venetians, which he had alwaies ſpecially liked) there to conferre with the Venetian legat and other the confederat princes, of matters concerning their ſtate in generall, as his manner was: but more particularly how they might take the citie of VALMES, which Mahomet had the laſt yeare built in the ſiegnorie of Aryannites Comynat, and much troubled that part of EPIRVS. But whileſt he lay there, he fell ſicke of a Scanderbeg falleth ſicke. feauer, which daily ſo encreaſed vpon him, that he became ſicke euen vnto death: and now perL ceiuing his end to draw nigh, ſent for his wife and ſonne, with the princes & lords his confederates, and the embaſſadours of the Venetians, into his bed chamber. Where after he had at large with greater pain notably diſcourſed of his troubleſome life led amongſt them, than he had before paſſed the ſame, and carefully forewarned them of the dangers like to enſue; he earneſtly exhorted them to continue in vnitie & concord, and valiantly to ſtand in defence of their religion, countrey, and libertie. And afterwards turning his ſpeech to his wife and his ſonne, commended them both with his kingdome to the tuition of the Venetians: who by the articles of the confederation betwixt him and them, were in honour bound to protect his ſonne and kingdome, during the time of his minoritie, and afterwards peaceably to place him in the ſame. In fine, he willed his wife after his death to paſſe ouer with her ſonne into APVLIA, where they M

The bloudie bane of faithlesse Turkes, and terrour of their name, EPIRVS strong defence and guard, lay buried there with fame:
Within that tombe wherein long since, Great Castriotus lay,
But now those limbes and tombe defac'd, are carried quite away;
The remnants of that worthy wight out of his graue were torne:
And being dead could find no rest, but were for iewels worne.
For after he farre spent with age, gaue place to fatall doome,
And left his fathers kingdome got, and kept with great renowme; I Forthwith the cruell Turks preuaild, and all things there possest:
Who worshipping his stately tombe, and place of quiet rest, Digg'd vp his bones, and brake the tombe wherein he did remaine:
And glad was he that could thereof some little part obtaine.
As if in them some martiall force, or vertue great had beene:
Or fortune rare, such as before in him was liuing seene.
So vertue which to others giues a sepulture and graue,
Bereft it him, yet forst his foe in honour it to haue.

Mathias king of Hungarie, taketh the kingdome of Bosna from the Turke.

Most part of the time of these warres betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, the Venetians by sea and the Hungarians by land, kept the Turks throughly busied. Mathias Coruinus King of HVNGARIE (according to his promise made vnto the Venetians) entred into the kingdome of BOSNA, where by force he ouerthrew the strong forts which the Turks had built for the defence of their frontiers, and manfully draue them out before him vntill he came to IAZIGA (of some called IAITZE) the chiefe citie of BOSNA, which he at length tooke: and following the course of his victorie, scarcely suffered the Turks to breath, vntill he had by force wrested all that kingdome out of their hands. Wherewith Mahomet being exceedingly grieued, in great furie came with a strong armie into BOSNA, and laid hard siege to IAZIGA, which was by the Christians right valiantly defended: vntill Mathias with a puissant armie came to the reliefe thereof, who so troubled the Turks campe with continuall skirmishes on the one side, and they of the towne with desperat sallies on the other; that at length the proud Turke was driuen to such extremitie, L that he was glad secretly to steale away by night with all his armie into SERVIA; and for hast to leaue behind him both his tents and great ordinance, which (the Turks histories report) he caused to be cast into the riuer, because it should not come into the hands of the Christians. Mathias after he had thus valiantly put to flight his enemies and relieued his citie, followed the Turks into SERVIA, and tooke part of that countrey also, which together with BOSNA he vnited to the kingdome of HVNGARIE. In these warres, Mahomet had such proofe of the force and power of Mathias and the Hungarians, that for a good while after he had no great stomacke to prouoke them farther: for why, the name of Mathias was now become vnto the Turks no lesse dreadfull, than was sometime the name of his father the valiant Huniades.

The Venetians at the same time also with their gallies scoured the seas, & landing their men M sometime in one place, sometime in another, did great harme in many places of the Turks dominion neere vnto the sea coast. Amongst other their Generals at diuers times sent from that state, one Nicholas Canalis succeeding Lauretanus (whom we haue before spoken of) as soone as he had receiued his charge, came with his fleet into the bay of SALONICHI, and landing his men, burnt diuers townes and villages alongst the sea side. Afterwards returning into PELO-

PONESVS,

A PONESVS, he fortified the towne of LEOOSTICIVM in the gulfe of PATRAS, which worke the Turks with their often skirmiſhes laboured to haue hindred, but in deſpite of all they could doe it was brought to perfection, and a ſtrong garriſon therein left for the defence therof, which done, he returned againe to EVBŒA. Shortly after, he with the ſame fleet put to ſea againe; and ſailing alongſt the coaſt of MACEDONIA and THRACIA, ſurpriſed the citie of ÆNVS which ſtandeth vpon the mouth of the riuer Meritza, called in ancient time Hebrus, vpon which riuer the famous cities ANDRINOPLE and PHILIPPOPOLIS are alſo ſituate. Canalis after he had taken the ſpoile of the citie returned to his gallies, carrying away with him two thouſand captiues into EVBŒA. At the ſame time alſo, the Venetians giuing aid vnto Nicholaus Duchaine
B againſt his brother Alexius, then at variance for the principalitie of ZADRIMA, neere vnto the riuer of DRINO in EPIRVS, gaue a great ouerthrow to the Turks which came in the quarrell of Alexius.

Mahomet not a little offended with the harmes done vnto him by the Venetians, and perceiuing that the Iſland of EVBŒA (now called NIGROPONTE) was for the commodious ſituation and ſtrength thereof, the chiefe place from whence they wrought him all theſe wrongs, and whither they afterwards retired againe, as vnto a moſt ſure place of refuge; determined with himſelfe at once to be euen with them for all, and to imploy his whole forces both by ſea and land, for the gaining of that place. This Iſland of EVBŒA is about an hundred miles in length, and lieth ouer againſt that part of GRECIA which was of old called BŒOTIA, from whence it is
C ſeparated with a narrow ſtrait of the ſea: it aboundeth with corne, wine, oile, fruit, and wood fit for ſhipping. The chiefe citie thereof, was in ancient time called CHALCIDE, and of latter time NIGROPHONTE, by which name alſo the whole Iſland was knowne: albeit the Turks now call it EGRIBOS: a populous, rich, and ſtrong citie; ſo fortified with wals and bulwarks, that (in moſt mens iudgement) it ſeemed a place impregnable. Vnto this ſtrong citie Mahomet reſolued to lay ſiege, knowing well that vpon the fortune therof depended the ſtate of the whole Iſland. Wherefore he aſſembled a mightie armie, and made great preparation both by ſea and land: and when all things were in readineſſe, ſent Mahomet (the great Baſſa of the court) with a fleet of three hundred gallies, and certaine other ſmall veſſels well furniſhed with ſouldiers, mariners, and all things neceſſarie, by ſea into EVBŒA: and with a great armie marched himſelfe
D by land through ACHAIA, vntill he came ouer againſt the citie of CHALCIS. The Venetian Admirall hearing of the comming of the Turks fleet, ſet forward to haue met them neere vnto the ſtraits of HELLESPONTVS: but after he had by his eſpials deſcried the great number of the enemies fleet, finding himſelfe too weake, ſhaped his courſe to the Iſland of SCIROS. The Baſſa comming out of the ſtraits of HELLESPONTVS, couered the ſea with his fleet, and holding on his entended courſe, without let came to EVBŒA: where at his firſt landing, he tooke STORA and BASILICON, two ſmall townes, which he raſed to the ground, and from thence went directly to CHALCIS. As ſoone as this great fleet was there arriued, Mahomet cauſed a bridge to be made of his ſmaller veſſels ouer the ſtrait betwixt ACHAIA and EVBŒA, whereby he paſſed all his armie, and ſo belaid the citie round both by ſea and land. And after he had planted his
E batterie, began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the wals: wherein he had in ſhort time made faire breaches, and the ſooner for that one Thomas of LIBVRNIA (chiefe canonier of the citie) before corrupted by the Turks, by ſignes agreed vpon, gaue them certaine knowledge in what places the wals were weakeſt: whereby they ſo aptly planted their batterie, as if they had taken view on the inſide of the wals. Which foule treaſon was at length perceiued, and the traitor therefore worthily executed. Yet little preuailed the tyrant thereby, for ſuch was the induſtrie of the defendants, that whatſoeuer he had by the furie of his great ordinance beaten downe by day, that they with reſtleſſe labour repaired againe by night. Thus was the ſiege continued thirtie dayes, in which ſpace many a ſharpe aſſault was giuen by the Turks, to their great loſſe; and the citie ſtill valiantly defended by the Chriſtians. At length the Venetian Admirall (to the great comfort of F the beſieged) came with his fleet within view of the citie, making ſemblant as if he would haue giuen the Turks battell. Whereupon it is reported, that Mahomet was about to haue raiſed his ſiege, and haue got himſelfe ouer into the maine, for feare the Venetians ſhould with their gallies haue broken the bridge, and ſo haue ſhut him vp into that Iſland: Which thing it was thought the Admirall might haue done to his great praiſe, if he would as a couragious chieftaine haue aduentured the matter, as he was earneſtly requeſted by the captains of euery priuat gally;

But he fearing to come any neerer, came to an anchor and moued not, neither gaue any ſigne of comfort or reliefe to the beſieged. Which thing the Turkiſh King quickly perceiuing, & therewith encouraged: hauing now in diuers places beaten downe the wals, and made them ſault-table; brought on his men to the breaches, promiſing them the ſpoile of the citie, with many other great rewards and hie preferments according to their particular deſerts, wherof he ſaid, he would himſelfe be an eye-witneſſe. Hereupon the Turks gaue a moſt fierce and furious aſſault, which the defendants with inuincible courage receiued, and made ſuch ſlaughter of them, that the ditches were filled, and the breaches made vp with the bodies of the dead Turks. But ſuch was the number of that populous armie (the greateſt ſtrength of the Turks) that the liuing little H felt the loſſe of the dead: Mahomet continually ſending in new ſupplies of freſh men, in ſtead of them that were ſlaine or wounded: So that one could no ſooner fall, but two or three ſtept vp in his roome, and ſo ſucceſſiuely, as if new men had ſprong out of the bodies of the dead. Twiſe they had euen woon the breaches, and were both times with wonderfull ſlaughter beaten out againe. This deadly and dreadfull aſſault, was maintained a whole day and a night without in-Chalcis taken by the Turks. termiſſion. At length the defendants being for the moſt part ſlaine or wounded, and the reſt wearied with long fight, and vnable to defend the towne now aſſaulted almoſt round, retired from the breaches into the market place, and there like reſolute men, ſold their liues at a deere price vnto the Turks. Amongſt the ſlaine Chriſtians, were found the dead bodies of many notable women, who ſeeing the ruine of the citie, choſe rather to die with their friends in defence I thereof, than aliue to fall into the hands of their barbarous enemies.

Mahomet being now become lord of the citie, and hauing loſt fortie thouſand of his Turks in that ſiege, in reuenge thereof cauſed all the men that were found in the citie aliue, to be put to moſt cruell death, eſpecially the Italians, vpon whom he ſhewed his tyrannie with moſt exqui-ſit and horrible torments. Paulus Ericus gouernour of the citie, with a few others, who with him were fled into the caſtle, without reſiſtance deliuered the ſame vnto him, vpon his faithfull promiſe, that they might in ſafetie depart: but after that he had got them into his power, the perfidious tyrant without regard, commanded them all to be cruelly murthered. The gouernours daughter a maiden of incomparable beautie, was amongſt the reſt taken priſoner, and for her rare perfection, by them that tooke her preſented to Mahomet, as the mirrour of beautie: The K barbarous tyrant greedie of ſo faire a prey, ſought firſt by flattering words and faire perſwaſion, to induce her to conſent to his deſire: but when he could not ſo preuaile, he fell into another vaine, and began to ſhew himſelfe in his owne nature, threatning her with death, torture, and force, worſe than death it ſelfe, if ſhee would not otherwiſe yeeld vnto his appetite.
Whereunto the conſtant virgin (worthie eternall fame) anſwered ſo reſolutely, and ſo contrary to the tyrants expectation, that he being therewith enraged, commanded her to be preſently ſlaine. The horrible and monſtrous crueltie, with the filthie outrages by that beaſtly and barſlauerie, vnder which it yet groaneth. This calamitie happened vnto the Venetian ſtate, or ra- L ther (to ſay truly) to the generall hurt of the Chriſtian common-weale, in the yeere of our redemption 1470.

Canalis the Venetian Admirall, who all the time of the ſiege, had in the ſight of the citie lien at anchor as a looker on; fearing now that the citie was loſt, to be ſet vpon by the Turks fleet, hoiſed ſaile, and laded with diſhonour returned in haſte vnto VENICE, where he was by the commandement of the Senat committed to priſon, and afterward with all his familie exiled to VTINVM.

Shortly after, when Mahomet was departed with his armie out of EVBŒA, and his fleet re-1471 turned to CONSTANTINOPLE: the Venetians with their gallies, attempted to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the citie, a little before loſt. But Mahomet had therein left ſo ſtrong a garri- M ſon, that when the Venetians had landed their men, they were againe enforced to retire to their gallies, and to forſake their Iſland.

CHALCIS thus loſt with all the Iſland of EVBŒA, the Venetians choſe Petrus Mocenicus, a valiant and diſcreet gentleman, Admirall of their fleet, in ſtead of Canalis: and by their embaſſa-dours ſollicited Sixtus the fourth of that name, then Biſhop of ROME, and Ferdinand King

A of NAPLES, with Lewis king of CYPRVS, and the grand maſter of the RHODES, to ioyne their forces together with theirs againſt the great and common enemie: which thing all the aforeſaid Chriſtian princes promiſed them to doe. And the more to entangle the Turke, they at the ſame time ſent Caterinus Zenus their Embaſſadour with rich preſents vnto Alymbeius Vſun-Caſſanes, the great king of PERSIA, to incite him on that ſide againſt the Turke: in which negotiation Zenus ſo well behaued himſelfe, that the next yeare following that great king tooke vp armes againſt Mahomet, and had with him mortall warres, as ſhall be in conuenient place hereafter declared. Mahomet not ignorant of theſe proceedings of the Venetians, and that they did what they might to ſtirre vp as many enemies as they could, and to bring him (if it were poſſible) into
B hatred with the whole world: and well knowing how much he had offended the minds of the Chriſtian princes with the crueltie he had of late vſed againſt them of CHALCIS, thought it not beſt as then further to prouoke them, and ſo happily to bring all at once about his cares, but for a ſeaſon to lie ſtill at CONSTANTINOPLE, as if he had beene deſirous now to liue in peace, not meaning further harme: hoping thereby, that although he concluded no peace with any of them (which indeed he was not deſirous of) yet that tract of time might mitigate the hainouſneſſe of the fact, and coole the heat of their diſpleaſure: whereby it came to paſſe as he wiſhed, that nothing worth the ſpeaking of was that yeare attempted againſt him. And becauſe the Perſian king was the man of whom he ſtood moſt in doubt, he ſought by his embaſſadours to pacifie him, and to withdraw him from the league of the Chriſtians: requeſting him, if it
C were for nothing els but for the communitie of the Mahometan religion, wherein they well agreed, and were thereby the profeſſed enemies of the Chriſtians, to withdraw his hand, and in their cauſe to ceaſe to take vp armes: vrging now (for that it ſo ſtood with his purpoſe) the zeale of religion, whereas otherwiſe he regarded (as was thought) no religion at all. But Zenus the Venetian Embaſſadour lying continually in the Perſian court, ſo wrought the matter with Vſun-Caſſanes, that he told the Turks Embaſſadours plainely, That he could not nor would not longer endure the manifeſt iniurie and wrong done vnto him by the Turkiſh king: and farther, that he had made a faithfull league with the Chriſtian princes, and therefore would to the vttermoſt of his power make it knowne vnto the world, that he would effectually performe what thing ſoeuer he had promiſed: and ſo diſmiſſed them, now no leſſe diſcontented than were D before the Perſian Embaſſadours at ſuch time as they returned from the Turks court, hauing obtained nothing they then requeſted concerning the Emperour of TRAPEZOND.

1472 The Venetians aided by king Ferdinand, the Biſhop of Rome, and the great maſter of the Rhodes, doe the Turks great harme all alongſt the coaſt of the leſſer Aſia.

The yeare following, Mocenicus the Venetian Admirall with his fleet arriued in the Iſle of LESBOS, where he did great harme. From thence he paſſed the bay of ADRAMITTIVM into the leſſer ASIA, and ſore ſpoiled the countrey about PERGAMVS. After that he landed againe at CNIDVS vpon the coaſt of CARIA, where he tooke a great bootie: and ſo hauing done the Turks exceeding much harme in ASIA all alongſt the ſea coaſt oppoſit to GRÆCIA, he returned laden with ſpoile towards PELOPONESVS. In his returne, about the promontorie of MALEA, vpon the coaſt of PELOPONESVS, he met with Richaienſis comming vnto him with ſeuenteene gallies from king Ferdinand: by whom hee was certified, that the great Biſhops fleet was
E readie to come forth alſo. After mutual gratulation, as the manner at ſea is, the Admirals ioining their fleets in one, landed at METHONE, now called MODON, then a citie of the Venetians in PELOPONESVS: where after they had well refreſhed their ſouldiours, and taken in freſh victuals, they put to ſea againe; and ſailing through the Iſlands, landed in ASIA, where they were at their firſt landing encountered by the countrey Turks, whom at laſt they put to flight, and by the ſpace of foure dayes tooke what pillage they could in the countrey: where the ſouldiours found great ſtore of rich bootie, eſpecially of Turkie carpets, which are there made in great abundance. From thence they ſayled to HALICARNASVS, which is a part of CARIA (where ſometime ſtood the ſtately tombe which Queene Artemeſia built for her Huſband Mauſolus, accounted amongſt the wonders of the world) where they tooke a wonderfull ſpoile. There came vnto
F them Nicholas Biſhop of MODRVSSA, with twentie gallies ſent from the great Biſhop: whom the other two Generals welcommed with great ioy. At the ſame time alſo came thither two gallies from the great maſter of the RHODES. With this fleet of 85 gallies, they ſailed to the Iſle of SAMOS ouer againſt EPHESVS (ſometime a place of great fame, but then altogether deſolate and vnpeopled) there to conſult for their further proceeding in thoſe warres. Looſing from SAMOS, they tooke their courſe alongſt the coaſt of ASIA, and landed at ATTALIA, the cheefe citie

of PAMPHILIA, a place of great trafficke: where they found in the ſuburbes of the citie great G
ſtore of many rich commodities, brought thither out of ÆGIPT and SYRIA; whereof they tooke what pleaſed them, and burnt the reſt, together with the ſuburbes. Vnto the citie it ſelfe they began to lay ſiege, but perceiuing that it was not without great loſſe of their men to be taken, they departed thence: and running all alongſt the coaſt of PAMPHILIA, burnt & deſtroied what came in their way, and ſo returned backe againe to the RHODES: where they met an Embaſſadour from Vſun-Caſſanes the Perſian king, to the Biſhop and the Venetians, for great ordinance; whereof that ſo mightie a prince was altogether vnfurniſhed. Of this Embaſſador they vnderſtood, that Vſun-Caſſanes was entred into league with the Chriſtian princes, and now buſie in making preparation againſt the Turke. At which time Mahomet requited the Venetians H with no leſſe harme in EPIRVS and DALMATIA, than they had done to him in ASIA: for now that Scanderbeg was dead, the Turks mightely preuailed vpon the weake princes of EPIRVS and ALBANIA, with the countries adioyning. The Chriſtian fleet departing from the RHODES, landed in the countrey of the Myndians, a part of CARIA, and with great ſpoile returned to the Iſland of NAXOS, one of the CYCLADES: from whence king Ferdinand his gallies returned home, laded with much rich ſpoile; for now the yeare was farre ſpent. Yet after the departure of the kings gallies, Mocenicus with the Legate returned backe againe into ASIA, and there landing their men, tooke the famous citie of SMYRNA in IONIA, and when they had taken the ſpoile therof, ſet it on fire. At which time alſo they did great harme about CLAZOMENE, not farre from SMYRNA. So Winter drawing now faſt on, they returned laded with the rich I ſpoyles of ASIA, the Legate into ITALIE, and Mocenicus to METHONE.

1473 The inſatiable deſire of ſoueraignetie, whereunto the Turkiſh king was naturally enclined, had continually armed him, not onely againſt the Chriſtian princes, but againſt others alſo euen of his owne ſuperſtition: making no great difference betwixt the one & the other, if ſo he might extend his dominion. He had long before vnder the pretence of a friendly parley craftely circumuented the king of MYSIA, a countrey in ASIA, and hauing got him within his danger, cruelly put him to death, & by force ſubduing his kingdome, left not one of the kings blood aliue. After that he inuaded CILICIA, which the Turks call CARAMANIA, where the two young brethren, Pyramet and Caſſambet raigned, and draue them both out of CILICIA: of whom Pyramet the elder, fled for refuge to Vſun-Caſſanes; Caſſambet the yonger aſſiſted by his old friends, K ſought by force of armes to recouer againe his inheritance wrongfully by the Turks poſſeſſed, and was beſieging certaine townes vpon the ſea coaſt, which being taken from the Turks would eaſily draw all the reſt of the kingdome after them. Mocenicus the Venetian Admirall being now with the firſt of the Spring come vpon the coaſt of CILICIA, at the requeſt of Caſſambet landed certaine companies of his men vnder the leading of Victor Superantius, and certaine peeces of great artillerie, wherewith he ſo battered the walls of SICHINVM, that he enforced the Turks therein to yeeld vp the citie: which he deliuered to Caſſambet. In like manner he tooke the citie of CORYCVS, which he alſo reſtored to Caſſambet. At laſt he laid ſiege to SELEVCIA, which ſtandeth vpon the riuer ORONTES, and was built by king Seleucus, one of the ſucceſſors of Alexander the Great, diſtant from the ſea about fiue miles: the Gouernour of this L citie diſcouraged with the ſight of the great artillerie, deliuered the citie to the Venetian captain, who by the appointment of the Admirall reſtored the ſame to Caſſambet. Who by this meanes brought againe into his kingdome, gaue great thanks vnto the Admirall, promiſing both for himſelfe and for his brother to be alwayes friends vnto the Venetians. Mocenicus departing from CILICIA, landed his men in LYCIA, and harried that countrey all alongſt the ſea coaſt. And this Mocenicus ſailed into CYPRVS, to appeaſe a great inſurrection there raiſed againſt the queene, who was by her huſband at his death left to the protection of the Venetians: which rebellion when he had well quieted, hearing that Triadanus Grittus, was by the decree of the Senat appointed Admirall, and alreadie come into PELOPONESVS, he with as much ſpeed as he could haſted thither, to giue vp his charge, and ſo to returne home againe to VENICE. M

Mahomet no leſſe troubleſome vnto the Mahometane princes than to the Chriſtians.

About this time the great Perſian king Vſun-Caſſanes began to make warre vpon the Turkiſh emperor Mahomet, for the better vnderſtanding whereof, it ſhal not be from our purpoſe briefly to ſhew by what meanes this Vſun-Caſſanes, of a ſmall prince aſpired to the kingdome of PERSIA, and ſo in ſhort time grew to that greatneſſe, that he was iuſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt monarchs of the world then liuing; as appeareth by theſe warres betwixt him and the great

Turkiſh

A Turkiſh emperour Mahomet. This Vſun-Caſſanes of whom we now ſpeake, was the ſonne of that Tachretin, who with other poor princes was driuen into exile by the violence of Baiazet the firſt, great grandfather to this Mahomet the great emperour of the Turks, and was againe reſtored by the great Tamerlane, as is before declared in the life of Baiazet. By the death of Tachretin, his ſonne Vſun-Caſſanes (of ſome called alſo Aſymbeius) obtained that ſmall territorie which his father had in ARMENIA: nothing anſwering vnto the greatneſſe of his conceits. Wherefore not contented with ſuch poſſeſsions as was from his father diſcended vnto him, hee began to ſhoulder for more roome, with ſuch weake princes his neighbours as he thought hee might beſt deale withall; wringing one prouince from this prince, another from that, & thruſting ſome
B others quite out of all that they had: And in ſhort time ſo enlarged his dominion, that he had got into his hands a great part of ARMENIA, and was reputed both for a mightie and fortunat prince. Inſomuch, that Calo Ioannes then emperour of TRAPEZONDE (whoſe power altogither anſwered not to the greatneſſe of his ſtile, being for moſt part ſhut vp within the bounds of PONTVS; and fearing the greatneſſe of the Turkiſh emperour Mahomet, whoſe name began then to grow dreadfull vnto his neighbour princes) gaue to him his onely daughter Deſpina in marriage: by ſuch aliance to ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt the Turkiſh tyrant, if need ſhould require. At which marriage it was agreed, that Vſun-Caſſanes ſhould in the right of his wife enioy all the kingdome of PONTVS, after the death of Calo-Ioannes her father, and of Dauid his brother: and that Deſpina ſhould ſo long as ſhe liued haue the free exerciſe of her Chriſtian religion.
C By this woman, Vſun Caſſanes had a daughter called Martha, whom I willingly remember, for that ſhe was the mother of Hyſmael, afterwards the great king of PERSIA, commonly called Hyſmael the Sophi: of whom more ſhall bee ſaid hereafter in the life of Selimus. Vſun-Caſſanes honoured with this great marriage, and ſtrengthened with this new alliance, ceaſed not after his wonted manner daily to encroch vpon his neighbour princes: and proceeded ſo farre, that at length he began to lay hand vpon a part of ARMENIA, which was then part of the dominion of the Perſian king. Zenza (whom ſome call Tzokies, which was indeed the name of his father) raigning then in PERSIA, by his embaſſadours admoniſhed and in ſort commaunded Vſun-Caſſanes to hold himſelfe content with his owne, or at leaſt with that he had alreadie wrongfully taken from others, and not to preſume to come within the bounds of his dominion, threat-
D ning otherwiſe to take him as an enemie to his ſtate, and to turne his forces vpon him. With which embaſſage Vſun-Caſſanes being much offended, gaue the embaſſadors no entertainment, but commanded them with ſpeed to get them out of his kingdome, and to tell their maſter, That he would ſhortly himſelfe in perſon come and debate the matter with him face to face. With which proud anſwere from ſo meane a prince, the Perſian king moued, leuied ſuch an armie for the inuading of him, as was thought to haue beene ſufficient to haue ſubdued a farre greater prince: and ſo appointed, ſet forward toward ARMENIA. Vſun-Caſſanes much inferiour to this great king in wealth and number of men, but not in hautineſſe of mind and valiantneſſe of courage, ſtaied not to expect the comming of ſo puiſſant an enemie, but full of hope ſet forward to meet him, and by great iournies ſought to come vpon him before he could haue any knowledge
E of his comming: yet had he then in his army ſcarcely one man to ten, but all armed with courageous hearts, & conducted by a moſt fortunat chieftaine which feared nothing. So holding on his way, at length he met with the great armie of the Perſians, with whom he preſently ioyned battell; and after a long and cruell fight, ouerthrew them in the plaine field, with ſuch a ſlaughter, as might well haue weakned the forces of a right great kingdome. The great king more enraged than diſcouraged with his ouerthrow, raiſed a farre greater armie than before, the verie ſtrength of his kingdome: reſoluing now not to ſend any more his lieutenants, but to go in perſon himſelfe againſt ſo deſperat an enemie. All things being in readineſſe, he ſet forward, and at length met with the Armenian prince, whom he found as ready to giue battell as hee was at the firſt. So being both deſirous to trie their fortune, they ioyned battell; wherin the Perſians were F againe diſcomfited and put to flight, and mo of them ſlaine in that battell, than were brought into the field in the firſt army. Zenza the Perſian king was there ſlaine with Vſun-Caſſanes his owne hand, and Cariaſuphus his ſonne taken priſoner: whom the Armenian prince vſed with the greateſt honour could be deuiſed, giuing vnto him the honour and title due vnto the Perſian king, taking vnto himſelfe the bare name of the protectour of the Perſian ſtate. Which hee did onely to pleaſe the Perſians, and to keepe them quiet vntill he had got ſome more aſſured poſſeſsion of that kingdome. But after hee had in the two former battels broken their greateſt G ſtrength, and then vnder the colour of a peaceable gouernour got into his power the regall citie of TAVRIS, with the reſt of the cities and ſtrong places of that great kingdome, and that all men had him now in great reuerence and admiration for his great vertues: hee ſecretly diſpatched out of the way the poore titular king his priſoner (the laſt of the poſteritie of the mightie Tamerlaine) and tooke vpon himſelfe the higheſt place, which admitteth no partner. Whileſt this reſtleſſe prince was thus tumbling in the world, and not yet well ſetled in his new gotten kingdome, Mahomet the Turkiſh emperour no leſſe ambitious than himſelfe, had ſcornfully reiected the embaſſadours and preſents which Vſun-Caſſanes had ſent: & hauing ſhamefully put to death Dauid the emperour of TRAPEZONDE his aliance, had conuerted all the kingdome of H PONTVS (which Vſun-Caſſanes of right claimed, as his wiues dowrie) into the forme of a prouince, and ſo vnited it vnto the Turkiſh empire. Which ſo manifeſt a wrong, Vſun-Caſſanes in the newneſſe of his ſo late atchieued greatneſſe, durſt not aduenture to redreſſe: but after that he was ſurely ſeated, and had with the courſe of time ouercome all dangers at home, being daily prickt forward with the remembrance of the former iniuries (ſtill ſuggeſted by the importunitie of his wife Deſpina) and the ſolicitation of the Venetians, to whom he had by ſolemne promiſe bound himſelfe; he determined now to take the matter in hand, and to trie his forces vpon his proud enemie the Turkiſh emperour. Hereupon hee raiſed a great armie, and being well appointed of all things neceſſary, paſsing through ARMENIA toward PONTVS, neere vnto the riuer EVPHRATES, was encountred by Muſtapha (Mahomet his eldeſt ſonne, a young prince of great I hope) and Amurath the great Baſſa of ROMANIA, whom Mahomet (fearing ſuch a matter) had ſent before with a ſtrong armie out of EVROPE to ioyne with ſuch forces as Muſtapha had alreadie raiſed in ASIA, ſo to withſtand the inuaſion of the Perſian. Theſe two great commaunders Muſtapha and Amurath ioyning battell with Vſun-Caſſanes, were by him in the plaine field ouer-throwne; where Amurath the great Baſſa himſelfe with thirtie thouſand Turkes were ſlaine:

Muſtapha with the reſt of the armie, by ſhamefull flight ſauing themſelues.

1474 Now when Mahomet vnderſtood that Amurath was ſlaine and his armie diſcomfited, he was Two huge armies of the Turks and Perſians in field together. therwith exceedingly troubled. But purpoſing to be thereof reuenged, gaue order into all parts of his dominions for the leuying of new forces: ſo that at the time by him appointed, was aſſem-bled a great and mightie armie of three hundred and twentie thouſand men. Vſun-Caſſanes in K like manner was in the field with an armie, nothing in number inferiour vnto his enemie. Theſe two Mahometane kings, drawing after them their hugie armies, met together neere the moun-taines of ARMENIA: where, at the firſt encounter, one of the Turks greateſt Baſſaes was ſlaine with fortie thouſand Turkes. With which hard beginning the prowd tyrant was ſo daunted, that he could hardly be perſuaded to proue his fortune any farther, but contenting himſelfe with that loſſe, was about to haue retired: and had vndoubtedly ſo done, if ſome of his moſt expert and valiant captaines which might be bold with him, had not ſharpely reproued him, that hauing ſo populous an armie as ſcarcely felt that ſmall loſſe, he ſhould once thinke of returning without victorie. With which their comfortable perſuaſions, he was againe encouraged to giue battell. Yet for his more ſafetie, hee withdrew his armie into a ſtrait betwixt two mountaines, L and with his cariages fortified the front thereof, as with a trench: behind which cariages, he placed his great ordinance, and on either ſide his archers. The Perſians, as men of great valour, and thereto encouraged with their former victories, came on as men fearing no perill, to haue charged the Turks euen in their ſtrength; preſenting their whole armie before they were aware, into the mouth of the Turks artillerie: which ſuddenly diſcharged amongſt the thickeſt of them, brake their rankes, and tooke away a number of them. Beſides that, the Perſian horſes terrified with the vnacquainted & thundring report of the great ordinance, were not to be ruled by their riders, but ſtarting backe, ran ſome one way, ſome another, as if they had felt neither bit nor rider. Which their confuſion Mahomet perceiuing, preſently tooke hold of the occaſion offered, and with his horſemen fiercely charged them, being now by themſelues entangled and out of M order. Neuertheleſſe the Perſians made great reſiſtance, and ſlew many of the Turks: but ſtill fighting confuſedly and out of order, they were at the laſt enforced to flie. In which fight a great number of them were ſlaine, and their tents alſo taken. Zeinal, Vſun-Caſſanes his eldeſt ſonne, labouring to ſtay the flight of the Perſians, was ſlaine with a ſmall ſhot. So the honour of the day remained with the Turks: yet had they no great cauſe to bragge of their winnings, hauing

loſt

A loſt in that battaile fortie thouſand ſouldiers: whereas of the Perſians fell not aboue ten thouſand. Mahomet contenting himſelfe with this deere bought victorie, returned homewards. And Vſun-Caſſanes leauing another of his ſonnes with his armie for the defence of ARMENIA, returned likewiſe to TAVRIS. But whileſt the Chriſtian Princes were in their greateſt expectation what might be the euent of theſe warres betwixt theſe two mightie Mahometane Kings; they vpon the ſudden concluded a peace, and confirmed the ſame with new affinitie, excluding the Chriſtians quite out of the ſame. This laſt battell betwixt Mahomet and Vſun-Caſſanes, was fought in the yeere of our Lord 1474, about foure yeeres before the death of Vſun-Caſſanes, who died the fifth of Ianuarie, in the yeere 1478.

B In the time of theſe warres died the noble Muſtapha, Mahomet his eldeſt ſonne, at ICONIVM, hauing ſpent himſelfe with reuelling amongſt his paragons: or as ſome write, commanded to die by his father vpon this occaſion. This youthfull Prince vpon a time comming to the court to ſee his father (or as they tearme it, to kiſſe his hand) became amorous of the wife of Achmetes Baſſa (a ladie of incomparable beautie) & daughter to Iſaack Baſſa, the chiefe men in the Turkiſh empire, next vnto Mahomet himſelfe: but finding no meanes how to compaſſe her in whom his ſoule liued, he awaited a time, when as ſhe (after the manner of the Turks) went to bathe her ſelfe: and there as he found her all diſroabed, ſhamefully forced her, without regard either of his owne honour or of hers. Of this ſo foule an outrage, Achmetes her huſband, with his clothes and hat all rent for madneſſe, came and greeuouſly complained to Mahomet, crauing vengeance

C for the ſame: vnto whom Mahomet againe replied: Art not thou thy ſelfe my ſlaue? and if my ſonne Muſtapha haue knowne thy wife, is ſhe not my bondſlaue he hath had to doe withall? Ceaſe therefore thus to complaine, and hold thy ſelfe therewith content. Neuertheleſſe, he in ſecret ſharply reproued his ſonne for ſo hainous and diſhonourable a fact by him committed, and commanded him out of his ſight: and as he was of a ſeuere nature, cauſed him within a few dayes after to be ſecretly ſtrangled. Neuertheleſſe, the wrong done vnto the Baſſa, ſunke ſo deepe into his haughtie mind, as that he would neuer admit excuſe therefore, but put away his wife, the ground of the implacable hatred betwixt him & the great Baſſa Iſaack, his father in law: and in fine, the very cauſe of his vtter deſtruction, as is afterward declared in the life of Baiazet.

Mahomet deliuered of his greateſt feare, by the peace he had lately concluded with Vſun-Caſ- 1475

D ſanes the Perſian King, was now at good leiſure to employ all his forces againſt the Chriſtians. And bearing a deadly hatred againſt the Princes of EPIRVS and ALBANIA, with a wonderfull deſire to extend his empire vnto the Ionian and Adriaticke, that he might from thence but looke toward ITALIE, which he began now to long after: he determined with himſelfe firſt to ſubdue thoſe countries, as ſtanding in his way, both for the inuaſion of ITALIE, and of the territories of the Venetians. And for as much as the ſtrong citie of SCODRA (otherwiſe called SCVTARIE) then in the poſſeſſion of the Venetians, for the commodious ſituation thereof ſeemed to giue him the beſt entrance into the countries of ALBANIA, EPIRVS, DALMATIA, and to ſuch cities as the Venetians held alongſt the ſea coaſt, he reſolued there to begin his wars.

This citie was of great ſtrength, as well for the naturall ſituation thereof, as for the ſtrong for-

E tifications therein made by the hand of man, which thing Mahomet was not ignorant of: but preſuming of his owne ſtrength and power, vainly perſwaded himſelfe, that no place was now able long to hold out againſt him. Wherfore hauing prepared all things fit for the beſieging thereof, he ſent Solyman Baſſa, an Eunuch (whom he had made his lieutenant Generall in EVROPE, in the place of Amurath Baſſa, before ſlaine by Vſun-Caſſanes) with eightie thouſand ſouldiers to beſiege SCODRA. This great Baſſa according to his charge came, and with great pompe encamped round about the citie, the fiue and twentieth of May. Shortly after hauing planted his batterie, he began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the wals, and ceaſed not by all meanes he could deuiſe to trouble the defendants: and when he had by force of the cannon done what he could, gaue diuers ſharpe aſſaults vnto the citie, but was ſtill with great loſſe valiantly repulſed by them of the

F citie. Long it were to declare, how often and in what terrible manner that warlike Baſſa, Mahomet his chiefe captaine, attempted to haue won the citie: as alſo to ſhew how they of SCODRA directed by their worthie Gouernour Antonius Lauretanus, valiantly defended themſelues and their citie: nothing was omitted, that the enemie could doe or deuiſe for the gaining thereof; but all his deuiſes & attempts were ſo met withall by the defendants, that they ſerued him to no other purpoſe but to the deſtruction of his people. Whilſt the Baſſa thus lay at the ſiege of SCO-

ſelfe to Grittus the new Admirall, who then lay with his fleet in the mouth of BOLIANA, a great riuer running out of the lake whereupon the citie of SCODRA ſtandeth. Theſe two great commaunders being met together, were both as one man, and with a wonderfull conſent did what they might for the furtherance of the common good, a thing not common: firſt they put ſtrong garriſons, with all things neceſſarie, into CHOLCHINVM, LYSSA, DIRRHACHIVM, and other cities of their ſeigniorie vpon the ſea coaſt. After that they went vp the riuer BOLIANA with certaine gallies, and came within ſight of SCODRA, and there by fires in the night, and other tokens of comfort, encouraged the defendants as with an aſſured promiſe of reliefe: which thing it grieued the Turks to behold, who therefore went about to haue ſhut in thoſe ſame gallies with H a great chaine drawne croſſe the riuer, where it was narroweſt betwixt them and the ſea: but in doing thereof, the Venetians out of their gallies ſlew fiue hundred of the Turks, and wounded diuers others, and ſo returned againe to ſea. It was afterward attempted by the aforeſaid Admirals, if a new ſupplie might haue beene put into the citie: but the enemie had ſo beſet the ſame, that it was not poſſible to be done. In the meane time, Mathias king of HVNGARIE (receiuing a great yerely portion of the Venetians for the defence of their countries againſt the Turke) hearing that SCODRA was beſieged, began to make ſuch ſpoile in the Turkes dominions bordering vpon him, that Mahomet was glad to call home the great Baſſa from the ſiege of SCODRA, to defend his owne frontiers. So the Baſſa after he had lien three months with his great armie at the ſiege, and loſt foureteene thouſand of his men, whereof the greateſt part died of ſickeneſſe taken I by long lying in the rotten mooriſh ground neere vnto the riuer, by commandement from his maſter riſe with his armie and departed. The Venetians alſo, which lay all that while thereabout in their gallies, were toucht with the ſame contagion: Triadanus Grittus died thereof, and Mocenicus the other Admirall fell therof dangerouſly ſicke; but being ſomewhat recouered, returned home, and was ſhortly after for his good ſeruice choſen duke of VENICE, Marcellus the old duke being then dead. With this diſhonour taken at SCODRA, Mahomet was ſo diſcontented, that he appointed a yearely fee vnto one, to put him in mind dayly of the ſiege of SCODRA.

Mathias king of Hungarie enforceth the Turke to forſake the ſiege of Scodra.

The ſame yeare that this great Baſſa Solyman had in vaine beſieged SCODRA, he was afterward ſent with a great armie into VALACHIA, where he was ſo intangled in the woods and fens by Stephanus the Vayuod, that he loſt all his armie, and with much adoe eſcaped himſelfe by K
the wonderfull ſwiftneſſe of a mare whereon he rid.

1476 The yeare following, which was the yeare 1476, Mahomet ſent out a great fleet to ſea, vnder the conduct of Geduces Achmetes, his chiefe counſellour and man of warre, (whoſe verie name was dreadfull in all places where he came) in hope to haue by treaſon ſurpriſed the Iſland of CRETE: But that plot was in good time by the Venetians perceiued, the traitors executed, and he of his purpoſe diſappointed. Whereupon he changed his former purpoſe for CRETE, & ſent the ſame Achmetes with his fleet into the Euxine (or as the Turkes call it, the Blacke ſea) to beſiege the rich citie of CAFFA. This citie was in ancient time called THEODOSIA, ſituate in the countrie of TAVRICA CHERSONESVS, faſt by the ſea ſide, and had of long time been in poſſeſſion of the Genowaies, and was a place of exceeding great trade, vntill that this great emperor L
Mahomet hauing taken CONSTANTINOPLE, and falling out with the Venetians, had by his ſtrong caſtles built vpon the ſtraits of HELLESPONTVS and BOSPHORVS, taken away both the trafficke of merchants into thoſe ſeas, and all poſſible meanes for the Genowayes to ſend ſuccour to that citie: yet it is credibly reported, that one valiant captaine vndertooke to carrie his companie (in number not aboue one hundred and fiftie men) by land from GENOA to CAFFA, not much leſſe then two thouſand miles, and worthely performed what he had vndertaken. Achmetes comming thither with his fleet, encloſed the citie both by ſea and land: which diuided in it ſelfe by reaſon of the diuerſe diſpoſition of the inhabitants, being of diuerſe nations, ſome Genowayes, ſome Greeks, ſome Armenians, but moſt Tartars, could not long hold out, but was in ſhort time giuen vp to the Baſſa, vpon condition, That the Genoway merchants, who were M there both in number many & exceeding rich, might in ſafetie depart thence with their wealth. Which promiſe the Baſſa performed not: but when he was poſſeſſed of the citie, ſent ſuch as he thought good to CONSTANTINOPLE, and commaunded the reſt vpon paine of death not to depart thence, or to conuey away from thence any part of their ſubſtance. In ſhort time after, the whole countrie of TAVRICA CHERSONESVS yeelded vnto the Turkiſh obeiſance. At which

A time alſo the Tartar Princes, namely the Precopenſes and Deſtenſes, terrified with the greatneſſe of the Turke, cowardly yeelded themſelues as tributaries vnto him; euer ſince which time they haue liued a moſt ſeruile and troubleſome life, ſubiect to euery command of the Othoman Emperours: for whom they haue done great ſeruice many times in their warres, againſt the Perſians, the Polonians, the Hungarians, Tranſyluanians, and Germains, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie well appeareth; and as the aforeſaid nations their neighbours, with others alſo farther off, haue euen of late to their great loſſe felt.

Although the Venetians had in theſe late warres loſt the great and fertile Iſland of EVBŒA, 1477
with the ſtrong citie of CHALCIS, the ſureſt harbour for their gallies: yet held they ſtill diuers
B ſtrong townes and commodious hauens by the ſea coaſt, both within PELOPONESVS and without, as METHONE, CORONE, TENARVS, NAVPACTVM, and others: which ſtanding as it were in the boſome of his empire, Mahomet ſore longed after. And therefore to ſatisfie his ambitious deſire, ſent Solyman (the great Baſſa of EVROPE) with a ſtrong fleet into PELOPONESVS: who entring the gulfe of CORINTH, at his firſt comming laid ſiege to NAVPACTVM, now called LEPANTO, a citie ſtanding in the gulfe of CORINTH, in the countrey of OZOLÆ neere vnto LOCRIS, ouer againſt PELOPONESVS. Antonius Laurettanus (for his late good ſeruice done in defending of SCODRA) made Admirall for the Venetians, came with
C ſpeed to NAVPACTVM, and in deſpight of the enemie, ſo furniſhed the citie, both with men and whatſoeuer elſe was needfull, that the Baſſa now out of hope to win the citie, riſe vpon the ſudden with his armie, and in a great furie departed, after he had lien there foure moneths. In this fret returning towards CONSTANTINOPLE, he put certaine companies of his men to ſhoare in the Iſland of LEMNOS, in hope to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the citie COCCINVM: but as they were about to haue entred, they were contrary to their expectation manfully reſiſted, by ſuch Chriſtians as by chance were next the gate. Where the notable courage of Marulla (a maiden of that citie) was much commended: who ſeeing her father ſlaine in the gate, tooke vp the weapons that lay by him, and like a fierce Amazon notably reuenged his death, deſperatly fighting in defence of her countrey with thoſe few which were there at the firſt; and ſo kept the Turks out vntill the reſt of the citizens (mooued with the alarum) came to the gate, and forced them (not without ſome loſſe) to retire againe to their gallies. Not long after, Lau-
D rettanus came thither with his fleet: but before his comming, the Baſſa was departed thence for CONSTANTINOPLE, hauing in this expedition done nothing that was expected at his hands.

Mahomet after the death of Scanderbeg, ceaſed not from time to time by one of his great captaines or other to inuade EPIRVS, and the other parts of ALBANIA; and ſo gaining ſometime one part, and ſometime another, had ſubdued moſt part thereof. And about this time, his armie lay at the ſiege of CROIA: for releeſe whereof, the Venetians (in whoſe protection it Croia beſieged by the Turke.
was) ſent Franciſcus Contarenus a noble gentleman their lieutenant, with ſuch forces as were ſufficient for the raiſing of the ſiege. He finding the Turks in the plaine of TIRANNA, gaue them battell; which for a great while ſtood doubtfull, at length victorie enclining to the Venetians, the Turks began to flie: after whom, the Venetians made no great purſuit, but contented to haue
E put them to flight, tooke their tents, with ſuch forts as they had raiſed againſt the citie. Thus whileſt the Venetians thinke themſelues in ſure poſſeſſion of the victorie, and out of feare of their enemies, they were through their owne too much ſecuritie, by and by themſelues ouerthrowne: For whileſt the common ſouldiers hauing their minds more ſet vpon the ſpoile than vpon the purſuit of the enemie (the battell as yet ſcarce ended) ſcatter themſelues; and the captaines were conſulting whether they ſhould lodge that night (which began then to approach) in the enemies tents or not: in the middeſt of their conſultation, the Turks hauing perceiued their diſorder, ſuddenly returned againe vpon them, and without great reſiſtance ouerthrew them, and put them to flight. In which flight, a thouſand of them fell; amongſt whom Contarenus the Contarenus the Venetian Generall ſlaine.
Generall, and diuers others of good place and calling were ſlaine alſo. This ouerthrow, the Ve-
F netians tooke a great deale better than that which ſhortly after followed, in the confines of ITALY at the riuer of Sontium.

Mahomet hauing conquered a great part of ALBANIA, and daily encroching vpon the Chriſtians, made diuers incurſions into the countries of DALMATIA, HISTRIA, and CARNIOLA, yea and ſometime went ſo farre, that he with his Turks entred into the prouince of FRIVLI, called in ancient time FORVM IVLII, a part of the Venetian ſeigniorie; and ſo carried away with them many priſoners with much ſpoile. For remedie whereof, the Venetians with exceeding charge and wonderfull labour fortified alongſt the riuer of Sontium from GORITIA to the fens of AQVILEA, the ſpace of twelue miles, and there built two forts, wherein they continually kept ſtrong garriſons for the defence of the countrey. Whereby the countrey people thinking themſelues now in ſafetie, began to fall into ſecuritie (the dangerous ſickneſſe of all commonweales) neglecting by their carefull watch, to foreſee a farre off the enemies comming, as they had before vſed. It fortuned at this time, that Aſa-beg (whom ſome call Marbecke) one of the Turks great captaines, vpon the ſudden when no ſuch thing was feared, came and ſhewed himſelfe in an euening vpon the farther ſide of the riuer of Sontium, with a thouſand horſmen: vpon the ſight of whom, an alarum was raiſed in both forts, and euery man put himſelfe in readineſſe, as if they ſhould euen preſently haue ioyned battel. But it was ſo nie night, as that nothing could as then be done: yet the Venetian garriſons ioyning themſelues together, watcht all that night in armes. There was at that time in both theſe forts, three thouſand horſemen and ſome few companies of footmen, all vnder the command of Hieronimus Nowell Countie of VERONA, a famous captaine of that time: who with the reſt of the captaines reſolued if he could, to keepe the Turks from paſſing the riuer; if not, then to giue them battell. Marbecke Generall of the Turks armie, taking good view of the place, in the night time ſecretly conueyed a thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers ouer the riuer, foure miles off, in ſuch a place as the Venetians feared leaſt, deeming it impoſſible for any man there to haue paſſed ouer. Theſe men he appointed to lie cloſe in ambuſh behind a great hill in ſight, not farre from the other ſide of the riuer, and vpon a ſigne giuen, preſently to diſcouer themſelues and charge the enemie. The next morning very early he ſent certain troups of his readieſt horſemen ouer the riuer, which by offering to skirmiſh with the Venetians, might ſo draw them into the field; and then as men in doubt whether to fight or to flie, to tole them on vnto the place where the ambuſh lay. The Venetians had diuided themſelues into three battalions; whereof the Generall himſelfe had the leading of the firſt, who ſeeing theſe diſordered troups comming to skirmiſh with him, encountred them fiercely, & eaſily put them to flight, being ſo determined before, and in that flight earneſtly purſued them: eſpecially the Counties ſonne, a valiant young gentleman, who with others like himſelfe, thought by that daies good ſeruice to gaine vnto themſelues great honour. When the Turks Generall ſaw that the Venetians following the chaſe, were gone a great way from the riuer, he forthwith paſſed ouer with the reſt of his armie, and followed the Venetians at the heeles: which the Turks which before fled now beholding, turned againe vpon their fierce enemies, and valiantly withſtood them. At which very inſtant, the other Turks vpon ſigne giuen ariſing out of ambuſh, came downe from the hill LICINIS, with ſuch violence and clamour, that the Venetians therewith diſcouraged, would haue fled if they could haue told which way: but they were on euery ſide ſo beſet, that there was no way left for them to eſcape: but were there all ſlaine, except ſome few which yeelded themſelues and ſo were ſaued. The other two battalions of the Venetians, diſcouraged with the ſlaughter of the firſt, fled incontinently; and in flying, were many of them ſlaine. In this battell the Countie himſelfe with his ſonne, and many other notable gentlemen, and halfe the horſemen, were loſt. The Turks encouraged with this victorie, the next day ſpoiled all the countrey of FRIVLI, betwixt the riuers of Sontium (otherwiſe called Liſonzo) and Tiliauentum, and cruelly burnt all the countrey before them: ſo that at once an hundred countrey villages were to be ſeene on a light fire together; which ſtood ſo thicke, that it ſeemed as if one continuall fire had wholly couered all the face of the countrey. The barbarous Turks laden with the ſpoile of that rich countrey, and driuing before them great numbers of miſerable captiues as if they had beene flocks of ſheepe, returned to Sontium. But when they had paſſed the riuer, and had trauelled homeward one dayes iourney, and all men thought they had now beene quite gone; they ſuddenly returned backe againe, and poſting through the countrey they had before ſpoiled, came to the riuer of Tiliauentum, which they deſperatly paſſed, and did no leſſe harme on that ſide the riuer, than they had before on the other: and ſo carrying away with them what they pleaſed, returned by the ſame way they came, hauing filled all that part of ITALY with terror and feare. This ouerthrow at Sontium, the Venetians account amongſt the greateſt loſſes which they receiued from the Turks in all theſe their long warres.

The countrey of Friuli ſpoiled by the Turks.

1478 The next yeere about Haruеſt, the Turks came againe with a farre greater power; and paſſing the riuer of Sontium, came before the forts at GRADISCA, where Carolus Fortebrachius lay

A lay with a ſtrong garriſon of the Venetians, offering him skirmiſh, ſo to haue drawne him into the field. But the warie captaine conſidering the great ſtrength of the enemie, and the loſſe receiued the yeere before, would not be drawne out of his ſtrength, but ſtood vpon his guard, expecting to take the enemie at ſome more aduantage: which thing the Turks fearing, durſt not diſperſe themſelues abroad for the ſpoile of the countrey, leauing ſo ſtrong a garriſon of the enemies behind them. And therefore when they had gone about foure miles into the countrey, they turned their courſe vp into the mountaines (which are part of the Alpes) towards GERMANIE, and there grieuouſly ſpoiled the mountaine people: ſtrangely paſſing through thoſe abrupt and hie mountaines with their horſes, where men could hardly either goe or ſtand on foot with-
B out ſomething to ſtay vpon. And ſo when they had done what harme they could, taking a great compaſſe about, returned home another way.

Mahomet remembring the ſhamefull repulſe he had about foure yeeres before receiued at SCODRA, and hauing the name of that citie daily ſounding in his eares; determined now once againe to gage his whole forces vpon the winning thereof, and ſo to giue peace to his ambitious deſires. And becauſe he would not againe be diſhonored with that he purpoſed to take in hand, he gaue out order into all parts of his dominions, both in EVROPE and ASIA, for the aſſembling of his beſt ſouldiers and men of warre. Now when all things were in readineſſe, and ſuch an armie aſſembled as he ſeldome or neuer had a ſtronger; firſt he ſent forth Aly-Beg (warden of the frontiers of his kingdome alongſt the riuer Danubius) with eightie thouſand of the ſoul-
C diers called Achanzij, towards SCODRA. Theſe Achanzij are horſemen, which for their good ſeruice according to their deſerts, haue certaine lands giuen them by the King to liue vpon during their liues; for which they are of dutie bound to ſerue vpon their owne charge as the forerunners of the Turke his armie, whenſoeuer he goeth to beſiege any place: Theſe be they which firſt enter into the enemies countrey, burning and ſpoiling what they can, vntill they come vnto the place appointed: and haue this priuiledge, That ſo ſoone as all the armie is come to the place to be beſieged, they may then at their pleaſure either depart or ſtay.

Vid. Marinum Barletium de expug. Scodrenſi.

The gouernour of SCODRA vnderſtanding both by common fame and certaine intelligence, of the Turks deſignes, with all care and diligence fortified the towne, labouring continually both night and day at the rampiers, as if the enemie had beene alreadie preſent, and plentifully
D prouided all things neceſſarie for the enduring of a long ſiege. The aged and vnneceſſarie people, he ſent out of the citie into other places of more ſafetie farther off: in whoſe ſtead he tooke in great numbers of ſtrong and able men which dwelt in the countrey round about; among whom were many mariners taken out of the gallies, and other men of like qualitie, which got their liuing vpon the riuer and lake of SCODRA, luſtie bodies enured to hardneſſe, who in the long ſiege following did great ſeruice.

The poore countrey people flie for feare of the Turks.

Whileſt this preparation was making in SCODRA, behold the mountaines a farre off Northward from the citie, began to ſhine with many great fires, and all the countrey was couered with thicke ſmoake, which euery houre ſeemed to draw neerer and neerer: when within ſhort time after, the poore countrey people (which as yet were not all fled) with ſuch traſh as they could
E well carrie, came running for life all ouer the countrey to the ſtrong cities vpon the ſea ſide, crying out that the Turks were come.

The next day which was the fourteenth of May, Aly-Beg with his eightie thouſand Achanzij, came into the ſuburbs of the citie, and there encamped; ſo that none could goe in or out of the gates: which was not the leaſt part of his charge. To him by the commandement of Mahomet, had Scander-Beg gouernour of BOSNA, and Malcotius with ſeuen thouſand horſemen, ioyned themſelues vpon the way. Of this Malcotius it is reported (as was of Auguſtus) that the maieſtie of his countenance, with the reſplendent beames iſſuing out of his eies (as if it had beene the raies of the Sunne) were of ſuch piercing brightneſſe, that no man was able with immoued and fixed eye long to behold the ſame. Theſe horſemen (the forerunners, as I ſaid, of Mahomets
F great armie) the Chriſtians much troubled with often ſallies and ſhot, out of the towne, and ſlew many of them with little or no loſſe vnto themſelues.

When Aly-Beg had thus lien before the citie ten daies, came Taut Gaiola the great Baſſa of CONSTANTINOPLE with fiue and twentie thouſand ſouldiers, and about twelue thouſand camels, for moſt part laden with metall in maſſe, for to make great ordinance of, and other neceſſaries for the campe. The Baſſaes great and ſtately tent of purple colour, was pitched vpon the

the top of an high hill called the Baſſaes hill, becauſe in that place Solyman Baſſa had lien in the former ſiege about foure yeeres before: The Baſſaes armie lay encamped betwixt the ſame hill and the towne. This Taut Gaiola was borne in EPIRVS of baſe parentage, and was from thence by the Turks carried away young to CONSTANTINOPLE; where for his ſharpneſſe of wit and rare actiuitie, he grew into ſuch fauour, firſt with Mahomet, and afterward with Baiazet his ſonne, that he was by them promoted to the greateſt places of honour, next vnto themſelues: wherein he became ſo popular, and had ſo poſſeſſed the hearts of the people, that it was ſuſpected of ſome, he would haue aſpired to the Turkiſh empire himſelfe. Preſently after the comming of this great Baſſa, workmen were ſet a worke about the caſting of the great ordinance, and making readie of other things for the ſiege. The Chriſtians alſo were no leſſe buſie about their fortifications, the gouernour appointing vnto euery man his charge, and which part of the wall to defend: yet keeping continually in the market place certaine companies (with the enſignes of S. Marke and S. Stephen) to ſerue as freſh ſupplies, as need or occaſion ſhould require. Whileſt the great ordinance was in caſting, the Baſſa cauſed a great bridge of timber to be made ouer the riuer, that ſo he might at his pleaſure paſſe ouer his men, and command both ſides of the riuer. The Chriſtians in the meane time with vigilant eye ſo attending the Turks, that none of them could ſtirre within ſhot, but he was forthwith fet off and ſlaine.

The thirteenth of Iune, Muſtapha the Beglerbeg or Viceroy of ASIA (commonly called the great Baſſa of NATOLIA) came alſo in great pompe to the ſiege with thirtie thouſand ſouldiers brought out of ASIA; perſonable men, but not accounted ſo good ſouldiers as they of EVROPE: for it is a common ſaying among the Turks, That the men of EVROPE, and the horſes of ASIA doe beſt ſeruice. This great Baſſa was honourably met and welcomed by the other great Baſſa of CONSTANTINOPLE, and was quartered vpon another ſide of the citie, where his rich pauilion (all of Greene) was pitcht in a vineyard about a mile from the towne. Muſtapha to proue the courage of his ſouldiers, propounded a reward to which ſoeuer of them, as durſt aduenture but to goe and touch the wals of the citie: vpon which occaſion, two of his ſouldiers paſſing well mounted, attempted to haue performed that enterpriſe. But making what haſt they could poſſibly, they were both ſlaine from the wall, and one of their bodies recouered by certaine valiant ſouldiers which ſallied out of the towne, and his head being cut off, was vpon a launce ſet vpon the wals for the Turks to behold.

Two of the Turks attempting to touch the wals of Scodra, are both ſlaine, and one of their heads ſet vp vpon the wall.

The fifteenth of Iune 5600 Ianizaries came into the campe, with foure white enſignes: at whoſe comming all the ſouldiers of both the Baſſaes camps gaue a wonderfull ſhout, and welcomed them with great ioy. Theſe are the great Turks guard and beſt ſouldiers, in whom the greateſt ſtrength of his kingdome conſiſteth, and are called the ſons of the great Sultan: after whoſe comming, Mahomet himſelfe was daily expected. Three daies after came two other great men, attended vpon with a number of followers, who by their countenance, and the great reuerence done vnto them by the reſt of the Turks, ſeemed to be men of great place and authoritie: theſe men deſired that they might with ſafetie ſpeake with the gouernour of the citie and the reſt of the captaines, to deliuer vnto them ſuch a meſſage, as they had for their good (as they ſaid) brought vnto them from Mahomet. Which their requeſt being granted, the elder of them, after he had with many glorious words ſet forth the power of his maſter, and what he had done to other great cities, with their Princes; and farther ſhewed into what danger they were like to fall, if they ſhould long ſtand vpon their defence: he began to perſwade them to yeeld vp the citie, aſſuring them of all kind vſage, with many rich rewards from the great Emperour; whereas otherwiſe, they were to expect nothing but extreme miſerie and moſt ſhamefull death. Whereunto anſwere was in the name of them all giuen by the mouth of Petrus Pagnanus, a graue and worthy citizen, That they were not afraid of the greatneſſe of Mahomet, or of any thing he had done or could doe: and that he ſhould find it hard to enforce them, but impoſſible to perſwade them to deliuer their citie: and therefore that he might at his pleaſure vſe his forces againſt men fully reſolued rather to yeeld vnto nature her laſt due, than to hearken to any compoſition: and in concluſion told them, that if they ſhould at any time after make any ſuch motion, they ſhould not expect any other anſwere than from the mouth of the Canon. With which ſhort anſwere theſe great men departed, not a little diſcontented.

At this ſame time the ſtrong citie of CROIA (which the worthy Scanderbeg had liuing ſo honourably defended, and dying had left it with his kingdome, in the protection and poſſeſſion of the

A the Venetians)hauing holden out a yeres ſiege,after that all the kingdome of EPIRVS and moſt part of ALBANIA was loſt, for lacke of victuals was yeelded vp vnto the Turke, vpon condition, That the hungerſtarued defendants(who then ſeemed ratherghoſts than men)might at their pleaſure in ſafetie depart: which agreement the faithleſſe Turke brake, and without mercie put them all to the ſword. This heauie newes was deliuered to them of SCODRA by certaine Chriſtians in the Turks campe: wherewith they were much grieued,but nothing at all diſcouraged.

Whiles the Turkes thus lay at the ſiege,the watermen,of whom a great number liued vpon the great lake of SCODRA (being in circuit about one hundred mile) came many times downe the riuer by night,and did much harme in the Turks campe: for remedie whereof,they were in-
B forced to build certaine ſmall gallies to keepe them in,who for all that many times ſtole ſecretly vpon them,and much troubled them.

The two and twentieth of Iune the Turkes mounted two great pieces of Ordinance vpon the top of the hill whereon the Baſſa lay: wherof the one carried a bullet,made of an hard kind of round ſtone,of three hundred pound weight,and the other a bullet of foure hundred,wherewith they began to batter the town foure daies: after that,they placed a third peece of artillerie at the foot of the ſame hill, which deliuered a bullet of fourehundred pound weight: and the next day they planted a fourth peece, greater than the reſt, about the middle of the ſame hill, which carried a ſhot of ſix hundred and fiftie pound weight. In this while, eight thouſand of the Turkes ſouldiers,called Aſapi(which are knowne from the Ianizaries by their red caps,where-
C as the Ianizaries weare white)came into the campe. And ſhortly after came Mahomet himſelfe with all his armie to the riuer of Drimon, whether the two great Baſſaes of ASIA and CONSTANTINOPLE went with great pompe and triumph to meet him.

Mahomet in perſon himſelfe commeth vnto the ſiege of Scodra.

The ſecond of Iuly Mahomet with all his armie before the riſing of the Sunne came to the campe before SCODRA: where after he had well viewed the ſituation thereof, he is reported to haue ſaid: O what a faire and ſtately place hath the Eagle choſen out for her ſelfe to build her neaſt, and to hatch her young ones in. Diuers rich pauilions were ſet vp for Mahomet himſelfe, but one farre greater than the reſt, diſtant from them about a flight ſhoot, which was the place wherein he held his counſell: the other were for his owne priuat vſe. Round about theſe his tents lay the Ianizaries encamped,a good diſtance off; yet ſo cloſe one to another,as if it had bin a perpetu-
D all rampire or ſtrong trench, whereinto was but one entrance,continually guarded with a moſt ſtrong guard. Round about the Ianizaries lay all the reſt of the armie encamped: ſo that all the countrie,as farre as a man could ſee,was couered and white with tents, much like as when the ground in Winter is couered ouer with a deepe ſnow: and ſtill moe people reſorted to the campe daily, ſo that it was deemed by men of great experience, that Mahomet had then in his armie of all ſort of people about three hundred and fiftie thouſand men, all gaping to deuour that poore citie: a ſight of it ſelfe ſufficient to haue daunted the courage of right valient men: But what can be terrible vnto them that feare not to die? Againſt this terrour of the enemie,the defendants were notably encouraged by the comfortable perſuaſions and exhortations of one Bartholomeus,a preacher (ſometimes one of the worthie Scanderbeg his ſoldiors)who afterwards
E giuing himſelfe to the ſtudie of diuinitie,became a zealous preacher, & in this ſiege did notably comfort the Chriſtian defendants againſt the terrour of ſo great an armie of miſcreants. All this while the batterie was ſtil maintained: and the fifth of Iuly the Turks mounted two other great peeces,wherof the one was like vnto the former before mounted,but the other placed vpon the middle of the Baſſaes mount,was of an incredible greatneſſe,diſcharging a ſhot of twelue hundred pound weight,and was called the Princes peece,in whoſe name it was with much cunning and induſtrie made: with which huge peece, the Turkes euen from the beginning of the ſiege had threatned the beſieged, willing them to expect the comming of the Princes Peece. The next day they planted vpon the ſame mount a ſeuenth peece, which caried a ſhot of fiue hundred and fiftie pound weight: from which time they battered the city with the aforeſaid ſeuen
F great peeces; and ceaſed not oftentimes by night out of their great mortar peeces, to caſt great bals of wild fire into the city, ſo to haue ſet it on fire: wherby diuers of the citizens were inforced to vncouer their houſes couered with ſhingle,and by men appointed for that purpoſe,to watch the fall of ſuch fireworkes,and ſo to quench the ſame: which they ſo carefully looked vnto, as that the deuiſe of the enemie tooke none effect at all. At the ſame time alſo the Turks out of their ſhort mortar peeces caſt huge great ſtones of incredible weight,which falling from high, did

moſt terribly cruſh in peeces whatſoeuer thing they light vpon, wherewith the defendants were G wonderfully troubled. In few daies after, the enemie mounted three other great peeces, whereof one was greater than that was called the Princes, & caried a bullet of thirteene hundred weight: from which time they daily battered the citie with ten ſuch peeces, as the like hath ſeldome times beene heard of: and arrowes fell ſo thicke into the citie, as if it had beene continuall ſhowers of haile, ſo that no man could goe or well ſtirre in the ſtreets without hurt. Yet in the middeſt of all theſe dangers the Chriſtians valiantly defended the citie, and with their deadly ſhot from the wals and mounts exceedingly annoied the enemie. The eleuenth of Iuly the Turks mounted another great peece like vnto the former, vpon the Baſſaes mount, and the ſame day battered the wals with 178 ſhot of this huge artillerie. H

Mahomet hauing by the furie of his great ordinance beaten downe a great part of the wall, and that now nothing ſtood in his way but ſuch ſimple repaires as the defendants had made of timber and plankes, with earth caſt in betwixt, was in good hope in ſhort time to become maſter of the towne: and therefore ſent certaine companies of his Ianizaries & other ſouldiers (which he with continual ſupplies of freſh men ſtill releeued) to aſſault the breaches, ſo if it were poſſible to enter the towne, or at leaſtwiſe to burne ſuch fortifications of timber as the defendants had made. But that which ſeemed vnto him at firſt ſo eaſie, he found in execution full of difficultie and danger: for the Turks approching the breach, found there reſolute men, a ſurer defence than any wall: whoſe valiant courage ſerued in ſtead of a ſtrong bulwarke. So whileſt the Turks deſperatly ſtriue in the face of the breach either to enter or to ſet fire vpon the new fortifications I made for moſt part of timber, and the defendants with no leſſe reſolution doe what they may to the vttermoſt to repulſe them, many were on both ſides ſlaine, but eſpecially of the aſſailants. Which Mahomet well perceiuing, and that by that manner of aſſault he gained nothing but notable loſſe and ſpoile of his beſt men, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and his batterie to be againe forthwith renewed: euery day ſhaking the wall with 160 or 180 moſt terrible great ſhot, and one day with 194, which was the greateſt batterie he made in one day during that ſiege.

After this great batterie, the tyrant cauſed a freſh aſſault to be giuen, but with little or rather worſe ſucceſſe than before: for though diuers of the defendants, and amongſt them ſome of good place, as Franciſcus Patauinus, Franciſcus Scorbaro, two Italian captaines, and ſome other of the better ſort of the citizens were there ſlaine with the great ſhot, whereof the enemie that K day diſcharged into the breaches 193: yet were they with greater loſſe enforced againe to retire, and with ſhame to giue ouer the aſſault.

Notwithſtanding this repulſe, Mahomet continuing his batterie with no leſſe furie than before, ſtill ſought by force of his artillerie to open a way into the citie: and the third day after the former aſſault gaue a more furious and deſperate attempt vnto the citie than before, inſomuch that the Turks were in the breaches come to handie ſtrokes with the Chriſtians, and there made a moſt cruell and deadly fight; wherein many fell on both ſides, but of the Turks moſt, yet were there many of the Chriſtians alſo ſlaine, eſpecially with the Turks great ordinance. It was a right ruthfull ſight to haue ſeene the rampiers at the great gate of the citie beaten downe flat to the ground, and to lie full of the rent bodies of the Chriſtians: at which place the enemie ſo pre- L uailed, that he was euen now readie to haue entered; for the Turks ſo furiouſly aſſailed the defendants, and the murthering ſhot from the Baſſaes mount fell ſo thicke and ſo terribly into the breach, beſide the infinite number of arrowes, that there was ſcarce any of the Chriſtians which defended that place but they were either ſlaine or greeuouſly wounded. But when all ſeemed now almoſt deſperat and forlorne, and the greedie enemie euen readie to deuoure his prey, a new ſupplie of luſtie ſouldiers well armed, came couragiouſly to the breach, and as lions encountering the enemie, draue him downe againe, and ſo enforced him with great loſſe to retire. Mahomet greeued with this repulſe, in his furie cauſed 173 great ſhot to be diſcharged into the citie, and afterwards ſending for his great Baſſaes and other his principall men of warre, declared vnto them his mind as followeth: M

Mahomet purpoſing to giue a general aſſault, encourageth his captaines and ſouldiers thereunto.

I thinke none of you are ignorant (right worthie ſouldiers) that now it is the third moneth ſince this citie hath by vs beene moſt ſtraitly beſieged, and with all manner of artillerie and engines of warre impugned, aſſaulted, and on euery ſide aſſailed, the wals thereof vtterly ſubuerted, and the bulwarkes laied flat with the ground, and (as you ſee) as good as raſed: Beſides that, ſo oft as wee haue ſet fire

A vpon their fortreſſes, ſo oft we haue prouoked them of Scodra to fight, and haue alſo much vexed them with aſſaults. Laſt of all, as you know, we haue left nothing vnproued, nothing vnattempted which could be deuiſed, the eaſilier to ouercome them, being wearied, worne out, and their ſtrength ſpent. Wherefore (in mine opinion) the matter is not longer to be put off or delayed, but euen to morrow before the enemie can recouer his ſtrength or repaire his breaches, let vs encloſe the citie round, and giue them a generall and terrible aſſault: and therefore euery one of you make your ſelues readie, and exhort your ſouldiers in the campe, that they euery one of them to morrow with the dawning of the day come forth armed and well appointed for the winning of the citie. Now will I proue and know them that are worthie of my pay. Thou the Baſſa of Constantinople, with thy ſquadrons and certaine companies
B of the Ianizaries our faithfull guard, giue charge vnto the breach: in the meane time, let the Baſſa of Asia with his power aſſault the other parts of the citie: let euery man make readie and bring with him what ſo is needfull for this generall aſſault; my mind giueth me, that to morrow before this time we ſhall win the citie: for who is there can reſiſt vs? The towne (as you ſee) is bared both of wall and of all other defence: the bulwarks and ditches are laid euen, and an eaſie way for vs to come vnto it: the citizens themſelues wearie with ſo many fights and aſſaults faint and want ſtrength; whereas we are ſtill freſh and luſtie: they in number few, we almoſt innumerable: beſides that, we farre paſſe them in the force of our artillerie, wherewith many of them ſhall periſh in the defending of the breaches. Who then can gainesay, but that they of Scodra are alreadie our priſoners? Where, vpon ſuch as remaine aliue, I will at my pleaſure vſe the law of armes and captiuitie. On therefore courageous hearts without
C further delay. Is not the very name of Scodra hatefull vnto vs? for which of you doth not with great diſdaine call to remembrance the death of your parents, or brethren, or friends, or companions, cruelly ſlaine vnder theſe wals? Can you diſgeſt your hatred againſt them of Scodra? and ſo many ſlaughters of your friends, by them made? But to forget elder times, and the harmes receiued from them long ſince, let vs but looke vpon our late ſlaughters and wounds as it were yet bleeding: it is not yet full foure yeeres ſince that we made warre with theſe men of Scodra, wherein ſo many thouſands of our people fell, that their ſlaughter is yet almoſt obiect to our eyes, and their bloud craning reuenge. This very hill whereon we ſtand, and the ſtones yet ſeeme beſprinckled and polluted with their bloud. Wherefore haſte you as men of courage, take vp armes, valiantly mount the hill, aſſault the towne, and reuenge your old iniuries. Glut your ſelues to the full in the effuſion of the Chriſtian bloud, where-
D unto our lawes doe ſo much exhort vs, and doe what you may with force and ſword, that not one of them of Scodra may be left aliue: which you may eaſily bring to paſſe, hauing all things thereunto needfull: for there is nothing to withſtand you, nothing wanting for the gaining of the victorie. All things are prepared, all things are readie: an eaſie matter it is for a ſtrong man to ouercome the weake and feeble, that wanteth ſtrength as doe they.

This ſpeech of the barbarous tyrant, was receiued with great applauſe and good liking of the hearers: and now was Scodra to be with all might and maine aſſaulted, and not a man there left aliue. Hereupon proclamation was made throughout the campe, That euery man vpon paine of death ſhould be readie againſt the appointed time. And the great captains & commanders of the armie departing from Mahomet, went vp to the top of the hill whereon the Baſſa lay, and from thence taking view of the citie, and laying their heads together, conſulted how they might beſt giue the aſſault. The defendants on the other ſide alwayes expecting their enemies houering ouer their heads, left nothing vndone that they could poſſibly deuiſe, for the defence of themſelues and the citie. Now vpon the top of the Baſſaes mount was a royall pauilion erected, richly couered with purple, from whence the proud tyrant might plainly behold all the aſſault: who with the dawning of the day (being the two and twentith of Iuly) entring the ſame, the Turks who in the couert of the night had conueyed themſelues as neere vnto the walles as they could, (vpon the ſignall of battell, giuen by a tire of ordinance diſcharged from the Baſſaes mount) ſuddenly ran to the breaches as thicke as bees, in hope by their ſudden approch to haue taken the Chriſtians at ſome aduantage: wherein they were much deceiued. For they alwayes doubting ſuch a matter, and carefully obſeruing the leaſt motion of the enemie, were alwaies in readineſſe to meet with their attempts: ſo that the Turks deſperatly ſtriuing to gaine the breaches, and the Chriſtians valiantly defending the ſame, there was in diuers places begun a moſt cruell and mortall fight; but eſpecially neere vnto the great gate, where the furie of the Canon had made the wals moſt faultable. There the enemie was come to fight hand to hand, and preuailing uailing vpon the defendants, had ſet vp one of the Turks enſignes vpon the top of the rampiers: G which Mahomet beholding, reioyced exceedingly, thinking the citie now as good as taken. But the Chriſtians ſeeing the danger, ſpeedily repaired thither with new ſupplies, and by plaine force draue the enemie out againe, and beat him from the rampiers. Vpon them alſo that were comming vp, they caſt downe peeces of timber, great ſtones, wildfire, pots of lime, and ſuch other things as might moſt annoy them: as for ſhot, none fell in vaine by reaſon of the wonderfull multitude of the Turks, who ſtood ſo thicke, that a man could hardly haue caſt downe a graine of muſtard ſeed from the wall but it muſt needs haue light vpon ſome of them: by which meanes the Turks were notably repulſed, their enſigne pluckt downe, and they enforced to retire from the wals. Which ſudden alteration Mahomet perceiuing, fell into a great rage, and H forthwith commanded his great ordinance, with greater furie than euer, to be diſcharged into the breach: And with great words commanded the two chiefe Baſſaes which ſtood by him vpon the mount, to goe preſently downe and enforce the ſouldiers which were already retired, to returne again vnto the aſſault. Theſe great commanders ſeeing the tyrant in ſuch a fret, forthwith deſcended from the hill, and where perſwaſion would not ſerue, with their drawne ſwords enforced the ſouldiers to returne backe againe to the aſſault. The Turks knowing that they were now in the eye of their King, and in the preſence of their greateſt commanders, ſtriue with might and maine to win the rampiers: for in that place, the wals of the citie were beaten downe to the ground, ſhaken before this aſſault with 2539 ſhot of the cannon or other peeces of no leſſe force. The Chriſtians likewiſe in defence of themſelues and their citie, with inuincible cou- I

A moſt terrible aſſault. rage oppoſed themſelues againſt the Turks: ſo that a more deſperat fight than there, was hardly euer to be ſeene; deſperat men with deſperat hand aſſailing one another: And the more to increaſe the terrour of the day, the thundring ſhot, with the clamour of men and noiſe of the inſtruments of warre, was ſo great, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue preſently fallen together; and arrowes falling into the citie as if it had beene ſhowers of raine, oftentimes darkened the light of the day. In this dreadfull fight, many of the defendants were ſlaine; but of the Turks, twentie to one. Neere vnto that gate where this terrible aſſault was giuen, were certaine loupes hewen out of the maine rocke, which flanked the ditch all alongſt that ſide of the citie, out of which the Chriſtians with their murthering ſhot made lanes amongſt their enemies, and ſlew them without number. For all that, the mightie Baſſaes and great captaines, one while by per- K ſwaſion, another while by threatning, forced them ſtill forward; and if any turned backe, preſently ſlew him: ſo that the Turks ſeeing no leſſe danger in retiring, than in fighting againſt the enemie, like deſperat men thruſt forward by heapes, and were ſlaine without number. Yet ſtill preſſing on ſo long as life laſted, and others ſtepping forward in ſtead of them that were ſlaine; they began againe to preuaile vpon the defendants (who in that place were for moſt part either ſlaine or hurt) and againe recouered the top of the rampiers, and there aduanced the Turks enſignes. Then began the tyrant to lift vp his head, making ſure account that the citie was now his owne. But as the common ſaying is, He that reckoneth without his hoaſt, muſt reckon twiſe: ſo chanced it to Mahomet. For the companies, from the beginning of the ſiege left in the market place readie for all euents, and oftentimes wiſhing for ſome occaſion wherein to ſhew them- L ſelues; being now in good time aduertiſed of the imminent danger, came with ſpeed to the place of the aſſault before the Turks had taken good footing; and there valiantly encountring them, ſlew a great number of them, and forced the reſt from the rampiers; and plucking downe their enſignes before ſet vp, in ſtead of them placed their owne. With which repulſe the Turks were ſo diſmaied, that they quite forſooke the aſſault, and in deſpight of their imperious commanders, not expecting any ſigne of retrait, in haſte retired to their campe. Mahomet fallen from ſo great an hope, and grieued aboue meaſure with this ſhameful repulſe, returned into his pauilion fretting and fuming as a man halfe mad, where two daies he tormented himſelfe with his owne paſſions, not admitting any man to his preſence. The Chriſtians afterwards tooke the ſpoile of the dead Turks, and cutting off diuers of their heads, ſet them vp vpon poles round about the M

After that Mahomet had two daies diſgeſted the laſt repulſe, the ſhame whereof grieued him more than the loſſe it ſelfe: he ſent for both the great Baſſaes of CONSTANTINOPLE and ASIA,

A and other two of his chiefe councellors, with whom he reſolued to giue another aſſault, and thereon to gage his whole forces: for they were all of opinion with him, that the defendants were ſo weakned and waſted with the former aſſault, that they could not poſſibly hold out another. Whereupon ſtraight commandement was giuen through the campe, that euery man without exception, ſhould be readie to go to the aſſault whenſoeuer they were called vpon: and the more to encourage the ſoldiers, great rewards and preferments were promiſed to them which in time of the aſſault ſhould performe any eſpeciall piece of ſeruice. The firſt appearance of the new Moone (which the Turks worſhip with great deuotion) was the time that Mahomet had appointed for this generall aſſault: in the meane ſpace he ſpared not to poure out his furie a-
B gainſt the wals and rampiers of the towne, by the mouth of the cannon. The Chriſtian defendants on the other ſide, firſt by heartie prayer commended themſelues and their citie to the protection of the moſt mightie, and afterwards with reſtleſſe labour and no ſmall perill, ſpeedily repaired and new fortified whatſoeuer the furie of the artillerie had ouerthrown or ſhaken; omitting nothing that could be done or deuiſed for the defence of themſelues, and their citie. Now as ſoon as the new Moone began to ſhew her ſelfe, the Mahometane prieſts going about the armie, gaue the ſoldiers knowledge thereof (as their manner is) by ſinging of a ſong, in manner of a proceſſion; whereunto the whole armie anſwered with a ſhort reſponde, but with ſuch a terrible noiſe as was wonderfull to heare: and at the ſame time bowing themſelues to the ground, ſaluted the Moone with great ſuperſtition. Al their fond ceremonies performed, they began to draw
C nie the citie ſo thick, and in number ſo many, that all the ground for the ſpace of a mile round about Scodra was thick couered with men. The Chriſtians expecting euery houre to be aſſailed, were readie vpon the wals and rampiers of the citie to repulſe the enemie: but eſpecially at the great gate where moſt danger was feared, for that the Turkes with their great ordinance had made that place of all others moſt faultable. Heere Iacobus Moneta a noble captaine, with his brother Moncinus a valiant gentleman, tooke vpon them to receiue the firſt aſſault which is commonly of all others moſt terrible: for the Turkes vſe in their aſſaults to giue three attempts, whereof the firſt is moſt furious and dangerous, as performed by their beſt ſoldiers; the other two are of leſſe force: but if they faile in all three, they forſake the enterpriſe as men diſcouraged. Whileſt both the aſſailants and the defendants ſtood thus in readineſſe, the one as it were facing
D the other a great part of the night, Mahomet before day went vp to the top of the Baſſaes mount, from whence he had before beholden the former aſſault: at whoſe comming, there were preſently eleuen cannons diſcharged, & twelue ſmaller pieces (the ſignal appointed for the aſſault.) The Turkes vpon this ſigne giuen, with exceeding tumult and moſt hidious outcrie (as their manner is) began to aſſaile the citie round, and with ſuch wonderfull agilitie of bodie and courage mounted the rampiers at the great gate, that they had there as it were in a trice ſet vp one of their enſignes, which was forthwith pluckt vp by Moneta, and the Turkes with great ſlaughter driuen downe, where many of them were ſlaine with ſtones, timber, fire, and ſuch other things caſt downe vpon them; beſide a great number ſlaine or wounded with ſhot, arrowes, and darts, whereof none fell to the ground in vaine, by reaſon that the Turkes ſtood ſo thick, that they vi-
E olently preſſed one another forward, in ſuch ſort, that the formoſt could by no means ſhun any danger, were it neuer ſo great or terrible. In this ſort the aſſault was with great ſlaughter of the Turkes continued vntill it was day; they ſtriuing to win the breach, and the Chriſtians moſt valiantly defending the ſame: Moneta himſelfe in this fight receiued diuers wounds, and was twice beaten downe to the ground; yet ſtill recouering himſelfe, encouraged his ſoldiers, and worthily repulſed the enemie. Mahomet ſeeing his ſoldiers beaten from the breach, cauſed a tyre of his great Ordinance to be diſcharged vpon the Chriſtians which ſtood therein thick for the defence thereof, by force whereof many of them were rent in peeces, and the reſt ſore diſmayed: which the Turkes quickly perceiuing, and therewith encouraged, came on againe with a freſh charge, forcing themſelues to the vttermoſt to haue entred. But the valiant captaine nothing diſ-
F couraged either with the loſſe of them that were ſlaine, or with the danger of himſelfe, couragiouſly withſtood the furious enemie, & maintained the place vntill new ſupplies came to relieue him, and neuer departed thence, either ſuffered any man to depart, vntill the aſſault was ended. Many were ſlaine on both ſides, yet nothing troubled the defendants ſo much as the great ordinance; which being diſcharged from the Baſſaes mount into the breach, at ſuch times as the Turkes were driuen backe, ſlew many of the Chriſtians, leauing the breach almoſt cleare: ſo gi-of them that were ſlaine, who manfully repulſed the enemie. The tyrant from the mount ſeeing the inuincible courage of the defendants, was therewith exceedingly troubled: but fully reſolued now or neuer to haue it, commanded all his forces to be drawne from all other parts of the citie vnto the great gate, there to renew the aſſault; ſtraightly charging his captaines, neuer to returne thence vntill they had taken the citie. Heereupon the greateſt part of that hugie armie was forthwith in the ſight of himſelfe brought vnto the appointed place, and there gaue a ſharp and cruell aſſault at the breach, with ſuch deſperat furie, that in ſhort time they had ſlaine moſt of the defendants there preſent, and aduanced diuers of their enſignes vpon the top of the rampiers. Which Mahomet beholding from the mount, reioiced exceedingly, making ſure ac- H.

count that the citie was now his owne: but by that time he had well conceiued this hope, new ſupplies of freſh and couragious men (of purpoſe reſerued for all euents) came to the place of danger, and with great reſolution encountring the wearied Turkes, draue them back, cleared the breach, and ouerthrew the enſignes. Which ſo ſudden an alteration in the breach, wrought no leſſe alteration in the prowd tyrants mind, his hope was turned into deſpaire, and his rejoycing into choller: inſomuch that in his furie, he commanded all his great artillerie to be at once diſcharged into the breach; whereby many of his forward and couragious ſouldiers were ſlain togither with the defendants. At the ſame time, the great commanders and captaines knowing themſelues to be in the eye of their imperious lord and maſter, with their drawne ſwords forced the poore ſouldiers againe forward to the breach; and the more to encourage them, ad- I.
uentured themſelues alſo amongſt them: whereby the fight became more fierce and terrible than before. Many of the Turkes were there ſlaine; yet ſuch was the force and multitude of them which ſtill ſtept vp in their place, and bullets and arrowes flew ſo thicke, that the defendants oppreſſed with multitude, and ouerwhelmed with ſhot, were hardly able longer to maintaine the place, being for moſt part either ſlaine or wounded. Whereupon a great crie ran vpon the ſudden through the citie, that euerie man without exception, ſhould forthwith repaire to the breach. Which was with ſuch cheerefulneſſe done, that in leſſe time than was to haue beene thought, a wonderfull multitude of all ſort of people was there met togither, encouraging one another againſt the preſent danger; who all as men reſolued to lay downe their liues in defence of their countrey, valiantly encountred the Turkes vpon the top of the rampiers, and K.
ſo hardly laid vnto them, that notwithſtanding their great number, they began now againe to wauer and ſhrinke backe. Which thing the tyrant perceiuing from the mount, in great rage cõmanded his canoniers, as faſt as they could to diſcharge the great ordinance into the breach, without any regard of his owne men, ſo that togither with them, he might alſo kill ſome of the Chriſtians: and withall imperiouſly commanded his captaines, with all their force and power to maintaine the aſſault, threatning them with moſt horrible death, if they returned without victorie. Heereupon the aſſault was againe renewed, euery man (in ſhew at leaſt) ſet downe there to doe his laſt deuoire. But the great ordinance ſtill playing vpon the breach, ſlew many of the Turkes as well as of the Chriſtians. Thriſe the great ſhot fell amongſt the Turkes themſelues, and rent in ſunder a great number of them which were formoſt, to the great diſcouragement of L.
the reſt: whereof the tyrant had ſmall regard, ſo that togither with them he might alſo diminiſh the number of the defendants. Neuertheleſſe, ſuch was the deſperate furie of the enemie, that the citie was in no ſmal danger to haue been euen preſently taken, had not freſh ſupplies come from other places of the citie which they were appointed vnto; who with great courage reſiſted the enemie. Yet the Turkes farre exceeding in number (and freſh men continually ſtepping vp in ſtead of them which lay by heapes vnder their feet, and ſerued them in ſtead of ſteps to get vp to the rampiers) maintained a long and terrible fight: at which time the great ordinance alſo ſore annoied the defendants, ſo that with one ſhot (whereby the greatneſſe of the harmes done at other times may be gathered) eighteene of the Chriſtian defendants were ſlaine. As for arrowes, they flew as thicke as haile into the citie; ſo that they obſcured the light of the day, and M.

It was a ruthfull ſight to haue ſeene the bodies of the valiant Chriſtians rent in ſunder with the great ſhot, & pieces of them cleauing vpon euery wall thereabout, euery ſtreet was ſtained with their bloud, the great ordinance continually thundred, churches and houſes came ratling downe, yea the heauie countenance of the

A ayre it ſelfe ſeemed to bewaile the miſerie of the poore Chriſtians: beſides, the noiſe of trumpets,drums,and other inſtruments of warre,with the horrible crie of the helliſh Turkes, was ſo great and hideous,that it ſeemed as if heauen and earth ſhould haue gone togither: nothing was to be heard but the very terror of the eare; nothing to be ſeene but death, and the very inſtruments of death. And now in this extremitie a fearefull cry ran through the citie, That without preſent help all would be loſt at the great gate: Whereupon, not onely they which were whole (which were the feweſt in number) but they alſo which lay wounded or ſick in their beds, cheering vp themſelues, with weapons in their hands ran with ſpeed to the place where the danger was; chuſing rather there to die, than to be ſlaine in their beds. Thus whileſt the Chriſtians of
B all ſorts, and from all parts of the citie ran deſperatly to the gate, the Turkes were on euery ſide hardly preſſed and in great number ſlaine: yet freſh men ſtill comming vp as if they had ſprung out of the earth, the deadly fight was by them ſtill maintained. For the Turkes on the one ſide, for feare of the tyrant, laboured with might and maine to win the citie; and the Chriſtians on the other, knowing no hope left for them if they ſhould be ouercome, with no leſſe reſolution defended the ſame. In this obſtinacie of minds,many fell on both ſides: ſometimes the Turkes A doubtfull fight. ſeemed to haue the better, and were ſtraight way by the Chriſtians put to the worſe. Which manner of mortall fight with doubtfull euent, was continued moſt part of that day: vntill that at length many being on both parts ſlaine, and the reſt for moſt part ſore wounded and hurt, the furie of the aſſault began to aſſwage: for the Turkes now wearie of that long and deadly
C fight, and fainting with their wounds, had no great ſtomacke to mount vp the rampiers, where they ſaw no hope to preuaile, but all things threatning preſent death. Mahomet beholding the wonderfull ſlaughter of his men, and that hauing done what was poſſible for men to doe, they now fought as men diſcouraged,and in diſpaire of Victory himſelfe,cauſed a retrait to be ſounded,which the Turkes no ſooner heard, but that they left the aſſault, and without order ran to their tents as men halfe feared out of their wits.

Of this victorie, the Chriſtians (as they had good cauſe) rejoyced greatly: yet was this joy mingled with much ſorrow and heauineſſe, for the loſſe of ſuch worthy men as were ſlaine in that aſſault, manie of whoſe bodies, they were glad to gather vp by peecemeale, ſome heere, ſome there, ſome cleauing on this wall, and ſome on that: which they, as the time would giue
D leaue, honorably buried with the reſt of the ſlaine. At which time alſo, they with all diligence and expedition repaired their breaches, and put all things in ſuch readineſſe, as if they ſhould haue preſently receiued a freſh aſſault.

Mahomet wonderfully grieued with the ſhamefull diſhonour and great loſſe he had receiued at the laſt aſſault, repented himſelfe that euer he had taken the matter in hand, wiſhing that hee had neuer heard of the name of SCODRA: and in his choller and frantike rage, moſt horribly blaſphemed againſt God, moſt wickedly ſaying, that it were enough for him to haue care of heauenly things,and not to croſſe him in his worldly actions. In which furie he deſcended from the mount and got him into his tent, where he againe tormented himſelfe with his melancholy paſſions by the ſpace of two daies; wherein he would neither be ſpoke withall, or admit any
E man to his preſence. Vpon the third day he called a generall counſell of his commanders and beſt ſouldiers, and thereupon openly before them all ſaid, That he was determined to giue the enemie a freſh aſſault, for that being weakned with ſo many aſſaults, he could not poſſibly be able to hold out another: and therefore hoped for an eaſie victorie. But he had no ſooner ſo ſaid, but that all they that heard him, cried out with one voice to the contrarie: ſaying, That it was not by any meanes to be attempted, foraſmuch as his beſt ſouldiours were already ſlaine, and the greater part of them that were left, either ſore wounded, or brought to that weakneſſe that they were not able to do any more ſeruice; and that therefore it were better for them to kill one another, or elſe himſelfe to kill them one by one, than to expoſe them to be ſo ſhamefully butchered by the Chriſtians. In this diuerſitie of opinions, Achmetes Baſſa the great champion of F the Turkes (a man reuerend and of great authoritie,for his birth,yeares,and rare experience in martiall affaires,and one by whom Mahomet had done great matters) ſtanding vp,with pleaſing ſpeech calmed his furious mind,and with ſubſtantiall reaſons perſuaded him to deſiſt from that his entended purpoſe, and to take another ſurer courſe, as followeth.

Your great valour and worthie praiſes inuincible emperour (ſaid he) who is able to expreſſe? the A notable ſpeech of the great Baſſa Achmetes.

greatneſſe whereof the mind of man cannot conceiue, and my dull ſpirit but wonder thereat; my tongue G faltereth to ſpeake of them, neither would this time ſerue ſo much as to recount them. It is of all men deemed a thing of great honour (moſt dread ſoueraigne) when a prince hath receiued a kingdome from his anceſtors, to be able in ſafetie to keepe and defend the ſame: greater than this is it, honourably to encreaſe and augment it, ſo left: but of a ſmall thing, by worthie proweſſe to bring it to the higheſt type of worldly honour, is of all other things the greateſt. Which moſt rare excellencie, all men worthily aſcribe vnto your perfection and felicitie: and I of all others can thereof bring the moſt aſſured teſtimonie, who haue oftentimes heard it of mine anceſtors (which following the fortune of the Othoman princes out of ASIA into EVROPE) that your worthy predeceſſors at their firſt comming into EVROPE (without offence be it ſaid) poſſeſſed but a corner thereof; to whom you afterward by di- H uine appointment ſucceeding, haue adioined ſo many prouinces, kingdomes, and Empires, as were tedious to rehearſe them. For who can worthily expreſſe, how you haue in EVROPE ſubdued CONSTANTINOPLE, the imperiall citie of the Eaſt empire, with all THRACIA, ACHAIA, GRECIA, PELOPONESVS, BEOTIA, THEBES, and the noble citie of ATHENS, the mother and nurſe of all good learning. The empire of TRAPEZOND, with the emperour thereof, is by you ouerthrowne: the kingdomes of SERVIA and BOSNA, with the princes of PELOPONESVS, are by you glorioufly vanquiſhed. You haue at your command twelue kingdomes in ASIA the leſſer, PONTVS, BYTHINIA, CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, CILICIA, PAMPHILIA, LYCIA, CARIA, LYDIA, PHRIGIA, NICHOMEDIA, and NICEA, with the famous citie of PRVSA. Beſides theſe, IONIA, DORIS, SMYRNA, COLOPHON, EPHESVS, MILETVM, HALI- I CARNASVS, PERGAMVS, with the countrie of TAVRICA, are vnder your ſubiection. The great countrey of ARMENIA hath felt your force: the Iſlands of LESBOS, CHIOS, and EVBŒA, are parts of your empire. What ſhould I ſpeake of infinit people and nations, by you moſt victorioufly vanquiſhed? This may ſuffice for all, that you haue gained from the Chriſtians twentie prouinces and two hundred great cities. For it were too long to rehearſe the Mahometane kings and princes by you alſo vanquiſhed: in all your expeditions all things haue yet giuen place to your fortune. The ancient monuments may now ceaſe to extoll the praiſes of Cæſar, Scipio, Pyrrhus, Hanniball, and other cheefetaines of ROME, and forraine nations: for why, they are all inferior to you both for victories and countries ſubdued. The Othoman familie is vndoubtedly fatall for ſoueraigntie: all the world ſhall in ſhort time come vnder your gouernment, and all nations ſhall ſerue you. As for this towne of SCODRA, K
let it not ſo much greeue you: worldly things (as you know) doe oftentimes deceiue our expectation: in them fortune beareth great ſway. Yet for this matter, quiet your ſelfe: for I dare gage my faith vnto your imperiall maieſtie, that I will in ſhort time find meanes, that this citie ſhall ſtand at your deuotion. Did not I of late bring into your ſubiection the impregnable citie of CROIA, which you ſo long deſired? But whereas you would now again forthwith attempt to win it by aſſault, I therein craue your pardon, in that I cannot be of that opinion, but muſt needs thinke farre otherwiſe: for to attempt warre, and to be ouerthrowne, is an eaſie matter for euery man to doe; but to vaniſh the enemie, and to carrie away the triumph, that right few men know. He that conſulteth of ſuch great and weightie matters, ought to be free both from furie and deſire, both euill counſellours. The Chriſtians of SCODRA are not in my opinion to be againe aſſaulted: for in ſo doing you ſhall but loſe your labour. For if you could not ſubdue them, your L armie being then freſh and ſtrong, how ſhall you now ouercome them with much fewer, and they wounded, weake and feeble? I haue viewed the whole campe, and ſearched euery tent; and found no place, no tent, yea ſcarcely any cabbin, without groning, ſighing, weeping, or wailing; in euery place was heauineſſe, ſorrow, mourning, and death it ſelfe: for in the laſt aſſault you loſt thirtie thouſand and more of your beſt ſoldiers: many moe are greeuouſly wounded and maimed: none, but he carrieth about him ſome ſigne that he was there: few or none there be that dare againe mount the hill to giue a freſh aſſault, they are all afraid and diſcouraged. Whom when I demanded, how ſo great a feare was come vpon them, and what was the cauſe they had ſo loſt their wonted courage? they anſwered me, That it was the looke, euen the very looke of them of SCODRA, whoſe eyes did ſeeme vnto them to burne and ſparkle with fire: their ſterne and terrible countenances (ſaid they) haue ſtrucke this terrour into vs, Wherefore I thinke it M not good to giue a freſh aſſault with men ſo diſmaied: but rather to vſe policie and delay againſt ſuch reſolute enemies. This citie of SCODRA is the eye and head of all this prouince, which the Venetians haue notably fortified and planted with ſtore of ordinance and of all things elſe neceſſarie for defence thereof; but eſpecially with moſt valiant ſouldiers, of purpoſe choſen out of many their garriſons for defence of this citie: you haue not now to doe with the weake and effeminate people of ASIA, but with

A the hard and rough people of Epirvs. And you know (moſt mightie Emperour) the ſtrength and courage of this nation: it is now thirtie yeares that you haue made warre againſt this people, and haue not yet altogether ſubdued them: and how dangerous and chargeable this warre hath beene vnto you, who knoweth not? It is now ſix moneths ſince we came firſt before this citie; we haue intrenched our ſelues round about it, we haue day and night laid hard ſiege vnto it, we haue battered it of long with eleuen cannons: I ſpeake not of other ſmaller peeces or engines of warre, with all kind of ſhot and fire-worke, and whatſoeuer elſe we could deuiſe. We haue many times to our coſt aſſaulted it: what could be done by force, ſtrength, or multitude of valiant men, is already done in the former aſſaults. Nothing hath been left vnattempted, no policie no direction hath wanted in your leaders, neither courage in
B your ſouldiors. What ſhould I recount the innumerable great ſhot, or ſpeake of our arrowes and darts, deliuered into the citie as ſhowers of haile? Did all this or any thing elſe we could doe, any thing terrifie theſe defendants? Were they not, nay are they not ſtill ready, with great aſſurance and courage at all aſſayes to encounter vs. You take a wrong courſe by force to conſtraine them. They haue taken vpon them the defence of this place, and are not thence to be remoued, there ſhall you be ſure ſtill to finde them either aliue or dead. And what account they make of their liues, you ſee, they will ſell them vnto vs deare for their countrey, and preferre an honourable death before a ſeruile life. Wherefore againſt men ſo ſet downe, policie is to be vſed: and them whom we cannot by force ſubdue, let vs by delay and time
C ouercome. If you will win Scodra, blocke it vp, build ſtrong forts in places conuenient round about it, and furniſh them with good ſouldiers: make a bridge ouer Boliana, with a ſtrong caſtle on ei-ther ſide, to ſtop the paſſage: which done, beſiege the other weaker cities of the Venetians, which are as it were the lims of Scodra: and ſubdue the countrey round about, which will be no hard matter for you to doe, being maſter of the field: ſo muſt Scodra at length of neceſſitie yeeld vnto you, as of late did Croia, enforced thereunto by famine. Thus may you in ſafetie without ſlaughter of your people come to the full of your deſires.

The wholeſome counſell of the Baſſa ſo well pleaſed Mahomet himſelfe, and the reſt there preſent, that the aſſault was laid aſide, and preſent order taken for the ſpeedie execution of that which was by him ſo well plotted. Whereupon the Baſſa of Constantinople with his forces was ſent to Zabiache, a citie in the borders of Dalmatia, ſtanding vpon the lake
D of Scvtarie, not farre from Ascrivivm, which in few daies was yeelded vnto him. The Baſſa poſſeſſed of the citie, thruſt out all the inhabitants, and leauing therein a garriſon of Turks, returned againe to the campe at Scodra. At the ſame time great Baſſa of Asia was alſo ſent by Mahomet againſt Drivasto, a citie alſo of the Venetians: which when he had beſieged and ſore battered by the ſpace of ſixteene dayes, the great tyrant came thither in perſon himſelfe, and the next day after his comming tooke the citie, without any great reſiſtance. Such as he found vpon the wals, he put to the ſword: of the reſt he tooke three hundred away with him vnto the campe at Scodra, and there in the face of the citie cauſed them all to be cruelly ſlaine, of purpoſe ſo to terrifie the defendants. The next day after he ſent the great Baſſa of Constantinople to Lyssa, called alſo Alessa, a citie of the Venetians, ſituated vpon the riuer
E Drinus, about thirtie miles from Scodra. The Baſſa comming thither, found the citie deſolate (for the citizens hearing of his comming, were for feare before fled) for which cauſe he ſet the citie on fire. Heere the Turkes digged vp the bones of the worthy prince Scanderbeg, for the ſuperſtitious opinion they had of the vertue of them: and happie was he that could get any little part thereof to ſet in gold or other jewell, as a thing of great price, as is before declared. All theſe things thus done, Mahomet committed the direction of all things concerning the ſiege of Scodra, vnto the diſcretion of Achmetes. By whoſe perſwaſion, he leauing a great power for the continuing of the ſiege, departed thence himſelfe with fortie thouſand ſouldiers for Constantinople, curſing and banning by the way all the countrey of Epirvs, all the inhabitants therein, and euery part thereof, their corne, their cattle, and whatſoeuer elſe was fruit-
F full; but aboue all other things the citie of Scodra, with all that therein was, for that he had neuer receiued greater diſhonour or loſſe than there.

Lyſſa taken by the Turks, and the bones of Scanderbeg digged vp by them, and had in great reuerence.

After his departure, which was about the ſeuenth of September, the two great Baſſaes of Constantinople and Asia, according to order before taken, built a great bridge ouer the riuer Boliana, and on either ſide a ſtrong caſtle, to the intent that no releefe ſhould that way be brought into the citie. Which worke when they had brought to perfection, and furniſhed both caſtles with garriſons, ordinance, and all things neceſſarie, they left Achmetes Baſſa with fortie G.

thouſand ſoldiers to continue the ſiege, and returned themſelues the one to CONSTANTINOPLE, and the other in ASIA. The warie and politike Baſſa mindfull of the charge he had taken vpon him, tooke ſuch order, that no releefe could poſſibly be brought vnto the citie either by land or by water: and ſo lying ſtill before it a long time, brought it at length into ſuch a diſtreſſe and want of all things, that the poore Chriſtians were faine to eate all manner of vncleane and loathſome things; horſes were daintie meat, yea they were glad to eate dogs, cats, rats, and the skins of beaſts ſod: it exceedeth all credit to tell at what exceeding great price a little mouſe was ſold, or puddings made of dogs guts. All theſe bare ſhifts and extremities the poore Chriſtians were content to endure euen vnto the laſt gaſpe, rather than to yeeld themſelues into the H hands of their mercileſſe enemies.

Whileſt SCODRA thus lay in the ſuds, the Venetians wearie of the long and chargeable war they had to their great loſſe now maintained againſt ſo mightie an enemie, by the ſpace of ſixteene yeares; and hauing no meanes to releeue their diſtreſſed ſubjects in SCODRA, thought it beſt to proue, if they could procure a peace from the tyrant. For which purpoſe they ſent Benedictus Triuiſanus, a great Senatour and a man of great experience, to CONSTANTINOPLE: who ſo well vſed the matter, that after long debating too and fro, at length a peace was concluded; whereof the cheefe capitulations were, That the Venetians ſhould deliuer vnto Mahomet the citie of SCODRA, the Iſland of LEMNOS, and the ſtrong caſtle of TENARVS in PELOPONESVS, and pay him yearely eight thouſand duckats; That they might freely after their wonted man- I ner trafficke into the Euxine by the ſtraits of Helleſpontus and Boſphorus Thracius, and other parts of his dominions. Concerning the citizens of SCODRA, it was compriſed in the ſame Aboord choice. peace, That it ſhould be at their owne choice either to liue there ſtill vnder the gouernment of the Turkiſh emperour, or elſe at their pleaſure to depart in ſafetie with their goods whether they would. Triuiſanus hauing in this manner concluded a peace, in his returne homeward the fourth of Aprill, found the Venetian Admirall riding at anker in the mouth of Boliana, from whence they both by letters certified the Gouernour and citizens of SCODRA, in what manner the peace was concluded with the Turke, and what prouiſion was therein made for them. Vpon receit of which letters, the gouernour calling together the citizens, declared vnto them how the caſe ſtood: and there with them entered into conſultation vpon this hard queſtion, Whether they K would remaine there ſtill in their natiue country vnder the Turkiſh tyrannie; or forſaking the ſame, liue amongſt other Chriſtians in perpetuall exile? But after the matter had beene throughly debated, and many reaſons on both parts alledged, at length it was by generall conſent concluded, That they ſhould all forſake the citie and the houſe of bondage, as dangerous both to their ſoules and bodies, and liue as it ſhould pleaſe God amongſt other Chriſtians. So the Turks giuing pledges for the ſafe departure of the Chriſtians in SCODRA, they all at an appointed day with bag & baggage came out of the citie, & were by the Venetians carefully tranſported into other parts of their territorie in ITALIE, where they liued in peace. The Turks (who had now beſieged the citie a whole yeare) after the departure of the Chriſtians entered the citie with great joy and triumph, which with many others thereabout, hath euer ſince to the great ruth of all L Chriſtendome remained in the poſſeſſion of the faithleſſe infidels. Thus was the ſtrong citie
Scodra yeilded vnto the Turks. of SCODRA loſt, and the long warres ended betwixt Mahomet and the Venetians, which happened in the yeare 1478.

1480 Mahomet now at peace with the Venetians, ſent the ſame Achemetes Baſſa (by whom he had but a litle before taken in SCODRA) with his fleet of gallies againſt one Leonard, prince of NERITVS, ZACYNTHVS, and CEPHALENIA, Iſlands neere vnto PELOPONESVS: where the Baſſa arriuing, eaſily tooke the ſame Iſlands, the poore prince for ſafegard of his life being glad to flie into ITALIE with his wife and treaſure to king Ferdinand, whoſe nigh kinſwoman he had maried.

About the ſame time Alis-Beg, ſurnamed Michael Ogli, Iſa Beg the ſonne of Caſſanes, and Balis Beg, ſurnamed Malcozogli (men of great account amongſt the Turks, and moſt honourably deſ- M cended) entred into TRANSYLVANIA with a great armie of an hundred thouſand men, and brought ſuch a general feare vpon the country, that Stephanus Batore the Vaiuod, was glad with all ſpeed to flie vnto Matthias king of HVNGARIE, to declare vnto him the danger of his countrey, and to craue his aid. Matthias at the ſame time lay ſick of the gout: neuertheleſſe he tooke ſuch order by his captaines, Stephanus Cherepetrus, & Paulus Kiniſius countie of TEMESVVARE,

A that the Turks were encountred not farre from ALBA IVLIA, and there in a great and bloudie battell ouerthrowne: wherein Iſa one of their great Captaines was ſlaine, with thirtie thouſand Turks mo. Neither was this victorie gained by the Chriſtians without loſſe, Bator the Vayuod himſelfe being ſore wounded, and eight thouſand men ſlaine.

Mahomet in his ambitious humour, had long time deſired to haue in his ſubiection the Iſland of the RHODES. For why, it grieued him that ſo ſmall an iſland ſhould lie ſo nie his great dominions in ASIA, holden by a few Chriſtians, to the great trouble of his merchants trading in the Mediteranean, beſide many other harms daily from thence receiued, and to haue no feeling of his greatnes. But foraſmuch as the winning of that place was thought to be a matter of great
B difficultie, and in former times vnfortunatly attempted by ſome of the Mahometane princes: he purpoſed now with good aduiſe to take this enterpriſe in hand. Wherefore calling togither his graue counſellors and moſt expert men of war, after he had declared vnto them the manifold iniuries receiued from them of the RHODES; he propounded the matter, Whether it were beſt to attempt the winning of that iſland or not? Some forward men perſuaded him to reuenge thoſe iniuries done by thoſe Chriſtians, and to ſubdue that iſland, which for the neereneſſe vnto CARIA, might of right be accounted as part of his dominion; and not to forbeare that enterpriſe for feare of repulſe, foraſmuch as he was able to bring mo men to aſſaile it, that were ſtones in the wall about it. Others better aduiſed, declared the ſtrength of the iſland, with the valour of the defendants; men alwaies brought vp in armes, and as it were choſen out of all parts of Chri-
C ſtendome: ſo that it was (as they ſaid) like to proue a matter of more difficultie than was by ſome ſuppoſed; whereof ſome of the Mahometane princes had to their no ſmal diſhonour, alreadie made ſufficient triall: Alleadging farther, that that ſmall iſland which ſcarcely appeared in the ſea, was not of that worth, as that he ſhould thereon gage his honour, with the liues of ſo many good men, and moſt valiant ſouldiors as might ſerue for the conqueſt of a kingdome. For all that, Mahomet prickt forward with the ſpurs of ambition, and continuall ſolicitation of Anthonius Meligalus, a fugitiue knight of the RHODES, reſolued to follow the counſell of them which perſuaded the warre. This Meligalus was a knight of the order, which when he had prodigally conſumed his ſubſtance which was great, with two others, Demetrius and Sophonius, men of his owne qualitie and diſpoſition, fled vnto the Turkiſh emperor; preſenting vnto him a perfect
D plot of the citie, with all the ſtrength both of it, and the iſle wherein it ſtood, and which way he might with moſt eaſe win it. In which ſeruice they frankly offered to ſpend their liues: but hoping indeed by ſuch foule treacherie to repaire their broken eſtate. All things being now in readineſſe, Mahomet appointed Meſithes Paleologus, one of his chiefe Baſſaes (the neere kinſman of Conſtantius Paleologus the laſt emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE) Generall for that expedition; committing to his charge the whole managing of that ſo great an action. Meſithes embarking his armie in number eightie thouſand, and throughly furniſhed with all things neceſſarie for the ſiege, ſet forward from CONSTANTINOPLE, and with a pleaſant gale of wind, ſayled alongſt the coaſt of ASIA the leſſe, towards the RHODES: where by the way he called vnto him Demetrius (one of the fugitiue knights) to learne of him the beſt meanes for the ſafe landing of E his armie. As for the arch traitor Meligalus, and chiefe author of this warre, he was fallen ſicke vpon the way; and in the extremitie of his ſickeneſſe, growing both troubleſome and loathſome vnto the Turkes that were with him in the ſame gallie, was by the marriners throwne ouerboord aliue: crying out in vaine for helpe, no man vouchſafing to haue any compaſſion vpon him; and ſo ſwallowed vp of the ſea, receiued amiddeſt the waues, the iuſt guerdon of his treacherie.

Mahomet loueth after the Rhodes.

A death right worthie ſuch a traitour.

At this time Peter Damboyſe a Frenchman, an Auergnoies, a man of ſingular gouernment, was Great Maſter of the RHODES; whoſe valiancie was ſuch, that commonly once in eight daies he had certaine intelligence what great matters paſſed in the Turkes court: and therewith of ſuch deepe iudgement, that he was ſeldome or neuer ouertaken, or deceiued with any falſe
F aduertiſements. This carefull Graund Maſter, was not ignorant of all theſe great preparations, neither of the comming of the Baſſa; and therefore had before ſtrongly fortified the citie, and ſo ſtored the ſame with all things needfull, as might well haue ſerued for many yeres ſiege: but eſpecially with ſuch ſhot and powder, that it was deemed (as indeed it was) an eſpeciall meanes whereby the citie was afterward preſerued. At the ſame time, many noble and valiant gentlemen hearing of the Turkes deſignes, repaired thither out of ITALY, FRANCE, SPAINE, GERMANIE, MANIE, and other places of Christendome, cheerefully to aduenture their liues, in defence both of the place, and of the Christian religion, against the common enemie of Christianitie. The Great Master taking a general view of all the forces he had, to oppose against so puissant an enemie, found that hee had in the citie sixteene thousand able men: in which number were reckoned many Iewes and other men of seruile condition; who in the siege following, did right good seruice. The great Bassa conducted by the false traitor Demetrius, safely landed both his armie and artillerie in the island the two and twentieth day of Iune, not farre from the citie. At which time the Great Master considering that the safetie of the citie consisted more in the liuely valour of the defendants, than in the strength of the dead wals, or other warlike prouision; thought it requisite, as a part of his duetie, by cheerefull persuasions to encourage them, valiantly to withstand the force of their enemies. And therefore calling them all together, spake vnto them as followeth: G H

The oration of the Great Master to the rest of the knights and souldiors, to encourage them valiantly to withstand the Turkes.

At length valiant souldiers and fellowes at armes, wee see the Turkes our mortall enemies (as we were before aduertised, as well by letters from our friendes, as by common fame) breathing after our destruction; in readinesse to destroie our churches, our oratories, our alters, our religion, and whatsoeuer else we account sacred or religious; seeking the ruine of this noble citie, and the cruell death of vs all; gaping at once, to deuour our liues, our wealth, our hope, with all our former honour. And truely as I cannot denie but that the chance of warre is doubtfull, and the euent thereof vncertaine: so when I consider your valiant courage and cheerefulnesse of mind, I presently conceiue a most assured hope of victorie. They haue entered into armes against vs, not so much for any desert of ours, or vpon any other quarrell; as for the vsatiable desire of rule, and the great despite they beare against vs and the Christian religion. But to withstand their furie, and to frustrate their designes, we want neither weapons, nor artillerie, nor prouision for many yeares; we haue a most strong garrison of Frenchmen, Spaniards, Germaines, English, and others, the verie chiualrie of Christendome: and that which more is, Christ Iesus our Captaine and Generall, by whose power, we shall no doubt easily repulse the vaine force of our most wicked and graceless enemies. The care wee haue for the defence of the Christian faith, whereunto wee are by speciall profession bound, will animate and encourage vs against them, which seeke for nothing more than to extend their wicked and grosse superstition, to the great dishonour of God, and of his sonne Christ Iesus. Besides that, wee are warlike Frenchmen, Italians, Germaines, and other worthie Christians: they are of CARIA, LYDIA, CAPADOCIA, and the other delicate countries of ASIA; effeminat persons, brought vp to pleasure. I say it not to draw you into anie manifest or ineuitable danger, neither to feed you with vaine hope, or to fill your eares with windie words: but this I promise and assure you of, that if this siege shall continue long, hither will come such strong ayde out of FRANCE, ITALY, GERMANIE and SPAINE, as will serue not onely to raise the siege, but to recouer againe the empires of CONSTANTINOPLE and TRAPESONDE. Then shall our enemie see no good end of their councels; but all their deuises so confounded, as that they shall hardly be able by speedie flight to saue themselues. But suppose the hardest should happen, which I feare not: would not any man account his life most happily and honourably spent, in defence of a good conscience, and the quarrell of Christ Iesus? Truely my great yeares and course of life now almost spent in defence of the Christian religion (as I euer desired) doth call me forth, as one so assured of that good laid vp for me in heauen by Christ Iesus (whose battell we are to fight) that I no whit feare any enemies force or future chance: which for all that, I haue as farre as I could, and to the vttermost of my power so prouided for, as that we will not (I hope) be there with ouerwhelmed. Be you therefore of good cheere and comfort (as I knowe you are) and shew your selues valiant and couragious, which resteth wholy in your selues: and as for all the rest, time, and our discretion shall right well prouide I doubt not. I K L

The valiant men and worthie souldiours, resting vpon the assurance of their aged gouernor, departed euerie man to his charge, full of hope and courage. Now had the Bassa landed his great armie, and sent Demitrius the traiterous knight, Meligalus his companion, with certaine troupes of horsemen and some foot, to view the ground, where he might best incampe with his armie. Demetrius in great pride riding about the citie, was knowne by Anthonie Damboyse, the Great Masters brother; by whose leaue, he sallied out with a troupe of gallant horsemen, and skirmished with them: but the Turkes being mo in number, cast about to haue encloased them; which Anthonie perceiuing, turned vpon them that were comming behind him, and that with M

A ſuch force, that he ſlew or wounded moſt part of them. In this hoat skirmiſh, Demetrius hauing his horſe ſlaine vnder him, and himſelfe ouerthrowne, was there troden to death vnder the horſes feet: an end too good for ſo falſe a traitor. Muratius a French knight, vnaduiſedly diſpoiling his dead bodie, was by the Turkes ſlaine, and his head preſented vnto the Baſſa in ſtead of Demetrius.

The Baſſa approaching the citie, at the firſt comming tooke a great orchard, which the Great Maſter had ſtrongly entrenched, and therein placed certaine companies of ſouldiors, with ſome ſmall peeces of ordinance: which place if it could haue beene kept, might haue fitly ſerued the defendants to haue at their pleaſure ſallied out vpon the enemie. But they which were appointed
B to the keeping thereof, either terrified with the ſight of ſo great an armie, or elſe doubting to be able to hold it againſt ſo great a power, abandoned it by night, and retired into the citie; leauing the great ordinance behind them for haſt. In this place, the Baſſa by the counſell of George Frapaine (a Chriſtian fugitiue of the Rhodes, and now maſter of his ordinance) began to plant his batterie, and from thence to batter the tower called Nicholea, or S. Nicholas his tower, diſtant from the citie three hundred paces. But againſt this place, Damboyſe had ſo aptly mounted two great Baſiliskes, that he made him glad quickly to forſake the ſame: yet finding no other place more conuenient for his purpoſe, ſhortly after he neere vnto the ſame place planted againe his batterie, of far greater force than before. Wherein beſide the ordinance of greateſt charge, he had three hundred ſmaller pieces for batterie: wherewith at the firſt he did ſmall harme, for that this
C George Frapaine repenting himſelfe (as it was thought) of his foule treaſon, beſtowed the ſhot to ſmall purpoſe; for which cauſe the Baſſa began to haue him in diſtruſt: which Frapaine perceiuing, fled by night againe vnto the Rhodes, and diſcouered vnto the Great Maſter all the ſecrets of the Turks campe. The Turkes continuing the batterie, had ſore ſhaken the aforeſaid tower called S. Nicholas, and beaten downe ſome part thereof: which the Chriſtians with great induſtrie, ſpeedily repaired in beſt ſort they could. For all that, the Turks gaue thereunto a fierce aſſault, by the ſpace of ſix houres, forcing themſelues to the vttermoſt to haue taken it: but perceiuing that it preuailed them nothing, they retired, hauing loſt eight hundred of their men, with many others drowned in the ſea, of whom the number was not knowne, and a thouſand others ſore wounded. Eight hundred Turkes ſlaine.

D Meſithes diſappointed of his former purpoſe, bent his artillerie againſt the wals of the citie and with continuall batterie had made a faire breach. But Damboyſe foreſeeing the danger, had with great labour caſt vp ſuch rampires with a countermure before the breach, that the Baſſa durſt not in any caſe aduenture to enter the breach he had made. For performance of this ſo neceſſarie a worke, the captaines themſelues refuſed not to put to their helping hands: by whoſe example, all the reſt of the people which were able to do any thing, being moued, willingly imployed their labour vntill the worke was fully finiſhed.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Cali-Baſſa the younger (a great courtier) was ſent from Mahomet, to ſee with what ſucceſſe the ſiege went forward. Vpon whoſe arriuall, it was giuen out through all the Turkes campe, That Mahomet was in perſon himſelfe comming to the ſiege,
E with an hundred thouſand men, and an hundred & fiftie peeces of great ordinance. Theſe news (of purpoſe deuiſed to the terrour of the defendants) being blown out of the campe into the citie, ſtrucke an exceeding great feare into the minds of ſome of the defendants, and ſo diſcouraged the Spaniards, with their nigh neighbours that came from Navar, that they began openly to reaſon in their conuenticles, That it was not poſſible for the citie to be defended againſt ſuch a power; and therfore after an inſolent maner, deſired leaue to be gone: to the great diſcouragement of the reſt. The Great Maſter vnderſtanding of their doings, ſent for theſe mutinous Spaniards: and after he had ſharpely reproued them both of diſorder and cowardiſe, promiſed to ſhip them away forthwith out of the iſle, ſaying, That he doubted not, right well to defend the citie againſt the greateſt power of the Turke, without the helpe of ſuch baſe minded cowards.
F In the mean time he commanded them to ſurceaſe from their mutinous talke, threatning otherwiſe to make them examples to others, what it were ſo much to forget themſelues. But theſe Spaniards ſhortly after, better conſidering of the matter, and what a diſhonor it would be both to themſelues and their nation, if they ſhould ſo diſhonourably be ſent away; repenting themſelues of that they had done, came and craued pardon of the Great Maſter: and to redeeme their former fault, in all ſallies & ſeruices during that ſiege, ſhewed themſelues moſt valiant and forward men: for all that, the Great Maſter would neuer afterwards truſt them in any ſeruice G alone. The Baſſa attempting much and preuailing little, thought it would much further his deſignes, if he could by anie meanes take the Great Maſter out of the way, by whoſe carefull pollicie he ſaw all his deuiſes ſtill countermaunded: wherefore to bring this his purpoſe to paſſe, he practiſed by the meanes of one Ianus a Dalmatian, to poyſon him. This Ianus hauing conceiued this treaſon from the Baſſa, was receiued into the citie of the RHODES, as a Chriſtian fugitiue fled from the Turkes: where hee acquainted himſelfe with one Pythius an Epirot, of great familiaritie with Marius Philelphus (of late ſecretarie vnto Damboyſe, but as then out of fauour and in diſgrace, for that he was partaker with the Spaniards in the late mutinie.) Ianus by the meanes of Pythius, whom he had now throughly corrupted, ſought after Philelphus, who H

Treaſon againſt the great Maſter diſcouered, and the traitours executed. then as he right well knew, liued diſcontented, as a fit inſtrument whereby to worke this treaſon; for that he was a man well acquainted with the cookes and butlers, and other ſeruitours in the Great Maſters houſe, and himſelfe (yet) there verie conuerſant alſo. Pythius preſuming of his old acquaintance and famaliaritie with Philelphus, and waiting vpon his melancholie humour, began to perſuade him to reuenge the diſgrace he liued in, and with all to ſhew him the meanes how to doe it, by poyſoning of the Great Maſter: which might (as hee ſaid) fall out to his greater good than he was yet aware of. Philelphus making ſemblant as if he had not diſliked of the motion, was deſirous to know of him what farther benefit might thereby ariſe vnto him, more than reuenge. To whom Pythius forthwith ſhewed the Baſſaes letters to Ianus, whereby hee aſſured him, that whatſoeuer he ſhould promiſe vnto any man for the furtherance of the practiſe, he would to the full performe the ſame. I Philelphus hauing got full vnderſtanding of the treaſon, preſently diſcouered the ſame to Damboyſe. By whoſe commandement Ianus and Pythius were ſtraightwaies apprehended, and being examined confeſſed the treaſon: for which Ianus loſt his head, and Pythius (as he had well deſerued) was ſhamefully hanged. Philelphus for his fidelitie, was pardoned his former errour, and againe receiued into the Great Maſters fauour.

The Baſſa vnderſtanding that the treaſon was diſcouered, and the traitours executed, was much grieued therewith. Neuertheleſſe, he ceaſed not with continuall batterie to ſhake the citie, but eſpecially the tower of S. Nicholas, for the aſſailing whereof he made wonderfull preparation. Amongſt other things, he had framed a great bridge, ſtaied with ſtrong ropes and cables, K ouer a ſhort fret of the ſea, betwixt the place of his batterie and the ſame tower, wheron ſix men might march a breaſt: in which deuiſe he repoſed great hope. But as the Turkes were making faſt this bridge, and had (as they thought) brought the worke to a good perfection; Gernaiſe Rogers an Engliſh man of great courage, and verie skilfull in ſea matters, found meanes by night to cut and breake in ſunder all the ropes and cables wherewith the bridge was ſtayed: which now looſe, was by the violenee of the ſea quickly carried away, and the Turkes diſappointed of their purpoſe. For which good ſeruice he was by the Great Maſter honorably rewarded, and of him in publicke audience highly commended.

Yet was the furious batterie by the Baſſa ſtill maintained, and a new bridge framed vpon ſmal boates and lighters, faſt moored with cables and anchors; and diuers peeces of great ordi- L nance placed in fuſts and gallies. So that the tower was at one time battered both by ſea & land, the defendants aſſailed with ſmall ſhot and arrowes innumerable, and the tower at the ſame inſtant deſperatly ſcaled. But Damboyſe had ſo placed his great ordinance, that with the force therof the bridge was broken in ſunder, foure of their great fuſts ſunke, with great ſtore both of men and ordinance: the defendants alſo in the tower, with ſhot, timber, ſtones, and other ſuch like things prouided for that purpoſe, grieuouſly ouerwhelmed the Turks that were ſcaling the wals and beat them downe with great ſlaughter. This hoat aſſault was deſperatly maintained by the Turks, from three a clocke in the morning vntill ten: when the Baſſa ſeeing no hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the aſſault, hauing therein loſt aboue 2500 men; whoſe dead bodies ſhortly af-of CRETE, going about to haue fled vnto the enemie, were apprehended and put to death. And George Frapaine, who in the beginning of the ſiege fled from the Turks, now againe vehemently ſuſpected of treaſon, was executed alſo.

Thus neither force nor treaſon preuailing, the Baſſa becauſe he would leaue nothing vnproued that might better his cauſe, ſent certaine meſſengers vnto the Great Maſter, offering vnto him

in

A in the name of the Turkiſh emperour, great rewards, with many honourable preferments, if he would yeeld vp the citie; which he could not (as they would haue perſuaded him) long hold againſt ſo mightie an enemie: wiſhing him now in his declining eſtate not to refuſe ſuch honorable and princely offers, for feare he were afterwards conſtrained to accept of farre worſe, or elſe through his deſperate wilfulneſſe plunge himſelfe and his people into ſuch extreame perill, as ſhould be impoſſible for him or them to find any way out of. Whereunto the great Maſter in briefe anſwered: That he would not willingly in his ſure eſtate vſe the counſell of his enemie: neither in his greateſt diſtreſſe refuſe cheerefully to yeeld his life vnto Almightie God, to whom he did owe it; and that with farre better will than to yeeld vp the citie vpon any conditions, beare they neuer ſo faire a B ſhew of honour or profit. The meſſengers perceiuing his conſtant reſolution, rather to die than to yeeld his citie, began (according to inſtructions before giuen them by the Baſſa) to temper with him another way, and to perſuade him to yeeld vnto the mightie emperour ſome ſmall yearely tribute or other homage, as an acknowledgement of his greatneſſe, and ſo to liue as his friend in peace. But the Great Maſter knowing by the wofull example of others, that in that ſmall requeſt lay included the beginning of the Turkiſh thraldome and ſlauerie: vtterly refuſed to pay him the leaſt tribute, or to do him the leaſt homage that could be deuiſed. With which anſwere the meſſengers returned, hauing obtained nothing of that they were ſent for.

The reſolute anſwere of the great Maſter.

The reſolute anſwere of the great Maſter reported by the aforeſaid meſſengers vnto the Baſſa troubled him exceedingly: for though he had ſmall hope by force to win the citie, yet he was C alwaies in hope vntill now, at his pleaſure to forſake the ſiege with ſome ſuch reaſonable compoſition as might ſtand with his honour. But ſith nothing remained now, but by plaine force to conſtraine his enemies; he reſolued for the ſafegard of his honour, in that extremitie to vſe that extreame remedie. Wherfore beſide the great peeces of batterie he had alreadie planted againſt the wals, he mounted diuerſe ſmaller pieces much higher, thereby the more to annoie the defendants, by beating downe of their churches and high built houſes. His ordinance thus placed, he battered the citie day and night for the ſpace of foure daies together without intermiſſion: during which time, the Chriſtians out of the citie ſpared not liberally to beſtow their ſhot amongſt their enemies alſo: ſo that the aire ſeemed to grow thicke, & the light of the day to be darkned with the ſmoke of the great ordinance; and the great ſhot came ſo thicke into the citie, that the D fearefull women and children were glad to ſhroud themſelues from the danger therof, in cellars and caues vnder ground. So long continued this great batterie, that at length the ſtrength of the wal gaue place to the furie of the cannon, and a faire breach was laid open for the enemie to enter: which was no ſooner made, but that with the firſt ſhew thereof the Turks gaue thereunto a deſperat aſſault; and preuailing by reaſon of their multitude, had vpon the ſuddaine recouered the top of the wals, & there ſet vp ſome of their enſignes: but the Chriſtians ſpeedily comming in on euerie ſide to the defence of the breach, they were againe quickely repulſed and beaten down into the ditches, out of which moſt of them neuer riſe more. At which time the Turkes in another place with their ſcaling ladders had gained the top of the wals, and there aduanced their enſignes alſo, and were now fiue hundred of them entred the citie, and come into the ſtreet E called the Iew ſtreet: where they were incountred by the Great Maſter and his followers, and all ſlaine that were alreadie entred; and their enſignes that ſtood vpon the wals throwne downe. The reſt yet ſcaling the wals, and ignorant of the fortune of their fellowes, were likewiſe beaten from the wals, and with wonderfull ſlaughter rejected. So that the Baſſa not able longer to endure the ſlaughter of his men, being in both places repulſed, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and left the aſſault; wherein he had loſt of his moſt forward men about fiue thouſand, with ſmall loſſe of the Chriſtians. In this aſſault the Great Maſter himſelfe receiued fiue wounds, whereof one vnder his right pap was thought to haue bin deadly: which yet afterward was verie wel cured with the reſt.

A faire breach made by force of the Turkes batterie.

After that the Baſſa had by the ſpace of three months to ſmal purpoſe ſpent all his forces and F deuiſes vpon the citie, he began to doubt whether it were better for him to raiſe his ſiege and depart, or to tarrie and expect ſome better fortune, which in all his former actions had ſeemed almoſt to haue waited vpon him: to forſake the ſiege, was diſhonorable; and to continue it without hope, preſented no leſſe danger. Beſides that, in the former aſſaults he had alreadie loſt nine thouſand of his beſt ſouldiours, and all the reſt of his armie was filled with heauineſſe and deſpaire, to heare the wofull ſighing and groning of their fellowes, of whom fifteene thouſand lay

but euen a little before two great ſhips ſent from Ferdinand king of NAPLES with men and munition, were in deſpight of all the Turks gallies ſafely arriued at the RHODES, to the great ioy and encouragement of the beſieged, and no leſſe diſcontentment of the Turks. Whileſt the Baſſa was thus deliberating what courſe to take, a rumor was raiſed in the campe, That the Chriſtian princes were comming with great power to relieue the town: with which news the whole armie was exceedingly troubled; whereupon he raiſed his ſiege. Some others ſay that Mahomet hearing of the euill ſucceſſe of his armie in the iſland of the RHODES, with the difficultie of the ſiege, and now readie to go in perſon himſelfe againſt the Sultan of ÆGYPT, ſent for the Baſſa, and that ſo the ſiege was raiſed. At the ſame time that the RHODES was thus beſieged, Mahomet ſent his old and moſt expert captaine Achmetes Baſſa, with a great fleet and a ſtrong armie to make an entrance into ITALIE (for no kingdome was ſo ſtrong, which the ambitious tyrant in the pride of his heart thought not he might now commaund) and hauing long before conquered CONSTANTINOPLE, otherwiſe called New ROME, was ſtill dreaming I wot not what of the conqueſt of Old ROME alſo. Achmetes landeth his armie in Apulia neere to Otranto, and ſpoileth the countrie. (otherwiſe called AVLONA) a ſea towne in the borders of MACEDONIA; and from thence paſſing directly ouer that narrow ſea, which is in breadth about ſixtie miles, landed his men in that rich and fertile part of ITALIE, called in ancient time APVLIA (now PVGLIA) neere vnto the old and famous citie of HYDRVNTVM, at this day called OTRANTO: where as ſoone as this warlike Baſſa had landed his forces, he forraged all that rich countrie alongſt the ſea coaſt and tooke ſuch infinit ſpoile as might well haue ſatisfied the greedie deſire both of himſelfe and of his hungrie ſouldiours: all which rich bootie he cauſed to be conueyed vnto his gallies. So when he had at his pleaſure ranged vp and down the countrie by the ſpace of foureteene daies, and ſaw that none made head againſt him, he laid ſiege to OTRANTO, the chiefe citie of that countrie, and as it were the key of that part of ITALIE: and hauing with ſuch ordinance as he K

A thing not greatly to be maruelled at, for as much as it was but weakly manned, and more weakely defended, by men altogether liuing in ſecuritie in the middeſt of their wealth and pleaſure. The Archbiſhop, with Zurlo the gouernor, and the chiefe men of the citie, for ſafegard of their liues fled into the great cathedrall church, as into a ſanctuarie; where they were altogether moſt miſerably ſlain. The reſt of the citizens, whoſe hard fortune it was to eſcape the ſword (as people reſerued to more miſerie) were afterward ſhipped ouer into GRECIA, & there ſold for ſlaues. The landing of the Turkes in APVLIA, with the taking of OTRANTO, brought a generall feare vpon all ITALIE, inſomuch that Sixtus Quartus, then the great Biſhop of ROME, forgetting all things ſaue himſelfe, was about to haue forſaken the citie for feare. Now after the L
Turkes had at their pleaſure ranſackt OTRANTO, Achmetes cauſed the ſame to be ſtrongly fortified (as the ſure footing of the Turkes in ITALIE) and victualled for eighteene monethes, and there leauing eight thouſand of his beſt ſouldiors in garriſon, returned himſelfe with the reſt to VALLONA, and ſo by land to CONSTANTINOPLE to know his Great Maſters further pleaſure; but purpoſing with himſelfe, with the firſt of the next Spring to haue returned with greater forces againe to ITALIE for the proſecuting of his former victorie. Which if he had done, it was greatly to haue been feared, that all that goodly countrey, ſometime miſtreſſe of the world, but then and yet alſo rent in ſunder by the diſcord and ambition of the Chriſtian princes, had in ſhort time become a prey vnto the barbarous Turke for euer.

But whileſt the great Baſſa (in his life time the great ſcourge of Chriſtendome) thus prouidly M

For at the ſame time, the Caramanian king, aided by the Perſian and the Sultan of ÆGIPT, had in a great battaile ouerthrowne Baiazet (Mahomets eldeſt ſonne then liuing) and ſlaine moſt part of his armie: in reuenge whereof, Mahomet with great expedition raiſed a great and puiſſant armie, and taking

His bodie was afterwards magnificently buried in a chappell neere vnto the great Mahometane temple, which he himselfe first built at CONSTANTINOPLE. 1481

The description of Mahomet.

The death of this mightie man (who liuing troubled a great part of the world) was not much
B more lamented by those that were neerest vnto him (who euer liuing in feare of his crueltie, hated him deadly) than of his enemies, who euer in doubt of his greatnesse, were glad to heare of his end. He was of stature but low, and nothing answerable to the height of his mind, square set, and strong limmed; not inferiour in strength (when he was yong) vnto any in his fathers court, but to Scanderbeg onely; his complexion was Tartarlik, sallow and melancholie, as were most of his ancestours the Othoman kings; his looke and countenance sterne, with his eies piercing, hollow and little sunk as it were in his head, and his nose so high and crooked that it almost touched his vpper lip. To be breefe, his countenance was altogether such, as if nature had with most cunning hand therein depainted and most curiously set forth to view the inward disposition and qualities of his mind: which were on both parts notable. He was of a very sharpe and apprehensiue wit, learned as amongst that nation, especially in Astronomie, & could speak the Greek,
C Latine, Arabicke, Chaldey, and Persian tongues. Hee delighted much in reading of histories, and the liues of worthie men, especially the liues of Alexander the Great, & of Iulius Cæsar, whom he proposed to himselfe as examples to follow. He was of an exceeding courage, and thereto very fortunate: a seuere punisher of iniustice, in them especially to whom he had committed the administration of iustice. Men that excelled in any qualitie, he greatly fauoured and honourably entertained: as he did Gentill Bellin, a painter of VENICE, whom he purposely caused to come from thence to CONNSTANTINOPLE, to draw the liuery counterfeit of himselfe, for which he most bountifully rewarded him. He so seuerely punished theft, as that in his time all the waies were safe, and a theefe scarcely to be heard of. But these good parts were in him obscured with D most horrible and notorious vices: for why, he was altogether irreligious, and of all others most perfidious, ambitious aboue measure, and in nothing more delighted than in blood: insomuch, that it is probably gathered, that hee was in his time the death of eight hundred thousand men: craft couetousnesse, & dissimulation were in him accounted for tollerable faults, in comparison of his greater vices. In his loue was no assurance, and his least displeasure was death: so that he liued feared of all men, and died lamented of none. He had issue three sonnes, Mustapha (dead before him as is before declared) Baiazet, and Gemes, or rather Zemes, of some called Zizimus, competitor of the empire with his elder brother: whom he exceedingly troubled in the beginning of his raigne, so that he could not well attend any other thing but him: which oportunitie (by God himselfe no doubt offered for the safegard of ITALIE) Alphonsus duke of CALABRIA,
E (king Ferdinand his eldest son) taking hold vpon, with all the power he could make in ITALIE, besieged the Turks in OTRANTO: with whom he had many sharp skirmishes, wherein he lost diuers of his great captaines and commanders; as the countie Iulio de Aquauiua, Loys de Capua, and the countie Iulio de Pisa, with others, and was still by the strong garrison of the Turks put to the worse: vntill such time, as being strengthened with aid out of SPAINE and PORTINGALE, but especially with certaine companies of most valiant souldiers sent from Matthias Coruinus out of HVNGARIE (whose forces the Turks most feared) he began to cut them short, and straitly besieged the citie both by sea land: vntill at length the besieged Turkes hearing of the death of their great emperour, and now hardly pressed with the dangers of a strait siege, no longer expecting the returne of Achmetes their Generall (then readie to haue come to their rescue with F fiue and twentie thousand soldiors) yeelded vp the citie vnto the duke vpon composition before made, That they might with bag and baggage in safetie depart thence: which they did, after they had to the great terror of all ITALIE holden that strong citie by the space of a yeare. And so was that rich countrey rather by the mercie of God (in taking away the great tyrant) preserued, than by the strength or policie of the inhabitants; which was then in great danger to

THE LIFE OF BAIAZET, SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND SECOND EMPEROR OF THE TVRKES.

UPon the death of Mahomet the late Emperour, great troubles began to ariſe about the ſucceſſion in the Turkiſh empire; ſome of the Baſſaes and great captaines, ſeeking to place Baiazet the eldeſt ſonne of Mahomet in the empire; and others with no leſſe deuotion labouring to preferre Zemes, or Gemes, otherwiſe called Zizimus, Baiazet his younger brother. By occaſion whereof, there aroſe two great and mightie factions, which in few dayes grew to ſuch heat, that many great tumults and hot skirmiſhes were made in diuers places of the imperiall citie, betwixt the fauourites of both factions, and great ſlaughter committed. In theſe broiles, the prowd Ianizaries for an old grudge ſlew Mahomethes, one of the foure great Baſſaes, a man by whoſe graue counſell moſt of the waightie affaires of the Turkiſh empire had beene managed during the raigne of the late emperour: And proceeding farther in their accuſtomed inſolencie, ſpoiled all the Chriſtians and Iewes which dwelt amongſt them, of all their wealth and ſubſtance; at which time the rich merchants and citizens of CONSTANTINOPLE which were naturall Turkes themſelues, eſcaped not their rauening hands, but became vnto them a prey and ſpoile alſo. The other three Baſſaes of the court, Iſaack, Meſithes, and Achmetes lately returned from the winning of HYDRVNTVM in ITALIE, although they ſecretly maligned and enuied one at the greatneſſe of an other; yet to appeaſe theſe ſo dangerous troubles, and to aſſure their owne eſtates, ioyned hands togither, and by their great authoritie and multitude of followers and fauourites, found meanes that Corcutus (one of the yonger ſonnes of Baiazet, a yong prince of eighteene yeares old) was as it were by generall conſent of the nobilitie and ſouldiers ſaluted emperour, and with great triumph and ſolemnitie placed in the imperiall ſeat. In whoſe name, the aforeſaid Baſſaes at their pleaſure diſpoſed of all things, little or nothing regarding either Baiazet or Zemes, then both abſent, the one at AMASIA, and the other at ICONIVM in LYCAONIA: for the iealous Turkiſh kings, neuer ſuffer their ſonnes to liue in court neere vnto them, after they be growne to yeares of diſcretion; but ſend them to gouerne their prouinces farre off: where they are alſo vnder the command of the emperours lieutenants generall in ASIA or EVROPE, and may not depart from their charge without great danger, not ſo much as to viſit their father without expreſſe leaue and commandement. So iealous are thoſe tyrants, yea euen of their owne ſonnes.

Diſſention amõgſt the Turks about the ſucceſſion.

Baiazet and Zemes hearing of the death of his father, and of the troubles in the imperiall citie, haſted thitherward with all ſpeed, where Baiazet being the neerer, firſt arriued: but finding the empire already poſſeſſed by Corcutus his yonger ſonne, and himſelfe excluded; he in the griefe of his heart, poured forth moſt grieuous complaints before God and man, calling heauen and earth to witneſſe of the great wrong and iniury done vnto him by the prowd Baſſaes. And what by teares and humble obteſtations, what by great gifts and greater promiſes, but moſt of all by the earneſt labour & ſolicitation of Cherſeogles the Viceroy of GRÆCIA, and the Aga or captaine of the Ianizaries, both his ſons in law, preuailed ſo much with the great Baſſaes and ſoldiers of the court, that Corcutus being of a mild and curteous diſpoſition, ouercome by their entreatie and the reuerence of his father, reſigned vnto him the imperiall gouernment, which he preſently tooke vpon him with the generall good liking of the people, and made Corcutus gouernour of LYCIA, CARIA, and IONIA, with the pleaſant and rich countries thereabouts; allowing him a great yearly penſion for the better maintenance of his eſtate, with promiſe alſo of the empire after his deceaſe: and ſo ſent him away to his charge, where he moſt pleaſantly liued during the raigne of his father Baiazet; giuing himſelfe wholy to the ſtudie of Philoſophie, which made that he was afterwards leſſe fauoured of the Ianizaries and other men of warre. G

Zemes riſeth againſt his brother Baiazet.

Zemes thus preuented by his elder brother, and vnderſtanding by his friends how all things ſtood at CONSTANTINOPLE, and that Baiazet was already poſſeſſed of the empire: returning with great ſpeed, raiſed a puiſſant armie in the countries which were vnder his command; and marching through the heart of ASIA the leſſe, by the way as he went, tooke into his poſſeſſion ſuch cities and ſtrong places as he thought beſt: and ſo entring into BYTHINIA, tooke the great citie of PRVSA, the ancient ſeat of the Othoman kings. Purpoſing in himſelfe, that as Baiazet had ſhut him out of EVROPE, ſo he would alſo in requitall thereof exclude him out of that part of the Turkiſh empire which is beyond HELLESPONTVS in ASIA, and to make himſelfe lord thereof. Wherein fortune at the firſt ſeemed vnto him moſt fauourable, all the people whereſoeuer he came yeelding vnto him obedience as vnto their prince and ſoueraigne: ſo that in ſhort time, he ſeemed both vnto himſelfe and to others in ſtrong poſſeſſion of that part of the empire. H

Baiazet goeth againſt Zemes.

Of theſe his proceedings Baiazet hauing intelligence, and perceiuing the greater part of his empire now in danger to be loſt; and doubting farther that Zemes his ambitious mind would hardly reſt therewith long contented: for remedie of ſo great a miſchiefe, leuied a ſtrong and puiſſant armie, wherewith he paſſed ouer into ASIA, and came to NEAPOLIS, a citie of ANATOLIA, neere whereunto Zemes lay with his armie ſtrongly encamped. As Baiazet was vpon the way againſt his brother, Achmetes the great Baſſa (in the confeſſion of all men the beſt man of warre, and moſt expert captaine amongſt the Turkes, and of all others moſt entirely beloued of the Ianizaries) came, & vnarmed, preſented himſelfe vpon his knees before Baiazet, his ſword hanging at his ſaddle bow: to the great admiration of many, who could not but wonder to ſee ſo worthie a chiefetaine of ſo great place in time of ſeruice, without any apparent cauſe, in ſuch humble manner to appeare before his ſoueraigne, as if he had had nothing to do with armes. It chanced many yeares before in the mortall warres betwixt Mahomet the late and great emperor of the Turkes, and Aſſymbeius Vſun-Caſſanes the king of PERSIA, that Baiazet hauing the leading of the right wing of his fathers armie, had not martialled it in ſo good order as was to Mahomet his liking: for which cauſe he commanded this Achmetes to goe and ſet that part of the battell in better order. Which his ſoueraignes command whiles he moſt skilfully performed, Baiazet taking it in euill part, as tending to his owne diſgrace, in great choller threatened the Baſſa to find a time when he would be reuenged vpon him: But he being a man of great ſpirit, and one that durſt both do & ſay much, perceiuing his meaning, bid him do what pleaſed him; and laying his hand vpon his ſword, ſolemnly vowed, That whenſoeuer he came to command as emperour, he would neuer weare ſword in field: the remembrance whereof was the cauſe that he then came in manner aforeſaid, ready to ſerue if he were thereto commanded, or otherwiſe to endure what ſo his princes pleaſure was. Baiazet perceiuing, that the vnkindneſſe ſo long before conceiued, was not yet diſgeſted, in token of grace ſtretched out to him his ſcepter, & taking him vp, commanded him to girt his ſword vnto his ſide, and not to remember that which he had long before both forgiuen and forgotten. And knowing right well that he was a moſt valiant and expert captaine; made him Generall of his armie, to the great contentment of the Ianizaries and the reſt of the armie: who ſo ſoone as they ſaw him, gaue out diuers great ſhouts for joy, as if victorie had moſt aſſuredly attended vpon him. Achmetes taking vpon him the charge, came and encamped ſo neere as he could to Zemes, and ſo lay by the ſpace of ten daies: during which time, many ſharpe skirmiſhes were made with diuers fortune; ſometime the one ſide preuailing, and ſometime the other. At length the matter was brought to a generall battell: wherein after a long and cruell fight, and great ſlaughter on both ſides, the fortune of Baiazet, conducted by the policie of Achmetes, preuailed againſt Zemes. Who ſeeing his army ouerthrowne, betooke himſelfe to flight, and came to ICONIVM: in which flight, many of Zemes his followers were taken priſoners, whom Baiazet would haue pardoned and enlarged, but that by the perſua- I K L M

Achmetes made Generall of Baiazet his armie.

ſion

A sion of Achmetes he changed his mind, and to the terrour of others suffered them all to be put to the sword.

Zemes doubting after this ouerthrow to fall into his brothers hands, and finding no means to make head againe: when he had stayed three daies at ICONIVM, caused his treasure, plate, jewels, and other things of great valour and light carriage to be trussed vp, and taking with him his mother and his two yong children, a sonne and a daughter, accompanied with a small retinue, fled into SYRIA, then part of the dominion of Caytbeius, commonly called the great Sultan of ÆGYPT and SYRIA. It was not long after the departure of Zemes from ICONIVM, but that Baiazet came thither with his armie, ta haue surprised him: but vnderstanding of his flight, Zemes flieth into Syria.

B he tooke order for the peaceable gouernment of that part of his empire. And so hauing suppressed that dangerous rebellion, and againe reduced that troubled part of his empire to his obeisance, returned with victorie to CONSTANTINOPLE.

The distressed prince Zemes trauelling through SYRIA, came at length to HIERVSALEM: 1482 where he stayed a good space, deuoutly visiting the monuments of that most auncient and famous citie. From thence he trauelled into ÆGYPT; where at his first entrance into the countrey, he was met by diuers of the greatest nobilitie of that kingdome, sent from the great Sultan, by whom he was honourably conducted to CAIRE, and there presented to Caytbeius, of whom he was graciously welcommed: vnto whom after due reuerence done, he declared the cause of his comming as followeth:

Zemes his speech vnto Caytbeius, Sultan of Ægypt.

If it were not to me certainely knowne (most victorious) that you are not ignorant either who I am, or from whence descended, or with what iniurie enforced, after long and painfull trauell I am here arriued; it would much concerne me to vse another manner of beginning of my speech, and with greater protestation of words to seeke your gracious fauour. But for as much as all these things are vnto your most royall Maiestie sufficiently knowne, as I doe well perceiue in this, that your infinite clemencie hath entertained me with farre greater kindnesse, than I in such my aduerse fortune durst wish for, much lesse request: now nothing remaineth for me to say, more than iustly to complaine vnto your inuincible Maiestie of the wrong and iniurie done vnto me by Baiazet, whom I may more iustly tearme my cruell enemie than kind brother. For he not contented to haue taken vnto himselfe my fathers em-

Neither hath the iealous desire of soueraignetie (whereof my father whilest he liued, had him alwaies in distrust) so much mooued him vnto this so cruell a fact, as a certaine vnnaturall crueltie towards all his kindred in generall, and mortall hatred against me his brother in particular: for he which is already possessed of the empire, and doth with all hostilitie persecute a priuat person, subiect and exposed to his iniurie, that man thirsteth not after soueraignety, but after blood; neither desireth he to conquer, but to kill. And whereas after my fathers death great troubles arise in* CONSTANTINOPLE, and many bloodie skirmishes were fought betwixt the fauorits of both of vs, it cannot with any

Neither am I iustly to be blamed, if that after my fathers departure I put my selfe vpon the way towards* CONSTANTINOPLE, especially being sent for thither by many my good friends, men of great marke and qualitie: but his fortune preuailing, I gaue place, and least my comming to the imperiall citie might haue been the occasion of new troubles, I returned aside into BYTHINIA, and so to PRVSA, with purpose there to haue rested in quiet, if my brother would haue giuen me leaue. But so farre was he from that, to suffer me there to rest, as that I was by him most cruelly assailed as an open enemie: and had I not by speedie flight withdrawne my selfe from the imminent danger, and departed quite out of my fathers kingdome, I must haue yeelded my selfe, my blood, and life, as a sacrifice into his cruell hands. Neither is he to me so mortall an enemie, or thirsteth after my life so much for feare, as for ve-

onely tooke pleasure in his brother, but had him also as a companion of his most glorious expedition: and G manie other famous Kings of forreine Nations, and of our owne familie, haue ruled both more safely, and better strengthened with the counsell and aide of their most louing brethren, rather than with others. But Baiazet is of a farre other minde, reputing violence and haughtinesse of heart to be his greatest and surest defence: herein his fierce nature delighteth, more than in the lawfull course of nature, iustice, and equitie; hee had rather haue his brother his enemie than his friend, and to driue him into exile than to make him partaker of his counsels. But I beseech thee most puissant Monarch, the faithfull keeper and maintayner of our Law and Religion, by the sacred reliques of our great Prophet Mahomet, which thou hast at HIERVSALEM and MECHA, suffer me not, a kings sonne, to liue in banishment and exile, poore and miserable, a scorne of his brothers crueltie, farre from home, farre from his countrie and kingdome: but regarding the law of the great Prophet, lift vp the afflicted and H oppressed, and by the great authoritie which you haue, bridle domesticall wrong; or if that will not take place, reuenge it with thy sword, and suffer not our empire, with so great trauell founded, by the crueltie or follie of one wilfull man to be ouerthrowne: which should be no more grieuous and lamentable to vs, than dangerous to your most high estate, and all other kings and princes of our religion. For you of your selfe vnderstand right well, what deadly enemies the Christian princes are vnto the Turkes: and doe you thinke, that if any great warre (which I wish not) should arise of this our discord, that they would long rest in quiet, and as idle beholders stand looking on vntill it were of it selfe appeased? Or rather, hauing such an opportunitie presented, would not with might and maine suddainely inuade our kingdome, before shaken with ciuile warres, and seeke the vtter ruine and destruction of the same? Which their desire, if that hatefull people could bring to passe (which thing Mahomet turne vpon I themselues) my minde abhorreth to thinke how far that mischiefe would run: for the Othoman familie once rooted out, there is none of our religion, your Maiestie onely excepted, which is able to withstand their power: wherefore you must then stand for your selfe, and all the rest, you alone must withstand the force of the Christians, you must maintaine that warre with much losse, and greater charge, and most vncertaine successe. Wherefore inuincible Monarch, I most humblie beseech thee, that pittying our estate, whiles the matter is yet whole, and remedie is yet to be had, to deale with Baiazet by your embassadors, That though hee will not receiue me his brother as partener of the empire, yet at least to admit me into some small part of my fathers kingdome: let him raigne and rule, let all things bee at his commaund; let it bee lawfull for mee poore man, but to liue in rest and quiet somewhere, possessing K but so much as may suffice mee honestly to lead a priuate life. Which thing if hee shall refuse to grant, although hee neither feare the lawes of God or man: yet as I haue at HIERVSALEM, so will I also shortly at MECHA (if by your leaue I may) complaine vnto the great Prophet of the iniuries done vnto mee by my cruell and vnnaturall brother; and afterwards make proofe of your compassion towards mee, all which I hope shall much auaile. But if (which I would not) I shall proue all these things in vaine, sith desperation enforceth men to all extremeties, I will go with fire, sword, and slaughter, by secret and open force, by right and wrong; and hated, will vex my hatefull brother by all manner of mischiefe, by all manner of reuenge. Neither will I make an ende of confounding of all, vntill I bee either receiued into part of the empire, or else together with my life leaue those desperate and lost things for him alone to enioie. For I deeme it much better, quickely to die, than with disgrace and infamie to protract a lingering L loathed life.

The great Sultan in courteous manner comforted the distressed prince, willing him to be of good cheere, and patiently to beare his present hap: for as much as it became a man born in so high fortune, not to be discouraged with any mischance, or dismaied if things fell out otherwise than hee looked for: commending him withall, for that hee saw in him no lesse courage than might well haue becommed his better estate: and willing him to liue still in hope, promised to doe what in him lay, to reconcile him vnto his brother, and to persuade him that hee might be receiued into some part of the kingdome. And to that purpose shortly after dispatched away an honourable embassage to Baiazet. Zemes in the meane while, by the same Sultans leaue, vpon a M superstitious deuotion trauelled into ARABIA, to visit the temple of Mahomet at MECHA, and his sepulchre at MEDINA. Vpon his returne to CAIRE, the embassadours before sent, returned also, but not hauing obtained any thing they desired: for Baiazet would not giue eare to any agreement, but seemed altogether to contemne and despise his brother. Wherefore Zemes more vpon stomacke and desire of reuenge, than for any hope he had of the empire, determined with himselfe

Caytheius the Ægiptian Sultan sendeth embassadors to Baiazet.

A himselfe to make open warre vpon him: reposing some good hope in his secret friends, and in the reuolt of some of the great captaines, who discontented with the gouernment of Baiazet, secretly wished for his returne.

Whilest he was thus plotting these waightie matters, a messenger with letters came fitly from the King of CARAMANIA, offering with all the power he could make, to ioyne with him, if he would take vp armes against his brother. This poore titular King then liued in ARMENIA, and being able by his friends to make some good force, was in hope by ioyning with Zemes to recouer some part of the Caramanian kingdome, from whence his father was not many yeeres before driuen by the force of the late Turkish Emperour Mahomet the Great, Baiazet his father. 1483 The king of Caramania solliciteth Zemes to take vp armes against Baiazet.

B It is hard to say, whether of these distressed and exiled Princes gaue the greater encouragement to the other, to take this desperate warre in hand, being both together farre vnable by all the friends they could make to encounter with the great power of Baiazet. But what is so dangerous or desperate which aspiring minds will not attempt, in hope of a kingdome? whose brightnesse so dazeleth their eyes, that they can see nothing but it.

Hereupon Zemes hauing receiued great gifts of the Ægyptian Sultan, with promise of aid, departed from CAIRE (the Sultan earnestly perswading him to the contrary) and as it was before appointed, met with the Caramanian King vpon the borders of ASIA the lesser: where they concluded to ioyne together such forces as they had, and to inuade Baiazet. Which they accordingly did: for raising all the power they could, they entered into CILICIA, now called

C CARAMANNIA; and ioyning their armies together, encamped betweene ICONIVM and LARENDA. Neither did Baiazet in time of so great a danger sit still, not so much fearing his brothers power, as the reuolting of his captaines and souldiers; whom he knew either to loue, or at least not to hate the young Prince his brother. Wherefore he raised a great armie, and sent Achmetes the great man of warre before with the one part thereof, himselfe following after with a farre greater strength: for at that time he had vnder his ensignes two hundred thousand men.

As he was marching with this great armie, a rumor was raised in the campe, That some of his chiefe captaines had conspired to betray him into the hands of his brother, and that many of the souldiers secretly fauouring Zemes, would vpon the ioyning of the battell forsake him, and take part with his brother. Which report so troubled Baiazet, that he stood in doubt what to doe, or

D whom to trust: but knowing that nothing winneth the heart of the common souldier more than the Generals bountie, he forthwith caused a wonderfull masse of money to be diuided amongst the captaines and souldiers, loding their minds with ample promises of farre greater rewards, for their fidelitie and valour to be shewed in that present seruice. Hauing thus assured vnto himselfe the wauering minds of his souldiers, he began to draw neere to ICONIVM, where his enemies lay encamped: and by glosing letters and flattering messengers made shew openly, as if he had beene very desirous to come to some good agreement with them, but secretly went about to stop all the straits & passages, in such manner as that it should not be possible for them againe to retire backe into SYRIA: for he doubted nothing more, but least they being but few in number, and so in strength far vnequall vnto him, would not vpon so great disaduantage ha-

E zard the fortune of a battell, but retire themselues into SYRIA, and so to his exceeding trouble and infinite charge protract the warre.

Zemes perceiuing his brothers subtill drift, and seeing no such reuolt as he had hoped for, and as had before by letters to him beene promised; and waighing with reason his owne weake forces, retired in good time vnto the straits of the mountaine AMANVS, which deuideth CILICIA from SYRIA. Here, despairing of all good successe in the enterprise he had taken in hand, he perswaded the Caramannian king his confederate to giue place vnto the time, and to reserue himselfe vnto his better fortune: and so breaking vp his armie, with a few of his followers came downe to the sea coast of CILICIA; where he hired a tall ship to attend in readinesse, that if any sudden danger should arise, he might goe aboord, and so saue himselfe by sea. In the mean

F time he sent a messenger vnto Damboys, Great Master of the RHODES, certifying him, That for as much as he had no place of safetie left amongst his owne people, wherein he might shrowd himselfe from the furie of his brother, still seeking after his life, he would vpon his safe conduct come vnto him into his island of the RHODES. Which his request the Great Master easily granted, deeming the flight of so great a prince from the Turke, to be a thing much profitable to the Christian commonweale: and thereupon he presently sent forth certaine gallies to fetch Zemes flieth to sea.

enforced by the ſudden acceſſe of his enemies, for the auoiding of preſent danger, to go aboord on that ſhip which he had prouidently before prepared to be in readineſſe for ſuch purpoſe. And hauing put a little from the ſhoare, ſhot backe againe an arrow with letters made faſt vnto it, directed vnto his brother Baiazet, containing as followeth:

Zemes his letters to his brother Baiazet.

Thou knoweſt (moſt vnkind and cruell brother) that I flie not vnto the Chriſtians, the mortall enemies of the Othoman familie, for hatred of my religion or nation; but enforced thereunto by thy iniurious dealing, and dangerous practiſes which thou inceſſantly attempteſt againſt me, yea euen in my extreame miſerie. But this aſſured hope I carrie with me, that the time will come when as thou the author of ſo great wrong, or thy children, ſhall receiue the iuſt guerdon of this thy preſent tyrannie againſt H thy brother.

It is reported, that when Baiazet had read theſe letters, he was ſo troubled in mind, that for certaine daies he gaue himſelfe wholy to mourning and heauineſſe, and would in no wiſe be comforted: inſomuch, that he was brought into the campe by the Baſſaes, as a man halfe diſtraught of his wits, ſhunning for a ſeaſon all mens ſpeech and companie.

Zemes flyeth to the Rhodes.

Zemes ſailing to the RHODES, was there honourably receiued of the Great Maſter, and all the reſt of the knights of the order: to whom in their publck aſſemblie three daies after, he openly declared the cauſes of the diſcord betwixt his brother and him: alleaging for the colour of his rebellion, That although Baiazet were his elder brother, yet that he was borne whileſt his father yet liued in priuat eſtate, vnder ſubiection and commaund, long before he poſſeſſed the king- I dome, and ſo no kings ſonne: whereas he himſelfe was the firſt borne of his father, being an emperour, and ſo not heire of his fathers priuat fortune (as was Baiazet) but of his greateſt honour and empire; and yet not of ſuch an hautie minde, but that he could haue been content to haue giuen place vnto his brother, ſo that he could haue beene contented likewiſe to haue granted him ſome ſmall portion of the empire, wherin he might ſafely haue liued as a poore prince, and his brother: but that ſuch was his pride, as that he would not vouchſafe to ſuffer him to liue ſo much as a poore priuat life in any corner of ſo large an empire, and was therefore by his vnnaturall and tyranous dealing, enforced to craue aid of the Chriſtian princes. Of whom (for ſo much as he had alwaies heard much honour) he was in good hope to find ſuccour and reliefe in that his diſtreſſed eſtate: proteſting vnto God and the world, that if euer it ſhould be his good K fortune by their meanes and helpe to obtaine the empire, he would neuer be vnmindfull of ſo great a benefit; but to make with them a perpetuall and inuiolable peace, and ſo to reſt their faſt friend for euer. The Great Maſter on the other ſide comforting him with cheerefull ſpeeches, promiſed to keepe him in ſafetie from the furie of his brother; and farther, to commend his cauſe to the other great kings and princes of Chriſtendome.

The deſcription of Zemes.

This exiled prince Zemes was about the age of eight and twentie yeares when he came to the RHODES; of ſtature tall, ſomewhat corpulent and well limbd, gray eied, but looking ſomething a ſquint; hooke noſed, and in the middle riſing, in ſuch maner as the Perſians commend in their kings: of colour browne, ſpare of ſpeech, and by nature cholericke; a great feeder, ſo that he ſeemed rather to deuour his meat than to eat it; much delighted in ſwimming, and to lie abroad L in the night; penſiue and melancholie, which men imputed to his great cares, neuer merrie but in the companie of the graund Maſter; a religious obſeruer of the ſuperſtition, from which he could neuer be drawne during the long time he liued in exile; learned, as among the Turkes, ſo that he writ the hiſtorie of his fathers life. But leauing him in ſafe keeping with the grand Maſter of the RHODES, let vs againe returne to the courſe of our hiſtorie.

Baiazet hauing now the ſecond time chaſed away his brother, after he had well quieted that part of his troubled kingdome in ASIA, returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, carefully attending when ſome new motion ſhould be made by his brother, to his farther diſquiet. But after he vnderſtood that he was with the great Maſter of the RHODES, he ſent certain of his Baſſaes (amongſt whom Achmetes the great ſouldiour is reported to haue beene one) vnto the Great M
Maſter, requeſting him to deliuer vp Zemes, offering for him a wonderfull ſumme of money. Which diſhonourable requeſt, when it could by no meanes be obtained, the ſame embaſſadors in the name of their maſter, concluded a peace verie commodious for the Rhodians: wherein amongſt other things it was agreed, That the Great Maſter ſhould keepe Zemes in ſafe cuſtodie, ſo that he ſhould no more trouble the Turkiſh empire: in conſideration whereof, & for his honorable

A norable vſage, Baiazet ſhould yearely pay vnto the Great Maſter thirtie thouſand duckets the firſt of Auguſt, which was afterward accordingly paied.

It fortuned that whileſt Achmetes the great Baſſa (emploied in matters abroad) was abſent from the court, Baiazet diſcourſing with the other Baſſaes his graue counſellors, vpon his late expedition into ASIA againſt his brother, ſeemed to be highly offended with the vntruſtineſſe and doubtfull faith of ſome of his greateſt captaines and ſouldiers: yet vpon whom he might juſtly lay the blame, he well knew not, although it ſeemed by his talke he ſhould ſomewhat diſtruſt the great captaine Achmetes. Hereupon Iſaack the moſt ancient Baſſa of the court, and of greateſt authoritie next vnto Baiazet himſelfe (whoſe daughter, a ladie of exceeding beautie, 1484
B Achmetes had long before married: but doubting that ſhe had yeelded her honour to the wanton luſt of Muſtapha the eldeſt ſonne of Mahomet the late emperour, had put her from him, and would by no meanes be reconciled; for which cauſe there was a ſecret hatred euer after betwixt thoſe two great Baſſaes) perceiuing the emperours diſcontented and ſuſpitious humor, and deſiring nothing more than the deſtruction of Achmetes; tooke hold vpon this opportunitie, and by all meanes he could deuiſe, encreaſed the ſuſpition of the treaſon, which had alreadie too much poſſeſſed the jealous emperour: ſometimes craftily imagining, intelligence to haue paſſed betwixt Zemes and Achmetes; and forthwith amplifying his power and authoritie, which (as he ſaid) was ſo great with the Ianizaries and ſouldiers of the court, that they by reaſon of his often imploiments, were wholy at his deuotion; ſo that he might at his pleaſure doe more in Ze-
C mes his quarrell, than ſhould ſtand with the ſafetie of Baiazet: a matter to be well conſidered of, and alſo carefully preuented. For remedie of which dangers, it was thought neceſſarie that Achmetes at his returne to court, ſhould be taken away and ſlaine. Achmetes his death contriued.

Achmetes fearing nothing leſſe than that which was contriued againſt him, came after his wonted manner to the court: and was with the other great Baſſaes inuited to a ſolemne ſupper, which Baiazet had commanded to be prepared, to ſolace himſelfe after his trauels (as it was giuen out) with his chiefe Baſſaes. To this royall ſupper came Achmetes with the reſt of the bidden gueſts, miſtruſting nothing, and was there ſumptuouſly feaſted by Baiazet: who to make his gueſts the merrier, drunke wine plentifully himſelfe, cauſing them alſo to drinke in like manner; ſo that they were full of wine: a thing vtterly forbidden by their law, yet daily more and more
D vſed, eſpecially by their great men in their feaſts. Supper now ended and the night farre ſpent, Baiazet in token that they were welcome, and ſtood in his good grace, cauſed certaine rich robes of pleaſing colours to be brought forth, & to be caſt vpon euery of his gueſts one, giuing beſide vnto euery one of them a faire guilt boule full of gold. But vpon Achmetes was caſt a gowne of black veluet, which amongſt the Turkes may well be called the mantle of death; being ſo ſure a token of the emperors heauie indignation, as that it is death for any man once to open his mouth or to intreat for him vpon whom it is by the emperours commandement ſo caſt. Achmetes ſeeing himſelfe now vnder the ſhadow of death, and knowing it but vaine to intreat for mercie; as he was a man of great ſpirit, brake forth and ſaid: Oh cachpogli (which is as much as to ſay, thou ſonne of a whore) ſith thou entendeſt ſo much crueltie againſt me, why
E didſt thou not put it in execution before thou hadſt enforced me to drinke this impure and forbidden wine? and ſo caſting his eies vpon the ground ſat ſtill. The other Baſſaes hauing leaue to depart, giuing thanks to the emperour, and crauing pardon for their exceſſe, kiſſed the ground at his feet and ſo departed: with whom Achmetes offered to haue gone out alſo, but was forthwith commanded to ſit ſtill, for that the emperour had to talke with him in ſecret. The Baſſaes were no ſooner departed, but the terrible executioners of Baiazet his wrath ſtept in, and laid hands vpon Achmetes to haue ſlaine him: when one of the Eunuchs in greateſt fauour with the tyrant, ſtanding by, aduiſed him not to be too haſtie in executing of ſo great a man, ſo entirely beloued of his beſt ſouldiers and men of warre, but rather to ſtay his execution for a while, to ſee how the matter would be diſgeſted; and in the meane time, by torture to wreſt out from him
F what might be got, to make it in ſome ſort appeare, that he died for his due deſert. Hereupon Baiazet deferred his execution to a farther time, and cauſed him there preſently to be ſtript, and carried away to be tortured.

Amongſt other gallants of the court which attended the comming out of the great Baſſaes whom they followed, was one of Achmetes his ſonnes, a gentleman of great hope, who miſſing his father amongſt the reſt, began preſently to miſtruſt that all went not well: & ſpeedily running Achmetes his ſon ſtirreth vp the Ianizaries to helpe his father.

from one of the Baſſaes to another, with much adoe learned the hard eſtate of his father: where- G of he was alſo at the ſame inſtant aduertiſed by a ſecret friend neere about Baiazet. Hereupon this yong gentleman began forthwith piteouſly to lament his fathers miſhap, and to exclaime againſt the crueltie of Baiazet: calling vpon the Ianizaries for aid, putting them in remembrance of his fathers great and manifold deſerts towards them, togither with his imminent danger: and ſo running vp and downe the citie in the dead time of the night, had in ſhort ſpace raiſed vp all the Ianizaries in armes. Who vnderſtanding of the danger of their ancient commander, whom they generally loued and honoured as their father, came running by heaps from all parts of the citie vnto the court gate, there with terrible exclamation doubling and redoubling, their Bre, Bre (which barbarous word they commonly vſe in expreſſing their greateſt diſcontentment and H furie) and did indeed ſo furiouſly beat at the court gate, that Baiazet fearing leaſt they ſhould breake in by violence, cauſed the outer gate to be ſet open, and ſhewing himſelfe from aboue out at an yron window, demanded of them the cauſe of that tumult and vprore. To whom they inſolently anſwered, That they would by and by teach him as a drunkard, a beaſt, and a raſcall, to vſe his great place and calling with more ſobrietie and diſcretion: and amonſt many other approbrious words wherewith they ſhamefully loaded him, they called him oftentimes by the name of Bengi, Bengi (that is to ſay, Bachelor or Scholler) which amongſt thoſe martiall men, contemners of all learning, is accounted a word of no ſmall reproach and diſgrace. And after they had in moſt deſpitefull manner thus reuiled him, they proudly commanded him Baiazet for feare deliuereth Achmetes to the Ianizaries. forthwith to deliuer Achmetes vnto them, or elſe to take that ſhould enſue thereof. Baiazet ter- I rified with this inſolencie of the Ianizaries, and fearing ſome ſudden violence to be offered, commanded Achmetes to be without delay deliuer vnto them: which was done in ſuch haſt, that he was brought forth vnto them almoſt naked, bare legged, and bare headed, bearing in his body the manifeſt markes of his hard vſage. The Ianizaries receiuing him with great reioycing, ſupplied his want of apparell with ſuch habiliments, as they for that purpoſe vpon the ſudden tooke from Baiazet his minions: and ſo taking him vp vpon their ſhoulders, with great ioy carried him out of the court, ſtill crying vnto him, How he did, and how he felt himſelfe? and ſo guarded him home, readie no doubt to haue ſlaine Baiazet and rifled the court, if he would haue but ſaid the word. But he yet loyall, laboured with good words to appeaſe that tumult, and to pacifie their furie: excuſing that which Baiazet had done againſt him, to haue beene done only K to correct him, for that happely he had forgotten ſome part of obedience and duetie. Neuertheleſſe, hereupon remained no ſmall heart burning betwixt Baiazet and the Ianizaries for a long time after: yet Baiazet for feare of them reconciled himſelfe to Achmetes, and in open ſhew had him in greater honour than before, promoting him euen vnto the higheſt degrees of honour, howbeit he inwardly hated him to death. And the more, by the continuall inſtigation of the old Baſſa Iſaack: by whoſe perſuaſion, when it was thought that all had beene forgotten, he was by Baiazets commandement as he ſat at ſupper in the court, thruſt through the bodie Achmetes ſlaine. and ſlaine. This was the miſerable end of Achmetes, the great champion of the Turkes, and one of the greateſt enemies of Chriſtendome that euer liued in the Turkiſh court: for by him, Mahomet ſubuerted the empire of TRAPEZONDE, tooke the great citie of CAFFA (called in anti- L ent time THEODOSIA) with all the countrey of TAVRICA CHERSONESVS, the impregnable citie of CROIA, with all the kingdome of EPIRVS, the ſtrong citie of SCODRA, and a great part of DALMATIA; and laſt of all OTRANTO, to the terrour of all ITALY: by him alſo Baiazet vanquiſhed and put to flight his brother Zemes, as is before declared. In reward of which good ſeruices, he was by the tyrant (vpon a meere ſuſpition) thus cruelly & ſhamefully murdred. About this time alſo Caigubus (Zemes his ſon, then but a child) was by the commandement of Baiazet his vncle, ſtrangled, in the new tower of CONSTANTINOPLE.

Baiazet now grieuouſly offended with the pride and late inſolencie of the Ianizaries, cauſed ſecret inquirie to be made, of them which were the authors of thoſe late ſtirs: and finding them to be the officers of their companies, and eſpecially thoſe which had before ſlain Mahomet Baſſa M the great politian, immediatly after the death of Mahomet the late emperour; at which time they had alſo raiſed great tumults, and done much harme in the citie: he vnder colour of preferment, ſent away thoſe authors of ſedition into diuers parts of his empire, appointing vnto them (as vnto old ſouldiers and men of good deſert) certaine lands and reuenues for their maintenance and preferment. But as ſoone as they were departed, he by ſecret letters commanded

A the gouernors and magiſtrates of thoſe places wherunto they were ſent, ſuddenly to apprehend them, and as traitors to put them to death; which was accordingly done. The Ianizaries of the court and about CONSTANTINOPLE, hearing what had happened vnto their fellowes, became wonderfull diſcontented, and began to mutine in diuers places of the citie, vttering ſpeeches againſt the emperor full of deſpight and reuenge: which thing when Baiazet vnderſtood, and had well conſidered the late danger he was in, together with the intollerable pride and inſolencie of thoſe his maſterfull ſlaues; he ſecretly propoſed in himſelfe for curing of ſo dangerous a diſeaſe, to vſe a moſt deſperate remedie: which was, ſodenly to kill & deſtroie all the Ianizaries, eſpecially thoſe which were belonging to the court, or about CONSTANTINOPLE. This his 1485

Baiazet purpoſeth to deſtroy the Ianizaries.

B purpoſe he imparted to diuers of his greateſt Baſſaes, charging them vpon paine of his heauie diſpleaſure not to diſcloſe it: and for the execution thereof, had ſent for great numbers of thoſe ſoldiors which are called Acanzij, who are amongſt the Turks reputed for the beſt ſort of common ſoldiors. Moſt of all the Baſſaes to whom he had imparted this his cruel deuiſe, much diſliked therof, as too full of peril & danger: yet ſeeing him fully reſolued for the performance therof, would not, or durſt not ſay any thing to the contrarie. Onely Alis and Iſhender Baſſa, both deſcended of the honourable familie of Michal Ogli, diſſuaded him from attempting any ſuch thing: alleaging firſt, that the Ianizaries were in number manie, ſouldiours of great courage and experience, reſolute men, and ſuch as would ſell their liues deare: then, admitting that he ſhould kill all them about the court and in CONSTANTINOPLE, yet foraſmuch as all his

C ſtrong towns and caſtles, eſpecially in the frontiers and chiefe places of his dominions, were poſſeſſed and holden by ſtrong garriſons of other Ianizaries, fellowes and friends of theſe (who would vndoubtedly take vp armes in defence of themſelues, and reuenge of their dead friends) it were a thing verie like to endanger himſelfe together with the whole ſtate of his empire, beſide the great diſhonour which would grow vnto himſelfe thereby for euer.

This ſo dangerous an exploit, wherin the hands of ſo many were to be vſed, was not kept ſo ſecret, but that the vigilant and wilie Ianizaries had got an inckling thereof: and thereupon began daily more and more to ſuſpect the matter, both by the often and ſecret repaire of the great men to the court, more than they had before ſeene; & alſo by the vnwonted multitude of thoſe Acanzij which were daily brought vnto the imperiall citie by great companies. Wherefore fea-

D ring to be ſuddenly ſurpriſed, they banded themſelues togither, and openly ſtood vpon their guard: and by chance lighting vpon Alis-beg as he came from the court (who was in deed their beſt friend) after their barbarous maner, with many opprobrious and contumelious words, demanded of him, if he were not one of them who had conſpired their deſtruction: and without more adoe had preſently ſlaine him, had he not (as a well ſpoken man) with great proteſtations and oathes perſuaded them, that he neuer conſented to any ſuch thing, or that they needed to feare any ſuch thing from him: and ſo with much adoe rid himſelfe out of their hands.

Baiazet ſeeing his purpoſe diſcouered, & that he could not without great bloudſhed and danger both to his eſtate and perſon, worke his will vpon the Ianizaries: by the counſell and aduiſe of them that ſaw further into the matter, to colour his former intention, commanded by open

E proclamation, That the Ianizaries and other his men of war (of whom he had a great power now aſſembled at CONSTANTINOPLE) to be in readineſſe againſt a certaine prefixed day, to go with him into MOLDAVIA: as if he had raiſed that power for that purpoſe only. But when the time was come that he ſhould ſet forward, the Ianizaries put themſelues in order of battell by themſelues, and would in no wiſe ioyne themſelues with the reſt of the armie, or receiue the emperour into the middeſt of their rankes, as they had alwaies before accuſtomed; but furiouſly ſhaking their weapons at him, told him plainely, that he had ſought their deſtruction: and bid him therefore if he thought it ſo good, to ſet his executioners to worke vpon them, whom hee ſhould find both readie and able to defend themſelues. To pacifie their furie, Baiazet was glad to giue them good words, and to vſe all the meanes he could (by his great Baſſaes and other cap-

F taines which were able to do any thing with them) to perſuade them to be quiet; ſwearing vnto them by the holie ſoule of his father (a ſolemne oath amongſt the Turkes) that he would not harme or wrong the meaneſt of them. So with much adoe they were at length appeaſed, and receiued Baiazet into the middeſt of them as their wonted manner was.

This dangerous tumult ſo quieted, Baiazet ſet forward, and paſſing ouer Danubius entered into MOLDAVIA, where he firſt laied ſiege to a ſtrong towne ſtanding vpon the Euxine ſea, called called of the Turks Kele, but in ancient time Achilleia, which was at length deliuered vnto him by compoſition. From thence he went to Ac-gibmen, otherwiſe called Asprocastron, which after a moneths ſiege was alſo deliuered vp by compoſition: which two ſtrong places ſo woon, he returned againe to Constantinople. G

Many great princes ſue to the Maſter of the Rhodes for Zemes.

Many great princes deſirous of Zemes, laboured by their embaſſadours to haue obtained him of the Great Maſter of the Rhodes, firſt Baiazet his brother fearing leaſt hee ſhould at one time or other againe breake forth vpon him, or els ſet vp by the Chriſtian princes, trouble his eſtate, offered great ſums of mony to haue had him deliuered into his hands: and Charles the French king purpoſing the conqueſt of Naples (which he in few yeares after performed) and after that to haue inuaded Græcia, thought Zemes a moſt fit inſtrument for the furtherance of thoſe his high deſignes, and was therefore wonderfull deſirous to haue had him. Mathias alſo king of Hvngarie (a fortunate warriour againſt the Turke) perſuaded that the hauing of him might be vnto him a great furtherance in the courſe of his victories, ſought by all the meanes he could to haue obtained him. At which time alſo Innocentius the eight of that name, biſhop of Rome, no leſſe deſirous than the reſt, to haue in his keeping ſo great a pledge of peace and warre (the bridle of the Turkes furie, together with the large penſion) hee was ſure to receiue yerely from Baiazet for the ſafe cuſtodie of him, ſo wrought the matter by Lyonell biſhop of Concordia his cunning legat, that the Great Maſter fearing on the one ſide to be conſtrained by the great power of Baiazet to grant that he had ſo often refuſed, and now ſo earneſtly ſolicited on the other ſide by the biſhop, cauſed Zemes to bee deliuered to him at Rome in the yeare 1488: for which doing he was by the biſhop honoured with the honour and title of a Cardinall. So Zemes to the great profit of the biſhop (who receiued from Baiazet a yearely penſion of fortie thouſand duckats) remained in ſafe cuſtodie at Rome all the time of Innocentius, and alſo of Alexander the ſixt his ſucceſſour: vntill that the French king, Charles the eight, paſſing through the heart of Italie with a ſtrong armie, againſt Alphonſus king of Naples in the yeare 1495, and making his way through the citie of Rome, ſo terrified the great Biſhop, who altogether fauored and furthered the title of Alphonſus, that he was glad to yeeld to ſuch articles and conditions as pleaſed the king; and amongſt the reſt to giue in hoſtage vnto the king his graceleſſe ſonne Cæſar Borgia Valentinus, and alſo to deliuer vnto him Zemes his honourable priſoner, as ſhall be afterwards in place conuenient at large declared. H I K

In the beginning of Baiazet his raigne, whileſt he was buſied againſt his bother Zemes in Asia, Iohn Caſtriot, the ſonne of Scanderbeg, aided by the Venetians, after he had fortunately ouerthrowne the Turkes in a battell neere vnto Croia, recouered a great part of Epirvs out of their poſſeſſion. At which time alſo Iohn Chernouich, a Chriſtian prince of Albania, caſting off the Turkiſh yoke impoſed vpon him by the late emperour Mahomet, ſuddainely tooke vp armes, and by the help of the Venetians valiantly expulſed the enemies out of that part of Albania: and ſo troubled Baiazet, that he was glad to ſuffer him peaceably to inioy all that hee had by force recouered, and further to content him with a ſmall tribute for the reſt.

Baiazet inuadeth Caramania

Baiazet highly offended with Abraham (whom ſome call Pyramet) the king of Caramania, for aiding his brother Zemes againſt him; in reuenge thereof raiſed a great armie both in Evrope and Asia: and marching alongſt Asia the leſſe through the countries of Phrigia, Misia, Caria, Lydia, and Pamphilia, entered at length into Caramania. But the king of Caramania hearing before of his coming, and knowing himſelfe too weake to meete him in field, fortified the ſtrong cities and places of his kingdome, and retired with his armie into the ſtraits of the mountaine Tavrvs, where it parteth Cilicia from Siria, wherein he was in more ſafetie than in any of his ſtrongeſt holds. Baiazet finding no way to come to him, ſpent moſt part of the Summer in ſpoyling of the open countrie: but perceiuing his enemies could not ſo be drawne into the field, he laied ſiege vnto the famous citie of Tarsvs, being the chiefe citie of the champaine part of Cilisia (the natiue place of S. Paule, the Apoſtle) and in ſhort time ſo battered the wals of his citie with his great ordinance, that hee had made them faultable. The citizens conſidering the danger they were in, offered to deliuer vp their citie, their libertie, liues and goods reſerued. Of which their offer Baiazet accepted, and moſt honourably performed his promiſe for their ſafetie: not permitting any of his ſouldiours to enter the citie, more than ſuch as muſt needs for the guard of his perſon, and ſafe keeping of the citie. And for as much as Winter began now to grow faſt on, he diſperſed his ſoldiors into the countrey L

Tarſus in Cilicia yeeldeth to Baiazet. M

A trey villages round about, not ſuffering the countrie people to till or ſow their land, or to do any thing els which might turne to their profit or good; whereby they were inforced to yeeld themſelues wholly to his deuotion. The Caramanian king ſeeing his people daily fall from him, and fearing to be at length forſaken of his ſouldiers alſo; in this his diſtres obtained aid both of men and mony of Caytbeius the great Sultan of ÆGIPT, and ſo with all the power he could make, tooke the field with the firſt of the Spring, fully reſolued to trie the fortune of a battell, although in ſtrength and power he knew himſelfe much inferiour to his puiſſant enemie.

Baiazet glad to ſee his enemie ſo forward, ſpeedily aſſembled his armie, and without delaie offered him battell: which the Caramanian king refuſed not. So betwixt them was begun a
B fierce and terrible fight; which by the skilfull conduct of the leaders, and exceeding courage of the ſoldiors, was maintained the whole day, with doubtfull victorie and great ſlaughter on both ſides, new ſupplies ſtill comming on in ſtead of them which were ſlaine. The day declining, the Caramanian king (whoſe fatall deſtinie had now appointed him vnto his laſt worke) ſeeing his wearied ſouldiours rather ouerlayed with multitude than by force vanquiſhed, to being to giue ground vnto their enemies; courageouſly thruſt forward with his guard and other valiant ſouldiors about him, with ſuch furie, that he brake into the middeſt of his enemies battaile: where being knowne, he was forthwith enuironed by the Turkes, and ſo hardly charged on euerie ſide, that hauing his horſe ſlaine vnder him, he was enforced to fight on foot; where after he had with his owne hand ſlaine diuerſe of his enemies, hee fell downe dead in the middeſt of C them. His ſouldiours diſcouraged with his death, turned their backs and fled, and in flying, were for the moſt part either ſlaine or taken priſoners. After this victorie, Baiazet ſpeedily ouerran all that large countrie, and without reſiſtance, in ſhort time brought vnder his obeyſance all the countrie of CILICIA.

A long and terrible battell betwixt Baiazet and the king of Caramania.

There was at that time in that part of CILICIA which is called TRACHEA, and lyeth towards the ſea ſide, an auncient Mahometane prince, who had vnder his commaund moſt part of that countrie, with the famous and populous citie of SCANDELORO, the chiefe place of his reſiance. This prince had of long time liued betwixt the Chriſtian kings and the kings of CARAMANNIA, as neuter, ſtill fearing the greater, but indeed louing neither: and had vntill then chiefely maintained his ſtate by the alliance he and his anceſtors continually held with the kings of CYPRVS,
D and the grand Maſters of the RHODES. Againſt this poore prince, the only one now left in ASIA the leſſe, not ſubiect vnto the Turkiſh kings, began Baiazet now to turne his forces: purpoſing before he proceeded any further, to make a full conqueſt of the leſſer ASIA, and ſo to make all ſure behind him. Of which his purpoſe, the prince hauing knowledge, and wiſely waying his owne ſmall power to withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemie: offered by his embaſſadors to deliuer vnto Baiazet his chiefe citie of SCANDELORO, with all the reſt of his territorie in CILICIA, vpon condition, that Baiazet ſhould giue vnto him other poſſeſſions for it in ſome other part of ASIA the leſſer, to the like value. Which his offer Baiazet accepted, and ſo became lord of all the ſea coaſt, from the ſtraits of BOSPHORVS vnto the confines of SIRIA.

After he had thus conquered CILICIA, with a great part of the mountaine TAVRVS, he deſ-
E cended into ARMENIA the leſſe, and in ſhort time brought vnder his ſubiction ſo much of that countrie, as alſo of CAPPADOCIA, as was ſometime belonging to the Caramanian kings. When Baiazet had thus ſlaine the Caramanian king, and ſubdued that moſt ancient kingdome of the Turks, which had long and many times mightily contended with the glorie and power of the Othoman kings, he left Muſtapha (one of his great Baſſaes) at ICONIVM, with his Aſian armie to keepe in obedience thoſe new woon countries: and as a triumphant conqueror returned himſelfe to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was of his ſubiects ioyfully receiued.

After that Baiazet had thus inlarged his empire with the kingdome of CARAMANNIA, and was now become an vnwelcome neighbour vnto the great Sultan of Ægypt and SYRIA; he 1487 began to ſwell in diſdaine againſt that mightie prince, for that he had giuen aid againſt him, firſt F vnto his brother Zemes, and after that to the Caramanian king in theſe late warres: of which wrong, purpoſing to be reuenged, he ſhortly after appointed one Caragoſes Baſſa his lieutenant in ASIA, with Iſhender, another of his great captaines, with a ſtrong armie to inuade SIRIA, then part of the great Sultans kingdome. Theſe two great commaunders, well appointed for the purpoſe, when they were come to the vttermoſt parts of CILICIA, the new bounds of Baiazets empire, were then to paſſe by the confines of Aladeules his kingdome, before they could passe the great mountaine TAVRVS to come into SYRIA. This Aladeules commaunded as king ouer the rude and fierce people which dwelt alongst that great and rough mountaine, and was then in league with the Sultan: he hearing of the approch of the Turks armie, with a great number of his mountaine people lay in ambush in the straits, whereby the Turkes must needs passe, of purpose to intercept them. Ishender marching in the vauntguard with a great number of the voluntarie souldiors called Acanzij, as the manner of the Turks is, and fearing nothing lesse than to be set vpon by the mountain king, before he was aware was come into the middest of his enemies; and was by them so fiercely charged on euerie side from their places of aduantage, that he there lost most part of his men, and forsaken of the rest, which sought by flight to saue themselues, he with his two sonnes and others were taken prisoners. Michael-beg the eldest of the two being fast bound, was slaine by one of Aladeules his followers, whose brother he had slaine in that skirmish: his head being cut off, was by the commaundement of Aladeules carried to his father Ishender, the more to grieue him: who disdainefully willed the messenger not to shew it vnto him, but to bid his master eat it if he would: with which answere Aladeules was exceedingly mooued: neuertheless pitying the old mans miserie, he shortly after set Iaxis Beg the yonger brother at libertie; but Ishender himselfe he sent prisoner vnto Caitbeius the great Sultan at CAIRE, where he remained in prison fiue yeres after. Caragoses the Bassa discouraged with the losse of so great a man, retired with his armie backe againe into CILICIA, and from thence aduertised Baiazet what had happened, by whom he was commanded to returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, as a man vnfit for so great an enterprise. G H

The next Spring following, Baiazet constant in his former resolution for the inuasion of SYRIA, sent Achmetes another of his Bassaes, with a far greater armie than had Caragoses, against the Sultan: who was no sooner come vnto the farther part of CILICIA, but he was there at a place called of the Turks TZVCVR OVA, encountered by the Ægyptians and Arabians, and there in a great battaile ouerthrowne; wherein he himselfe fighting most valiantly, lost two of his fingers, and being taken prisoner was sent to CAIRE. I

Baiazet with this ouerthrow rather incensed than discouraged, made great preparation the next yeare against the Sultan both by sea and land, such as he had not before at any time made. And when all things were now in readinesse, sent Alis Bassa (of some called Calibeus) and Cherseogles his sonne in law, two notable captaines, with a great and puissant armie by land against the Ægyptian Sultan: at which time he requested of the Venetians, with whom he was then in league, that he might by their good leaue, as occasion required, refresh his fleet (then ready to put to sea for the inuasion of SYRIA, as he said) in their Island of CYPRVS. Which his request was by the generall consent of the Senat denied, as a thing tending to the danger of their state: yet wisely doubting least Baiazet taking that deniall in euill part, should seeke to haue that by force which he could not obtaine by request, they presently sent Francisco Priuolo, their Admirall, to sea with thirtie gallies for the defence of that Island. He hearing that one fleet of the Turks gallies, lately come out of HELLESPONTVS, lay houering at the Island of SCIRÒS, expecting a farre greater from the coast of IONIA; and carefully considering how secret and suddaine the Turkish designements were, although it was giuen out, that all that great preparation was made against the Sultan: yet to prouide that they should not suddainely surprise the Isle, he speedily sent sundrie companies of souldiours, especially archers out of CRETA, into CYPRVS, for the better defence thereof: but stayed himselfe with his fleet at the Island of NAXOS, that so at hand he might be the readier to withstand whatsoeuer the Turkes intended. But when he vnderstood that all their fleet was met, and now set forward, he hoised saile, and held his course directly for CYPRVS. In the meane time, the Turkish fleet sayling alongst the coast of LYCIA, PAMPHILIA, and CILICIA, kept on their course, vntill they came vpon the coast of SYRIA: by which time Calibeus and Cherseogles were come with a mightie armie into CILICIA, neere vnto the mountaine TAVRVS. K L

Caitbeius the Ægyptian Sultan hauing before had certaine intelligence of the great preparation that Baiazet had made against him, had before sent Vsbeg, a most valiant and politicke captaine, with a strong armie of his Mamalukes and other his most expert souldiors into SYRIA, to be readie at all times to withstand the Turkes. This worthie cheefetaine vnderstanding of the comming of the Turkes armie, thought it greater policie to carrie the calamities which alwaies wait vpon great armies, into the enemies countrey, than to receiue it into his own bosome. And M there-

A therefore although he knew himſelfe to be for number farre inferiour vnto his enemies,yet ſupplying that want with the valour courage and aſſured confidence he had repoſed in the approoued & inuincible force of his Mamalukes, he expected not the comming of the enemie into SYRIA,but paſſing ouer the mountaine AMANVS, and ſo deſcending into CILICIA, met him not far from TARSVS,in the ſame place (as it was thought) where Alexander the Great had long before in a great battell vanquiſhed Darius.

A long and terrible battell betweene the Turks and the Mamalukes.

Theſe two puiſſant armies come from farre out of diuers parts of the world the one to find the other, were no ſooner come together, but that with like cheerefulneſſe they ioyned battell; and that with ſuch violence and furie,that the earth ſeemed to tremble vnder their feet,and
B a moſt preſent deſtruction threatned vnto them all; which terrible and cruell fight was maintained all that day with doubtfull victorie and exceeding ſlaughter on both ſides. The politike Generals with new ſupplies of freſh ſouldiours, continually relieuing the moſt diſtreſſed parts of their battels: and they likewiſe as men prodigall of their liues,reſolutely offering themſelues to all dangers. When this moſt dreadfull fight had in this ſort indured the whole day, and manie thouſands of valiant men of late aliue, lay now dead vpon the ground,the approching night brake off the battell: and both the armies ſore wearied and weakned(but eſpecially the Turks) retired to their camps, where they reſted that night.

But the Ægyptians comming to their campe, found all their carriages with their prouiſion of victuals and other neceſſaries quite taken away and gone. Which thing(as ſome write) the C bordering people of the countrey (for moſt part liuing vpon robberie) had done in time of the battell,to pleaſe the Turkes: or as ſome others report, they which had the charge thereof, terrified with the greatneſſe of the Turks armie, and doubtfulneſſe of the battell,fled away, and taking their way alongſt the ſea ſide,fell into the hands of the Turkes which were put on ſhore out of the gallies,and ſo were of them ſpoiled. Howſoeuer it was(for in ſo great vncertaintie I dare not affirme)certain it is, that the Ægyptians were ſore troubled with the loſſe of their prouiſion;fearing that if they ſhould now ſtay longer in the countrey,they ſhould forthwith be driuen to great extremities for want of neceſſaries. Wherefore, when they had euill reſted that night,the next day early in the morning they preſented themſelues in order of battel before their enemies,brauing them into the field, and daring them to battell. The Turks diſdaining to ſee
D any prouder in field than themſelues, after they had in goodly order raunged their battels, ſet forward with enſignes diſplayed againſt their proud enemies. There began a moſt terrible and bloudie battell,fought with ſuch deſperat reſolution, as if they had ſolemnly vowed either to ouercome or die in the place where they ſtood. A man would haue ſaid, that the former daies furie had beene but a play in compariſon of this. Many valiant ſouldiours couered with their dead bodies the ſame ground whereon they liuing ſtood when they receiued the firſt encounter of their enemies. Of both thoſe great armies none was ſeene to giue ground,or once looke back. The Turks Ianizaries,and the Ægyptians Mamalukes,the vndoubted ſtrength of the greateſt Mahometane Monarchs (ſouldiors for their valour much feared,and through the world renowmed)there buckled togither,and ſtanding foot to foot, ſpent the vttermoſt of their forces
E one vpon another: as if they would in that battell haue made it knowne vnto the world,which of them were to be accounted the better ſouldiours. Whileſt victorie ſtood thus doubtfull, and the day was now far ſpent, Vsbeg (the Ægyptian Generall)with fifteene thouſand valiant horſmen(whom he had reſerued for that purpoſe) gaue a freſh charge vpon the Turkes ſquadrons, with ſuch force,that they had much adoe to keepe their order,and began now to giue ground; which was by and by made good againe,by other freſh men ſpeedily brought one by the Baſſaes. Then became the battell more fierce than before,euerie man ſtriuing to the vttermoſt of his power,to ſell his life vnto his enemie as deere as he could. In which manner of fight all the reſt of the day was ſpent, vntill that after the going downe of the ſunne,the darkneſſe of the night comming faſt on, they were glad for lacke of light to breake off the battell and to retire them-
F ſelues into their campes,not knowing as yet who had got the better.

The Turks flie away by night.

The Turkes Baſſaes taking view of the armie,and finding that of an hundred thouſand fighting men which they brought into the field, there was ſcarce a third part left,and moſt of them alſo maimed or hurt; and doubting to be ſet vpon again the next morning by their reſolute enemies, fled away ſecretly the ſame night, leauing behind them for haſt, their tents well ſtored with victuals, and all other things needfull. The Ægyptians alſo hauing loſt one halfe of their armie (which was at the firſt ſeuentie thouſand) and wanting their neceſſarie prouiſion, were retired alſo the ſame night into the mountaine TAVRVS, not knowing any thing of the flight of the Turkes. And ſome of the ſouldiours paſſing quite ouer the mountaine without ſtay into SYRIA, raiſed a report all ouer the countrey as they went, That the Sultans armie was ouerthrowne, and that the Turks had got the victorie: ſo vncertaine was the true knowledge of the euent of that battell, euen vnto them that were preſent therein. The Ægyptian lying the night vpon the ſide of the mountaine, had ſpeedie intelligence from Aladeules of the flight of the Turkes: which being alſo confirmed by his eſpials to be true, hee preſently came downe from the mountaine, and entred into the Turks campe, where he found plentie of victuals and of all other things needfull for the refreſhing of his armie. G H

Aladeules the mountaine king, with the people called Varſacide, by whoſe confines the Turkes muſt needes in their returne paſſe, robbed and ſlew many of them in their diſordered flight; and had ſo ſtopped the paſſages, that they were in flyiug ouertaken by the Mamalukes and ſlaine, with ſo great a ſlaughter, that of all that great armie of the Turks few remained aliue to carrie newes home. Calibeius and Cherſeogles the Baſſaes, were in that flight both taken priſoners, and afterwards preſented to Caitbeius the Sultant of CAIRE; with eighteene enſignes of the Turks Sanzackes, which are great men amongſt them, hauing euerie one of them the regiment and commaund of ſome one prouince or other, and are in degree next vnto the Baſſaes.

Neither was the fortune of Baiazet his nauie at ſea, better than that of his armie at land: for as it lay at rode vpon the coaſt of SYRIA at the mouth of the riuer Orontes, which runneth by the famous citie of ANTIOCHIA, his gallies were by tempeſt and rage of the ſea put from their anchors, & in the ſight of their enemies ſwallowed vp of the ſea; or elſe driuen vpon the main, and there with the ſurges of the ſea beaten in peeces. Baiazet not a little troubled with theſe loſſes both by ſea and land, at length with much adoe, by his embaſſadors concluded a peace with the Sultan, vnto whom he reſtored all ſuch place as he had before taken from him: for which the Sultan deliuered vnto him Calibeius, Cherſeogles, Achmetes, and Iſhender, with all the reſt of the Turks priſoners, which he had in great number in his keeping. I

Shortly after this peace was concluded betwixt theſe two great and mightie princes, Caitbeius the Sultan died: who of a Circaſſian ſlaue, by many degrees of honour, and by the fauour of the Mamalukes his fellowes, obtained the rich kingdome of Ægypt, which he right worthily gouerned to his immortall praiſe by the ſpace of two and twentie yeares; commanding at one time the great and rich countrie of ÆGYPT, with all AFFRIKE as far as CIRENE, Weſtward; and IVDEA, with a great part of ARABIA, and all SYRIA, vnto the great and famous riuer Euphrates, Eaſtward. In the latter end of his raigne, he (ouercome with the importunitie of his wife Dultibe an Arabian borne, a woman of an hautie ſpirit) ioyned his ſonne Mahomethes, a young man of about foure and twentie yeares old, with him in the felloſhip of his kingdome; that ſo poſſeſſed of it, his father yet liuing, he might the better inioy it after his death. Contrarie to the cuſtome of the Mamalukes, who of long time had not vſed to haue their king by ſucceſſion, but by their free election. Who grudging to be thus defrauded of their wonted choiſe, immediatly after the death of Caitbeius, ſlew Mahomethes his ſonne; and in a few moneths after, foure moe, who one after another, without their good liking, had aſpired vnto the kingdome: neither could they be contented, vntill ſuch time as that they had according to their wonted cuſtome ſet vp a Sultan of their owne choiſe. K L

About the ſame time that the aforeſaid peace was concluded betwixt the two great Mahometane princes, Baiazet and Caitbeius, Charles the French king was making great preparation againſt Alphonſus king of NAPLES, giuing it out, That after he had recouered that kingdome, he would forthwith from thence inuade the Turkes dominions in GRÆCIA. Which great attempt the haughtie king was induced to take in hand, by the perſuaſion of diuers of his nobilitie, but eſpecially the ſolicitation of Lodouicus Sfortia duke of MILLAN: whereby the whole ſtate of ITALIE was in ſhort time after ſore ſhaken, and Sfortia himſelfe, authour of thoſe troubles, at laſt carried away by the French, miſerably ended his daies as a priſoner in FRAVNCE. Alphonſus the Neopolitane king doubting the greatneſſe of the French king his enemie, entered into a confederation with certaine of the ſtates of ITALIE againſt the French, but eſpecially with Alexander the ſixt then Biſhop of ROME: for the better aſſurance wherof, he gaue M

A his baſe daughter in marriage to Godfrey Borgia, the Biſhops ſonne, and made him prince of CARINVLA: his other ſonne Francis he entertained alſo in great pay to ſerue him in his wars. And by his embaſſadour Pandonius Camillus, lately returned out of FRANCE, gaue Baiazet to vnderſtand what the French king had purpoſed againſt them both, requeſting him to aid him with ſix thouſand horſemen and as many foot againſt their common enemie, promiſing to giue them honourable entertainement during thoſe warres. And to further the matter, Alexander the great Biſhop ſent George Bucciarde, a Ligurian, skilfull in the Turkiſh language, embaſſadour to Baiazet, to declare vnto him with what great preparation, both by ſea and land, the young French king (deſirous of honour and the enlargement of his kingdome) was about to inuade NAPLES;

Alphonſus king of Naples, and Alexander Biſhop of Rome craue aid of Baiazet againſt Charles the French king.

B and then, with what great power (after he had diſpatched his warres in ITALIE) he purpoſed to paſſe ouer into GRÆCIA; and that he had to that end earneſtly trauelled with him, to haue Zemes his brother deliuered into his hands, whom he deſired to vſe as a moſt fit inſtrument for the troubling of his ſtate and empire, by reaſon of his many friends: yet that his Holineſſe (hauing the French in diſtruſt as a proud and ambitious people, as alſo carefull for the danger of the citie of ROME, and of the ſtate of ITALIE in generall) had entered into a confederation with Alphonſus king of NAPLES, with their vnited forces to withſtand that proud nation, both by ſea and land; wanting nothing more for the accompliſhment thereof, than mony: by which only means Baiazet might (as he ſaid) prouide for the ſafetie of his kingdome in GRÆCIA, if he would put to his helping hand, to furniſh them with mony for the entertainment of

C ſouldiers: for as much as the citie of ROME, and the kingdome of NAPLES, were the ſureſt wals of that ſide of the Othoman empire; if he not altogether refuſing the charge, would not ſpare for a little coſt to maintaine the warre rather in that forraine conntrey, than to receiue it, brought home to his owne dore concluding, That it were much more commodious and eaſie with his treaſures to repreſſe his enemie in a ſtrange countrey a farre off, than by dint of ſword and plaine battell in his owne. A thing by experience well knowne, that they which haue neglected & ſet at nought remote dangers, for ſparing of charge, haue afterwards been enforced with greater danger to receiue the ſame into their owne boſomes, when as they were become deſperat and paſt remedie. Baiazet, who both by his eſpials and often letters and embaſſadours from Alphonſus, knew all this to be true, gaue great thankes to the biſhop by his embaſſador, for that

D he ſitting in ſo high place, did ſo friendly & in ſo good time admoniſh him, both a ſtranger, and of a contrarie religion, of things of ſo great conſequence: yet for anſwere, he willed him to returne againe to his maſter with one Dautius his embaſſadour, who ſhould carrie with him both money and his other ſecret reſolutions concerning thoſe matters. Amongſt other things giuen him in charge, was an Epiſtle written in Greeke, wherein the barbarous king with great cunning perſuaded the biſhop to poyſon Zemes his brother, as a man of a religion altogether contrarie to his: for indeed of him alone for his great vertues Baiazet ſtood in feare and doubt, leaſt hee ſhould by ſome chance eſcape out of priſon to the troubling of his ſtate. For the performance of this his requeſt, he promiſed faithfully to pay vnto the biſhop two hundred thouſand duckats, and neuer after, ſo long as he liued, to take vp armes againſt the Chriſtians. Otherwiſe than Baiazet ſtudeth Dautius his embaſſadour to Alexander biſhop of Rome.

E had his father Mahomet and his grandfather Amurath done, who both as deadly enemies vnto the name of Chriſtians, neuer ceaſed by continuall warres to worke their woe.

But George the biſhops embaſſadour, and Dautius, trauelling towards ITALIE, and hauing now happely paſſed the Adriaticke, as they were about to haue landed at ANCONA were bourded by Io. Rouereus, brother to Iulianus the Cardinall (a man of great account in thoſe quarters) and cleane quit of their treaſure and whatſoeuer elſe they had aboord. Rouereus pretending for the defence of the fact, That the biſhop did owe him a great ſumme of money, due vnto him for his good ſeruice done in the time of Innocentius his predeceſſour, for which he now paied himſelfe. Neither could the biſhop, much troubled with that iniurie, euer after recouer any one part thereof, although he threatened vengeance with fire and ſword, and alſo ſought for recompence

Io. Rouereus robbeth the Turks embaſſadour.

F of the Venetians, whom it concerned to ſaue the Turkes harmeleſſe in thoſe ſeas: for why, Rouereus bearing himſelfe vpon the French, which were now vpon comming, whoſe faction he followed, kept the money, and ſet at nought the biſhops thundering curſes and vaine threats. Dautius himſelfe, Baiazets embaſſadour, being ſet on ſhore, was glad to goe on foot to ANCONA; and ſo from thence paſſing vp the riuer Padus, came to Franciſcus Gonzaga, duke of MANTVA, of whom (for the ancient friendſhip betwixt him and Baiazet) he was courteouſly entertained

and

and furniſhed both with money and apparell, and ſo ſpoiled returned into GRECIA, to carrie G newes vnto his maſter how he had ſped.

When Baiazet vnderſtood by Dautius the euill ſucceſſe he had in his late iourney, he forthwith ſent Muſtapha one of the Baſſaes of the court, vnto the great Biſhop Alexander, with like inſtructions as he had before giuen to Dautius: who with better hap arriued in ITALIE, and came to ROME in ſafetie; where he forgot no part of that was giuen him in charge by his great maſter. But amongſt many other things, the life of Zemes was that he moſt ſought for at the Biſhops hands.

PLES: and taking his way without leaue through the citie of ROME, ſo terrified Alexander the biſhop, who (as we haue before ſaid) altogither fauoured, and as much as in him lay furthered the cauſe of Alphonſus; that he was glad to yeeld to all ſuch articles and conditions as it pleaſed him then to demaund: not purpoſing in himſelfe at all the performance of any of thoſe things, which for feare he had with great ſolemnitie promiſed, as the ſequell of the matter afterwards declared. Amongſt other things, he was enforced to giue vnto the king his graceleſſe ſon Cæſar Borgia Valentinus (then one of the cardinals) in hoſtage, for the performance of the other of his promiſes. Which diſgrace the craftie old biſhop ſought to couer, by gracing his ſonne with the title of his legate: and with him he was alſo enforced to deliuer Zemes the Turke, Baiazet his brother his honourable priſoner; who to the great profit of the biſhop and his predeceſſor, had I Zemes dieth, poiſoned by Alexander Biſhop of Rome. remained in ſafe cuſtodie at ROME about the ſpace of ſeauen yeares. But Zemes within three daies after he was deliuered vnto the French, died at CAIETA, being before his deliuerance poiſoned (as it was thought) with a powder of wonderfull whiteneſſe and pleaſant taſte; whoſe power was not preſently to kill, but by little & little diſperſing the force therof, did in ſhort time bring moſt aſſured death: which pleaſant poiſon, Alexander the biſhop skilfull in that practiſe (corrupted by Baiazet his gold, and enuying ſo great a good vnto the French) had cauſed to be cunningly mingled with the ſugar wherewith Zemes vſed to temper the water which he commonly dranke. His dead bodie was not long after ſent to Baiazet, by Muſtapha his embaſſador, who to the great contentment of his maſter, had thus contriued his death with the biſhop. Not long after this dead bodie ſo farre brought, was by the appointment of Baiazet, honourably en- K terred amongſt his aunceſtors at PRVSA. Cæſar Borgia alſo the biſhops ſonne, a little before giuen in hoſtage vnto the French king, deceiuing his keepers at VELITRAS, returned againe
The euill life of Cæſar Borgia. to ROME before the French king was come to NAPLES. This wicked impe come of an euil ſtrain, not worth the remembrance but by way of deteſtation, (the very monſter of nature, if a man ſhould well conſider the courſe of his whole life) ſhortly after his eſcape, enuying at the honour of Candianus his brother, who then was Generall ouer the biſhop his fathers forces, which were at that time great: when he had one night merily ſupped with his ſaid brother with their mother Vannotia, traiterouſly cauſed him to be vnawares murdered in the ſtreets as he was going home, and his dead bodie to be caſt into the riuer of Tiber. Then caſting off his prieſtly habit with his Cardinals roabs, he tooke vpon him the leading of his fathers armie in his brothers ſtead, and L gaue himſelfe wholy to martiall affaires: a vocation beſt fitting his fierce and bloudie diſpoſition. And with exceeding prodigalitie, wherwith he exhauſted his fathers coffers and the treaſures of the church, bound faſt vnto him deſperat ruffians and ſouldiers (eſpecially Spaniards, his fathers countrey men) ſuch as he knew fitteſt to ſerue for the execution of his moſt horrible deuiſes. Which manner of his proceedings, although they were ſuch as all good men deteſted, yet did the old hypocrit his father winke thereat, fearing as it was thought, to be murdered of the viper himſelfe, when it ſhould ſerue for his purpoſe. Now when he had thus ſtrengthned himſelfe, and that he was become a terrour to all the nobilitie of ROME and the ſeigniories thereabout, he by the deuiſe and helpe of his father (who deſired nothing more than to make him great) firſt draue the moſt honourable family of the Columnij out of the citie, and afterwards out of LATI- M VM: and by moſt execrable treacherie, poiſoned or killed the honourable perſonages of the great houſes of the Vrſini and Caetani; taking vnto himſelfe their lands and poſſeſſions. With like crueltie he ſtrangled at one time foure noblemen of the Camertes: and draue Guido Feltrius out of VRBIN. He tooke the citie of PISAVRVM from Io. Sforția, who with much difficultie eſcaped his bloudie hands: and draue the Malateſtaes out of ARIMINVM. The great lady Catherine

A rine Sforția he thruſt out of FORVM LIVII and FORVM CORNELII, and ſhamefully led her in triumph through ROME. And neuer ſatisfied with blond, which he without meaſure ſhed, he tooke the citie of FAVENTIA from Aſtor Manfredus, a young gentleman of rare perfection: whom after the beaſtly tyrant had moſt horribly abuſed againſt nature, he cauſed to be cruelly ſtrangled, and his dead bodie to be caſt into Tiber. Hauing thus filled the meaſure of his iniquitie, and as a fretting canker, hauing either deuoured or driuen into exile moſt part of the Roman nobilitie; and purpoſing by the ſupportation of his father, to make himſelfe lord and ſoueraign both of the citie, and of all LATIVM; in the pride of his thoughts he was by the hand of the moſt higheſt attached and caſt downe, and that by ſuch meanes as he leaſt feared. For being with his
B father at a ſolemn ſupper in the Vaticane, of purpoſe prepared for the deſtruction of certain rich Cardinals and ſome other honourable citizens, they were both poiſoned by the fatall errour of one of the waiters; who miſtaking of a flagon, gaue the poiſoned wine to the accurſed biſhop and his ſonne, which was prepared for the gueſts: wherof the old biſhop in few daies after died. But his ſonne who had drunke the ſame more delaied with water, although he died not of long time after, yet preſently fell into ſuch an extreame ſickneſſe, that he was not able to helpe himſelfe, or to commaund his deſperat followers, whereof he had great ſtore: but lying ſicke, in ſhort time ſaw himſelfe of them forſaken, and two of his enemies, Pius the Third, and Iulius the Second, one after another ſitting in his fathers place. Of which two, Pius enioyed that pontificall dignitie but ſixteene daies: and Iulius ſucceeding him, cauſed this Cæſar Borgia (who of right
C had deſerued a thouſand deaths) to be ſhut vp in the caſtle called MOLES ADRIANI, from whence he ſet him at libertie vpon the deliuerie of certaine ſtrong holds which were yet holden by his garriſons. After he had thus rid himſelfe out of Iulius the biſhops hands, he fled to OSTIA, and ſo by ſea to NAPLES: where he was by the commandement of Ferdinand king of SPAINE, apprehended by Conſaluus the Great, and tranſported into SPAINE; for feare leaſt he being of a moſt troubleſome nature, and much reſorted vnto by his old fauourits, ſhould raiſe ſome new ſtirs in ITALIE. He was no ſooner arriued in SPAINE, but he was caſt into priſon in the caſtle of MEDINA, where after he had lien three yeares he deceiued his keepers, and with a rope which he had gotten, let himſelfe downe from an high tower of the caſtle: and ſo eſcaping, fled to the king of NAVARRE, whom he afterwards ſerued in his wars, and was in an hoat
D ſkirmiſh againſt the kings enemies (wherein he had obtained the victorie) ſlaine with a ſmall ſhot. Vnworthy after ſo many horrible villanies, to haue ended his daies ſo honourably. His dead bodie was found ſtript, and ſo brought vnto the king vpon a bad beaſt, as if it had beene a dead calfe all naked; which was by his commandement honourably buried at PAMPILONA.

The death of Ceſar Borgia.

But to returne againe from whence we haue ſomething too long with this troubleſome body gone aſtray. The French king hauing thus loſt both his great hoſtages, Zemes the Turke by death, and the Cardinall Borgia by eſcape, held on his iourney towards NAPLES: and with wonderfull ſucceſſe preuailed as he went, all places yeelding vnto him without any great reſiſtance. Alphonſus ſeeing himſelfe deſtitute of ſuch aid as he had in vaine requeſted both of the Turkiſh emperour and of the Venetians, and now almoſt beſet with his mightie enemy, to E whom ſo many ſtrong places had in ſhorter time been deliuered than any man had before imagined; and withall, conſidering with himſelfe, how that he had loſt the hearts of his ſubiects (the ſtrongeſt defence of princes) for that moſt of the nobilitie, and eſpecially the Neapolitans, hated him for his too much ſeueritie in puniſhing the offenders in the late rebellion, wherein the princes of SARNE and SALERNE were chiefe; and the common people were no leſſe offended with the grieuous and heauy exactions, required of them for the maintenance of theſe warres, inſomuch that their murmuring ſpeeches came oftentimes to his owne hearing; as oftentimes it falleth out, That the hatred of the ſubiects againſt their princes, which hath for feare of long time beene diſſembled during their proſperitie, more frankly and fiercely breaketh out in their declining eſtate: For theſe cauſes, Alphonſus fearing to be forſaken of his people, as a man in deſ-
F paire, with aboundance of tears openly in the ſight of al the Neapolitans, reſigned his kingdom of NAPLES vnto his ſonne Ferdinand, when as he had as yet ſcarcely raigned one whole yeare after the death of Ferdinand his father: and with foure gallies paſſed ouer to MAZERRA a citie of CICILIA. His ſon Ferdinand, a prince of rare perfection and ſingularly graced with all the vertues of true nobilitie, and thereto deerely beloued of all the people, was to the wonderfull contentment of the Neapolitans with great ioy and acclamations ſaluted king: and ſo hauing performed formed all the ceremonies belonging to his coronation, returned preſently to his armie. By this G time the French King with all his forces was entered farre into the kingdome of NAPLES: and hauing taken by aſſault certaine cities which truſted too much to their owne ſtrength, ſtrucke ſuch a generall terrour into the minds of the Neapolitanes, that they thought no place now ſtrong enough to abide his batteries, or power ſufficient to encounter his forces. Ferdinand the young King with his armie had taken the ſtraits of the forreſt of S. Germane, thereby to impeach the further paſſage of the French King. But whileſt he was there buſied, he was ſuddenly aduer-tiſed, that Fabritius Columna with a great power of Frenchmen had by the Appenines broken into CAMPANIA, and ſo was marching towards him: wherefore doubting to be ſhut vp betwixt two ſtrong armies of the enemies, he retired ſpeedily to CAPVA, a ſtrong citie ſituat vpon the riuer Vulturnus; purpoſing there by meanes of that deepe riuer, to ſtay the French from H paſſing farther. But whileſt he lay there, newes was brought vnto him, That all the citie of NAPLES was in an vprore, and that the citizens were all vp in armes, as men in doubt which way to turne themſelues. Ferdinand not a little troubled with theſe bad newes, commended Ferdinand departeth from Capua to paciſie an vprore at Naples the charge of his armie and the defence of the citie of CAPVA to his chiefe captaines, and rid himſelfe in poſt backe againe to NAPLES.

It is a ſtrange thing to tell, what a ſudden alteration enſued vpon his arriuall there: for ſuddenly all the tumult was appeaſed, euery man laid downe his armes, and welcommed him with a generall gratulation: for he was a man of a great and an inuincible courage, and of ſo comely a perſonage as might eaſily win the hearts of his ſubiects; inſomuch, that when he earneſtly requeſted them, that they would not traiterouſly betray him vnto his barbarous & cruell enemies, I being their naturall King, or rather their brother borne and brought vp amongſt them: they all with one conſent anſwered, That they would ſpend their liues and goods in his quarrell, ſo long as he ſhould keepe his armie whole, and defend the citie of CAPVA: But if it ſhould ſo chance, that the Aragonians ſhould be ouerthrowne, or elſe for feare abandon that citie, and the French King, as victor, to approch the citie of NAPLES; he ſhould doe both againſt reaſon and equitie, if by exacting fidelitie and allegeance of his ſubiects, apprehended with ſo iuſt a feare, he ſhould ſo expoſe that noble citie with the fruitfull countrey thereabout, to be ſpoiled and deſtroyed by a mercileſſe and cruell enemie. Whileſt Ferdinand was thus buſied in appeaſing and confirming his wauering ſubiects at NAPLES, the French King had taken diuers cities, and was come before K CAPVA. The citizens of CAPVA although they were alwayes well affected to the Aragonian Kings: yet ſeeing the French King as a moſt violent tempeſt to beare downe all before him, began now to conſult amongſt themſelues of yeelding vp the citie; whereunto they were the more prickt forward, by the ſudden reuolt of the great captaine Triuultius with his followers, as alſo by the departure of Verginius and Petilianus, two great and famous commanders, who ſeeing themſelues forſaken of Triuultius, fled with their companies vnto the citie of NOLA. In this diſcomfiture of King Ferdinand his armie, the Frenchmen had entered into the ſuburbs of the citie: which thing Gothfredus and Gaſpar (two valiant Germane captaines) beholding, ſallied with their companies out of the citie, of purpoſe to abate the pride of the French, & to confirme the doubtfull citizens: Theſe worthie captaines when they had with exceeding valour repulſed L
the French, and thought to haue againe returned into the citie, could not be ſuffered to enter, but were by the citizens ſhut out of the gate, in danger to haue had their throats cut by the enemie.
In which perplexitie they were glad vpon their knees to entreat the cowardly citizens ſtanding vpon the wals, not in ſuch traiterous manner to betray their friends readie in their defence to beſtow their liues: and with much entreating, at length obtained of thoſe heartleſſe men, that they might by ten and ten in a companie be receiued in at one gate of the citie, and ſo put out at another, fartheſt from the danger of the enemie: in which ſort when they had paſſed through the citie, they tooke the way towards NAPLES: and vpon the way met with the king at AVERSA, vnto whom they declared all that had happened in his abſence at CAPVA. Who although he ſaw his armie diſperſed, and all things now deſperat, yet went he on forward, and came to the M very gates of CAPVA, and there called vpon diuers of the cheeſemen of the citie, requiring to be let in. But when he ſaw there was none to giue him anſwer, & an enſigne of the French king diſplayed vpon the wall, in token that the citie was become French, he returned to NAPLES:
where he found the gates now ſhut againſt him, and all the citiſens vp againe in armes, and not willing to receiue any of the ſouldiors which came from CAPVA, more than the king himſelfe:

for

A for flying fame preuenting his returne, had filled euery corner of the citie with report, That all the cheefe captains of his armie were either gone ouer to the enemie, or elſe for ſafegard of their liues fled; That the whole armie was broken vp, and CAPVA yeelded to the French. Wherefore the Neapolitanes framing their fancies according to the condition of the time, began now alſo to fawne vpon the good fortune of the French, and to haue king Ferdinand in contempt: which he well perceiuing, and fetching a compaſſe farther off from the citie, came vnto the caſtle, whereinto he was receiued with his followers by his faithfull captaines therein before left. But prouidently foreſeeing that he could not there long ſtay, but that he ſhould be beſieged by his enemies both by ſea and land, he commended the keeping of that peece vnto Alphonſus D'a-
B ualus, a moſt valiant captaine, and departed himſelfe with twentie gallies well appointed vnto ÆNVRIA, an Iſland not farre from NAPLES, hauing in it a commodious harbour and a ſtrong caſtle: where fortune, neuer firme but in miſerie, ſeemed againe to deride the poore remainder of his honor: For comming thether, the captaine of the caſtle, vnworthely named Iuſtus, forgetting his dutie towards his ſoueraigne, of whom he had before receiued many extraordinarie fauours, moſt traiterouſly now in his ſo hard diſtreſſe ſhut the gates of the caſtle againſt him at his landing, and vnkindly refuſed to receiue him. With which vnexpected ingratitude, the poore king was wonderfully perplexed and almoſt abaſhed: yet with earneſt entreatie & ample commemoration of the benefits and preferments which both his father and himſelfe had in times paſt beſtowed vpon him, he preuailed ſo much with this vnthankfull man, that he was content to C receiue him into the caſtle, ſo that he would come but himſelfe alone: of which his offer, when no more could be got, the king ſeemed to accept. So the captaine hauing opened a port to receiue him in, was in the very entrance thereof ſuddenly ſtabd to the heart with a dagger by king Ferdinand and ſlain in the middeſt of his armed ſouldiours. Which was done with ſuch a countenance and maieſtie, that the warders with their weapons in their hands, diſmaied with his look, forthwith at his commandement opened the gate, and receiued him in with all his followers. Whereby it appeareth, That in the countenance of princes reſteth a certaine diuine maieſtie, in all fortunes aboue the common courſe of nature: which is of power to daunt the hearts of moſt diſloyall traitors in the performance of their vnnaturall treaſons. The next day after the departure of king Ferdinand from the caſtle of NAPLES, Charles the French king was receiued into D the citie with ſuch pompe, triumph, and acclamation of the Neapolitanes, as if they had euen then by the benefit of that forraine king been reſtored vnto perfect liberty, and deliuered out of ſome long and hard bondage. Shortly after the caſtle of NAPLES, with all the ſtrong places thereabout, were yeelded vnto the French, and embaſſadours ſent from all the princes and people of that kingdome, yeelding themſelues into the power of the French king. Then Ferdinand ſeeing all loſt and gone, departed from ÆNARIA, where he lay expecting the euent of his hard fortune, and ſailed into SICILIA. Thus the houſe of ARAGON in leſſe than fiue moneths loſt the kingdome of NAPLES, about 63 yeares after that it was firſt taken from the French by Alphonſus the elder, this Ferdinand his great grandfather.

A moſt reſolute act of king Ferdinand.

Charles the French king receiued into Naples.

The report of the great preparation made by the French for this warre, had long before fil-E led the eares of them which dwelt in any part of the Turks dominions in EVROPE: but when they ſaw the French enſignes diſplayed vpon the wals of the caſtles and ſtrong townes alongſt the coaſt of CALABRIA and SALERNE, ſuch a ſudden feare fell vpon the Turks garriſons alongſt the coaſt of EPIRVS and MACEDONIA on the other ſide of the Adriatike, ouer againſt that part of ITALIE, that many of them forſooke their charge: the Chriſtians in thoſe places, as alſo in GRÆCIA and PELOPONESVS beginning then to lift vp their heads in hope of their deliuerance, and to make the beſt preparation they could to ioine with the French againſt the Turks: but eſpecially the rough and wild people inhabiting the high mountains called ACROCHERAVNII in the borders of EPIRVS, who preſently tooke vp armes, refuſing to be any longer tributarie vnto the Turkiſh emperour.

F This proſperous and ſpeedie ſucceſſe of the French king in the conqueſt of NAPLES, filled the minds of moſt of the Chriſtian princes, as alſo of the Turkiſh emperour, with a doubtull expectation, whither his greatneſſe would grow: many being of opinion, that he couertly affected the empire of ROME, and to make himſelfe the ſole monarch of ITALY. Which conceit no little troubled both the great Biſhop Alexander, and Maximilian then emperour. Baiazet alſo feared much, leaſt he ſhould vpon the ſuddaine turne his forces into EPIRVS or GRÆCIA, to his no ſmall diſquiet. And Ferdinand, the aduiſed king of SPAINE, was no leſſe carefull for the G ſafetie of SILICIA. Lodouicus Sforti a alſo (ſhortly after created duke of MILLAN, the cheefe occaſion of the French kings comming into ITALIE, and a great aider of him in thoſe warres) began now to conſider better of the matter, and to ſtand in doubt of the king, whom he well perceiued to make ſmall reckoning of his word or promiſe, ſo that he might thereby enlarge his dominions. And the Venetians, who in all theſe wars had ſtood looking on as neuters (in hope that when the Aragonians and French had with long warres, which they vainely imagined, well weakened one another, that they might then at their pleaſure ſhare out ſomething for themſelues) were now in doubt with the reſt of the ſtates of ITALIE to loſe ſome part of their owne territorie: for now there was no prince or ſtate in ITALIE able to oppoſe themſelues againſt H

the French, but ſtood as it were all at his deuotion.

A great league made by diuers Chriſtian princes againſt the French king.

Wherefore the aforeſaid princes, namely Maximilian the emperour, Ferdinand king of SPAINE, Alexander Biſhop of ROME, the ſtate of VENICE, and Lodouicus Sforti a duke of MILLAN, for the more aſſurance of their eſtates, by their embaſſadors ſpeedily ſent from one to another, concluded a ſtrong league amongſt themſelues, wherof thee cheefe capitulation was,
That if any of theſe confederates ſhould vpon their owne accord make warre vpon any other prince, they ſhould do it vpon their own charges: but if any of them ſhould chance to be inuaded by any other, that then euery one of theſe confederates ſhould of their owne charge ſend foure thouſand horſe and ten thouſand foot in aid of their confederate ſo inuaded, vntill the warres were ended: which league was to endure for twentie yeares. The fame of this league was wel- I come to many other princes, but eſpecially to Baiazet, who now feared nothing more than the forces of the French, and therefore had offered vnto the Venetians, to aid them both by ſea and land againſt the French, if their affaires ſhould ſo require. This league ſo much pleaſed not other princes, but it troubled the French king more, as of purpoſe made againſt him, although it was by the confederates pretended to be made onely for their owne ſafetie. Wherefore he with all expedition placed his beſt captaines with ſtrong garriſons in all the cities & ſtrong holds of the kingdome of NAPLES, and left Mompenſer his viceroy in the citie of NAPLES, and with the reſt of his armie returned towards FRAVNCE; purpoſing by the way as he went to terrifie the diſſembling Biſhop, ſo if it were poſſible to draw him from the league, and afterwards to deale with Sforti a and the reſt as he might. But when he was come neere vnto ROME, the Biſhop for K feare fled out of the citie to PERVSIVM, intending from thence to haue fled to VENICE, if the French king ſhould haue further purſued him. Charles deceiued of his purpoſe, in peaceable manner entered the citie, and there ſtayed three daies and ſo depar ted; vſing violence againſt none, but againſt ſuch as were well knowne to be of the Aragonian faction. From ROME he marched to PISA, and ſo with much paine paſſing the Appenines, was at the riuer of Tarrus, not farre from PARMA, ſet vpon by Franciſcus Gonzaga duke of MANTVA, generall of a great armie which the Venetians and Sforti a had raiſed vpon the ſudden to haue ſtopped his paſſage:
in which battaile he was in great danger to haue beene taken or ſlaine, and there loſt his tents, with all the rich ſpoile gotten in the rich kingdome of NAPLES: yet hauing at length with great ſlaughter valiantly repulſed his enemies, he afterwards returned in ſafetie home. L

Ferdinand recouereth his kingdome of Naples from the French, and dieth.

About the ſame time that this battell was fought at Tarrus, the yong king Ferdinand, lately driuen out of his kingdome by the French king, returned againe out of CICILIA to NAPLES:
where he was ioyfully receiued of the Neapolitanes, and by the helpe of his friends (but eſpecially of the great Conſaluus, ſent in his aid by Ferdinand king of SPAINE) in leſſe than a yeares ſpace recouered the kingdome of NAPLES againe from the French: and then dying without iſſue, left the ſame vnto his vncle Federicus: wherein the vncetainetie of worldly honours, the cheefe felicitie of ambitious minds, is well to be noted; when as in that one kingdome the cheefe gouernment was ſix times changed in leſſe than the ſpace of three yeares. For firſt Ferdinand the elder dying, left that kingdome vnto his ſonne Alphonſus, at ſuch time as the French king was making preparation for theſe warres: Alphonſus deſpairing of his owne forces, reſigned the M kingdome to his ſonne Ferdinand, when he had ſcarcely raigned fully a yeare: Ferdinand in leſſe than three moneths was driuen quite out of ITALIE by Charles the French king: Charles poſ-ſeſſed of the kingdome, in ſhort time after was againe diſpoſſeſſed by the ſame Ferdinand: Ferdinand hauing with much trouble thruſt out the French, died within leſſe than a yeare: After whom ſucceeded Federicus his vncle, no leſſe vnfortunate than the reſt. And Charles the French king

A king himſelfe liued not long after, but dyed ſuddainly as he came from playing at Tenniſe, being then but ſeuen and twentie yeres old, leauing the floriſhing kingdome of FRANCE, with the troubleſome title pretended to the kingdome of NAPLES, vnto Lewes his ſucceſſour, who liued with great trouble to conquer the ſame, and with greater griefe to looſe it againe. The death of Charles the French king. 1496

But to returne againe to the courſe of our hiſtorie, from whence the great occurrents of that time (not altogether impertinent to our purpoſe) haue a little to farre led vs. Baiazet deliuered of two great feares, firſt by the death of his brother Zemes, and after by the caſting out of the French out of NAPLES; began now to turne his forces vpon the Chriſtians, and by his lieutenant Bali-beg, Sanzacke of SILISTRA, inuaded the countries of PODOLIA and RVSSIA, being B part of the Polonian kingdome, where the Turks did great harme, and carried away many priſoners. But comming againe the ſecond time, and making ſuch like ſpoile as before, they ſtayed ſo long, that the cold of the Winter (which in thoſe countries is verie extreame) was now come on: and in their returne, as they were about to haue paſſed through MOLDAVIA, they were by Stephanus, prince of that countrie, denied both paſſage and victuals, and forced to take the way alongſt the ſea coaſt: where many of them ſtragling from their armie, were by the way cut off and ſlaine by the Moldauians; and the reſt, what by the extremitie of the cold; what for want of food, and foulenеſſe of the way, periſhed: ſo that of that great armie verie few returned home. The Turks hiſtories report, That in this expedition were loſt fortie thouſand Turkes. 1497 The Turke inuade Podolia & Ruſſia, and in their returne are for moſt part loſt.

C He ſent alſo Cadumes one of his Baſſaes into ILLIRIA; who ſpoyling that countrie, with a part of CROATIA, was encountred by nine thouſand Croatians and Hungarians neere vnto the riuer Moraua, vnder the leading of countie Bernard Francopaine: where after a cruell and bloudie fight, the Chriſtians were put to the worſe, and aboue ſeuen thouſand of them ſlaine; the reſt ſaued themſelues by flight through the mountaines and woods. Of the Chriſtians that were loſt, manie were drowned in Moraua, chuſing rather ſo to end their daies than to fall into the hands of their cruell enemies. This ouerthrow was imputed to the Generall, who would needs giue the Turkes battell in plaine field, although he was earneſtly intreated by countie Io. Torquatus to haue kept the ſtraits of that countrie, whereby he might haue had great aduantage of the enemie. Torquatus himſelfe hauing loſt all his horſemen in that battell, and his horſe killed D vnder him, fought valiantly on foot, vntill hee was by the multitude of his enemies oppreſſed and ſlaine. The Baſſa to giue Baiazet a ſure teſtimonie of the victorie, cauſed all the noſes of the ſlaine Chriſtians to be cut off and put vpon ſtrings, and ſo by wagon ſent them as a barbarous preſent to CONSTANTINOPLE. After the death of Charles the French king, Lewes the twelfth of that name hauing obtained that kingdome, writ himſelfe alſo duke of MILLAN, as diſcended of one of the daughters of Io. Galeatius firſt duke of MILLAN: in which his ſuppoſed right he was fully reſolued to make warre vpon Sforția then duke of MILLAN. And for his better ſucceſſe in thoſe warres, ſought by all meanes he could, to draw ſome other of the princes and ſtates of ITALIE into the fellowſhip of that intended warre; but aboue all others the Venetians, as moſt commodious for his purpoſe, with whom he made a firme league; and for the aide E they were to giue him, couenanted that they ſhould haue for their ſhare, the citie of CREMONA, with all the pleaſant countrey about ADDVA, then part of Sforția his dominion: which was afterwards accordingly performed.

Sforția vnderſtanding of this compact made againſt him, and knowing himſelfe farre too weake of himſelfe to ſtand againſt ſo puiſſant enemies; attempted firſt to ſet Maximilian the emperour, with the ſtates of GERMANIE vpon the French king: But that not ſorting to his deſire, he ſought to agree with the king by offering to hold his dukedome of him, by paying him a yearely tribute. After he had thus in vaine proued all the meanes he could deuiſe to haue appeaſed the French king, & prouided for his own ſaftie; he by his embaſſadors ſent of purpoſe, 1498 certified Baiazet of the confederation betwixt the French king and the Venetians, and that their F purpoſe was, after they had oppreſſed him, and ſome other of the ſtates of ITALIE, then with their vnited forces to inuade his dominions: and that therfore it were good for him in time to looke vnto it, and to giue aide againſt thoſe which would in ſhort time become his moſt dangerous enemies. By this meanes the Duke was in good hope, ſo to buſie the Venetians by bringing the Turke vpon them, as that they ſhould ſtand the French in ſmall ſtead. At which time alſo the embaſſadors of FLORENCE did what they could to pricke forward the Turke to make warres vpon the Venetians; for the malice they bare against them for protecting them of PISA G against the oppression of the Florentines.

Baiazet perſuaded by the embaſſadors, and calling to remembrance the iniuries before done him by the Venetians; firſt in giuing aid to Iohn Caſtriot the ſonne of Scanderbeg, and Iohn Cher-nouich another prince of EPIRVS (whereby he loſt a great part of that countrey, and was alſo farther inforced to yeeld to ſuch conditions as altogither ſtood not with his honour,) and againe by denying to giue his fleet leaue to put into their harbours in CYPRVS, in the time of his warres againſt the Sultan of ÆGIPT: all which he was glad then to endure, for feare leaſt that his brother Zemes (then liuing) ſhould by their means be ſet vp againſt him; promiſed now to do what the embaſſadors had requeſted: glad in his mind that the diſcord of the Chriſtian princes had preſented vnto him ſo fit an opportunitie of reuenge. H

1499 Hereupon he made great preparation both by ſea and land againſt the Venetians, and vpon the ſudden cauſed Scander Baſſa (his lieutenant in ILLYRIA) with twelue thouſand horſe to break into the countrie of FRIVLI, part of the Venetian territorie vpon the frontires of ITALIE. The Baſſa as he had in charge, paſſing ouer diuers great riuers, at length entred the countrie, burning and deſtroying all before him as farre as LIQVENTIA, carrying away with him all the poore countrie people priſoners. But when he was come to the banks of TILIAVENTVM, and vnderſtood that he came too late to pleaſure the duke of MILLAN (for why, the French with the Venetians had before without reſiſtance driuen him quite out of ITALIE and GERMANIE) he there, with more than barbarous crueltie put foure thouſand poore priſoners to the ſword: and ſo hauing filled the countrey with mourning and with bloud, returned from whence he came, loaded with the ſpoile of that rich countrie. I

Friuly part of the Venetian territorie ſpoyled by the Turks

At the ſame time alſo, Baiazet put to ſea ſuch a fleet as none of his predeceſſors had before ſet forth; and with a great armie in perſon himſelfe marched alongſt the ſea coaſt of MOREA, in ſuch ſort, as that his armie by land and his fleet at ſea (as neere as they could) kept euen pace, the one within ſight of the other. Neither were the Venetians vnmindfull of themſelues, but ſet forth a ſtrong fleet vnder the charge of Anthonie Grimani their Admirall; in number farre inferiour to the Turkes, but for equipage, ſtrength, skilfull marriners, and all other maner of warlike prouiſion, much ſuperiour. For which cauſe the Turkes, although defied and braued by the Venetians, yet durſt not at the firſt ioyne with them in battell; but ſtill crept alongſt the coaſt of MOREA, not daring to put farther off into the ſea. In this their courſe, the Venetians troubled K them exceedingly, ſomtimes making ſhew as if they would haue conſtrained them to fight, and otherwhiles giuing them chaſe, neuer departing far from them; wiſely accounting it right good ſeruice, if they could but keepe that hugie fleet from landing in ITALIE, or other place of the Venetian territorie. Moſt men were in good hope, that if thoſe great fleets ſhould haue ioyned in battell, the Venetians ſhould haue had a notable victorie; for that the enemie as afraid, kept ſo dangerous a courſe and ſo neere the maine. The longer they thus ſayled, the more was the ſtate of VENICE offended with their Admirall, that he contrarie to all expectation delaied to fight, and ſtill ſuffered the dangerous enemie to approach neerer and neerer their territories: and there were none which had not rather he ſhould haue ſet all vpon the hazard of one battel, than to protract by delay a long and doubtfull warre. Whileſt all mens minds were thus in ex- L pectation of ſome great exploit to be done vpon the enemie, newes came to the citie, That the Turkes fleet had put into the hauen SAPIENTIA in the Iſland SPHRAGA, to water, and was there embayed by the Venetians. This report was of moſt men ioyfully receiued, as if the victorie had been alreadie aſſured: and ſo much the more, for that it was vainly ſuppoſed, that it would be gained without any great loſſe. But others which better knew the place, deemed of the matter farre otherwiſe, ſaying, That the place wherein the enemie lay was ſuch, as that he might ſafely at his pleaſure depart thence. Yet forſomuch as the Turkes fleet was more ſubiect vnto danger in putting out of the harbour than in the wide ſea, there was no man but was of opinion, That the Venetian Admirall would ſet vpon them as they ſhould come forth againe. Whileſt men were thus diuining too and fro, and the Venetians attended the comming forth of the ene- M mies fleet, it fortuned that Andreas Lauredanus, and Albanus Armerius (two valiant gentlemen) but a little before come from CORCYRA of purpoſe to be preſente at the battell, were the firſt that began the fight; and with their two nimble ſhips (after they had changed a few bullets) boorded a tall ſhip of the Turkes, being of ſuch beautie and burthen that ſhe ſeemed rather a ca-

Fight at ſea betwixt the Turks and the Venetians.

ſtle

A ſtle than a ſhip, whereof one Barach of SMYRNA (a notable pirat) was captaine: who after a long and cruell fight, perceiuing that he muſt either yeeld or by force be taken, deſperately ſet fire on his owne ſhip, by rage whereof both ſhe and the Venetian ſhips faſt grapled vnto her, were all three together burnt down to the water: many of the men (to ſhun the violence of the fire) leapt ouer boord into the ſea, where ſome of them were taken vp by other ſhips, and ſome perilled. Some few other of the Venetian fleet couragiouſly aſſailed the Turkes at their comming out; and doing great harme, put the Turkes whole fleet in no ſmall feare. But the moſt part of the Venetian gallies lay looking on a farre off; vnto whom the other before in fight with the Turks after they had done what they could, retired alſo. But by that they had done, it appeared plain-
B ly that the Venetian Admirall that day let ſlip out of his hands a moſt notable victorie, if he as a reſolute man had with his whole fleet charged the enemie.

After this fight the Turkes held on their courſe, ſtill keeping MOREA on the right hand, whom the Venetians ſtill followed: at length the Turkes fleet was come to the entrance of the gulfe of PATRVS, where the Venetians againe faintly ſetting vpon them, ſuffered them to recouer the gulfe; with no leſſe diſhonour than they had before let them eſcape at the port SAPIENTIA. For the Venetians, hauing the aduantage of the place, and better appointed for fight at ſea, might eaſily (as it was ſuppoſed) haue gained the victorie, if the commanders (but eſpecially the Admirall) had bin ſo forward in the ſeruice as became men of their place. But many of them afraid to fight, lay aloofe; ſo that Dauthes the Turks Admiral (who perceiuing himſelfe too weak,
C had purpoſed to haue run his gallies on ſhoare, and ſo to haue fled to the armie at land if he had felt himſelfe ouercharged by the Venetian fleet) had now contrary to his expectation recouered the gulfe he deſired, though not without loſſe of ſome of his gallies. Within this gulfe ſtandeth the ancient citie of NAVPACTVM (now called LEPANTO) then ſubiect to the Venetians, whi- Lepanto yeelded to the Turkes. ther Baiazet was then come by land with his armie; and now by the comming of his fleet into the gulfe, laid hard ſiege vnto the citie both by ſea and land. They of the citie ſeeing themſelues on euerie ſide beſet with their enemies, without any great reſiſtance fell to compoſition with Baiazet, and ſo yeelded vnto him the citie, which the Turkes hold at this day.

Grimanus the Venetian Admirall returning to Venice, was for his euill ſeruice (or rather for that he according to his mild nature had not vſed ſeueritie againſt ſuch captaines as refuſed to D fight) caſt into priſon: and although he was a man mightily friended, yet was he by a publicke decree baniſhed into one of the Abſytides Iſlands, vpon the coaſt of LIBVRNIA. From the firſt foundation of the citie of VENICE was neuer man impugned with more ſpight, or defended by greater friends: but common hatred preuailing, he was neuertheleſſe exiled. Thus Baiazet hauing made a road into the Venetian territorie by Scander Baſſa, and taken from them the citie of NAVPACTVM with the countrie thereabout, returned with victorie to CONSTANTINOPLE.

The next yeare following, which was the yeare 1500, Baiazet put to ſea a greater and ſtron- 1500 ger fleet than he had the yeare before: and himſelfe in perſon, with a puiſſant armie of an hun- Methone beſieged both by ſea and land by Baiazet.
dred and fiftie thouſand men entred by the ſtrait of CORINTH into PELOPONESVS, and mar-E ching through the countrie came and encamped before the ſtrong citie of METHONE (now called MODON) then vnder the gouernment of the Venetians. At which time his great fleet met him there alſo by ſea, as he had before appointed. When he had thus beſet the citie both by ſea and land, and with long and continuall batterie made three great and faire breaches in the wals, he gaue vnto the ſame two terrible aſſaults, and that with ſuch deſperate furie that many of them which went formoſt vnto the breach, ouerthrown by the preſſe of them which followed, were troden to death. Yet neuertheleſſe the citie was both times valiantly defended by the citizens and garriſon ſouldiors: ſo that when he had done what he could, he was glad to retire from the wals, hauing filled the towne ditches with the bodies of his ſlaine Turkes. The Venetian Admirall Triuiſanus lying at the iſle of ZACYNTHVS (but far too weake to fight with the ene-
F mie) in the beginning of the ſiege ſent Valerius Marcellus and Baptiſta Polanus, with two galliſſes full of men and munition in relieſe of the beſieged: and now doubting their farther wants, ſent Io. Maripetrus, Alex. Cothius of CORCYRA, and Cachuris of HYDRVNTVM, with three other great gallies, with men, munition, and ſuch other things as he thought needfull for the defence of the citie. Theſe three reſolute captaines comming with a full wind, and packing on all their ſailes, brake through the Turks fleet lying in their way, & ran themſelues a ground vnder

the wals of the towne: for they of the towne had ſo barred the hauen for feare of the enemie, G that they could not that way poſſibly get in. The citizens and ſouldiors ioyfull of the comming of this freſh ſupplie, and withall fearing leaſt the gallies ſhould be ſet off againe from them by the enemie, came running by heapes from all parts of the citie towards the ſea, to receiue this new come aide: which was done with ſuch a confuſed diſorder, that diuers places of the citie towards the land, were left without defendants, as if there had been no enemie neere. Which the Ianizaries quickly perceiuing, preſently entred by thoſe forſaken places with little or no reſiſtance. Then the citizens all too late began to make head: for the Ianizaries alreadie entered, Methone taken by the Turks. made way for the reſt of the armie; which ſwarming into the citie, flew without pitie all that came in the way, as well Grecians as Venetians, with all the ſouldiours but euen then newly H landed out of the three gallies. In this ſlaughter Anthonius Fabritius and Bardella, gouernours of the towne, with Andreas Falco, biſhop of METHONE, in his pontificalibus and his mytre on his head, were ſlaine: none eſcaped the furie, but ſuch as were for their ſtrength reſerued for ſeruile labour, or for their beautie, to the victors luſt: and of theſe a thouſand bound faſt together in long ropes were brought to Baiazets pauillion, and there in his ſight by his commandement cruelly murdered. The cities of CORONE and PYLVS, now called NAVARRINVM) Corone, Pylus, and Criſſeum yeelded to the Turks. ſometime the dwelling place of old Neſtor, terrified with the taking of METHONE, yeelded themſelues by compoſition to Baiazet. This citie of CRISSEVM, now knowne by the name of Caput S. Galli, was taken alſo by Cherſeogles, Baiazet his ſonne in law. All theſe were cities belonging to the Venetians. NAVPLIVM was alſo beſieged by Haly Baſſa, but yet ſtill defended I by the Venetians. Baiazet hauing new fortified the citie of METHONE, and ſtored it with new inhabitants, left in it a ſtrong garriſon, and ſo with victorie returned to CONSTAN-TINOPLE.

1501 At this time Triuiſanus the Venetian Admirall died (of griefe of mind as ſome ſuppoſed) in whoſe place the Senate ſent Benedictus Piſaurius, a noble and valiant gentleman, who with the Venetian fleet followed the enemie, then departing from the ſiege of NAVPLIVM, purſuing them euen vnto the ſtraits of Helleſpontus, ſtill cutting off ſuch as ſtragled or tarried behind the reſt of the fleet: by which meanes he tooke aboue twentie of their ſhips and gallies, and in his returne tooke from the Turks the Iſland of ÆGINA, and landing in diuers places of the Turkes dominions, left vnto them the woful remembrance of his being there. Afterwards meeting with K Conſalnus, ſurnamed the Great (ſent by Ferdinand king of SPAINE, to aide him againſt the Cephalenia taken by the Venetians. Turkes) at ZACYNTHVS; he inuaded CEPHALENIA, which Triuiſanus his predeceſſour had in vaine attempted the yeare before, and laied hard ſiege to the citie, which was for a ſpace valiantly defended by the Turks: yet at length by the good conduct of Conſalnus it was by force taken, when as Giſdare the gouernour thereof, with his garriſon of Turkes, had before fought it out euen to the laſt man. The citie being taken, all the whole Iſland yeelded forthwith to the Venetians.

Piſaurius hauing taken CEPHALENIA, repaired the citie, and leauing a ſtrong garriſon for defence of the Iſle, departed to CORCYRA: where he was aduertiſed, That the Turkes were rigging forth a great fleet againſt the next Spring; wherof ſome part lay in the bay of AMBRACIA L not farre from CORCYRA, ſome at EANTE, and the reſt within the ſtraits of HELLESPONTVS.
Wherefore purpoſing to do ſome exploit vpon thoſe gallies which lay in the bay of AMBRA-CIA, to auert the mind of the enemie from perceiuing of that he had ſecretly with himſelfe intended, he ſent the greateſt part of his fleet vnto the Iſland of NERITOS, who ſuddainly landing, ſhould put the inhabitants in feare. The captaines ſent about the buſineſſe, cheerefully put in execution what the Admirall had commanded, and by their ſudden landing raiſed ſuch a tumult, that all the countries thereabout were filled with the expectation of that which ſhould enſue thereof. The Bay of AMBRACIA is ſo ſtraitened on either ſide with the mountaines of EPIRVS, that the entrance thereof is but halfe a mile ouer: but by and by opening it ſelfe into a great wideneſſe, and running vp into the land, maketh a moſt pleaſant & ſafe harbour for ſhips M and gallies to ride in. Piſaurius with a faire wind comming thither with eight gallies well appointed, when the Turkes thought him to haue beene at NERITOS, and entring the ſtrait, rowing farther into the bay, burnt one of the Turkes great gallies, to the terrour of all them that dwelt round about the bay, and carried away with him eleuen moe, laded with munition and victuall, through the ſtrait; the Turks in vaine fretting thereat, and doing what they could with their

A their great ordinance from shore to haue sunke him in going out of the bay. But hauing done what he came for, he returned with his prey againe to CORCYRA. Not long after he also recouered the castle of PYLOS in MOREA, which as it was suddainely gotten, so was it as suddainly lost. For Camalia, a notable pyrat of the Turkes, who had been abroad seeking after purchase, putting into that harbour by chance, tooke three gallies, there left by the Admiral for defence of the place, and so terrified the faint-hearted captaine, that he fell to composition with the pyrat to yeeld him the castle, so that he and his souldiours might in safetie depart: which the pyrat granting, had the castle deliuered vnto him, which he could not with farre greater strength haue possibly woon. So was PYLOS for feare twice in one yeare yeelded vp vnto the Turkes, and was both times the death of the cowardly captaines which gaue it vp, being both beheaded by the Pylos taken from the Turkes and again yeelded vnto them.

B commaundement of the Admirall. About the same time Pisaurius attempting to haue burnt other of the Turkes gallies lying in the riuer EANTE, vpon the coast of MACEDONIA, but not with so good successe as before: For the Turks, made more carefull by the losse they had but a little before receiued at AMBRACIA, did now more valiantly looke vnto their gallies. So that when Pisaurius had in certaine small vessels, made of purpose for that seruice, embarked two hundred resolute souldiours to haue gone vp the riuer to haue fired the gallies, they were by the way, after they had entered a good way into the riuer, encountered by the Turks, and enforced to returne. But before they could get out of the riuer, the wind rise so contrarie with such a stiffe gale full in the mouth of the riuer, that the marriners ouermastered with the violence of the weather, when they had done what they could, and spent all their strength, were driuen ashore,

C some on the one side of the riuer, and some on the other, and so fell into the hands of their enemies, of whom it booted not to craue mercie.

About this time Baiazet tooke also the auncient and famous citie of DIRRACHIVM, now called DVRAZO, from the Venetians; being before ruinous and almost quite abandoned by the inhabitants, as a place of danger, and not to be kept, now that the Turke had got all the country round about it. The Venetians sore pressed with these warres so long maintained against the Turke, had many times prayed aide of other Christian princes, and were well holpen by the Spaniard in the taking of CEPHALENIA: and now Lewes the French king vpon a good deuotion to that warre, sent the lord Rauesten with seuen tall ships and fifteene gallies well appointed out of PROVINCE and GENVA, to aid the Venetians his friends. This fleet departing from

Dyrrachium taken by the Turk

D NAPLES, where they had by the way put in, and passing about ITALIE, and so through the Ionian sea, came to MELOS, one of the CYCLADES; at which Island Pisaurius with his fleet in short time arriued also: from whence they by mutuall consent departed together to inuade the Island of LESBOS. And being there safely arriued, landed their forces, and layed siege vnto the strong citie of MYTILENE, where by the furie of their artillerie they in short time had made a faire breach in the wall. In the time of this batterie whilest the breach was in making, Pisaurius with part of his fleet sailed to TENEDOS, for it was reported, that certaine of the Turkes gallies were then comming for that place out of Hellespontus. Which report, as some write, was of purpose giuen out by the French, thereby to withdraw the Venetian Admirall from the siege, that so in the meane time they being in good hope to take the towne in his ab-

Mytilene besieged.

E sence, might themselues carrie away the honour thereof, together with the rich spoile. Others fauouring the French, blame the Venetian Admirall, as if he had of purpose departed, enuying at the honour of the French: which is hard to be belieued in so honourable a personage, and in an action so much concerning the good of his commanweale. Howsoeuer it was, the breach being made, in his absence was by the Frenchmen presently assaulted: although that Paulus Valatesius the Venetian vice-Admirall earnestly requested the French Admirall to deferre the assault for a while, and to expect the returne of Pisaurius. Which his counsell the French Admirall gaue him the hearing of, but yet went forward with the assualt. The French men after their manner furiously assailing the breach, , were valiantly repulsed by the Turkes: so that in the breach was made a deadly & most terrible fight, many falling on both sides. Yet for all that,

F the citie was manfully defended by the Turks, and the Frenchmen were inforced to retire. The French Admirall hauing taken this repulse, commaunded all things to be carried aboord, purposing to haue forsaken the siege, and so to haue departed: when in the meane time the Venetian Admirall returned, and with much adoe persuaded the French to stay. Whereupon the batterie was againe begun with greater furie than before, and now the leaders were consulting of a freſh aſſault to be giuen, when ſuddenly newes was brought, that the Turks fleet was comming G to relieue the citie: and therupon the aſſault was for a time deferred, and the battery continued.

But thoſe Turkes which came, being in number but few, were for moſt part by them in the gallies taken and caſt ouer boord; ſome few that got to land, ſaued themſelues in the woods and deſart places of the Iſle. By this time the citie was againe made faultable, & the Venetians with great courage aſſailed the breach, and had twice gained the top of the rampires, from whence they were againe both times beaten downe by the Turks, the French all the while looking on. Many valiant men were there ſlaine and hurt, and in the end the Venetians were glad with loſſe to retire, as had the French done before. Whileſt this was in doing, a pinnace came to the fleet with newes, that the Great Maſter of the RHODES was comming with his gallies to the ſiege: H
The ſiege of Mytilene broken vp whereupon the Admirals determined to maintaine the ſiege vntill his comming. But the next day after, the French Admirall changing his purpoſe ſhipped his men, and hoiſing ſaile departed to CHIOS: and ſailing thence towards ITALIE, was ouertaken with a moſt terrible tempeſt, wherein the Admirall gallie with two others were loſt with eight hundred good ſouldiours, the admiral himſelfe with aboue fortie others were by chance contrarie to all hope ſaued, and with much danger with his weather-beaten fleet recouered the hauen of TARENTVM. The Venetian Admirall thus forſaken of the French, and ſeeing the time paſt wherein he expected the comming of the Great Maſter of the RHODES, brake vp the ſiege, and departed from LESBOS to CHIOS, and from thence to PAROS, where he found the Maſter of the RHODES with his gallies; vnto whom he complained greatly of the inconſtancie of the French, imputing it vnto I them, that the citie of MYTILENE was not woon: neither were they behind with him, but in 1502 euery place where they came, laid the fault as much or more vpon him. From PAROS the Venetian Admirall tooke his courſe to the Iſland of MELOS; where hee found one Rhichius, an arch pyrate of the Turkes, who by force of tempeſt was driuen on ſhore, and by the ſuddaine comming downe of the Iſland people, taken: him (for that he had exerciſed exceeding cruelty vpon certaine Chriſtians whom he had taken) Piſaurius cauſed to be faſt bound to a ſpit, and with a ſmall fire to be roſted to death. From MELOS he returned to CORCYRA, and there wintered.

The next Spring Piſaurius with certaine gallies which Alexander biſhop of ROME had ſent vnto him vnder the commaund of Iacobus Piſaurius biſhop of PAPHIA, ſailed to NERITOS, K now called S. MAVRA, which is an Iſland parted from the firme land with a little fret of the ſea, long time before that way let in by the Corinthians. Here Piſaurius ſuddenly landing his Neritos taken by the Venetians. men, ſurpriſed the Iſland, and with wonderfull celeritie and induſtrie caſt vp two great trenches in ſuch ſort and to ſo good purpoſe, that three thouſand of the Turkes horſemen comming at a low water ouer that narrow ſtrait which parteth the Iſland from the maine, were with loſſe repulſed, and forced to retire. Whereupon S. MAVRA the chiefe citie was forthwith deliuered vnto Piſaurius, with the reſt of the Iſland.

The Venetians wearie of this long and chargeable warre againſt ſo mightie an enemie, ſent Lodouicus Manetius their embaſſadour, to Baiazet, to entreat with him for peace: but Baiazet ſtood vpon ſuch hard points, that nothing could at that time be concluded: yet Manetius ſo L diſcreetly vſed the matter, that Baiazet ſent with him at his returne to VENICE, his embaſſadour, to propound vnto the Senat ſuch conditions as it pleaſed him to graunt them peace vpon. This embaſſadour had audience in the Senat twice, where he in the name of his maſter propounded ſuch proud and vnreaſonable conditions, that they were by the Senat reiected, and ſo he himſelfe diſmiſſed and ſent backe againe.

1503 The yeare following the Venetians ſent an embaſſadour to Baiazet, who mooued with the pittifull complaints of his own ſubiects, for the daily harmes they receiued from the Venetians alongſt the ſea coaſt, as alſo for want of trade; and fearing alſo ſome troubles like to ariſe in his kingdome in ASIA (as indeed there did not long after) yeelded himſelfe now more willing to heare of peace, than before. This embaſſadour called Zacharias Phriſcus, was well heard of Ba- M iazet, and after long ſute had brought the matter he came for into ſome good tearmes: and being honourably rewarded by the Turkiſh emperour, returned home, carrying with him vnto the Senate far more reaſonable conditions of peace than had at any time before been by Baiazet propounded. Hereupon the Venetians ſhortly after ſent Andreas Gritti (an honourable Senatour) a man well knowne to Baiazet both for his famous traffique in former time at CONSTANTINOPLE,

A STANTINOPLE, and alſo for that in theſe late warres he was taken priſoner at the winning of METHONE, and his life ſpared at the interceſſion of Cherſeogles (Baiazet his ſonne in law) and afterward raunſomed: he in the name of the ſtate from whence he came, concluded a peace with Baiazet. The capitulations whereof were, firſt that the Venetians ſhould deliuer vp the iſlands of NERITOS & LEVCADIA, reſeruing vnto themſelues the iſland of Cephalenia only: Then, that Baiazet ſhould reſtore all ſuch goods as had beene taken from the Venetian merchants, in theſe late warres; and that it ſhould be lawfull for them (as they were wont) ſafely to traficke into the Euxine ſea, and to CONSTANTINOPLE; and there to haue their Conſull or gouernour as they had had in former time: And laſt of all, that the Venetian territorie ſhould be cer-
B tainly knowne, and ſeparated from the Turkes by certaine bounds and limits. Theſe conditions were ſolemnly agreed vpon, and confirmed both by Baiazet and the ſtate of VENICE: and ſo a firme peace concluded in the yeare 1503, after the warres had continued betwixt them about the ſpace of fiue yeares.

A peace concluded betwixt Baiazet and the Venetians.

The ſame yeare Baiazet aſſembled a great and puiſſant army of his beſt and moſt approued ſouldiers, as well in ASIA as EVROPE, which met togither at SOPHIA, purpoſing (as it was thought) to haue inuaded HVNGARIE: but worthely doubting the ſucceſſe of that war againſt ſo warlike a nation, he changed his purpoſe, and leauing Achmetes Baſſa with his Aſian ſouldiers at SOPHIA, turned himſelfe with the reſt of his armie into ALBANTA (to reduce thoſe rebellious people againe to his obeiſance) and had before ſent a fleet of gallies to ſtop the paſſages of C that countrey alongſt the ſea coaſt. But the countrey people vnderſtanding of his comming, fled into the high and rough rocks and mountaines, from whence they did the Turkes great harme: who neuertheleſſe with incredible labour and aduenture, mounted thoſe difficult places; and killing an exceeding number of thoſe mountaine and ſauage people carried all the women and children they could light vpon, away with them priſoners: and with fire and ſword made al the countrey deſolate. After which ſpoile done, Baiazet returned with his armie to MANASTIRVM; and departing thence, vpon the way met with a Deruiſlar (which is a phantaſticall and beggarly kind of Turkiſh monks, vſing no other apparell but two ſheepskins, the one hanging before and the other behind) a luſtie ſtrong fat fellow, attired after the manner of his order with a great ring in each eare: who drawing neere vnto Baiazet, as if he would of him haue receiued
D an almes, deſperatly aſſailed him with a ſhort ſcimitar which he had cloſely conuaied vnder his hypocritall habit. But Baiazet by the ſtarting of the horſe whereon he rid (being afraid at the ſudden approach of the hobgoblin) partly auoided the deadly blow by the traitor entended, yet not altogither vnwounded: neither had he ſo eſcaped the danger, had not Iſhender Baſſa with his horſemans maſe preſently ſtruck downe the deſperat villaine as he was about to haue doubled his ſtroke; but being now ſtruck downe, he was forthwith rent in pieces by the ſouldiers. This treacherous and deſperat fact ſo much moued Baiazet, that he proſcribed all them of that ſuperſtitious order, and baniſhed them out of his empire.

Baiazet in danger to haue been ſlaine by a Deruiſlar or Turkiſh monke.

After ſo many troubles Baiazet gaue himſelfe vnto a quiet courſe of life, ſpending moſt part of his time in ſtudie of philoſophie, and conference with learned men: vnto which peaceable
E kind of life, he was of his owne naturall diſpoſition more enclined than to warres; albeit that the regard of his ſtate, and the earneſt deſire of his men of warre, drew him oftentimes euen againſt his will into the field. As for the ciuile gouernment of his kingdome, he referred it wholy vnto his three principall Baſſaes, Alis, Achmetes, and Iachia, who at their pleaſure diſpoſed of all things. After he had in this quiet and pleaſing kind of life to his great contentment paſſed ouer fiue yeares, of a little neglected ſparke ſuddenly aroſe ſuch a fire in ASIA, as was hardly after with much bloud of his people and danger of that part of his empire quenched: the reliques whereof yet troubleth thoſe ſuperſtitious people at this day. Which thing was brought to paſſe by the craftie deuiſe of Chaſan Chelife, and Schach Culi his boy (whom ſome call Teckel Scachoculis, and others Techellis) two hypocriticall Perſians: who flying into thoſe countries,
F and with the counterfeit ſhew of faigned holineſſe hauing procured vnto themſelues a great name amongſt thoſe rude people, with a number of windie headed followers (filled with the noueltie of their new doctrine) raiſed firſt ſuch a diuerſitie of opinions about the true ſucceſſours of their vntrue prophet; and afterwards ſuch a rebellion amongſt the people, as that the one yet remaineth, and the other was not in a good while after with great bloudſhed appeaſed.

Baiazet by nature peaceable.

But

But for the better vnderſtanding of the ground of theſe troubles, which hapned at this time G in the raigne of Baiazet by occaſion of theſe two fugitiue Perſians; as alſo of the mortall wars which afterwards enſued betwixt Hyſmael (commonly called the great Sophi of PERSIA) and Selymus, Baiazet his ſucceſſor: it ſhall not be much from our purpoſe briefely to declare the great mutation which at this time hapned in the Perſian kingdome, as well in the ſtate it ſelfe, as in matters of their ſuperſtition. At ſuch time as Aſymbeius Vſun-Caſſanes raigned in PERSIA, there was one Haider Erdebil (whom Iouius calleth by the name of Harduelles) a man honorably diſcended amongſt the Perſians; who contemning worldly honour, riches, pleaſure, and whatſoeuer elſe belonged vnto delicacie of life (commonly accounted the greateſt part of humane felicitie) as meere vanities and trifles, led ſuch a ſtraight and auſtere kind of life, with ſuch continencie and contempt of the world, as that the vulgar people, for moſt part giuen to pleaſure, H wondering at that in him which they could not or would not themſelues imitate, began to haue the man in ſingular admiration for the opinion they had conceiued of his vpright life and rare vertues. The fame of this new prophet (for ſo he was accounted) was growne ſo great in the Perſian kingdome, that people without number reſorted out of all parts of PERSIA and ARMENIA vnto the great citie of TAVRIS to ſee the man. And he the more to ſeduce the multitude (delighted with nouelties) began to inuay againſt the common receiued opinion of the Mahometanes, concerning the true ſucceſſours of their great prophet; and to reuiue the opinion of Giuni, ſurnamed Soſi: perſuading the people (as if he had been inſpired with ſome diuine inſpiration) That none of the profeſſors of the Mahometane religion ſhould inherit the kingdome of heauen after they were dead, but ſuch as were the followers of Haly, the true ſucceſſour of the I great prophet Mahomet, and his fellow in writing. Whom he taught them onely to honour as priuie to the mind of the great prophet, and ſo to receiue his writings as of all others moſt authenticall; reiecting Ebubekir, Omer, and Oſman, with their writings, as moſt wicked and accurſed men; whom the Turkes had euer, and yet doe with the others Mahometanes, honour and worſhip as the true ſucceſſours of their great prophet Mahomet, and his ſincere interpretors, togither with the aforeſaid Haly, whom the Perſians do onely acknowledge: and therefore in their praiers doe commonly ſay, Curſed be Ebubekir, Omer, and Oſman, and God be fauourable to Haly and well pleaſed with him. Which their difference about the true ſucceſſor of their prophet, in whom was no truth, hath been, and yet is, one of the greateſt cauſes of the mortall wars betweene the Turkes and Perſians: and not the diuers interpretation of their law (as many haue written) K which among the Turkes and Perſians is all one.

The Turks and Perſians differ not about the interpretation of their law, but about the true ſucceſſor of their great prophet Mahomet.

Vſun-Caſſanes mooued with the fame and vertues of this new prophet, or rather (as ſome thought) deſirous to win the hearts of the multitude of them that had receiued this new phantaſie; gaue him in mariage his daughter Martha, begotten of the Chriſtian ladie Deſpina the daughter of Calo Ioannes emperour of TRAPEZONDE. Which marriage the Chriſtian emperour made with that Mahometane prince, and he alſo accepted thereof, therby to ſtrengthen themſelues againſt the Turkiſh emperour Mahomet the Great; whoſe power was then become a terror vnto all his neighbour princes: but to how ſmall purpoſe this policie ſerued them both, is before declared in the life of the ſame Mahomet. At the concluſion of this marriage, the emperour had ſpecially couenanted with Vſun-Caſſanaes, that his daughter Deſpina might haue the L
the fre exerciſe of the Chriſtian religion. Whereby it eaſily came to paſſe, that this Martha her daughter, inſtructed by her mother, became a Chriſtian alſo: who now married by her father vnto this preciſe hypocrit Haider Erdebil, in ſhort time bare him a ſonne called Hyſmael, whom ſhe ſo much as ſhe could trained vp in the principles of the Chriſtian religion. Whereby it came to paſſe, that afterwards when he had by rare fortune obtained the kingdome of PERSIA, he alwaies during his life had the Chriſtians in good regard, and neuer found fault with their religion.

Haider thus graced with the marriage of the great kings daughter Martha, only for his rare vertues and puritie of life, as was commonly ſuppoſed; grew now into farre greater credit and eſtimation of the people than before. So that his doctrine and opinions began to be generally M receiued, and the number of his followers ſo greatly augmented, that Iacup ſucceeding his father Vſun-Caſſanes but lately dead, began to haue the power and credit of Haider his brother in law in ſuſpect; and to diſtruſt leaſt the Perſians (who ſecretly fauoured the remainder of the poſteritie of their auncient kings) ſhould aſſemble togither vnder the colour of this new ſuperſtition,

and

A and raiſe ſome dangerous rebellion before he were well ſetled in his ſeat. For he was not ignorant, that Aſembeius Vſun-Caſſanes (his father) had but by force and pollicie vſurped the kingdome, hauing killed Molonchres the lawfull king: whereof there aroſe two factions, ſome fauouring the vſurper, and other ſome the poore remainder of the diſcent of their auncient kings of the race of Tamerlane. For which cauſes Iacup (as hee was of a ſuſpitious and troubleſome nature, and aboue meaſure iealous of his ſtate, nothing regarding the neere alliance or reputed holineſſe of his godly brother in law) cauſed him, ſuſpecting no ſuch matter, to be ſecretly murthered: and ſo hauing ſtrucke off his head, with fire and ſword perſecuted all the profeſſors of that new doctrine; ſo to deliuer himſelfe for euer of that his vaine and needleſſe feare: Hyſmael B the ſonne of Haider (who was afterwards called the great Sophi of PERSIA) being then but a child, as it were by fatall deſtinie eſcaped the furie of his cruell vncle Iacup, and fled into HIRCANIA vnto one Pyrchales his fathers friend, who then ruled in a ſmall territorie neere vnto the Caſpian ſea.

Haider Ardebil ſecretly murdred.

Amongſt many other of the diſciples and followers of Haider (which in that cruell perſecution were glad to flie for ſafegard of their liues) the two before named Chaſan Sheliſe, and Schach Culi, afterwards ſurnamed Cuſelbas, in outward ſhew both of vertue and learning not inferiour vnto their maſter, flying that dangerous tempeſt and paſſing ouer the riuer Euphrates, came into ARMENIA the leſſer, and there tooke vp their dwelling at the great mountaine ANTITAVRVS: at the foot whereof the broken rockes haue diuers darke and obſcure caues, made partly C by art, and partly by nature; which place is of the inhabitants called Teke-Ili: whereof diuers hiſtoriographers, I know not whether deceiued by the name of the place, or elſe wittingly tranſferring the name of the place vnto the man that liued therein, haue called this Schach Culi (who of the two proued of greater fame) by the name of Techellis, by which name we will alſo from henceforth call him. A thing heeretofore much vſed amongſt the religious, and alſo ſome of the children of great princes, who oftentimes bare the names of the places where they were borne, or where they moſt liued. This place is both wholſome and exceeding pleaſant, for the varietie of fruits and liuely ſprings, wherewith the plaines adioyning are continually watered, and the mountains at all times of the yeare garniſhed.

Here Shelife with his companion Techellis, hauing ſeparated themſelues farre from the com- D panie of men, and giuen themſelues wholy to a contemplatiue life for diuers yeares liued moſt ſtraitly and auſterely, contenting themſelues with ſuch things as the earth of it ſelfe affoorded them, without ſeeking for better. Theſe hipocrits were firſt ſeene, and afterwards acquainted with the ſheepheards and heardſmen liuing vpon the mountaines: and in proceſſe of time with the rude husbandmen and countrey people, who wondring at their ſtrait and deuout kind of life, relieued them with all things neceſſarie. Yea Baiazet himſelfe hearing of their auſtere and deuout manner of liuing, ſent them yearely ſixe or ſeuen thouſand aſpers, as his almes giuen them vpon charitie and deuotion. But afterwards when they began to tell fortunes, and as it were by the way of diuination to prognoſticat of things to come, the rurall people held them for more than men, and conceiued of them a firme opinion that they were ſome diuine pro- E phets. And ſo were by the countrey people firſt drawne into the countrey villages, and afterwards as if it had been againſt their wils, into the cities; where they had in ſhort time filled all the countrey farre and neere, with the admiration of their fame: But after they began to publiſh their new phantaſied doctrine concerning the true ſucceſſour of their great prophet Mahomet, they wanted not their new fangled followers (as had Haider their maſter before among the Perſians) who had them in ſingular reuerence; perſuaded now by them, that they ſhould be condemned for euer, if they did not (as they were by them taught) giue the honour of the true ſucceſſion of their great prophet, onely to Hali, and him onely to reuerence and call vpon next vnto the great prophet himſelfe.

When they had thus with their often ſermons and blinded prophecies ſeduced the people, F and in ſhort time woon great credit amongſt the vulgar ſort, of themſelues too much giuen to noueltie and ſuperſtition; they commanded their diſciples and followers to weare vpon their Turkiſh hats a red band or riband, whereby to be knowne from others that were not of their profeſſion. Of which red bands or ribands, they which profeſſed this new ſuperſtition, were and yet are ouer all the Eaſt part of the world called by the name of Cuſelbaſſas, which is to ſay Red heads.

The beginning of the Cuſelbaſſas.

Hyſmaell

Hyſmaell his behauiour in the time of his exile.

Hyſmaell alſo liuing in exile, moſt earneſtly embraced that new ſuperſtition which Haider his G father had before taught in PERSIA, but with farre better fortune and ſucceſſe. For as ſoone as he was growne to mans eſtate, he following his fathers manner of life, and being by nature wonderfull eloquent, comely of perſon, exceeding wiſe, and of an inuincible courage, was of the rude vulgar people accounted of more like a god than a man: ſo that he grew to be of great fame and power amongſt thoſe barbarous people with whom he liued. And not the baſe and vulgar ſort only, but diuers noblemen alſo and others of good reputation, once allured with the noueltie of his doctrine, the more to manifeſt their good will towards the author of their ſect; after they had forſaken their old ſuperſtition, ceaſed not (as the manner of men is) to commend him in the higheſt degree of vertue and honour. And he himſelfe as yet but a youth, altogether bending his wit to the ſetting forth of himſelfe, making ſemblant of more than was indeed in him, obtained, H as if it had been againſt his will, riches, honour, fame, and authoritie; of all which things, he as a notable diſſembler ſeemed to make no account or reckoning: neither were there ſome wanting which would ſweare, that Haider his father (as he was an excellent Aſtronomer) calculating his natiuitie, ſhould ſay, That he ſhould prooue a great prophet, and the author of true religion, who ſubduing the greateſt part of the Eaſt, ſhould become as glorious both in matters of religion and martiall affaires, as was Mahomet the Great prophet himſelfe. Which report being bruted abroad amongſt the vulgar people, greatly encreaſed his authoritie, and gaue them occaſion to talke of wonders. Not long after Hyſmaell was firſt by the admiration or rather aſſentation of his friends and followers, and afterwards as if it had beene by a generall conſent, ſurnamed Sophor: which amongſt thoſe people ſignifieth a Wiſe man, or the interpreter of the gods. I Theſe proſperous beginnings, with the troubled ſtate of the Perſian kingdome, encouraged him to take in hand great matters: for his vncle Iacup the Perſian king was long before dead, being together with his ſonne poyſoned by his adulterous wife: which thing he preſently perceiuing, enforced her to drinke of the ſame cup; and becauſe he would be ſure that ſhe ſhould not eſcape, with his owne hand ſtrucke off her head, and immediately after died, with his ſonne. After whoſe death great trobles aroſe about the ſucceſſion: and diuers great men one after another aſpired to the kingdome, which they enioyed not long. And amongſt the reſt Eluan-beg (whom Ionitus calleth Aluantes) at that time ſtood in no ſure poſſeſſion of the kingdome, being mightily impugned by his brother Moratchamus.

Hyſmaell returneth into Armenia, and recouereth his inheritance.

Hyſmaell taking hold of this opportunitie, armed diuers of the moſt able men of his follow- K ers, and receiuing ſome ſmall aid from his poore old friend Pyrchales, entered into ARMENIA, and there partly by the fame that ran of him, and partly by the good will of the people, rather than by any force, recouered his fathers inheritance, whereunto the remembrance of his dead father did not a little further him. He encouraged with this good beginning, daily grew ſtronger and ſtronger, by the continuall repairing vnto him of ſuch as hauing once receiued the doctrine of Haider, were glad of long for (feare of perſecution) to diſſemble the ſame: but now hauing got an head and cheefetaine to cleaue vnto, began openly to ſhew themſelues againe, and in great number to reſort vnto him, in hope of the good ſucceſſe of their religion, not ſo happely begun by his father.

Sumachia taken by Hyſmaell.

His power thus daily encreaſing beyond his expectation, he laied ſiege vnto SVMACHIA, a L citie in the confines of MEDIA, which he tooke by force and ſacked: and with the ſpoile thereof both enriched and armed his ſouldiers, which before were for moſt part naked men. The taking of this citie wonderfully encreaſed both his fame and courage, as oftentimes it falleth out, That haughtie minds, courageouſly attempting high exploits, by the good euent of their firſt attempts make way vnto the full of their ſtately deſires. So after this, Hyſmaell his thoughts were not ſo low, as to thinke of the taking of this or that litle citie; but how he might now compaſſe the great citie of TAVRIS, the very ſeat of the Perſian kings, and afterwards the kingdome it ſelfe. Whereupon repoſing no leſſe confidence in his owne good fortune, than the valour of his ſouldiers, he marched with his armie directly to the citie of TAVRIS, and that with ſuch expe- M dition, that he was come before it before any ſuch thing was feared, much leſſe prouided for. Eluan the Perſian king was then at TAVRIS, and had but a little before fought a great battaile with his brother Moratchamus for the kingdome: and hauing vanquiſhed him, draue him out of ARMENIA and PERSIA; and afterwards, as it commonly falleth out in the winding vp of ciuile warres, had cauſed diuers of the cheefe citizens of TAVRIS, which had taken part with his

A brother against him, to be seuerely executed, filling the eyes of their friends with the horrible spectacle of their dismembred bodies, and the hearts of most men with sorrow and heauinesse: whereby he had so alienated the minds of the citizens from him, that now vpon the approch of Hysmaell, they were all readie to forsake him: of which their disposition Hysmaell was beforehand enformed, and vpon the good hope thereof had hasted his comming. Eluan the Persian king thus ouertaken on the sudden, had not time to raise such forces as might suffice either to encounter his enemie, or defend the citie; wherefore despairing of his owne strength, and iustly fearing the reuolt and furie of the discontented citizens, as a man dismayed, suddenly fled out of the citie. After whose departure the gates were presently set open vnto Hysmaell. For the citizens which in those troublesome times (wherein the two brethren contended for the king-
B dome) had suffered great calamitie, chose rather in that present danger to receiue a conqueror of so great fame as was then Hysmaell, than to their vtter destruction to oppose themselues against him in the quarrell of their cruell king: and the rather, for that they saw a generall securitie and open way to preferment proposed vnto all such as should receiue the reformed religion of this new conquerour.

Hysmaell entering the citie, slew certaine of the kings guard which were not yet departed, and then vtterly rased the stately tombe wherein his vncle Iacup was after the manner of the Persian kings royally buried. And to mitigate the sorrow he had so long conceiued of his fathers death, and with reuenge to appease his angrie ghost, he caused the tyrants bones to be digged vp and scattered abroad, and the memoriall of his name to bee quite rased out of all places
C of the citie.

Hysmaell taketh the citie of Tauris, and defaceth the tombe of his vncle Iacup.

Although Hysmaell was thus possessed of the regall citie of TAVRIS, and had thereby made a way for the obtaining of the whole kingdome; yet he knew that so long as Eluan liued, his conquest was not vnto him assured: and therefore so the vttermost of his power he augmented his armie with new supplies taken vp in that populous citie, whom he furnished with armour & weapons taken out of the kings armourie. In the meane time newes was brought vnto him, that the Persian king before fled into the fartheſt part of his kingdome, was now comming from SCYRAS with a great armie against him; and that Moratchamus his brother, forgetting in this common danger all former quarrels, had raised a great armie about BABILON in ASSYRIA, in short time to ioine with his brother.

D Hysmaell neuertheless nothing terrified with the report of the great preparation of the two bretheren against him, to the intent he might seeme to vndertake this warre by the appointment of God, and vpon a greater assurance than vpon his owne strength, resolued to go against them. And so after he had mustered his armie, & in best manner he could prouided all things necessarie, he set forward from TAVRIS: vsing no other persuasion to encourage his soldiers, but that they should as became resolute men, make hast and follow him whom God had giuen them for a cheefetaine and leader, vnto a most assured victorie. The Persian king was at the same time ten dayes iourney from TAVRIS, when Hysmaell with incredible celeritie preuenting the fame of his comming, was come to the mountaine NIPHATES, which parteth ARMENIA from ASSYRIA: which mountaine Eluan purposing shortly to passe ouer with his populous armie, had sent be-
E fore his scouts to discouer the straight passages, and a multitude of pioners to make the wayes more commoditous for his great armie to passe. Which thing Hysmall vnderstanding, and politickely considering that it should be much for his aduantage, if he should first himselfe passe ouer those great mountaines, and so vpon the sudden set vpon his enemies then lying in securitie, and fearing nothing lesse than such a desperat attempt: vpon that resolution aduanced his ensignes vp the mountaines; and hauing with small resistance discomfited them which kept the passages, came downe the same mountaines like a tempest, and furiously assailed the king, then lying in his campe on the other side at the foot of the mountaine: vpon the approach of whom, such a hurly burly was raised in the kings camp, that what for the confused tumult of the souldiers, and fearefull outcries of the multitude of base people which followed the campe, the F king could scarcely giue order vnto his captains what he would haue done, or yet encourage his souldiers, or put them in order of battaile. So that Hysmaell giuing a fierce onset with his Armenian souldiers, there was suddenly begun a most terrible and bloodie battaile. Neither did that day the fortune of Hysmaell faile him, whose courage and proweſſe neuer failed: for assailing the kings battaile of footmen, with three squadrons at once, he had ouercome them and put them them to flight before that the horſemen could arme themſelues and mount their horſes, which were for moſt part vnſadled and vnbridled at his comming. The King, who had nothing either feared or foreſeene this ſo ſudden a miſchiefe, but had vainly perſwaded himſelfe, That the very fame of his comming with ſo huge an armie, would ſo terrifie his enemies, as that he ſhould find none either at TAVRIS, or in all ARMENIA, that durſt make reſiſtance; was glad now to run to and fro to encourage his ſouldiers, to ſtay his diſcomfited battailes, yea and to come to handie blowes himſelfe. But when neither his captaines nor ſouldiers could put in execution his ſudden directions which he was enforced to giue in that imminent danger, being at once ouercome with ſhame and deſperation, he reſolutely thruſt himſelfe into the head of his battaile, and there valiantly fighting, was ſlaine. Whereupon the Perſian horſemen, the greateſt ſtrength of the Kings armie, hauing now no King for whom they ſhould fight, betooke themſelues to flight, after whom followed the archers and all the reſt of the Kings armie.

Eluan the Perſian king ſlaine.

When as Hyſmaell had with leſſe loſſe than a man would haue thought ſo great a victorie could haue beene atchieued, poſſeſſed the enemies tents, he made no great purſute after them, for that he thought it more requiſit to refreſh his ſouldiers, throughly wearied and almoſt ſpent with long trauell and the late fight: wherefore for certaine dayes he repoſed himſelfe with his armie in thoſe his enemies forſaken tents. Afterwards, when he had receiued embaſſadours from diuers places, yeelding their cities and townes, and that the fauour of the people generally enclined to him, together with the victorie; he marched with his armie to SCYRAS, where he was of the citizens, who had before heard of the victorie, ioyfully receiued, and his armie relieued with all things he could deſire. Hyſmaell there entertained with the greateſt honours that the fearefull citizens could poſſibly attribute vnto him, did oftentimes preach vnto them of the truth and excellency of his fathers doctrine, and withall gaue out ſtraight proclamations, That he would account all them for his enemies, which did not within the ſpace of thirtie dayes renounce their old ſuperſtition, and receiue this new found veritie (as he would haue it.) Wherefore for as much as on the one ſide were propoſed moſt certain rewards, by the happy courſe of his victories; and on the other, was threatened exile and torture to ſuch as ſhould obſtinatly perſiſt in their opinion; in ſhort time he drew all the vulgar people to embrace his new doctrine. And afterwards hauing payed his ſouldiers with the riches of that great citie, he gallantly furniſhed both his old and new ſouldiers that wanted armour, with moſt excellent armour and furniture: for in that citie, one of the greateſt and moſt famous of the Eaſt, were many ſhops full of all kind of armour, which the armourers with wonderfull cunning vſed to make of yron and ſteele and the iuice of certaine hearbes, of much more notable temper & beautie than are thoſe which are made with vs in EVROPE; not onely headpeeces, curiaſſes, and complete armors, but whole capariſons for horſes, curiouſly made of thin plates of yron and ſteele. Departing from SCYRAS, he tooke alſo the great cities of SAPHA, ſuppoſed to haue been the citie in ancient time called SVSA, and SVLTANIA, which for the wonderfull ruines of the huge buildings, is deemed to haue beene the ancient and famous citie TIGRANOCERTA. Theſe great mattters quickly diſpatched, and hauing in euery citie placed gouernours of his owne ſect, he paſſed ouer the riuer of TIGRIS into MESOPOTAMIA, of purpoſe to expulſe Moratchamus the late kings brother out of BABILON, who was yet in armes, and had entended (as is before ſaid) to haue paſſed into ARMENIA, to haue ioyned his forces with the king his brother: but now terrified with his brothers calamitie (who together with a moſt puiſſant armie, and the ſtrength of the Perſian kingdome, was in one day fallen from the height of ſo great a fortune) thought it not beſt to trie his fortune in the field againſt ſo fortunate an enemie, but forthwith to withdraw himſelfe into the remoteſt places of that large kingdome, and from thence to expect ſome better fortune. For he well knew that he was not able to withſtand his victorious enemy, now leading after him a moſt puiſſant armie, who not long before had with a ſmall power vanquiſhed & ſlain his brother in a great battell. Hyſmaell now by the greatneſſe of his fame and forces, & as it were by the fauor of God himſelfe, become a terror to all the princes of the Eaſt, entered into MESOPOTAMIA after the flight of Moratchamus, & receiued all that great prouince into his ſubiection, euery man as it were ſtriuing who ſhould firſt by his ſpeedy ſubmiſſiõ purchaſe the fauor of the victorious conqueror. To be breefe, Moratchamus already terrified, and repoſing no great hope in himſelfe, or his own power, neither deeming it for his ſafetie to ſhut himſelf vp within the wals of any ſtrong citie, truſſed vp his things of greateſt price, and with his wiues and children fled into ARABIA.

Hyſmaell goeth againſt Moratchamus.

This

A This Moratchamus is he whom ſome hiſtoriographers called Mara Beg, and is in the Turkes hiſtories called Imirſa Beg, who (as they report) afterwards marrying the daughter of Baiazet, and recouering part of the Perſian kingdome, was ſodenly murthered by ſome of his nobilitie, whom he purpoſed ſecretly to haue put to death, if they had not preuented the ſame by murthering of him firſt. Hyſmaell hauing victorioully ſubdued a great part of the Perſian kingdome, and filled all the Eaſt part of the world with the glorie of his name, returned out of ASSYRIA into MEDIA, and tooke in ſuch cities and ſtrong holds as were yet holden by the garriſons of the late Perſian king. And afterwards returning into ARMENIA, made wars vpon the Albanians, Iberians, and Scythians, which dwell vpon the borders of the Caſpian: For that thoſe nations, in ancient times tributaries vnto the Perſian kings, taking the benefit of the long ciuile warres
B wherewith the kingdome of PERSIA and all the Eaſterne countries, with the ruine of the kings houſe, had bin of late turmoiled; had neither paied any tribute by the ſpace of foure yeres, nor ſent any honourable embaſſage as they were wont, and as was expected, eſpecially in ſo great a victorie and alteration of the ſtate.

Hyſmaell hauing thus obtained the Perſian kingdome, in ſhort time became famous through the world, and was iuſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt monarchs of that age. But nothing made him more to be ſpoken of, than the innouation he had made in the Mahometane ſuperſtition: for by his deuiſe and commaundement, a new forme of prayer was brought into their Mahometane temples, farre differing from that which had beene of long time before vſed. By reaſon whereof, Ebubekir, Homer, and Oſman, the ſucceſſours of their great prophet Mahomet,
C before had in great regard and reuerence, began now to be contemned, & their writings nothing regarded: and the honour of Hali exalted, as the true and only ſucceſſour of their great prophet. And becauſe he would haue his ſubiects and the followers of his doctrine knowne from the Turkes and other Mahometanes, he commanded that they ſhould all weare ſomered hatband, lace, or riband vpon their heads; which they religiouſly obſerue in PERSIA vntill this day: whereof they are of the Turkes called Cuſelbas or Redheads. And in ſhort time he had ſo vſed the matter, that he was wonderfully both beloued and reuerenced of his ſubiects: inſomuch that his ſayings were accounted for diuine oracles, and his commaundments for lawes. So that when they would confirme any thing by ſolemne oath, they would ſweare by the head of Hyſmaell the king: and when they wiſhed wel to any man, they vſually ſaid, Hyſmaell grant thee thy
D deſire. Vpon his coine which he made both of ſiluer and gold, on the one ſide was written theſe words, La illahe illalahu, Muhamedun reſul allahe: which is to ſay, There are no gods but one, and Mahomet is his meſſenger. And on the other ſide, Iſmaill halife lullahe; which is to ſay, Hyſmaell the Vicar of God.

Hyſmaell exceedingly beloued and honoured of his ſubiects.

While ſt Hyſmaell was thus wreſtling for the Perſian kingdome, Chaſan Chelife and Techellis (whom wee haue a little before declared to haue beene brought out of the mountaines and deſarts into the countrie villages, and afterwards into the cities; and to haue filled the countries of ARMENIA and a great part of the Leſſer ASIA with the noueltie of their new doctrine and opinions, firſt phantaſied by one Giunet Siech, and afterward reuiued by Haider Erdebill Hyſmaell his father) hauing gathered a great armie of ſuch as had receiued their doctrine, inua-
E ded the Turkes dominion. For after that Techellis (this cold prophet) had with wonderfull felicitie in the preſence of many prognoſticated of things to come; and Hyſmaell the Sophi (of late a poore exiled & baniſhed man) was thought to haue grown vnto the higheſt type of worldly honours, not by mans helpe, but by vprightneſſe of life, and the fortunate paſſage of an vndoubted religion: ſuch a deſire of receiuing that new ſuperſtition poſſeſſed the minds of the people in generall, that the cities and towns thereabouts were now full of them which in token of their new profeſſion had taken vpon them the wearing of the red hat, the known cogniſance of the Cuſelbas. Firſt they met together at the citie of TASCIA at the foot of the mountaine ANTITAVRVS, or as the Turkiſh hiſtorie reports, at the citie of ATTALIA, to the number of ten thouſand vpon a great Faire day; where they laied hands vpon the chiefe magiſtrate of the ci-
F tie and executed him, ſetting his quarters vpon foure of the higheſt towers of the citie: and farther perſuaded by theſe new maſters of this new ſuperſtition, to take vp armes in defence of themſelues & of their ſincere religion (as they termed it) in caſe that any violence ſhould be offered them by the irriligious Turkes; they all ſwore neuer to forſake their captaines for any diſtreſſe, or yet refuſe any labour or aduenture for the honour of their moſt holy religion (as they would haue it)in defence whereof,they had alreadie vowed their ſoules and bodies. Theſe ring- G leaders of rebellion,ſeeing the minds of their franticke followers ſo well prepared for their purpoſe,and repoſing a great confidence in their valour and reſolution; and withal conſidering that the money which was bountifully brought in vnto them by the countrie people, partly for deuotion,partly for feare,was not ſufficient to maintaine ſo great a multitude; gaue leaue by publike proclamation to their vnruly followers, to forage the countrey round about them, and to liue vpon the ſpoile of them which would not receiue that new found doctrine. Whereupon they diuiding themſelues into diuers companies, and raunging vp and downe the countrey, brought into the campe great abundance of cattell and other ſuch things as the countrey yeelded: and forthwith(their multitude ſtill increaſing)they entred into LYCAONIA,a populous and fruitful countrey,where they refreſhed themſelues many daies, roaming vp and downe to the H great grieuance & terrour of the people:and brought ſuch a feare vpon the whole countrey,that they which dwelt in open dorpes and villages, were glad to flie with their wiues, children, and goods into the ſtrong citie of ICONIVM: for proclamations were in many places ſet vp in the names of Chaſan Cheliſe and Techellis, wherein many both ſpirituall and temporall bleſſings were in moſt ample manner propoſed to all ſuch as ſhould forthwith take part with them,and follow that their new doctrine alreadie eſtabliſhed in PERSIA: But vnto ſuch as ſhould obſtinatly perſeuere in their old ſuperſtition, after they had once drawne their ſword, was threatned vtter deſtruction without hope of pardon of life. So that all the inhabitants thereabouts,terrified with the terrour of this proclamation, ſome for feare of death,ſome vpon inconſtancie,ſome for ſafegard of their goods and poſſeſſions(dearer vnto them than any religion)ſome other in- I debted, infamous, in danger of law: beſide many fugitiue ſeruants daily reſorted to theſe new maſters.Now long after,whileſt the Turks were making preparation for the ſuppreſſing of this dangerous rebellion, certaine troupes of horſemen ſent from Hyſmaell came in good time to theſe new prophets: for Hyſmaell in fauour and furtherance of that new ſuperſtition,had a little before by fit meſſengers, exhorted him to proceed couragiouſly in their ſo religious an enterpriſe,and to ioine martiall force vnto the religion they profeſſed: promiſing further, not to be wanting vnto them at their need,but to ſend them skilfull leaders, and from time to time to furniſh them with coine for the maintenance of that warre. All this Hyſmaell did openly in deſpight of Baiazet, of ſmall beginnings to ſow the ſeed of greater warre. For hee bearing an old grudge againſt Baiazet, for the former warres betwixt the Turkes and the Perſians, as alſo for K their diſagreement in matters concerning their ſuperſtition;and prickt forward with the heat of youth,deſired nothing more in the greatneſſe of his power, and proſperous ſucceſſe of his affaires,than to haue occaſion to make wars with the Turkiſh king: For which purpoſe he ſent his embaſſadors vnto the ſtate of VENICE to ioine with them in league and amitie,in ſuch form and ſort,as they had long time before by Catarinus Zemes,Barbarus and Contarenus their embaſſadors,concluded with Vſun-Caſſanes the great Perſian king his grandfather. The chiefe things that he requeſted of the Venetians was,That they would ſend him out of ITALIE by the way of SYRIA, men skilfull in the caſting of great ordinance, and with their fleet to trouble Baiazet by ſea: promiſing in the meane time himſelfe to fill ASIA the leſſe with his armie by land,and ſo to L giue a faire occaſion vnto them,to recouer by ſea all ſuch places, as they had before in the late wars loſt vnto the Turkes vpon the coaſt of PELOPONESVS and GRÆCIA.

Hyſmaell ſendeth embaſſadors vnto the Venetians,to ioine in league with them againſt Baiazet.

The Venetians hauing with all courteſie entertained the embaſſadours, gaue them anſwere, That they would neuer be forgetfull of the ancient league and amitie they had made with the Perſian king; the remembrance whereof, was vnto their ſtate a thing moſt pleaſant: and that they were wonderfull glad, that the new king was an enemie vnto the Turke, and had them in ſuch regard,as to participat vnto them the cauſes of that war: and farther to promiſe vnto them thoſe things, which if his grandfather Vſun-Cuſſanes or his vncle Iacup would haue performed he ſhould not now haue had need to make wars with the Turkiſh emperour. But ſuch was the alteration of things and times,that as the Perſian kings then liuing at home in peace,thought it M not good to ſtir whileſt Baiazet was buſie in EVROPE; ſo now their ſtate ſtanding in far worſe condition and fortune,could not performe that which they heartily wiſhed,and moſt of all deſired: for that they thought it not good to breake the league which they had not long before made with Baiazet the Turkiſh emperor: eſpecially then,when ſundrie warlike nations of EVROPE conſpiring together, and diuers mightie kings prouoked with no iniurie,but onely enuy-

ing

A ing at their happie eſtate, made wars vpon them; yet were neuertheleſſe in good hope, that God would ſtand in their iuſt defence, and ſtill preſerue their ſtate, which no enemies power had for the ſpace of 700 yeares and more, euer beene able to ouercome. Wherefore they ſhould ſhew vnto their king, that they would as occaſion ſhould ſerue, and as it ſhould ſtand with the good of their ſtate, do their vttermoſt deuoire, to make him vnderſtand, that nothing was deerer vnto them than the friendſhip of ſo great a king: nor any thing more honourable than by mutuall counſell and combined forces, to aſſaile the Turke their common enemie.

Shortly after, the embaſſadors (hauing obtained nothing more than the hope of a league to be in time concluded, and being honourably rewarded) returned with their gallies to CYPRVS;
B and ſo from thence to SYRIA, where he had ſecret conference with Petrus Zenus (the ſonne of Caterinus Zenus, a man famous for his embaſſage vnto Vſun-Caſſanes into PERSIA) gouernour of the Venetian merchants at DAMASCO. Which thing Baiazet hauing intelligence of, and of the paſſage of the Turkiſh embaſſadors that way, complained grieuouſly both by his embaſſadors and letters vnto Campſon Gaurus Sultan of Ægypt, that he dealt not as a friend and confederat with him, in ſuffering theſe embaſſadours ſo to paſſe throught the middeſt of SYRIA vnto the Chriſtians their common enemies, to ſtir them vp to warre. Whereupon, all the Venetian merchants which were at TRIPOLIS, ALEPPO, DAMASCO, BERYTVS, and ALEXANDRIA;
C and eſpecially Zenus himſelfe, were forthwith apprehended by the commandement of the great Sultan, and carried in bonds to CAIRE: where they were many times enforced in chaines to anſwere vnto ſuch things as were laid to their charge, and after they had by the ſpace of a yeare endured the manifold deſpights of the prowd Mamalukes, hardly obtained to eſcape with life and libertie.

The two ſeditious prophets Chaſan and Techellis well ſtrengthned with the aid of the Perſians, were now come vnto ICONIVM the moſt famous citie of LYCAONIA: and waſting all the countrie before them, drew a great multitude of people to receiue their new doctrine. For the repreſſing of which outrages, Orchanes and Mahomethes, two of Baiazet his nephewes (who in ſteed of their fathers Alem Schach and Tzian Schach, the ſonnes of Baiazet before dead, gouerned thoſe countries) gathered togither their forces, & diſdaining to ſuffer ſuch diſgrace by ſuch a rabble of raſcal people, in the ſight of ſo famous a citie, came into the field to giue them battel.
D But they in their youthfull heat making too much haſt, and ioyning battel in a place of diſuantage, were by the rebels ouerthrowne and put to flight. Neither would theſe ringleaders in that victorie haue forborne to haue aſſailed ICONIVM, but that they wanted artillerie and engines of war requiſit for the beſieging of cities.

Orchanes and Mahomethes two of Baiazet his nephewes ouerthrowne by Techellis.

Corcutus alſo one of the ſonnes of Baiazet hauing at the ſame time leuied a conuenient army about THYATIRA, SYPILVS, MAGNESIA, and PHOCEA, durſt not farther ſtir or ſet forward againſt the rebels, although they lay diſperſed about the countrey faſt by him. Theſe new prophets with enſignes diſplaied, marching from countrie to countrie through the heart of the leſſer ASIA, entered at length into BYTHINIA, where neere vnto the riuer Sangarius they met with Caragoſes Baſſa the Viceroy of ASIA, comming againſt them with a great armie well ap-
E pointed, which he had a little before raiſed vpon the bruit of the comming of theſe rebels; and had alſo commanded Acomathes (whom the Turkes call Achmetes) the eldeſt ſonne of Baiazet then liuing, gouernour of the great countries of CPADOCIA and PONTVS, to riſe his power, and to follow at the backe of the rebels: who if they ſhould hap to be put to the worſe, would neither be able to retire, neither to keepe the field, being ſo ſhut vp betwixt two ſo great armies. But Techellis by his ſpeedie comming, fruſtrated theſe deſignes of the viceroy: for marching with all poſſible ſpeed, he was vpon Caragoſes before he was well aware of his comming, neere vnto the mountaine HORMYNVS; as he was then taking vp of moe ſouldiours, and daily expected the comming of others, as if hee had beene going againſt ſome puiſſant enemie. The Viceroy ſeeing the rebels approach, although he had before not purpoſed to haue encountred
F them before he had raiſed farre greater forces: thought it not now to ſtand with his honour to refuſe to giue them battell, although his armie for moſt part conſiſted of the rude countrie peaſants, taken vp vpon the ſudden out of PAPHLAGONIA, GALATIA, PONTVS, and BYTHINIA, raw ſouldiours, and for moſt part vnarmed: as commonly they are which in thoſe countries are preſſed againſt their wills out of the townes and villages, and are of the Turkes called Aſapi, who of the Ianizaries are ſcarcely accounted for men. But his greateſt confidence he repoſed in the approued valour of his auncient horſemen, by whoſe meanes he doubted not, in G ſafetie to retire out of the battell, and to ſaue himſelfe if any thing ſhould fall out otherwiſe than well; making no great account of the common ſouldiours more than by them if he could to weaken the force of the rebels: who on the other ſide (their greateſt force conſiſting of footmen) had no hope to ſaue themſelues by flight, but onely by plaine valour and dint of ſword. Which Techellis well conſidering, exhorted his ſouldiours to remember into what countrie they were come, and that there was no cities of refuge, no new power, no other gods of defence to flie vnto, if they ſhould not that day play the men: Wherefore let vs couragiouſly (ſaid he) ſet forward againſt our enemies, and by victorie defend our liues, together with the truth of our

The battell betweene Caragoſes and Techellis religion, for which wee haue vowed both our ſoules and bodies. He had ſcarce ſaid thus much, but that his whole armie (in token of cheerefulnes) gaue a moſt terrible ſhout, & without farther H ſtay, ſet vpon their enemies. The Viceroy had placed his footmen in the maine battell in the middle, and his horſemen in the wings, thereby to haue compaſſed in his enemies: but Techellis had ſet all his footmen in one great ſquare battell, and his Perſian horſemen for a refuge. But the Viceroy his freſhwater ſouldiors, could ſcarcely abide the ſight of Techellis his armie: for in the front of the battell ſtood ſouldiors throughly armed, and all the reſt of his armie with red hats vpon their heads, as if they had been embrued with bloud, which wonderfully terrified the Baſſaes cowardly and vnskilful ſouldiors: ſo that hauing endured the fight ſcarcely halfe an houre, they all turned their backs and fled. The Turkiſh horſemen which had valiantly aſſayled the rebels armie on both ſides, although they had ſlaine many with their arrowes and launces, and ſomewhat diſordered the battell, for that the footmen were inforced to leaue their places, and to I preſſe ſtill on forward againſt them; yet when Techellis his ſouldiours (hauing ouercome the footmen, & diuiding themſelues into diuers ſquadrons) began with their long pikes to kill their horſes, and to lay hardly vnto them, they likewiſe betooke themſelues to flight alſo. Then the Perſian horſemen (which all this while had ſtood ſtill as lookers on) left their ſtandings, and following the chaſe ſhew many of the Turks in their diſordered flight: and following faſt on, encloſed the Viceroy as he was ſtaying of his horſemen, and could not for the thicknes of the duſt well diſcerne his enemies; ſo that he had beene there taken, if he had not been ſpeedily reſcued by his guard, and ſo deliuered from that danger: The reſt of the Turkes horſemen ſaued themſelues by flight. In this battell ſeuen thouſand of the Turks footmen were ſlaine, and all their enſignes taken, with great ſtore of prouiſion. K

After which victorie, Chaſan and Techellis reſting their armie one day, marched to the citie of CVTAIE, neere vnto the mountaine HORMINIVS: This citie is ſcituated as it were in the middeſt of ASIA the leſſe, and is the ſeat of the Turkiſh emperours Viceroy in ASIA; as SOPHIA in MŒSIA is for his other Viceroy in EVROPE: For it was reported, that the countrey people had for feare of the preſent warre, conuaied thither the greateſt part of their wealth; and the rebels well knew, that the Viceroy himſelfe with his chiefe horſemen were fled thither alſo: Neither doubted they, but that all the armie might be greatly inriched by the wealth of that citie, if they ſhould without delay imploy their whole forces for the gaining therof; their enemies
ſo much worth as whereon to gage his whole forces, comming before the citie, placed ſuch field pieces as he had before taken in the battel, and his archers in ſuch fit places as might moſt annoy the defendants; afterwards he cauſed ſcaling ladders to be ſet vp, and proclamation made through all his campe, That the whole ſpoile of the citie ſhould be the ſouldiours, if the could take it; with promiſe of greater rewards to them that ſhould firſt recouer the top of the walls. Filled with this hope, the rebellious multitude approched the wal, fearing neither enemies force, multitude of ſhot, or daunger of death; ſtriuing who ſhould firſt mount the ladders, and ſome clambering one in the necke of another, ſo to get vp by the ruines of the wall. The defendants in the meane time from aboue caſting downe vpon them great ſtones, timber, fire, ſcalding water, lime, ſand, and ſuch like without meaſure: Wherwith although many were ouerthrown and M cruſht to death or ſpoiled, yet others preſently ſtept vp in their place; neither was any of them ſeene for feare of ſo preſent danger, to ſhrinke backe or be diſcouraged. For the viceroy on the one ſide, and Techellis on the other, were both eyewitneſſes of euery mans valour in that hot ſeruice: the one prickt forward with doubtful hope, for feare to be inforced to giue ouer the aſſault ſo begun; and the other, with the due regard of his honour, life, and ſtate, all ſubiect to that danger;

A ger; and therefore in perſon himſelfe performed all the parts of a worthie chiefetaine and couragious ſouldior. But at length the defendants wearied with the fierce aſſault of the enemie, and for moſt part wounded, Techellis continually ſending in freſh men, and withdrawing ſuch as were hurt, by plaine force brake into the citie in two places ouer the heapes of the dead bodies: and hauing repulſed the defendants, burſt open one of the gates, and thereby brought in his whole armie, Then began a miſerable ſlaughter of the ſouldiors and poore citizens in euery houſe and corner of the citie. At which inſtant, the pallace whither the Viceroy had retired himſelfe with his familie, was alſo taken. The viceroy himſelfe, with his wiues and children, were there alſo taken priſoners, and the ſtately pallace built of marble, in a trice conſumed
B with fire.

Caragoſes the viceroy with his wiues and children taken by Techellis in the citie of Cutaie.

The rich citie of CVTAIE, the ſeat of the great commander of the Turkiſh empire in ASIA, thus taken by Techellis, and his whole armie both beautified and inriched with the ſpoile thereof: he perſuaded himſelfe, that it was now no hard matter for him to take the citie of PRVSA alſo, the auncient ſeat of the Turkiſh kings in BYTHINIA, and ſo to indanger the whole ſtate of the Turkes empire in ASIA, if he ſhould now without delay carrie the terror of himſelfe thither, before the Turks could in that countrie make head againſt him, or the citizens be able in ſo ſuddaine a feare to make any ſufficient prouiſion for the defence of themſelues and their citie; & ſo in the courſe of his good fortune to vſe the courage and cheerefulneſſe of his ſouldiors. Wherefore appointing a day when he would ſet forward, he commaunded all things neceſſarie to bee
C made readie for the taking of that rich citie, being neither ſtrongly walled neither furniſhed with any good garriſon for the defence thereof.

Baiazet ſendeth Alis Baſſa againſt Techellis, out of Europe.

But whileſt he was making this preparation, a new armie, lately ſhipt ouer the Helleſpont from CALLIPOLIS into ASIA, enforced him to change his former determination. For Baiazet awaked at the name of Techellis, and the fame of the new ſuperſtition now generally receiued in PERSIA, had long before giuen commaundment to his ſonnes, nephewes, and the viceroy of ASIA, That they ſhould with all carefulneſſe prouide, that that part of his kingdome tooke no harme thereby. But after he ſaw Techellis of a poore hermit become a great captaine, and backt alſo with the Perſian king, and all his dominions in ASIA now in danger of ſome great alteration, he ſent Alis Baſſa ouer with his Europeian armie. This Alis an eunuch, borne in MACE-
D DONIA (yet for his courage comparable with the greateſt captains) had for his many and worthie deſerts, in the time of the great emperour Mahomet, Baiazet his father, got vnto himſelfe both the honour and name of a moſt famous chiefetaine. He hauing made choice of the principall horſemen of EPYRVS, MACEDONIA, SERVIA, ILLYRIA, and THRACIA, and ioyning vnto them ſeuen thouſand Ianizaries (the moſt aſſured hope of the Turkes in all their expeditions) paſſed ouer from CALLIPOLIS into PHRYGIA, and vpon the way directed his letters vnto Athomates and Corcutus, Baiazet his ſonnes, and to all the other Sanzackes and Gouernours of the Turkes prouinces in ASIA, That they ſhould with as much ſpeed as they could raiſe their forces, and meet him in GALATIA. But Techellis aduertiſed of his comming, thought it beſt for him to depart out of PONTVS, and to retire to ſome place of more ſafetie, leaſt by E longer ſtaying he ſhould be incloſed by his enemies, repairing thitherwards on euerie ſide, or elſe vpon ſome great diſaduantage be enforced to ioine battell: for he ſaw, that if he ſtaied neuer ſo little, he ſhould find no ſafe paſſage or place of refuge to retire vnto, hauing left ſuch large and ſpacious countries, ſo many enemies cities, ſo many great riuers, ſo many diſcontented people behind him; all which the firſt fauour of the vulgar ſort, and ſpeedie courſe of his victorie, had a little before laid open vnto him. Wherefore calling together his captaines and moſt expert men of warre to conſult vpon the matter, it was generally thought to be a point of meere madneſſe, or elſe of extreame neceſſitie, with ſo ſmal a power of vnskilful ſoldiors, without any ſufficient ſtrength of horſemen, to ioine battel with ſuch an enimie as better knew the countrey than he, and farre exceeded him both for the number and expertneſſe of his ſouldiours. Where-
F fore Techellis truſſing vp his rich prey he had before gotten, began now with ſpeed to retire back againe with his followers through GALATIA. But the Baſſa hauing intelligence almoſt euerie houre by letters and eſpials both of the retiring of Techellis, and the way he held, paſſed ouer the riuer Sangarius; and coaſting the countrie, came and encamped betwixt the cities of CVTAIE and ANCYRA, which way it was ſuppoſed the enemie would paſſe. Where when he had there a while reſted his wearied ſouldiors, and was certainly aduertiſed, that the rebels had taken another way, he ſet forward againe, and after fiue daies march in the plaines of GALATIA, G ouertooke the ſtraglers of the enemies, who wearied or wounded, were not able to hold way with the armie: all whom the Baſſa commaunded to be cruelly put to the ſword. And Techellis to terrifie the great Baſſa, or at leaſtwiſe with a moſt horrible ſpectacle to ſtay his purſuit, cau-ſed Caragoſes the viceroy, whom he had carried along with him in chaines, to be cruelly empaled by the highway ſide vpon a great ſharpe ſtake ſet faſt in the ground, and ſo left him ſticking for the Turkes to wonder at. But Alis Baſſa nothing diſmaied with the horrible death of ſo great a perſonage, held on his way with more haſt than good ſpeed, exhorting his ſouldiours patiently to endure the painfulnes of the long march, and to ſtraine themſelues to take reuenge of thoſe rebellious theeues and robbers, who deſtroying the countrey before them, ſpared not H ſo much as the Turks children and the temples of their religion: and ſo the day following came into the plaines of ANCYRA. The ſame day alſo Achomates came vnto the Baſſa with ten thouſand ſouldiours. Alis Baſſa perceiuing that he could not poſſiby with his whole armie ouertake his enemies marching with greater ſpeed before him, and grieued at the heart to ſee them eſcape out of his hand, reſolued to prooue if he could with his horſemen ouertooke them: wherupon leauing his footmen with Achomates, he himſelfe with eight thouſand horſe following the enemie vpon the ſpurre, ouertooke the rereward of their armie at the mountaine OLYGA, a little from the citie of ANCYRA, vnto whom he gaue an hot skirmiſh.

The battell betwixt Alis Baſſa and Techellis.

Techellis which a little before had taken a fit place for his campe, vpon the riſing of the hill, although he ſaw his men faint with long trauell and the ſcorching heat of the ſunne, yet quick- I ly perceiuing that he ſhould haue to doe only with horſemen, and that in a place of aduantage;
turning his armie, and orderly placing his ſouldiors, as the ground and the ſhortnes of the time would giue leaue, valiantly receiued the impreſſion of the Turkes, and with their long pikes and arrowes at the firſt repulſed them: ſo that it ſeemed, they would neither haue giuen ground vnto the bragging horſemen, neither haue done any thing not beſeeming their former victories, had not Alis Baſſa ſent in a thouſand Carbines, who in troupes orderly following one another, deliuered their ſhot as thicke as haile vpon the enemie: with which ſtorme many of them being ſlaine, and moe wounded, their ranks began to be ſomewhat diſordered: whereupon the other horſemen breaking in, with great ſlaughter ouerthrew the vauntguard of Techellis battell: in Chaſan Chelife ſlaine. which conflict Chaſan Chelife himſelfe was ſlaine. Techellis alwaies at hand where moſt need K was, euen in the middeſt of the ſlaughter of his men, ſet in order a new battell of his moſt readie and beſt armed ſouldiours, the only remedie in ſo great a diſtres; and bringing them on into the front of the battell, oppoſed them againſt the horſemen, now (as they thought) in poſſeſſion of the victorie: commaunding them by little and little to retire vnto the mountaine, to the intent that they might ſeeme to doe that by commandment of the generall, which they were like ynough to haue done of themſelues for feare; hoping that it would ſo come to paſſe, That the Turks finding the diſaduantage of the place, would leaue ſo hardly to aſſaile them. But the Baſſa encouraged with the firſt ſucceſſe of the battell, exhorted his ſouldiors to vrge the victorie, now almoſt as good as gotten, and not to giue the enemie ſpace to recouer the ſtrength of the moun-taine, but valiantly to charge them, and with a little ſhort paines that day to end all that war, to L
the honour of Baiazet their ſoueraigne, and worthie commendation of themſelues in generall.
In this ſort incouraging them, he with a troupe of his beſt horſemen (to animate the reſt, and to ſhew his owne valour) brake through the enemies battel: which thing he in the ſame heat, with more courage than diſcretion, attempting to perform the ſecond time, was encloſed by his ene-Alis Baſſa ſlain. mies and ſlaine: vpon whoſe fall the fortune of the battell was in a moment changed. For the Turkes, which erſt fought couragiouſly, hauing beaten backe and almoſt ouerthrowne their enemies, now diſmaied with the death of their generall, began to fight but faintly, and by little and little to giue ground, and at laſt turning about their horſes, fled. On the other ſide Techellis his ſouldiours, who but a little before had repoſed greater hope in the ſtrength of the place and the mountaine, than in their weapons and valour, now encouraged with new hope, and taking M heart in the faint charge of their enemies, began to thruſt forward, and with a moſt terrible noiſe crying victorie, put to flight the Turkes horſemen, before wearied with long trauell, when as they had by the raſhneſſe of the Generall loſt a notable victorie almoſt alreadie gained. Techellis although he knew that the enemie could neither refreſh his horſes, nor yet with any aſſurance keepe the field, if he ſhould haue purſued him; yet hauing loſt many of his beſt ſoldiors, and the

A reſt of his armie ſore weakened with trauell, faſting and fighting, determined to refreſh his wearied followers vpon the mountaine OLYGA. From whence after a few dayes he marched ouer the riuer Halys vnto the citie of TASCIA, his old dwelling place, and ſo to the citie of CELENIS, which the riuer Marſya (much ſpoken of by the Poets) runneth thorow, and is now called by the name of MARAS, but as then the regall ſeat of the mountaine king Aladeules. The Turkes horſemen hauing thus in ſome ſmall ſort rather reuenged the iniuries done by the rebels than obtained any victorie, returned to Achomates, who was then comming on with the footmen. Not long after Baiazet vnderſtanding of the death of Alis Baſſa his Generall, ſent Ionuſes Baſſa, a warlike captaine, and of great experience (borne in EPIRVS) in his ſtead. Who as ſoon as he had receiued the charge of the armie from Achomates, marching forthwith into CAPPA-

Ionuſes Baſſa ſent by Baiazet, Generall of his armie againſt Techellis.

B DOCIA, and keeping the way on the right hand towards the mountaine ANTITAVRVS, came in few daies vnto the citie of TASCIA, the place of Techellis his abode: where burning and deſtroying the countrey all about, he came and encamped with his armie at the foot of the mountaine. The Baſſa had in his armie aboue fortie thouſand horſe and foot, well appointed with many field peeces, and plenty of victuals which he brought with him, for feare of want in that bare countrey. Techellis terrified with his comming, hauing of late receiued no aid from Hyſmaell the Perſian king, and wanting alſo great artillerie; and beſides that ſeeing his ſouldiers greatly both deminiſhed and diſcouraged with the late battaile at OLYGA; determined not vpon ſo great diſaduantage to meet his enemie in the plaine field, but to keepe the rough mountaine and thicke woods, hoping that if he could be able any time to keepe thoſe ſtrong places, he ſhould

C either receiue ſome aid from Hyſmaell, or by the heat of the Turkes leaders take them at ſome notable aduantage. In the meane time many notable skirmiſhes paſſed betwixt the ſouldiers on both ſides: for the Turkes fetching a compaſſe oftentimes about the mountaines, and ſeeking for the beſt paſſages, by the eaſie riſing of the hils, came to skirmiſh with their enemies: and Techellis his ſouldiers on the other ſide, ſallying many times out of the woods and abrupt places of the mountaines, valiantly aſſailed the Turkes. After they had a long time in this ſort, as if it had beene in diſport, rather proued their forces one vpon another than done any great matter, the Turkes prying into euery corner, at length perceiued to wayes whereby their whole army with enſignes diſplayed might without any great difficultie be brought vnto the top of the mountaine, and ſo into their enemies ſtrength. The Baſſa hauing well viewed and conſidered

D the places, cauſed the Ianizaries at one inſtant to march vp to the mountaine by one of the aforeſaid waies, and the reſt of his army by the other: who with ſoft pace climing vp the ſteepe mountaines, with their targuets defended themſelues as well as they could againſt their enemies darts and ſhot. For Techellis his ſouldiers hauing before taken the high mountaines and places of aduantage, caſt downe vpon the Turkes great ſtones and ſhot without number, as if it had beene out of ſome ſtrong forts. But the Turkes bending certaine ſmall field peeces againſt the places which moſt annoied them, eaſily draue them from their ſtandings; the harquebuſiers ſtill following their enſignes, ſhrouded cloſe vnder the targuetiers, and deliuering their deadly ſhot as ſhowers of raine vpon their enemies. Whoſe deſperat approch Te-

E chellis perceiuing, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and with all his armie retired farther off into the higher mountaines and rougher woods. The night following, perceiuing that by the euill ſucceſſe of the former skirmiſh he had loſt a great part of his credit and ſtrength, he with great ſilence forſooke the woods, and paſſing quite ouer the mountaines fled into ARMENIA, then part of the Perſian kingdome. Neither did the Turkes perceiue their departure vntill it was light day, and that their ſcouts entring the thicke woods, and finding the enemies baggage with ſome wounded ſouldiers not able to flie, brought newes vnto the Baſſa of the enemies departure and of his ſpeedie flight into ARMENIA. Which thing when he by them which were taken, vnderſtood to be certainely true, fretting and chafing like a mad man, that he had not preſently vpon the enemies retreat beſet the wood round, he ſent his horſemen forthwith to purſue them: but

F all in vaine, for Techellis was by direct and knowne wayes gone into ARMENIA. Some few ſtraglers not able to make ſo much haſt as the reſt, were ouertaken by the Turkes horſemen, and brought backe to the Baſſa.

Techellis thus put to flight, Ionuſes cauſed ſtrait inquiſition to be made through all the cities of the leſſer ASIA, for all ſuch as had profeſſed the Perſian religion: and them whom he found to haue borne armes in the late rebellion, he cauſed to be put to death with moſt exquiſit torments,

ments,& the reſt to be burnt in their foreheads with an hot yron,thereby for euer to be known; G whom together with the kinsfolkes and friends of them that were executed, or fled with Techellis, he cauſed to be tranſported into EVROPE, and to be diſperſed through MACEDONIA, EPIRVS, and PELOPONESVS: for feare leſt if Techellis now fled into the Perſian kingdome, ſhould from thence returne with new forces,they ſhould alſo againe repaire vnto him,and raiſe a new rebellion. This was the beginning, courſe, and ending of one of the moſt dangerous rebellions that euer troubled the Turkiſh empire: wherein all, or at leaſtwiſe the greateſt part of their dominions in ASIA might haue been eaſily ſurpriſed by the Perſian king, if he would thoroughly haue proſecuted the occaſion and opportunitie then offered.

The remainder of Techellis his followers, flying into PERSIA, by the way lighting vpon a H Carauan of merchants laden with ſilkes and other rich merchandiſe, tooke the ſpoile thereof: for which outrage comming to TAVRIS the captaines were all by the commandement of Hyſmaell executed, and Techellis himſelfe to the terrour of others burnt aliue.

Techellis burnt at Tauris.

A great earthquake at Conſtantinople.

The next yeare (which was the yeare 1509, the foureteenth day of September) chanced a great and terrible earthquake in the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE and the countries thereabouts: by the violence whereof,a great part of the wals of that imperiall citie, with many ſtately buildings both publike and priuat,were quite ouerthrowne,and thirteene thouſand people ouerwhelmed and ſlaine. The terrour whereof was ſo great, that the people generally forſooke their houſes,and lay abroad in the fields: yea Baiazet himſelfe,then very aged and ſore troubled with the gout,for feare thereof remoued from CONSTANTINOPLE to HADRIANOPLE; I but finding himſelfe in no more ſafetie than before, he left the citie and lay abroad in the fields in his tent. This earthquake endured by the ſpace of eighteene daies,or (as the Turkes hiſtories report) of a moneth, with very little intermiſſion; which was then accounted ominous,as portending the miſerable calamities which ſhortly after happened in the Othoman family. After this earthquake enſued a great plague, wherewith the citie was grieuouſly viſited, and for the moſt part vnpeopeled. But after that the earthquake was ceaſed, and the mortalitie aſſuaded; Baiazet cauſed the imperiall citie to be with all ſpeed repaired, and to that purpoſe gaue out commiſſions into all parts of his dominion for the taking vp of workmen: ſo that there were at once in worke eightie thouſand workmen, who in moſt beautifull manner, in the ſpace of foure moneths againe repaired the ruines of that great citie. K

Baiazet had by his many wiues, eight ſonnes and ſix daughters, which liued to be men and women growne; and the ſonnes all gouernours in diuers prouinces of his large empire: whom the Turkiſh hiſtories reckon vp in this order, Abdullah Zelebi, Alem Scach, Tzihan Schach, Achmet, Machmut, Corcut, Selim, and Muhamet. Yet Antonius Vtrius a Genoway, who long time liued in Baiazet his court, and (as he of himſelfe writeth) waited in his chamber at the time of his death, reckoning vp the ſons of Baiazet, maketh mention but of theſe ſix, Sciemſcia, Alemſcia, Achomates, Mahometes, Selymus,and Corcutus: naming the forenamed by names ſomething differing from the other. Sciemſcia the eldeſt, gouernour of CARAMANIA, for his towardlineſſe moſt deerely beloued of his father, died of a naturall death before him, and was of him and his ſubiects greatly lamented. Alemſcia died in like manner,of whoſe death as ſoone as he was ad- L uertiſed, by mourning letters written in blacke paper with white characters (as their manner of writing is, in certifying of heauie newes) he caſt from his ſcepter with all other tokens of honour, and cauſed generall mourning to be made for him in the court, and through all the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, by the ſpace of three daies; during which time all ſhops were ſhut vp, all trading forbidden, and no ſigne of mirth to be ſeene: and for a certaine ſpace,after the manner of their ſuperſtition, cauſed ſolemne ſacrifices to be made for the health of his ſoule, and 7000 Aſpers to be giuen weekly vnto the poore. His dead body was afterward withall princely pompe conuaied to PRVSA, and there with great ſolemnitie buried. Tzihan gouernour of CARIA, and Mahomet gouernour of CAPHA, vpon their fathers heauie diſpleaſure, were by his commaundement both ſtrangled.

And being at the length come to AMASIA vpon a ſolemne holiday, they awaited the comming of Achomates to the church: who paſſing by, ſtaied a while liſtening attentiuely vnto their pleaſant and alluring harmonie; which was for that purpoſe moſt curiouſly and skilfully before deuiſed, and by them both with their inſtruments and voices, performed. emperor,but in deed for feare to be diſcouered. As theſe counterfeit gueſts were returning from G the court in their garments of fauour, they happened to meet with three courtiers which knew Mahometes; who diſmounting from their horſes, had done him honour and due reuerence, as to the ſonne of the great emperour,had he not by ſecret ſignes forbidden them,as one vnwilling to be knowne. When he had thus ſeene his father, the court, and the imperiall citie, he went againe aboord,and ſo with ſpeed returned to MAGNESIA.

The report of this his doing, had in ſhort time filled both the citie and the court, and was at laſt brought to Baiazet his eares: which raiſed in his ſuſpitious head many a troubleſome thought, greatly fearing, that in theſe ſlie practizes lay hidden ſome ſecret and deſperat conſpiracie, dangerous to himſelfe and his other children. Wherefore after long diſcourſe had with the three great Baſſaes then of his ſecret counſell, concerning the matter; to rid himſelfe of all H feare,he reſolued in any caſe to take him away. And therefore cauſed them in his name to write vnto Aſmehemedi, a gallant courtier,and alwaies neere vnto Mahometes, to poiſon him with a ſecret poiſon, for that purpoſe incloſed in thoſe letters ſent vnto him: with promiſe of great rewards and preferments for that his ſeruice,to be afterwards receiued from the emperour: Charging him withall, that if he could not effect the matter, he ſhould ſo conceale it, as that Maho- metes ſhould haue no diſtruſt thereof; the leaſt ſuſpition whereof,would tend to his vtter deſtruction. This Aſmehemedi for ſome vnkindneſſe bare a ſecret grudge againſt Mahometes, which Baiazet knowing of, made choiſe of him the rather: And he on the other ſide, partly to per-forme the old tyrants command, & partly to reuenge his own priuat wrong; vigilantly awaited Mahometes poiſoned by Aſmehemedi. all oportunities to bring to effect that he had in charge. At length it fortuned,that Mahometes ha- I uing diſported himſelfe in his gardens of pleaſure,and being thirſtie after his exerciſe,called for drinke: Aſmehemedi alwaies at hand,in a gilt boule fetcht him ſuch drinke as he deſired,wher-into he had ſecretly conuaied the deadly poiſon ſent from Baiazet. Mahometes hauing drunke thereof, in ſhort time began to feele himſelfe euill at eaſe, and preſently ſent for his phiſitions:
who thinking that he had but ſomething diſtempered himſelfe with drinking too much cold drinke in his heat, perceiued not that he was poiſoned, vntill that within ſix daies after he died.
Of whoſe death Baiazet aduertiſed, could not abſtaine from mourning, although he himſelfe had beene the onely author thereof: and the more to manifeſt his heauineſſe, commaunded all the court to mourne with him, and prayers to be made in their temples after their ſuperſtitious G manner,and almes to be giuen to the poore for the health of his ſoule. His dead bodie was af- K terwards carried to PRVSA, and there honourably buried with his anceſtors. Aſmehemedi the Aſmehemedi iuſtly rewarded for his treacherie. traitour in reward of his vnfaithfulneſſe towards his maſter, was by the commaundement of Baiazet caſt into priſon, and neuer afterwards ſeene, being there (as it was thought) ſecretly made away.

Now had Baiazet but three ſonnes left, Achomates, Selymus, and Corcutus. Achomates go-uernour of AMASIA,was a man both politike and valiant; but much giuen to pleaſure and delight: him Baiazet and moſt part of the great men of the court fauoured aboue the reſt of his brethren; except ſuch as were before corrupted by Selymus. Corcutus for his mild and quiet nature was of moſt men beloued,but not thought ſo fit for the gouernment of ſo great an empire; L eſpecially by the Ianizaries and ſouldiers of the court, for that he was (as they thought) altogither drowned in the ſtudie of philoſophie, a thing nothing agreeing with their humour. Yet might Baiazet ſeeme to doe him wrong,if he ſhould not according to his promiſe againe reſtore him vnto the poſſeſſion of the empire, which he had almoſt thirtie yeares before receiued at his hands; as is before in the beginning of his life declared. But Selymus being of a more hautie diſ-poſition than to brooke the life of a ſubiect vnder the commaund of either of his brethren, and altogither giuen to martiall affaires; ſought by infinit bountie,faigned courteſie, ſubtile policie, and by all other meanes good and bad, to aſpire vnto the empire. Him therefore the Ianizaries with all the great ſouldiers of the court, yea and ſome of the chiefe Baſſaes alſo (corrupted with gifts) wiſhed aboue the reſt,for their lord and ſoueraign: deſiring rather to liue vnder him which M was like to ſet all the world on a hurly burly, whereby they might increaſe their honour and wealth, the certaine rewards of their aduentures, than to lead an idle and vnprofitable life (as they tearmed it) vnder a quiet and peaceable prince.

Whileſt men ſtood thus diuerſly affected towards theſe princes of ſo great hope, Baiazet now farre worne with yeares, and ſo grieuouſly tormented with the gout that he was not able to

A to helpe himſelfe : for the quietneſſe of his ſubiects and preuenting of ſuch troubles as might ariſe by the aſpiring of his children after his death, determined whileſt he yet liued (for the auoiding of theſe and other ſuch like miſcheefes) to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion in ſome one of his ſons; who wholly poſſeſſed of the kingdome, might eaſily repreſſe the pride of the other. And although he had ſet downe with himſelfe, that Achomates ſhould be the man, as well in reſpect of his birthright, as of the eſpeciall affection he bare vnto him; yet to diſcouer the diſpoſition of his ſubiects, and how they ſtood affected, it was giuen out in generall tearmes, That he meant before his death to make it knowne to the world, who ſhould ſucceed him in the empire, without naming any one of his ſonnes; leauing that for euery man to deuine of, according as they
B were affected: which was not the leaſt cauſe, that euery one of his ſonnes with like ambition began now to make ſmall account of their former preferments, as thinking onely vpon the empire it ſelfe.

1511 Selymus aided by Mahometes his father in law, riſeth againſt his father

Firſt of all Selymus, whom Baiazet had made gouernor of the kingdome of TRAPEZOND, rigging vp all the ſhips he could in PONTVS, ſayled from TRAPEZOND ouer the Euxine (now called the Blacke ſea) to the citie of CAPHA, called in ancient time THEODOSIA, and from thence by land came to Mahometes king of the Tartars called Præcopenſes, a mightie prince, whoſe daughter he had without the good liking of his father before married: and diſcouering vnto him his entended purpoſe, beſought him by the ſacred bonds of the affinitie betwixt them, not to ſhrinke from him his louing ſon in law in ſo fit an oportunitie for his aduancement: and
C withall ſhewed vnto him, what great hope of obtaining the empire was propoſed vnto him by his moſt faithfull friends and the ſouldiers of the court, if he would but come neerer vnto his father (then about to transferre the empire to ſome one of his ſonnes) and either by faire meanes to procure his fauour, or by entering with his armie into THRACIA, to terrifie him from appointing either of his other brethren for his ſucceſſour. The Tartar king commending his high deuiſe, as a kind father in law with wonderfull celeritie cauſed great ſtore of ſhipping to be made readie in the Ponticke ſea, and MŒOTIS, but eſpecially at the ports of COPA and TANA, vpon the great riuer of Tanais, which boundeth EVROPE from ASIA; and arming fifteene thouſand Tartarian horſemen, deliuered them all to Selymus, promiſing forthwith to ſend him greater aid if he ſhould haue occaſion to vſe the ſame. Theſe things being quickely diſpatched,
D Selymus paſſing ouer the riuer Borryſthenes, and ſo through VALACHIA, came at length to Danubius, and with his horſemen paſſed that famous riuer at the citie of CHELIA: His fleet he commaunded to meet him at the port of the citie of VARNA, called in ancient time DIONYSIOPOLIS, in the confines of BVLGARIA and THRACIA: he himſelfe ſtill leuying moe men by the way as he went, pretending in ſhew quite another thing than he had indeed intended: which the better to couer, he gaue it out as if he had purpoſed to haue inuaded HVNGARIE.

But Baiazet a good while before aduertiſed, that Selymus was departed from TRAPEZOND, and come ouer into EVROPE, maruelling that he had left his charge in ASIA (the rebellion of Techellis and the Perſian warre yet ſcarce quieted) and that vpon his owne head he had entertained forraine aid to make warre againſt the moſt warlike nation of the Hungarians; and far-E ther, that with his armie by land, he had ſeized vpon the places neereſt vnto THRACIA, and with a ſtrong nauie kept the Euxine ſea, he began to ſuſpect, as the truth was, That all this preparation was made and entended againſt himſelfe: for the craftie old ſire had good proofe of the vnquiet and troubleſome nature of his ſonne, eſpecially in that without his knowledge he durſt preſume to take a wife from amongſt the Tartars, and afterwards with no leſſe preſumption of himſelfe raiſe an armie both by ſea and land. Whereby he eaſily perceiued, that he would neuer hold himſelfe contented with a ſmall kingdome, ſo long as he was in hope by deſperat aduenture to gaine a greater. Yet thinking it better with like diſſimulation to appeaſe his violent and Baiazet ſendeth embaſſadours to Selymus.
fierce nature, than by ſharpe reproofe to moue him to farther choller, he ſent vnto him embaſſa-
F dours to declare vnto him with that danger the Turkiſh kings had in former times taken vpon them thoſe Hungarian warres: for example whereof he needed not to go no further than to his grandfather Mahomet the Great, who many times to his exceeding loſſe had made proofe of the Hungarian forces: wherefore he ſhould doe well to expect ſome fitter opportunitie, when as he might with better aduiſe, greater power, and more aſſured hope of victorie, take thoſe wars in hand. Whereunto Selymus anſwered, That he had left ASIA, enforced thereunto by the iniuries of his brother Achomates, and was therefore come ouer into EVROPE, by dint of ſword

and the helpe of his friends, to win from the enemies of the Mahometane religion a larger and better prouince for that little barren and peaceable one which his father had giuen him, bordering vpon HIBERIA and CHOLCHOS, bare and needie people, liuing as connies amongſt the rockes and mountaines. As for the Hungarians, whom they thought to be a people inuincible, and therefore not to be dealt withall, he was not of that baſe mind to be daunted with any danger, were it neuer ſo great: and yet that in his opinion the warre was neither ſo difficult or dangerous, as was by them pretended; for as much as the ancient proweſſe of that warlike nation was now much changed, together with the change of their kings; and their diſcipline of warre not onely much decayed, but almoſt quite loſt; after that Vladiſlaus, farre vnlike in policie and proweſſe, had ſucceeded the renowmed Matthias in that kingdome. Neither had he (as he ſaid) from his cradle learned to be afraid of death, or of the common chances of warre, as knowing that neither God nor man would be wanting to him, who with an honourable reſolution did aduenture vpon vertuous and worthie attempts: and that therefore he was fully reſolued for his owne honour (which his father had in ſome ſort blemiſhed by the immoderate aduancement of his brethren) either to die honourably in the field in battaile againſt the enemies of the Mahometane religion, or elſe glorioully to extend the bounds of the Turkiſh empire: and that he would not (though one of the youngeſt in the Othoman familie) be accounted inferiour to any of his brethren in vertue and proweſſe. Thus was the Hungarian warre neuer by Selymus entended, notably by him pretended; and with no leſſe diſſimulation by Baiazet diſſwaded. The embaſſadours, although Selymus in all his ſpeeches ſhewed no token of peace: yet in his fathers name preſented vnto him diuers gifts, thereby if it might be to appeaſe his fierce & cruell mind. Vnto his old gouernment they adioyned SAMANDRIA, which the Hungarians call SCHENDEROVIA, a ſtrong citie of SERVIA vpon the borders of HVNGARIE, with many other ſtrong townes in the ſame countrey: they gaue him alſo threeſcore thouſand duckats, beſide a thouſand garments of cloth and ſilke: with good ſtore of prouiſion wherewith to releeue and content the ſouldiers by him entertained; leſt that they drawne farre from home in hope of ſpoile, ſhould take it in euill part if they ſhould be ſent away emptie handed. Selymus in a happie time hauing receiued theſe gifts, returned the embaſſadours vnto his father, with more doubtfull anſwere and vncertaine hope than before: yet changing nothing in himſelfe of his former reſolution, ſecret meſſengers and letters from his friends in the court ſtill whetting him forward (too much alreadie enflamed with deſire of ſoueraigntie) perſwading him to make haſt and to repoſe his greateſt hope in his quicke ſpeed; for that they vnderſtood, that about the time of his ſetting forward, his brother Achomates was comming with a great power, being ſent for out of CAPADOCIA by his father.

Preſents giuen to Selymus by his fathers embaſſadours.

Baiazet would appoint his ſucceſſour whileſt he yet liued.

In the meane time Baiazet, moued the rather with the feare of Selymus, reſolued vpon that, whereof he had long before in his mind deeply conſidered, and now ſaid openly, That he would appoint his ſucceſſour, who in ſtead of himſelfe, ſpent with yeares and ſickneſſe, ſhould bring with him the flower of youth and ſtrength of bodie, fit to gouerne ſo great an empire. But when theſe things were propounded vnto the ſouldiours of the court by the foure great Baſſaes (who in all things both of peace and warres had next place vnto the emperour himſelfe) it was forthwith gainſaied by thoſe martiall men, crying aloud with one voice, That they would know no other emperour but Baiazet, vnder whoſe conduct & good fortune they had now ſerued aboue thirtie yeares: and therefore would not ſuffer him to liue a priuat life in obſcuritie, who with ſo many victories and ſtrong cities taken, had brought the Othoman empire vnto that height of renowme and glorie. They ſaid moreouer, that there was in him yet ſtrength enough, if he would but with the reuerend honour of his age retaine the maieſtie of his place, and the glorie he had gotten with his long and happie raigne, and moſt famous victories: and that of his children, ſuch a one ſhould vndoubtedly in his due time ſucceed in the empire, as of right ought: onely they wiſhed, that the old emperour might in the meane time liue in health with a long & happie raigne: neither needed he (as they ſaid) to feare that after his death any controuerſie ſhould ariſe amongſt his ſonnes about the ſucceſſion; for that the Othoman progenie vſed to attaine the imperiall ſeat, according to the old cuſtome of their anceſtours the Othoman kings, by right and order onely, and not by corruption or faction. But if he would needs vpon his owne priuate good liking, or as it were by new adoption proceed to make choice of ſuch a one, as the people and the men of warre (his moſt loyall and faithfull ſubiects) could not ſo well like of, it would be

A be an occaſion of much more trouble, and happily the meanes to bring in that confuſion of the ſtate, which he thought thereby to eſchew. For then, beſide the diſlike of the people, the other brethren would neuer endure ſo notable an iniurie, or euer be at quiet, vntill they had (as men wrongfully caſt off and diſinherited) by ſtrong hand and endangering of all, recouered their honour loſt by the headſtrong will of their aged father.

The ſouldiers thus before inſtructed by the friends and fauourites of Selymus, who with money and large promiſes had corrupted their captains & cheefe officers, ſpake theſe things frankly to haue deterred the old emperour from his purpoſe. But he thinking that they had (as he himſelfe did) eſpecially affected Achomates his eldeſt ſonne; for that they had generally proteſted,

B that they would againſt all iniuries defend his honours vnto whom the empire ſhould of right appertaine: ſaid he would make choice of Achomates, if it ſhould ſtand with their good liking. But the cheefe of the ſouldiers, who corrupted by Selymus, had together ſold both their faith & themſelues, cunningly commended Achomates, and ſeemed wonderfully to like of him; yet to accept of him for their ſoueraigne, Baiazet yet liuing, they ſaid was not agreeing with the antient cuſtome of the Othoman kings, neither for the behoofe of the men of war, neither yet good for the ſtate of the empire: for as much as neither his brethren Corcutus and Selymus, neither the ſouldiers of the court, could with patience endure the leaſt touch of the ſuſpition of infidelitie; which they muſt needs doe, if he as a ſuſpitious father ſhould doubt either of the loue or loyaltie of his moſt dutifull ſonnes, or of the faith or conſtancie of his moſt faithfull ſeruants,

C whereof he had made ſo many trials. Beſides that, it ſeemed vnto them all vnreaſonable, that by the odious preiudice of that fact, the ſouldiers ſhould be defrauded of the rewards vſually graunted vnto them during the time of the vacancie of the empire, ariſing of the ſpoile taken from them which are of religion different from the Turkes. For it is a cuſtome, that immediately vpon the death of the Turkiſh emperour, all the Iewes and Chriſtians which liue at CONSTANTINOPLE, PERA, HADRIANOPLE, THESSALONICA, and PRVSA, eſpecially marchants, expoſed vnto the iniuries of the Turkes, are by the Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the court ſpoiled of all their wares and goods, and become vnto them a prey: neither will they giue their oath of allegeance vnto the new emperour, vntill he haue graunted vnto them all that prey, as a bountie, and haue ſolemnely ſworne by his owne head (the greateſt aſſurance

D that can by oath be giuen amongſt the Turkes) freely to pardon all the offenders, and for euer to forget all the outrages before committed. When Baiazet ſaw his men of war thus generally to oppoſe themſelues againſt the tranſlation of the empire to Achomates, he of purpoſe to corrupt the minds of them which were already before corrupted, promiſed to giue them fiue hundred thouſand duckats, if they would ſtand fauourable to Achomates, and accept him for their ſoueraigne: which maſſe of money his cuſtomers and receiuers vndertooke to leuy of the ſame marchant ſtrangers & Iewes, & to pay it as Baiazet had promiſed. Yet the ouerthwart frowardneſſe of theſe men of warre ouercame the good fortune of Achomates, although the reward propoſed, were great: For why, they had in their martiall minds conceiued farre greater rewards and preferments, if in ſtead of a peaceable and quiet prince, a monſtrous tyrant of reſtleſſe na-

E ture (as was Selymus) might by their helpe and meanes aſpire to the empire. Thus Baiazet driuen from his hope, thought it beſt for the preſent to diſſemble the matter; and concealing his greefe, with patience to put vp that diſhonour vntill a fitter opportunitie were offered for the effecting of that he ſo much deſired.

Baiazet ſeeketh to preſer Achomates to the empire.

Selymus aduertiſed from his friends, with what affection and faſtneſſe the ſouldiours of the court had in the ſecret fauour of him openly withſtood the earneſt deſire of Baiazet for the preferment of Achomates, becauſe he would not longer fruſtrate the expectation of his fauorits by lingering and delay, or ſeeme to diſtruſt the readie good will of the men of warre towards him, left the borders of HVNGARIE; and with his armie marching through THRACIA, encamped at length vpon the riſing of an hill not farre from HADRIANOPLE, from whence the neighing

F of his horſes might eaſily be heard, and his tents from the high places of the citie diſcouered. From thence he ſent a meſſenger vnto his father then lying in the citie, to certifie him, That for as much as he had not of many yeares before ſeene him, he was now therefore deſirous to come vnto his preſence to viſit him, before he croſſed the ſeas backe againe by his appointment to TRAPEZOND: and the rather, becauſe it might chance that he ſhould neuer ſee him againe, being now become both aged & diſeaſed: beſides that, it much concerned (as he would haue had him to beleeue) the quietneſſe of his kingdome in Asia, and the vnitie of his children, if the con- G trouerſies betwixt him & his brother Achomates, which could not ſafely be committed to meſſengers, might by themſelues be diſcouered to him their father, as an indifferent hearer & decider of the ſame. Wherefore he humbly beſought him, to appoint him a time and place to giue him audience in, and not to denie him leaue to come and kiſſe his hands; which thing his anceſtors neuer refuſed to grant vnto their poore friends, much leſſe vnto their children. Baiazet who a few daies before vnderſtanding of the comming of Selymus, and throughly ſeeing into his de-uiſes, had called vnto him certaine of his Sanzackes or chiefe captaines, with their ſelect companies out of the neereſt parts of Græcia, and had alſo ſet ſtrong watch and ward through the citie: fearing leaſt vnder the colour of parley his ſouldiors attending about his perſon, corrup- H ted by Selymus & his friends (who euen then loded with gifts and promiſes, were ſecretly vpon the point of reuolt) ſhould be quite drawne away from him, and ſo he himſelfe at length be either by open force oppreſſed, or ſecret trecherie circumuented, thought it beſt to cut him off at once from all hope of conference or acceſſe vnto his preſence. Wherefore ſeriouſly blaming him, that he had vpon his owne head brought his armie into another mans prouince, that he in armes required audience, and laſt of all ſo inſolently abuſed his fathers lenitie and patience; he by the ſame meſſenger ſent him farther word, That he ſhould not preſume to approch any nee-rer vnto him, or expect any thing appertaining to peace: who guarded with forraine power, had without his fathers leaue entered into armes, and ſpoiled the countries of his friends: and that therefore he ſhould do well with all ſpeed to depart out of Thracia, yea and out of Eu- I rope alſo, and diſbanding his forces, againe to retire himſelfe vnto his own charge in Pontus;

in which doing he ſhould find greater fauour & kindnes with him his father, than euer he had before: but if he would needs proceed in the courſe by him begun, that then hee would no more take him for his ſonne, but for his enemie; and before it were long, ſharply chaſtiſe him for his malapert inſolencie, little differing from vnnaturall treacherie. The meſſenger with his anſwere diſmiſſed, it was not long after but that Baiazet was by his eſpials aduertiſed, that Selymus the night following was riſen with his armie, and marched directed towards Constantinople:
whether he was ſent for by his friends, in hope that vpon his approch with his armie, ſome ſud-daine tumult and vprore would to his auaile riſe in that ſo great and populous a citie. Wherupon Baiazet fearing leaſt in ſtaying at Hadrianople, he might loſe the imperiall citie of Con- K stantinople, earely in the morning by breake of the day departed from Hadrianople towards Constantinople: vpon his departure Selymus peaceably entered the citie of Hadrianople, the citizens fearing, that if they ſhould haue made any reſiſtance, their vnſea-ſonable faithfulneſſe towards Baiazet might haue turned to their vtter deſtruction. Selymus after he had a while refreſhed his armie with the plentie of that citie, according to his former determination ſet forward againe, of purpoſe by long and ſpeedie marches to haue preuented his fathers comming to Constantinople. Baiazet was yet ſcarcely come to Chiurlus, or rather Selymus ouer-takethhis father Tzurulum, an ancient ruinous citie almoſt vpon the mid way betwixt Hadrianople and Constantinople, when warning was giuen him of them that followed his armie, that the forerunners of Selymus were at hand, cutting off the ſtraglers of his armie: and with hot skirmi- L ſhing ſtayed and troubled his rereward. The aged emperor more mooned than terrified with the ſtrangeneſſe of the matter, becauſe his marching ſhould not ſeeme as if it were a flight or chaſe, commanded his ſtanderd to be ſet vp, and all his armie to make a ſtand, of purpoſe, that The cheefe men about Baiazet ſecretly fauour Selymus, and diſſuade him from giuing him battaile. if Selymus ſhould ſo fiercely come on to giue him battaile, he might find him in readineſſe. The great captaines and noblemen then preſent with Baiazet, whether it were for old acquaintance, or vpon ſome new inclination of their affection, or els vpon hope of new aliance and preferment wiſhing well vnto Selymus, and therefore indirectly and cunningly fauoring him, ſeemed not to like of Baiazet his reſolution, to be ſo farre moued (as they ſaid) with the youthfull heate and lightneſſe of his ſonne, as to ſeeke reuenge by battell, wheras the victorie it ſelfe could yeeld him nothing but ſorrow, but the ouerthrow threatened deſtruction both to himſelfe and all M them that were with him: the imminent euent whereof ſeemed to bee ſo much the more dangerous and fearefull, by how much he was at that time inferiour vnto his ſonne both in warlike prouiſion and number of men. Wherefore it were good for him (they ſaid) to moderate his anger, and not now in the winding vp of his life to make too much haſt by a miſerable death in a wofull battell to ſtaine the whole glorie of his former life. There was (as they would haue perſuaded

A ſuaded him) but one only courſe to be taken full of wholeſome pollicie and ſafetie, and that was, That he ſhould with ſuch ſpeed as he had begun, march on forward to CONSTANTINOPLE; that ſo Selymus excluded out of the citie (his chiefeſt hope) and then not knowing which way to turne himſelfe, ſhould either of his owne accord, or for feare of his fathers greater forces, thinke of returne: and ſo with his raſcall followers more honeſtly periſh by the hands of them whoſe countries he had ſpoyled, and vpon whom he muſt of neceſſitie liue in his retire, than by the ſword of his father. The author of this counſell was Muſtapha, the moſt auncient Baſſa of thoſe which being in greateſt authoritie about the emperour are onely of his priuie councell, and ſway all matters of importance concerning either peace or warre: he then vpon an vnthankfull and malitious mind loathing Baiazet, as one that had too long raigned, hated him al-
B ſo for certaine priuat diſpleaſures conceiued of the emulation of the other younger Baſſacs by him promoted: and ſecretly bare great affection to Selymus, both in condition and fauour reſembling his grandfather the Great Mahomet, by whom he was brought vp himſelfe, and him of all the ſonnes of Baiazet he thought moſt worthie of the empire. This Muſtapha was borne in the towne of SERES (neere vnto AMPHIPOLIS) the ſonne of a Grecke prieſt, a man of a ſlie craftie and ſubtile wit, alwaies ſubiect to corruption: which deſeaſes of mind were in him well to haue bin diſcouered by his froward looke and ſquint eies, the ceraine notes of a nature to be ſuſpected. Next vnto this Muſtapha was Boſtanges Baſſa, borne of the honourable familie of Ducagina in ÆTHOLIA, and thereof called Ducaginoli: a man for his couetouſneſſe, ambition, and trecherie, infamous; as the foule and miſerable end of his life afterwards declared: Vnto this
C man Selymus had by ſecret promiſe betrothed one of his daughters now mariageable, as a reward of his corrupt faith. By which ſlight, he had alſo allured Aiax (Aga or captaine of the Ianizaries, and great Maſter of the houſhold) to promiſe his aid for the obtaining of the empire; whereunto he ſaid he was by deſtinie called: and by his meanes drew other inferior captaines ſecretly to fauour his quarrell, vnto whom he ſpared not to promiſe whatſoeuer might pleaſe them. Yea the captaines almoſt generally either corrupted with reward, or for feare following the inclination of the greater commanders, of themſelues leaned that way. Of all the reſt, only Cherſeogles Baſſa (whom the Turkes hiſtories call alſo Achmet Hertezec-ogli) a faithfull, conſtant, and vpright man, free from all double dealing and deceit, a faſt and aſſured friend vnto Baiazet his father in law, was of opinion, That the immoderate pride & inſolencie of Selymus, was
D euen there by force of armes and ſtrong hand forthwith to be oppreſſed, before he ſhould approch any neerer vnto the imperiall citie, for feare of raiſing ſome farther trouble and tumult there than were well to be appeaſed; which was the thing that Selymus his friends moſt of all deſired. Neither was it to be thought (as Cherſeogles ſaid) that the naked Tartarian horſemen, although they were in number moe, would euer be able to abide the firſt charge of Baiazet his wel armed penſioners. As for the Ianizaries, of whoſe approued faith and valor tried in maine dangers, he had before had good experience: there was no doubt but that they would now to the vttermoſt of their power, defend the perſon and honour of their aged and victorious emperor, who had of long time ſo well of them deſerued; and alſo to reuenge his quarrell vpon diſobe-
E dient Selymus, who neither fearing God the iuſt reuenger of ſuch vngratious dealing, neither the infamie of men, had moſt vnnaturally lift vp his ſword againſt his father, wickedly to depriue him of life of whom he had receiued life. Wherfore he perſuaded him in his own iuſt quarrell, to go forth vnto his ſouldiors with cheerefull countenance, and putting them in remembrance of the benefits they had from time to time moſt bountifully receiued at his hands, as alſo of their allegeance and dutie; to make them to vnderſtand, that repoſing his truſt in their fidelitie and valour, he had reſolutely ſet down with himſelfe, in that place before he went any further, by their faithfull hands to chaſtiſe the preſumptious inſolencie of his vnnaturall ſonne, togither with his rebellious followers.

Cherſeogles Baſſa the only great man faithfull to Baiazet, perſuadeth him to giue battel to Selymus.

But now that we are fallen into the remembrance of this Cherſeogles, it ſhall not be amiſſe both for the honour of the man, and the great loue he alwaies bare vnto the Chriſtians, to ſtep
F a little out of the way, to ſee the cauſe why he being a Chriſtian borne, turned Turke. For hee was not (as almoſt all the reſt of the great men about Baiazet were) of a child taken from his Chriſtian parents, and ſo brought vp in the Mahometan religion; but being now a man grown, turned Turke: yet ſo, as that he neuer in heart forgot either the Chriſtian religion or loue toward the Chriſtians; a thing not common among ſuch renegates. He being the ſonne of one

Cherſechius a ſmal prince of ILLYRIA, neere vnto the Blacke mountaine, and going to be ma- G ried vnto a ladie whom he moſt entirely loued, and vnto whom he was alreadie betrothed, honourably deſcended of the houſe of the Deſpot of SERVIA: his intemperat father, with luſtfull eye beholding the young ladie of rare feature and incomperable beautie, deſired to haue her for himſelfe; and regarding more the ſatisfying of his own inordinate deſire, than his owne honor or the fatherly loue of his ſonne, tooke her in mariage himſelfe: all his friends labouring in vain to diſſuade him, and with open mouth crying ſhame of ſo foule a fact. Wherefore the young man, moued with the indignitie of ſo great an iniurie, and driuen headlong with deſpaire, fled firſt to the Turks garriſons which lay not farre off, and from thence to CONSTANTINOPLE:
where the fortune of the man was to bee wondred at: For being brought before Baiazet, who with cheerfull countenance entertained him for that he was honourably deſcended, and wel li- H ked both of the man and of the cauſe of his reuolt: ſmiling vpon him ſaid, Be of good cheere noble youth, for thy great courage is worthie of far greater fortune than thy fathers houſe can affoord thee; now in ſteed of thy loue wrongfully taken from thee by thy father, the kinſwoman of a poore exiled prince, thou ſhalt haue giuen thee in mariage the daughter of a great em-perour, of rare and ſingular perfection. And not long after, abiuring his religion, and changing his name of Stephen to Achomates and Cherſeogles, hee married one of Baiazet his daughters, a princeſſe of great beautie: and deſerued to haue a place amongſt the Baſſaes of greateſt honour in the court. Yet ſtill retaining the remembrance of his former profeſſion with a deſire to returne thereto againe: inſomuch, that he kept in his ſecret cloſet the image of the crucifex, which he ſhewed to Io. Laſcaris as to his truſtie friend, as he himſelfe reported. This man at ſuch time I as the citie of MODON was taken by the Turkes, and a multitude of poore Chriſtian captiues cruelly put to death in the ſight of Baiazet, by earneſt intreatie ſaued the Venetian Senatours there taken: and afterward by earneſt ſuit deliuered Andreas Gritti, being priſoner at CON-STANTINOPLE and condemned to die, who not many yeares after was choſen duke of VE-NICE. He was the chiefe meanes whereby the Venetians to their great good obtained peace of Baiazet. He alſo by his great authoritie and of his owne charge, redeemed innumerable Chriſtians from the ſeruitude of the Turkes, and ſet them at libertie. Neither is his kindneſſe towards the furtherance of good learning to be forgotten: for at ſuch time as the aforeſaid Io. Laſcaris, the notable and learned Grecian, by the appointment of Leo the tenth ſought for the auncient works of famous writers, he procured the Turkiſh emperors letters patents, that he might free- K ly at his pleaſure ſearch all the libraries in GRÆCIA, to the great benefit of good letters. Now Baiazet encouraged by this mans perſuaſion (as is aforeſaid) and hearing as he lay in his pauillion the alarum of the enemie, with the tumult and clamour of his own ſouldiers, as if they had been men afraid; and ſundrie meſſengers alſo at the ſame time comming vnto him with news, That Selymus with his Tartarian horſemen had almoſt encloſed the rereward of his armie, and alreadie taken ſome of his baggage: grinding his teeth for verie madneſſe and griefe of mind, with teares trickling downe his hoarie cheekes, got him out of his pauillion in his horſelitter (for he was at the ſame time ſo troubled with the gout, that he was not able to ſit on horſebacke) and

The ſpeech of Baiazet to the Ianizaries and ſouldiors of the court.

Will you (foſter children, valiant ſouldiours, and faithfull keepers of my perſon, who with great good fortune haue ſerued me in field aboue the ſpace of thirtie yeares; and for your faithfull and good ſeruice, haue both in time of peace and warre, of me receiued ſuch rewards, as by your owne confeſſion and thankeſgiuing farre exceeded your owne expectation, and the meaſure of our treaſures) Will you I ſay ſuffer the innocent father to be butchered by his graceleſſe ſonne? And your old emperour tormented with age and diſeaſes, to bee cruelly muthereed by a companie of wild Tartars, little better than arrant roagues and theeues? Shall I bee now forſaken in this my beauie old age and laſt act of life? and ſhall I bee deliuered vnto mine enemies by them, by them I ſay, who many yeares ago with great faithfulneſſe and inuincible courage defended myne honour and right againſt my brother Ze- M mes? and haue manie times ſince, not onely valiantly defended this empire againſt moſt warlike nations, but alſo moſt victoriouſly augmented the ſame? But I will not ſo eaſily beleeue that which to my no ſmall greeſe is brought vnto mine eares, concerning the reuolting of mine armie: neither if I did beleeue it, am I ſo feareſull as to bee therewith diſcouraged, or to ſeeke to make ſhift for my ſelfe.

For

A For to what purpose should I thinke of flight? as though I could in any other place find more faithfulnesse or surer defence than with you? And concerning your selues, what should be your hope by this so infamous treacherie? If any of you (for I cannot beleeue that you are all so mad) without regard of faith, of worldly shame, or the feare of God, haue polluted your minds with the pernitious conceit of so foule a treason; doe you thinke to gaine greater rewards and preferments by your treacherie and villanie, than by your fidelitie and constancie? There be manie which carefull of my person, perswade mee to reserue this my sicke and feeble bodie vnto my better fortune, and to commit my selfe to flight; so rather to saue my life with shame and infamie, than to end my daies with honour and glorie: Which is so farre from my thought for the apprehension of any feare to doe, that I will to the contrarie forthwith
B giue the fierce enemie battell; and in this my last danger make proofe of all your fidelitie and valour, and of euerie one of your good wils in particular: and so by conduct of the highest, either defeat the power and breake the strength of this graceless man, or else hauing raigned aboue thirtie yeares an emperour, end my daies together with them which shall vnto the end continue with me in their faithfulnesse and loyaltie, although I should be most shamefully and dishonourably betraied and forsaken of some of mine owne guard: which thing though lying fame would make me beleeue, yet will I not feare it vntill I see the proofe thereof.

The common sort of the Ianizaries, vnto whom the great commaunders and captaines corrupted by Selymus, had not for their leuitie and multitude communicated their purpose of trans-
C ferring the empire to Selymus: began to crie out as if it had been with generall consent, That he should not doubt to ioine battell with his enemies, and so to make proofe of their constant fidelitie and wonted valour. Which was done with such a cheerefulnesse and desire expressed by great shouts, clapping of hands, and clattering of armour; that it seemed they would play the parts of resolute souldiours, and that as guiltlesse men they tooke it grieuously to be once suspected of treason or infidelitie. Others also who secretly and in heart were well affected to Selymus, for fashion sake followed them with like crie: but especially the great commaunders both of the armie, and of the emperours court, now changing their affection (whether it were for shame of the fact, or for feare of discouering themselues out of season, is vncertain.) Wherfore according to the maner of such men, which through their mutabilitie and mischieuous dis-
D position, fearing to be conuinced and discouered, add vnto the present a second & new treason or trecherie, to couer the former: so Mustapha and Bostanges (not daring now to shew themselues for Selymus) to make a great shew of their faigned loyaltie towards Baiazet, departed themselues out of his pauillion, to encourage the souldiours and to martiall the battell.

The common sort of the Ianizaries faithfull to Baiazet desire battell.

Baiazet sicke in his chariot, by the aduise of Cherseogles the faithfull Bassa, placed his battel in this order: The Sanzakes (which are the gouernours of prouinces) with their horsemen, in number about six thousand, he set in the front of the battel: The Spachi-oglans and Siliphtars, which are the chiefe horsemen of the court (and as it were the emperours pensioners) were placed as two wings on each side of the great squadron of the Ianizaries; in the middest whereof was old Baiazet himselfe. Other foure thousand horsemen (seruants to the great men of the court) were
E left in the rearward, and to guard the baggage. These slaues (for so indeed they are) for their apparell and furniture, yea and valour also, are little inferior to their masters, by whom they are so sumptuously maintained both for strength and ostentation. The battell thus ordered, Baiazet commanded the trumpers to sound, and a red ensigne in token of battel to be displaied. On the other side, Selymus placing his Tartarian horsemen in both wings, and his Turks in the middest in manner of a halfe moone, for that he in number of horsemen farre exceeded his father, did almost on euerie side inclose him, and so charge him. The Tartars when they were come within an hundred paces of their enemies, casting themselues (after the manner of their fight) into great rings, emptie within in manner of a crowne, and so running round, that they might both backward and forward deliuer their arrowes, cast vpon their enemies whole showers of shot as F if it had beene haile, to the great annoyance of the Turks: when as in the meane time, the other Tartarian archers farther off, shooting their arrowes not right forth, but more vpright towards heauen, which falling directly downe sore gauled the Turkes horses also. But the old souldiours (taught by the example of their captaines) serred close together, and casting their targets ouer their heads, as if it had beene one whole roofe or penthouse, receiued their arrowes with lesse harme, and hasted with as much speed as they could to come to handie blowes. The pensioners alſo at the ſame inſtant brauely charged the middle of Selymus his battell, where his Turkiſh horſemen ſtood: and Aiax (captain of the Ianizaries) drawing out ſeuen hundred readie harquebuſiers out of the ſqadron of the Ianizaries, with them aſſailed the hindmoſt of one of the wings of the Tartars: and the foure thouſand ſeruants left in the rereward, as deſirous as the reſt to ſhew their forwardnes, with great ſlaughter repulſed the other wing of the Tartars, which came to haue ſpoiled the Turks carriages. This fierce battell betwixt the father and the ſonne, with doubtfull euent endured from noone vntill the going down of the Sunne: Selymus in many places ſtill reſtoring his declining battell, and fighting himſelfe, as for an empire. But after that the Tartars, hardly charged by the harquebuſiers, were not able to abide the ſhot, eſpecially their horſes being with the vnwonted noiſe therof wonderfully terrified, and ſo carrying backe their riders whether they would or no, began to flie; the reſt of the horſemen could neither by commandement, threatening, or wounds, be enforced to ſtay, but turned their backes and fled. The footmen alſo whom Selymus had attired and armed after the manner of the Ianizaries, being forſaken of their owne horſemen, were now by Baiazet his horſemen compaſſed about and almoſt all ſlaine.

Selymus his armie put to flight

Selymus his armie thus ouerthrowne, and himſelfe hardly beſet, was by certain troupes of his Turkiſh horſemen which yet ſtaied with him, deliuered from the preſent daunger; and being wounded, was mounted vpon a freſh horſe, and ſo with all the ſpeed he could fled after the Tartars. But doubting to be purſued and ouertaken by his fathers ſpeedie horſemen, he changed his horſe, and tooke another of a wonderfull ſwiftneſſe: and ſo reſeruing himſelfe to his future fortune, with a few of his followers fled to VARNA, and from thence by ſea to CAPHA.

The eſtimation Selymus had of his horſe whereon he eſcaped from his father.

The horſe whereon Selymus fled, was all cole blacke, called Carabulo (that is to ſay, a blacke cloud) whom Selymus as a good ſeruitour euer after exempted from all ſeruice: and had him in ſuch eſtimation, that couered with cloth of gold, he was as a ſpare horſe without a rider led after him in all his great expeditions, firſt into PERSIA, and afterward into ÆGIPT, where he died at CAIRE, and there to the imitation of Bucephalus, Great Alexanders horſe, had a monument erected for him: wherein Selymus ſhewed himſelfe more kind than to his owne brethren, whom he cruelly murthered, and hardly affoorded to ſome of them ſo honourable a ſepulture.

In this battell of fortie thouſand which Selymus brought into the field, eſcaped not aboue eight thouſand, but they were either ſlaine or taken priſoners. Of Baiazet his armie were loſt about ſeuen hundred, and three thouſand hurt with Tartarian arrows: which loſſe he preſently reuenged, with extreame crueltie cauſing all ſuch as were taken priſoners, to be without mercie put to the ſword in his ſight; whoſe heads were laid together by heaps, and their dead bodies as if they had been towers. Of this notable battell betwixt the father and the ſonne in the yeare 1511, CHIVRLVS, called in ancient time TZVRVLVM, before an obſcure old ruinous citie (or as Iouius calleth it, a village) became famous; but much more afterwards by the fatall deſtinie of Selymus: who not many yeres after (ſtrucken with a moſt loathſome and incurable diſeaſe) ended his daies in the ſame place with an vntimely and tormenting death, God (as is to be thought) with reuenging hand in the ſame place taking iuſt puniſhment for his former diſloyaltie towards his aged father, as ſhall hereafter be in due time and place declared.

Three daies Baiazet lay ſtill in the ſame place where he had obtained the victorie, vntill ſuch time as all his ſouldiours were againe returned from the chaſe of the enemie: after that, he held on his way to CONSTANTINOPLE, and there bountifully rewarded his ſouldiours. In the meane time Achomates hearing of all the trouble which had happened betwixt his father and his brother Selymus, with the euent therof, came with an armie of twentie thouſand from AMASIA, through the countries of GALATIA and BITHYNIA, vnto the citie of SCVTARI, called in ancient time CHRISOPOLIS (though ſome ſuppoſe it to haue beene the famous citie of CHALCEDON) which citie is ſituated vpon the ſtrait of Boſphorus directly againſt the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE. In this place Achomates encamped his armie, neere vnto the ſea ſide, expecting what courſe his father ſhould take after ſo great a victorie. For beſide the prerogatiue of his age, and the eſpeciall loue of his father towards him, the generall affection of the vulgar people, with the good opinion he had of himſelfe, had alreadie filled his mind with the hope of the empire: wherefore he ceaſed not night and day to ſend meſſengers ouer that narrow ſtrait to CONSTANTINOPLE, and earneſtly to ſolicite Baiazet his father in ſo fit an occaſion to make haſt

A haſt to diſpatch what he had ſo long before determined, concerning the reſignation of the empire. He alſo importuned his friends and familiars in beſt manner he could to commend him to his father, and in moſt ample ſort to extoll his graue purpoſe for tranſlation of the empire; and to doe the vttermoſt of their deuoire, that ſeeing God and good fortune had iuſtly ouerthrowne the raſh attempt and force of his brother Selymus, he by their good meanes might the ſooner obtaine the empire, whereof he was the vndoubted heire.

Baiazet, who of himſelfe and according to his old good liking was altogether deſirous of the preferment of Achomates, was by their perſwaſions eaſily entreated to haſten the performance of that he had before determined for the transferring of the empire. And making no great ſecret B of the matter, commanded certaine gallies to be made readie for the tranſporting of Achomates from SCVTARI to CONSTANTINOPLE. But the great Baſſaes with the ſouldiers of the court (the ſecret fauourits of Selymus) vnderſtanding the matter, began againe openly to reſiſt and impugne his purpoſed determination, and to alleage the ſame reaſons they had before at HADRIANOPLE alleaged: in fine they ſaid plainely, That they would by no meanes ſuffer him ſo farre to diſable himſelfe as an inſufficient man to reſigne the empire, who of late had with ſo valiant and courageous an heart fought for the honour of his crowne and dignitie; and that therefore ſo long as he liued, they would acknowledge no other ſoueraigne but Baiazet: yet for all that as they meant not thereby to cut off Achomates his hope, ſo neither ought he to diſtruſt the good will of the men of warre; but that he being a man of moſt approued and knowne va- C lour, might in due time with their generall good liking enioy his right, which ſhould then without all queſtion be due vnto him as the eldeſt ſonne of their emperour. They ſaid moreouer, that they had in the late battaile againſt Selymus ſufficiently declared what minds they were of both towards their emperour and Achomates, and what confidence they were to repoſe in the fidelitie of their ſouldiers, who to manifeſt their faithfulneſſe and loyaltie, had not refuſed to offer themſelues vnto the hazard of a moſt vnequall battaile, yea their liues vnto death it ſelfe. O foule diſſimulation, the couert maske of all miſchiefe, vnder which, meere trecherie is here pretended for great loyaltie, the aged emperour too too much flattered; Achomates ſhamefully deluded, and (the man that might not as then without ſome addition of diſgrace be named) Selymus, euen bloudie Selymus, ſecretly ſought for aboue all men to be preferred!

Baiazet willing to prefer Achomates to the empire.

D Baiazet by this offwardneſſe and inſolencie of the ſouldiers againe diſappointed of his purpoſe, or elſe (as ſome thought) delighted with the ſweetneſſe of ſoueraignetie: for that after the late victorie he ſeemed (as one growne young againe) neither to feele himſelfe old or vnable ſtill to gouerne ſo great an empire; ſent word to Achomates, how the matter ſtood, & that he ſhould forthwith depart from SCVTARI to his old charge at AMASIA, from whence he would againe call him at ſuch time as he had with new bountie won the minds of the ſouldiers, and procured the good liking of other the great men in court, whereby ſo great a matter and not vſuall, might the better and with more ſecuritie be effected.

Achomates thus deceiued of his hope and expectation, greeuouſly complaining that he was ſo mocked of his father, and contemned of the ſouldiers of the court, began to mix his new re- E queſt with words of heat and diſcontentment, and to inueigh againſt his father, for making him a byword (as he tearmed it) and a laughing ſtocke vnto the world, after he had taken the paines to come ſo farre, and that by his ſpeciall appointment. But if he proceeded ſo to doate, and to make ſo great reckoning of the ſouldiers of the court, that in reſpect thereof he neither regarded his promiſe, nor that was right and iuſt, he would himſelfe by force of armes take vp- on him the defence of his owne honour and right, ſo light eſteemed by his father, and reuenge the diſgrace offered vnto him by others.

Whereunto Baiazet anſwered by the Cadeleſcher (which is a man of greateſt place and authoritie amongſt the Turks in matters concerning their ſuperſtition, and therefore of them honoured aboue others, as the ſacred interpreter of their law) that he did neither well nor wiſely F without iuſt cauſe to fall into ſo great rage and choller, as by his ſpeech and force to thinke to extort that good which was onely by loue and loyaltie to be gained: whereas all things ſhould be ſurely kept for him, and the empire vndoubtedly deſcend vnto him, if by vntimely haſt he did not marre that hope which he ought by ſufferance and patient expectation to cheriſh: he might (as the Cadeleſcher told him) learne by the late example and fortune of his brother Selymus, what might be for his owne good and welfare; and that it was a thing of far more danger, deſpe-desperatly to thrust himselfe headlong into such an action as he could not possibly see the end of, than moderating by reason his hot passions, to expect with patience the oportunitie of time, and fitnesse of occasion, with the alteration of matters, all tending to his good. G

Achomates enflamed with anger and greefe of the repulse, all the while the Cadelescher was deliuering his fathers message, gaue him many sharpe taunts, and had much adoe to stay himselfe from offering of him violence; oftentimes threatening him, that in short time both his father should deerely buy the changing of his purpose, and the souldiers of the court their trecherous dealing: and so sending him away with this short answere, he presently rise with his armie, and passing through BITHYNIA, cruelly spoiled the country in his returne to AMASIA. There daily more and more enflamed with the greefe and the indignitie of the repulse before receiued, he determined to inuade the lesser ASIA: that if it should so fall out, that he must needs by force of armes trie his right against either of his brethren, he might therein vse the wealth of that rich prouince. Whereby if it should chance that he should by the practise of any faile of the whole empire, yet he should at the leastwise be possessed of the one halfe therof, and be the readier for all euents, hauing all those great and rich prouinces in his power. Wherefore calling vnto him his two sonnes, Amurathes and Aladin, yong princes of great hope, after he had greeuously complained of the vnkindnesse of his father Baiazet, and of the iniuries done against him by his enemies in the court, he declared vnto them, that there was now no hope left for him to obtain the empire, except they would forthwith enter into arms with him, and so together with him defend both his and their owne right and honour, against the mallice and iniuries of their enemies: which he said, would be an easie matter to doe by supprising the lesser ASIA, if they they would courageously aduenture vpon it; for as much as all PISIDIA, LYCAONIA, PAMPHYLIA, with the sea coast of IONIA, were not as then kept with any armie or nauie: and as for his brother Corcutus, there was no great doubt to be made of him, who according to his quiet disposition would be content either to sit still, or else in regard of his iust quarrell take part with him; or if he would needs intermeddle his quiet estate with the troubled, and so enter into armes, might easily be thrust out of whatsoeuer he possessed: as for the gouernours of the rest of the prouinces, he doubted not, but that they would also yeeld either to his commaund or fortune. Wherefore he willed them to plucke vp their hearts as men of courage, and to goe into the countries thereabouts to take vp men, and whatsoeuer else were needfull for the warres. These gallants, of their owne youthfull disposition readie ynough for such a matter, and now encouraged with their fathers persuasion, did what they were by him commanded, and had in short time raised a notable armie of voluntarie souldiers, of whom the greatest part were of seruile condition. But Achomates himselfe, besides his old armie which he had in former time lead against the Persian rebels, leuied new forces also, and called forth into the field all the able men that were to be found in the cities round about: and so running through the prouince, proclaimed himself king of ASIA, and such as would not forthwith yeeld vnto him, those he and his two sonnes in diuers places prosecuted with all hostilitie: by which meanes many cities, especially such as were but weakely fortified, partly for feare, partly by constraint were deliuered ouer vnto him. H I K L

Achomates inciteth his two sons Amurat and Aladin to take part with him against their grandfather Baiazet.

After that, he entered with his armie into LYCAONIA, and the borders of CILICIA, where by embassadours and often letters he requested Mahometes his brothers sonne (who then gouerned those countries) to aid him in his iust quarell against them, who by craftie and sinister persuasions had to his dishonour and disgrace withdrawne his fathers good will from him, and so farre seduced him, as that he was determined to appoint another successour in the empire, than him his eldest and first begotten sonne: which their mallice he would (as he said) preuent, and by force of armes recouer his right, which his father knowing to be due vnto him, was about to haue put him in possession of whilest he yet liued, had he not by the sinister practise of others beene hindered: for the recouery whereof, if Mahometes would out of his prouince aid him with men and victuall, and so further his iust cause, he promised that he should find a farre better vncle than he had found a father; and that his present friendship should in time be most amply and bountifully requited. M

Whereunto Mahometes answered, that he could not do what his vncle had required, except he were so cõmanded by his grandfather Baiazet, whom alone he acknowledged for his dread soueraign: & that it was not for him to iudge, whether he did right or otherwise, That he would not

A in his life time resigne the empire to his sonne. But this (he said) he was not ignorant of, that he was not to yeeld his obedience to any other, so long as he liued possessed of the empire: to whom both his father Tzihan Shach whilest he liued, and himselfe also had giuen their oath of obedience and loyaltie. Wherefore it were good for him to pacifie himselfe, least in seeking vntimely reuenge of his enemies, he should to the offence of all men wrong his father: and by too much heat and hast ouerthrow both his hope and honour; which of right should be most great, if he could but in the meane time haue patience, and stay himselfe a while. Achomates, who expected nothing lesse than such an answere, but thought that Mahometes would either for loue or feare haue presently come vnto him; and now finding his requests to be with greater grauitie and consideration denied by his nephew, than they were by reason of him demaunded;
B entred with his armie into the borders of his prouince, and with fire & sword began to destroy the countrey before him. Which Mahometes with such power as he had thinking to remedie, was by the way encountered by his vncle not farre from LARENDA, and there ouerthrowne: and taking that citie for refuge, was there certaine daies besieged by Achomates; and at last together with his brother (then but a child) deliuer into his hands, at such time as the citie was by the fearefull citizens by composition yeelded vnto him. Achomates hauing taken the citie with his two nephewes, caused Mahometes his counsellors, with his foster brother, by whose persuasion it was supposed that he had so answered his vncle and endangered himselfe, to be put to death.

These proceedings of Achomates filled Baiazet with griefe and indignation, that he should in 1512
C so great yeares be set vpon by two of his owne sonnes, one after the other. Yet to proue if those troubles might without more bloudshed be pacified, he sent his embassadours vnto him to reproue him for his disloialtie; and to command him forthwith to set at libertie his two nephewes, Mahometes and his brother, and so without more stir to get him againe to AMESIA: which if he should refuse to doe, then to denounce vnto him open warre. But he, which by how much the more he had after his repulse ambitiously affected the empire, had resolued with himselfe to deale so much the more cruelly in his proceedings: hauing receiued this message from his father, caused the chiefe embassador (for that he had in franke speech deliuered his message and denounced vnto him wars) to be in his owne presence put to death; and threatned the rest with the like, if before the going downe of the sunne they voided not his campe.

Baiazet sendeth embassadors to Achomates.

Achomates killeth his fathers embassadours.

D This outrage highly offended Baiazet, and alienated the minds of many before well affected to Achomates: for that without any reuerence of his father and contrarie to the law of nations, he had violated the embassadours sent to him for peace. Vpon the first brute hereof, the souldiers which then waited at the court gate, in the hearing of Baiazet exclaimed, that the insolencie of Achomates was not longer to be suffered, but forthwith by force to be represt; that by sufferance and delay he would grow from euill to worse; and that if Baiazet should prolong the time, and in fatherly sort seeke by faire meanes to reclaime him, he should afterwards in vaine craue the aide of his best souldiers against his rebellious sonne strengthened by his owne long sufferance. Mustapha also the chiefe Bassa, with Bostanges and others of great place (who secretly fauoured Selymus, and had cunningly caused these things by fit men to be dispersed amongst E the souldiers) began at the first to mutter, and as it were to wonder at the strangenesse and hainousnesse of the fact; in such slie sort, as if they had condemned the deed done, but not the doer. But afterward, when they saw that Baiazet was throughly heated, both by his owne angrie disposition and the speech of the soldiers, and vpon the confidence of his former victorie against Selymus, now readie to seeke reuenge; they began then to heape fresh coles vpon the fire, and bitterly to inuay against Achometes, as a traitour to his aged father and the state; and withall highly commended the fidelitie and courage of the Ianizaries and souldiers of the court, who for the safetie and honour of their aged emperour, were most prest and ready to expose themselues, their liues, and whatsoeuer else they had, vnto new dangers.

So was Achomates by the craft and subtiltie of these great men, by the anger of his father, Achomates proclaimed traitor.
F and the iudgement of the souldiers, proclaimed traitour; and order taken, that the souldiers of the court with the Europeian horsemen, should with all possible speed be sent against him into ASIA. But when choice was to be made of some valiant and worthie Generall that might take vpon him so great a charge, which seemed especially to appertaine vnto some one of the great Bassaes: it was strange to see, how they all began to straine courtesie at that preferment, and eue-

rie one to refuſe the place and diſable himſelfe, ſaying, That it were a great Indignitie, that the G emperours armie ſhould be led againſt his ſonne by any of his ſeruants: and the ſouldiours (hauing their leſſon before hand) ſaid plainly, That they durſt not, nor would not draw their ſwords or lift vp their hands againſt the ſonne of the emperour, and heire apparant of the empire, except they were conducted and commanded by ſome of the Othoman bloud in perſon preſent with them: for ſo had his brother, long before when he rebelled in CILICIA, and now of late Selymus his rebellious ſonne, been both ouerthrowne and vanquiſhed, euen by the conduct of Baiazet himſelfe, and not by any of his ſeruants. Theſe things all tended to this purpoſe, that Selymus might by indirect meanes be reconciled to his father (whom they ſecretly fauoured, although for feare of diſpleaſure they durſt not ſo much as name him but by way of diſgrace) and by this verie meanes to make way for his returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, and ſo conſequently H giue him power to ſeaze vpon the empire. For it was probably ſuppoſed, that neither Baiazet himſelfe, being verie aged and diſeaſed; neither Corcutus, altogether buried in his ſtudie, would vndertake the managing of thoſe wars: ſo that of the Othoman familie only Selymus was left, to whom that charge might be committed, all the nephewes of Baiazet by reaſon of their tender yeares, as yet vnfit for the ſame. At theſe ſpeeches of the Baſſaes and the ſouldiors, Baiazet as a man perplexed and in a chafe, flung away into his pallace, excuſing himſelfe by his great yeares and diſeaſed bodie: but complaining deepely, that Corcutus in following the vaine title of learning, with a quiet contented kind of life, had in the meane time neglected other ſtudies and honourable qualities, better beteeming his princely birth and calling. As he was thus reaſoning with himſelfe, and deuiſing what courſe to take; Muſtapha the old Baſſa, who all the time of his I raigne had vſed to diſburden him of his cares, hauing by way of talke drawne him into a full diſcourſe concerning the proceeding to the intended warre, ſet vpon him with this craftie and premeditated ſpeech, framed of purpoſe for his deſtruction.

The craftie oration of the great Baſſa Muſtapha to Baiazet, for the bringing home of Selymus

Your Maieſtie may not (moſt dread Soueraigne) although by yeares and ſtrength of bodie you were neuer ſo well able, you may not I ſay, either tranſport your armie, or your ſelfe paſſe ouer in perſon into ASIA; leaſt whileſt you are there, from place to place chaſing Achomates, you leaue a far more dangerous enemie behind you in EVROPE; who may in your abſence ſeaze vpon THRACIA, GRÆCIA, yea and the imperiall citie it ſelfe, deſtitute of ſufficient defendants. Doe we not heare, that Selymus is raiſing of new forces aboue VARNA? to expect a new ſupply of horſemen from the K Tartar king his father in law? and already as it were houering ouer our heads? Is he not of greater ſpirit and courage, than to be daunted or diſmaied with the misfortune of one battell? or if you ſhall ſend ouer your old beaten ſouldiers into ASIA, and call Corcutus into EVROPE with the forces he leuied the laſt yeare, who in time of your ſicknes may withſtand the attempts of Selymus: will he feare theſe freſh water ſouldiers of ASIA, or their philoſophicall Generall, which feared not the ſouldiers of your court, the pickt and choſen men of the world, and your ſelfe a moſt worthie and victorious emperour? You are deceiued, and (if I may be ſo bold ſo to ſay) you throughly ſee not into the doubtfull euent of things, if you thinke not that you muſt at one time wage warre againſt two dangerous enemies, euen in the remoteſt parts of your empire, in ASIA and EVROPE: for whileſt you ſhall goe about to expulſe Achomates out of CAPADOCIA, Selymus neerer at hand, and waiting all opportunitie; will by L and by at your backe, raiſe a moſt dangerous warre in the very heart and chiefe ſtrength of your empire. But if you moued with the greatneſſe and due conſideration of the danger, ſhall goe about to defend THRASIA, and for that purpoſe retaine with you the moſt approued and faithfull ſouldiers of the court, you ſhall ſee all ASIA on a fire before your face: neither will Achomates make an end of waſt and warre, vntill ſuch time as he haue drawne the empire of ASIA to himſelfe. Wherefore if it be not to be imputed to your fault, but to your fate or fortune, that two begotten of your ſelfe, ſhould by your ſelfe and the conſent of all men be adiudged traitours vnto your crowne and dignitie; whereof the one through raſhneſſe, the other vpon pride and vaine diſcontentment, hath riſen vp in armes againſt you: why doe you not in ſo doubtfull and perplext a matter, preferre ſafe and ſound aduiſe before that which maſketh vnder the ſhew of maieſtie and honour? and whom you cannot both at one M time correct and be reuenged vpon, to ſet vpon them as occaſion ſhall ſerue when they are togither by the eares betwixt themſelues? This is the onely hope of your ſafetie, this is the onely way, if you ſhall reſolue (as the common prouerbe ſaith) to driue out one naile with another, and ſo to ouercome your enemies. Moderate a while your hoat deſire of reuenge, and for the preſent diſſemble your griefe;

A griefe; grant vnto one of them pardon, and in shew take him into your grace and fauour, imploy him against the other: so shall you without danger, howsoeuer it fall out, persecute the one whom you loue not, with the bastard of the other whom you trust not: and at your pleasure oppresse him, to whom you shall commit your ensignes and armie; the hands of your faithfull and trustie souldiers being euen at your appointment readie to take reuenge. So shall you with securitie make an end of this warre, exposing vnto the danger him whom you had rather to ouercome (as your enemie) by him whom you wish also to perish.

Mustapha had scarce made an end of speaking, but the other Bassaes (as they had before
B agreed amongst themselues) began where he left, & with all their cunning laboured to perswade Baiazet to call home his sonne Selymus, and to make him Generall of his armie against his brother: saying, That he had alreadie endured sufficient punishment for his former disloyaltie, and that therfore it was like that he as a well corrected child would from thenceforth containe himselfe within the compasse of his most dutifull obedience: whereas Achomates proud of his birthright, hauing of late violated his fathers embassadours, and filled all Asia with rebellion, was not like to be brought to any reasonable conformitie, vntill he were by force of armes pluckt downe, and so made to know himselfe, in like manner as was his brother Selymus of late. Baiazet seeing that in resoluing of a matter of so great consequence, Cherseogles Bassa (his sonne in law, and the onely faithfull counsellour then about him) sat all silent, hanging the head, as a man not
C of the same opinion with the rest, stood a great while in doubt what to resolue vpon: he could not so easily forget the late iniuries done against him by Selymus, it was yet fresh in memorie, how that he had out of Asia inuaded Evrope, surprised Hadrianople, giuen him battaile, endangered his person with his Tartarian horsemen, and that onely by the goodnesse of God he had obtained the victorie: on the other side, his Maiestie contemned, his nephewes imprisoned, his embassadours violated, the cities of Asia ransacked, and all those goodly countries presently smoking with the fire of rebellion, so filled his old heart with anger and indignation, as that he desired nothing more than to be reuenged. Whilest he was thus strogling with his owne thoughts, and doubtfull what to doe, the vnfaithfull Bassaes by deepe deceit and treacherie (Cherseogles most instantly perswading the contrary) ouercame him so farre, as with
D his owne hand to write letters to Selymus, promising him, that forgetting all iniuries past, he would vpon the hope of his loyaltie, receiue him into his former grace and fauour, and make him Generall of his armie, if he would without delay repaire to Constantinople, and so passe ouer into Asia against his rebellious brother Achomates.

Whilest these things are in doing at Constantinople, Corcutus aduertised by letters from his friends of the weake estate of his aged father, and by what perswasions he had beene induced (after Achomates was proclaimed traitor) to call vnto him Selymus, and to make him Generall of his armie; came downe out of Magnesia to Phocis, and there embarking himselfe in his gallies, sailed to Constantinople: where being arriued, he went presently to the court, attended vpon with a great number of his friends and fauourites; and entring into the priuie
E chamber, humbled himselfe before his father, and kissed his hand: and after much talke had betwixt them of diuers weightie matters, is reported to haue spoken vnto him as followeth.

Corcutus commeth to Constantinople.

It is now aboue thirtie yeeres past (most reuerend father, and dread Soueraigne) since that I (being chosen and proclaimed Emperour by the prerogatiue of the souldiers of the court, by generall consent of the citizens of this imperiall citie, and by the graue iudgement of the wise and graue Bassaes of the Court) haue cheerefully and willingly, and as I may truly say, with mine owne hand deliuered from my selfe vnto your Maiestie the possession of this most glorious kingdome and empire: Which thing what worldly wight would haue done? but either a mad man, or else a most kind and louing sonne? Vnto which so rare an example of a religious and louing heart, I was not by any feare
F or constraint enforced, but onely by regard and contemplation of your owne sacred person, and the due consideration of my dutie. Neither did it in the course of so many yeares, euer repent me of that my singular kindnesse and dutie done, when as I contenting my selfe with such things as you had vnto me assigned, and with the generall commendation of my well doing, as well as with a kingdome, thought this your great estate and highest type of worldly honour, not to be compared with the quiet contentment of my pleasing studies: when as I accounted it a vaine thing, and not beseeming the re-

ſolution of a ſetled and quiet mind, to long after theſe worldly things, which being had and enioyed to the full, worke no full contentment in the inſatiable deſire of man: and that ſurmounting vertue, and the ſweet, o moſt ſweet meditation of heauenly things promiſed vnto my contemplatiue and rauiſhed mind, things of farre more worth and maieſtie than all the kingdomes and monarchies of the world. But whileſt I was tracing this path, little regarding worldly honour, or the glorie of an empire, and was for pure deuotion and deſire of knowledge trauelling into the furtheſt part of ARABIA, vnto the altar of our moſt ſacred prophet Mahomet, and ſo to the Indians, as to men of a more exact knowledge and ſincere profeſſion; you in the middeſt of my trauell drew me out of ÆGYPT by the long hands of the Ægyptian Sultain, backe againe into PHRYGIA; commanding mee, that eſchewing the manifold dangers (which in my long trauell I muſt needs haue fallen into) I ſhould from thenceforth haue more regard of my life and health, and to expect the fruit both of my loyaltie towards you, and of your fatherly loue towards me: as if you had beene then of opinion, that the time would come, when for the euill diſpoſition of ſome, an innocent man, deuoted vnto the ſtudie of wiſedome and learning, might be a ſtay both to your ſelfe and the whole Othoman familie. Since which time I haue euer both dutifully obeyed your command, and with as much care and integritie as I poſſibly could, diſcharged my charge: and in the late Perſian warre raiſed and brought into the field mine armie, wherewith I defended the frontiers of my prouince from the incurſions of the Barbarians. But after that they were vanquiſhed, and by your forces driuen out of the leſſer ASIA, and that my vnnaturall and graceleſſe brethren, the one of them in EVROPE, as a moſt deſperat recreant, had in plaine battell aſſailed the perſon of your moſt ſacred Maieſtie (his reuerend father, farre ſpent with age, and then greeuouſly tormented with the gout) of purpoſe to haue at once deprined you both of your life and empire: and the other in ASIA ſeeking by like diſloyaltie and moſt horrible treaſon there to poſſeſſe himſelfe of a kingdome, had beſieged and taken priſoners his brethers ſonnes your nephewes, young princes of great expectation, your faithfull and louing ſubiects; and proceeding further, had ſet all that part of your empire on a broile: I thought my ſelfe in dutie bound to repaire hither vnto your imperiall Maieſtie, for that I ſaw it came to paſſe, not without the prouidence of the moſt mightie, that I might at ſuch time eſpecially requeſt the iuſt reward of my due deſert of you my moſt reuerend and louing father, the moſt religious obſeruer of equitie and iuſtice: when as you hauing had too great proofe of the infidelitie of my vnnaturall brethren, might moſt fitly and moſt commodiouſly performe that which you vpon great reaſon might now grant vnto me your dutifull and obedient ſonne, although my former deſerts had merited no ſuch thing. Wherefore moſt gracious, I humbly pray and beſeech you by all your fatherly loue and affection towards me, and my knowne loyaltie towards you, to vouchſafe before the comming of Selymus, to haue regard of mine honour, with the ſtate of your empire: for when he ſhall once in armes breake in, he will at a trice cut off all hope of pacification, and ſupported by the men of warre, confound all things at his pleaſure: for I heare, that the very gaarders of your perſon, and chiefe commanders of your armies, altered in diſpoſition towards you, doe but expect the good offer of time, when they may willingly ſalute for their Emperour and Soueraigne, him, whom your good fortune of late full ſore againſt their wils, ouerthrew in open field. Wherefore that empire whereof I was ſometime poſſeſſed, and for the rare deſert of mine ancient loyaltie towards you, is of good right due vnto me, reſtore to me againe whileſt you may, and whileſt it is yet in your power, in this ſudden and momentarie occaſion now preſented. For your Maieſtie ſhall in vaine fauour my moſt iuſt and vpright claime, after that you (hauing once receiued into the imperiall citie a moſt deſperat and ambitious man) haue for euer loſt your libertie, together with your ſelfe.

Baiazet comforteth Corcutus, and promiſeth to reſigne to him the empire, after that Selymus was paſſed ouer onto Aſia.

Corcutus with teares ſtanding in his eyes hauing ended his ſpeech, the aged Emperor moued with a fatherly affection, and the reaſonable perſwaſion of him, his onely loyall and moſt kind ſonne, comforted him vp with good words, and willed him to be of good cheere; and withall diſcouered vnto him the very ground of his reſolution, in calling home of Selymus: telling him farther, That he could be well content to reſigne vnto him againe the empire, but that it was not in his power ſo preſently to doe, for feare of the ſouldiers of the court; who had (as he ſaid) of late withſtood him in the like motion, and would againe with tooth and naile gaineſay it, if he ſhould but giue the leaſt occaſion for them to ſuſpect any ſuch matter: but that by the plot now laied, Selymus ſhould vnder the title of honour be drawne out of EVROPE, together with the ſouldiers of the court, into ASIA againſt Achomates, both barres vnto his preſent deſire for transferring of the empire; in whoſe abſence it ſhould be in his power freely to diſpoſe thereof

A at his pleaſure: which he promiſed preſently to reſigne vnto him, ſo ſoone as they were once paſſed ouer into Asia. Which thing once done, although it were not altogither to their liking, yet feared he not that either the captaines or ſouldiours, who had of late ſo honorably and faithfully defended him againſt Selymus, ſhould now for his ſake diſlike of Corcutus, or attempt any thing not beſeeming the glorie of their late deſert: but rather hoped, that if his two vnnaturall and rebellious ſons Achomates and Selymus, ſhould once ioine battell (as it was moſt like they ſhould) that either the one or both ſhould by the iuſt indgement of God periſh for their ſo great diſobedience, murthered by the hands one of another. Corcutus not much miſliking of his fathers purpoſe, and reſting himſelfe wholy vpon his fauour, though it not good farther to argue the
B matter his father had ſo well conſidered of: but taking his leaue returned to his lodging, not without hope of obtaining the empire, & ſo remained many daies after at Constantinople: during which time he ſought neither by gifts nor golden promiſes to procure the loue and good liking of the great Baſſaes, or ſouldiors of the court; for that he as a plain vpright man, thought it not good by ſuit and corruption (the great promoters of the vnworthie) to ſeeke for that at their hands, which was of right due vnto him by his fathers fauour and promiſe.

In the meane time Selymus his faſt friends, aduertiſing him of the comming of Corcutus to the court, aduiſed him to make haſt, and with all ſpeed poſſible to come to Constantinople; for that it was to be feared, leaſt Baiazet being verie aged, and withall eaſie to be drawne away, might by the perſuaſion of Corcutus be induced to alter, yea and perhaps quite breake off
C the courſe before well ſet for his moſt readie preferment. Vpon which news, Selymus attentiuely waiting vpon nothing more than to haue acceſſe vnto his friends in court, and before reſolued at his firſt comming thither, not to ſpare for any coſt in corrupting the men of war, and ſo to poſſeſſe himſelfe of the empire: made now no ſtay, but with certaine troupes of horſemen commanding the reſt to follow after, came with wonderfull celeritie to Constantinople. Corcutus with the great Baſſaes and courtiers, and moſt part of the ſouldiours of the court, going to meet him at the gates of the citie: at his entrance receiued him with a kiſſe (as is the manner of the Turks) and brought him through the middeſt of the citie, all the people running out by heaps to haue a ſight of the man; of late in euery mans mouth for his deſperat rebellion, but now welcomed with much thundring ſhot in token of triumph, and the ioyful acclamation
D of men, women, and children, and people of all ſorts. So that it eaſily appeared, that all the hatred before conceiued againſt him, for his late outrage againſt his father, was now quite forgotten; and that he would in ſhort time before his other brethren aſpire vnto the empire.

The next day after Selymus came to the court, and hauing acceſſe to his father, fell proſtrate before him and kiſſed his feet, and with the greateſt ſhew of humilitie poſſible, craued of him pardon for his diſloialtie. O deepe diſſembler, and traitor of all other moſt treacherous! of late in field with ſword drawn to haue ſlaine his aged father, but now proſtrate at his feet; and within an houre, mounted perforce into his imperiall ſeat!

The old emperour ſmiling vpon this Crocodile, in moſt kind manner tooke him vp, and courteouſly ſaid vnto him:

E Thy faults ſonne Selymus are ſo much the leſſe, for that they haue found ſpeedie repentance, wherefore I dee the more willingly grant thee pardon: but from henceforth endeauour thy ſelfe, that God who hath giuen thee a notable ſpirit and courage, may alſo be thought to haue endued thee with a good and well diſpoſed mind. There is a martiall matter readie worthie thy hardineſſe, wherein thou maieſt ſufficiently manifeſt vnto the world thy forwardneſſe and courage: there when time ſerueth let it appeare.

The craftie ſpeech of Baiazet vnto his ſonne Selymus.

Shortly after was called a counſell for the wars, but eſpecially for the chuſing of a Generall to go againſt Achomates: the honour of which place, when many would haue giuen to Selymus, he began with great diſſimulation to refuſe, making as though he would not in any caſe be preferred before his brother Corcutus, to whom he would (as he ſaid) willingly giue place, both in re-
F ſpect of his yeres and learned diſcretion, who could no doubt with greater authoritie and wiſedome manage that warre: as for himſelfe, now he had obtained his fathers gratious pardon and fauour, he could well content himſelfe with any corner of the empire, were it neuer ſo little.

The craftie diſſimulation of Selymus.

But Corcutus and his friends, who had reſpoſed all their hope and all their deuiſes in the departure of Selymus with the ſouldiors of the court; as if they had with great modeſtie contended on both ſides, againe perſuaded him, yea and inſtantly requeſted him not to refuſe that honour, by general consent without any disgrace to his brother, giuen to him as to a worthie chief- G taine of greater experience in martiall affaires. So Selymus with wonderfull cunning deluding Corcutus and his fauourits, whilest he seemeth craftily to refuse the thing he most desireth, is by the generall consent of all parts, chosen Generall of the armie to go against his brother Achomotes. Which was no sooner made knowne vnto the souldiors, especially the Ianizaries and other souldiors of the court; but they before instructed, with lowd acclamations saluted him, not for their Generall onely, but for their soueraigne lord and emperor also: and so without farther delay put themselues in armes to defend and make good that they had done, if any better disposed should seeme to withstand them or dissent from them.

Selymus by the souldiors thus saluted emperour, at first made shew as if he had beene halfe vnwilling to take vpon him the empire; and so began faintly to refuse it, as moued so to do by H the due reuerence and regard of his father, yet liuing. But after a while he suffered himselfe to be intreated: and then commending himselfe and his cause wholy to the men of war, to bind them vnto him the faster, promised beside the particular fauors he ought them, to bestow a right great and generall larges amongst them: which he afterwards accordingly performed.

After that, he requested the chiefe Bassaes and commanders of the armie there present, to go forthwith vnto his father, and to take such order (seeing it was the mind of the whole armie it should be so) that the empire might by his goodwill without farther trouble or tumult, be forthwith transferred vnto him.

Mustapha the great Bassa, in whose wilie head all this matter was (to his owne worthie destruction) first hammered; whether it were vpon a new fineneſſe of his owne, or that Selymus (as it I was giuen out) had threatned to kill him except he would go and shew all the whole processe of the matter to his father: comming as a man dismaied to Baiazet (who awaked with clamor and tumult of the souldiors was come out of his chamber into the open roomes of his pallace) in few words deliuered vnto him this most vnwelcome message as followeth:

The blunt speech of Mustapha to Baiazet, perswading him to resigne the empire to Selymus.

Emperour (said he) the men of war haue in their counsell saluted Selymus both their Generall and Emperour: which their choice they require thee to ratifie, being readie presently to breake into the court to kill vs both, if thou shalt refuse forthwith to resigne the empire. They all with one consent request that of thee, which they haue alreadie put into the hand of another. Wherefore it is a thing of far more danger to seeke to recouer that thou hast alreadie lost, than willingly to yeeld that which is alreadie taken from thee, seeing it is not by any force or policie to be regained. They in armes, in furie, and now entred into rebellion, thinke vpon some greater mischiefe. K

Baiazet troubled with feare and choller, and then too late perceiuing the treacherie of the Bassaes, and how he had been by them betraied; pausing a while at the strangeneſſe of the matter, afterwards in furie brake out into these words:

The resolute answere of old Baiazet to Mustapha and the other Bassaes.

False and forsworne, doe you thus betray me? and with such monstrous villanie requite mine infinite bountie? Why doe you not also as murtherers take away my life, which could not indure for a while to expect the dissolution of this my weake and aged bodie? but deposing your iust and lawfull soueraigne, must needs in post haste set vp a most wicked and graceleſſe man to raigne ouer you. But much good doe it you with your desired emperour, the contemner of God, and murtherer of his father: to whom ere it L be long, you shall full dearely pay the price of this your perfidious dealing and treacherie against mee. And hee himselfe beginning his empire of most vnnaturall treason, murther, and bloudshed, shall not (I hope) escape the heauie hand of God, the vndoubted and seuere reuenger of so great impietie and treason.

Mustapha, with Bostanges and Aiax as false as himselfe, returning backe againe to the souldiours speaking not a word of the sorrow and indignation of Baiazet; told them how that he was well content to resigne the empire, and so had appointed Selymus (vnto whom both God and the generall consent of the men of war had alreadie deliuered the empire) to succeed him in the empire. When this their speech was generally reported, they whom Selymus had before corrupted, began now to hold vp their heads, and looke big on the matter: and others who before M stood doubtfull what to doe seeing now no other remedie, in hast ioyned themselues vnto the same faction. Whilest all things were thus disorderly carried by the vnruly souldiors, Selymus was by them mounted vpon a couragious horse, and so with all pomp conducted vp and down most of the faire streets of the imperiall citie: and with the generall voice and clamour of the people (how soeuer their minds were for most part otherwise affected) saluted emperour. And

A the ſame day both the great Baſſaes and the ſoldiers in generall, were all ſolemnly ſworne vnto Selymus, as their onely lord and emperour.

Corcutus, whether it were for greeſe of his hope now loſt, or feare of his life, although Selymus had promiſed to giue him the citie of MYTILENE, with the Iſland of LESBOS, ſecretly embarked himſelfe, and ſo returned to MAGNESIA. Corcutus flieth.

Baiazet of late one of the greateſt monarchs of the world, but now thus thruſt out of his empire by his ſonne, deteſting both him and the treacherie of his ſubiects, and ouercome with ſorrow and melancholie, determined of himſelfe, before he were thereto enforced by Selymus, to forſake CONSTANTINOPLE, and to retire himſelfe to DIMOTICA (a ſmall citie wholeſomely ſituated in THRACIA, not farre from HADRIANOPLE; where in former time he had for
B his pleaſure beſtowed great coſt, and now as he thought beſt fitted his preſent eſtate.) Wherefore cauſing great ſtore of treaſure, plate, iewels, and rich furniture to be truſſed vp, he with fiue hundred of his houſhold ſeruants, full of heauineſſe and ſorrow, with teares trickling downe his aged cheekes, departed out of the imperiall citie towards HADRIANOPLE, with purpoſe from thence to haue gone to DIMOTICA. Selymus brought him about two miles vpon his way, and ſo returning againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, tooke poſſeſſion of the pallace.

Baiazet being then about ſeuentie ſix yeares old, or as ſome report full foureſcore; and beſide his old diſeaſe of the gout, ſore weakened with heauineſſe and greefe of mind, was not able to trauell aboue fiue or ſix miles a day, but was conſtrained by the extremitie of his paine and weakeneſſe, to ſtay ſometimes two or three daies in a place. Whileſt he was thus trauelling,
C Selymus no leſſe carefull of the keeping of his eſtate, than he had before beene for the obtaining of the ſame, began now to doubt, That if he ſhould depart from CONSTANTINOPLE, and with all his forces paſſe ouer into ASIA againſt his brother Achomates, Baiazet in the meane time might in his abſence returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, and ſo againe poſſeſſe himſelfe both of the citie and the empire. Wherefore to rid himſelfe of that feare, he reſolued moſt viper like before his going, to kill his father, and ſo moſt vnnaturally to depriue him of life of whom he had firſt receiued life: ſuch is the cruell and accurſed nature of ambition, that it knoweth neither father, mother, brother, wife, kindred, or friend, no, ſometimes not her owne children: the furie whereof was neuer in any one more pregnant, than in this moſt monſtrous and cruell tyrant Selymus.

D The readieſt and moſt ſecret way he could deuiſe for the effecting of this his damnable deuiſe (which without great impietie could not be ſo much as once by him thought vpon) was to worke it by poyſon: vpon which reſolution he ſecretly compacted with Hamon a Iew, his fathers cheefe phyſition, to poyſon him; promiſing him for his reward a penſion of ten duckats a day during his life. And for that men are oftentimes with terrour and feare, as well as with reward, enforced to be the miniſters of miſchiefe; he to be the more ſure of this Iew (prone ynough for gaine to doe euill) threatened him with moſt cruell death, if he did not both ſecretly and ſpeedily worke this feat, commaunding him ſo ſoone as he had done it to returne vnto him to CONSTANTINOPLE. Selymus practiſeth with Hamon a Iew, Baiazet his phiſition, to poyſon him.

E The deceitfull Iew moued both with the feare of death, and hope of reward (two great motiues) comming ſhortly after to Baiazet, and finding him very weake, ſeeming to be very carefull of him, told him, That he would prepare for him a potion, which ſhould both reſtore to him his health, and alſo ſtrengthen his weake bodie, if it would pleaſe him to take it the next morning early lying in his bed. Baiazet nothing miſtruſting his old phyſition whom he had ſo often & ſo long truſted, ſaid he would gladly take it. Early the next morning commeth the Iew with the deadly potion in a cup of gold, Baiazet yet ſleeping, which he ſet downe in the chaire of eſtate, and ſo ſtood waiting vntill the aged prince ſhould of himſelfe awake. But Baiazet ſtill ſleeping ſoundly (as oftentimes it chanceth when men ſleep their laſt) and withall ſomewhat longer than ſtood with the Iewes purpoſe, he preſuming of his wonted practiſe, awaked him, and told him, that the time to take the potion was almoſt paſt, and asked him if it were his pleaſure then to F take it. Baiazet doubting no treaſon, willed him to bring it: whereof when the Iew had taken the ſey (hauing before himſelfe taken a preſeruatiue againſt that poyſon) he gaue it to Baiazet to drinke, who cheerefully dranke it vp: the phyſition commaunding them that waited in his bedchamber, and attended on his perſon, to keep him well couered with warme clothes, and not to giue him any thing to drinke vntill he had well ſweat. This curſed Iew hauing thus poyſoned Baiazet poyſoned by the Iew.

the aged Prince, to auoid the danger of the fact, and to carrie the first newes thereof to Selymus, G secretly conuayed himselfe away, and fled in hast to CONSTANTINOPLE. But Baiazet attainted with the force of the poyson, began first to feele most greeuous gripings in his stomacke, the strong paine whereof appeared by his miserable complaining and heauie groning; in the midst
The death of Baiazet. of which torments he gaue vp the ghost in the yeere 1512, when he had raigned thirtie yeares. The Turks report that he died a naturall death: but Antonius Vtrius, a Genoway, who at that time serued in Baiazet his chamber, and was present at his death, reporteth, That vpon his dead bodie the euident tokens of poyson were to be seene. His dead bodie, with all his treasures were presently brought backe againe to CONSTANTINOPLE, and deliuered to Selymus, who caused the bodie of his father to be with the greatest solemnitie that might be, buried in a most sumptu- H ous tombe, in a chapell neere vnto the great Mahometane temple, which he had before built for himselfe at CONSTANTINOPLE, which monument there remaineth at this day to be seene. His seruants were all by Selymus restored to their places which they before held in the Court in Selymus causeth two of his fathers pages to be put to death for mourning for their master. the time of their old master, excepting fiue of the pages of his chamber, who lamenting the death of their master aboue the rest, had attired themselues all in mourning apparell: for which cause, they were by the commandement of Selymus cast in prison; where two of them were put to death, the other three at the sute of Solyman, Selymus his sonne, and of other two Bassaes, were saued: but being stript of their rich apparell, and whatsoeuer else they had gotten vnder Baiazet, they were enrolled for common souldiers vnder Sullustares Bassa. Of these three this Antonius Vtrius the Genoway (before spoken of) was one, who after ten yeares miserable cap- I tiuitie amongst the Turks, at last escaped, at such time as Selymus was by the Persian discomfited: and with much adoe returning againe into ITALIE, writ the historie of all such things as he himselfe had there seene, with the calamities of Baiazet his house, and a great part of the tyrannous raigne of Selymus.

Hamon the Iew iustly rewarded for his treacherie. Hamon the false Iew (as the same author reporteth) comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, and expecting some great reward for his foule treason, by the commandement of Selymus had his head presently strucke off: with this exprobation of his trecherie, That oportunitie seruing, he would not sticke for reward to doe the like against Selymus himselfe. Of this Baiazet, Ianus Vitalis writeth this Elogium:

Paulus Iouius Illust. viorũ, Elog. lib. 4.

Dum rerum exquiris causas, & dum procul Hunnes
Carmannos, Cilices, Sauromatasq; domas:
Baiazete, domi proles tua te petit armis,
Et te per fraudes amouet imperio.
Adijcit inde nouum sceleri scelus, & tibi miscet
Pocula lethiferis illita graminibus.
Intempestiuos crudelis vipera fœtus,
Per sua sic tandem funera, rupta, parit.
Quid tutum est, cui sint ingentia regna tyranno?
Si timeat natos, progeniemq; suam?

In English thus.

Whil'st that thou Baiazethes seekes of things the hidden cause,
And faine wouldst bring the Hunne and Russe vnder thy Turkish lawes:
Thy sonne at home steps vp in armes against thy royall crowne,
And by false treason and deceit finds meanes to plucke thee downe.
Whereto he addeth mischiefe more, and straight without delay,
By poyson strong in glittering boule, doth take thy life away:
The cruell viper so brings forth her foule vntimely brood, M
Which eat and gnaw her bellie out, their first and poysoned food.
What things may Princes hold for safe, that doe great kingdomes sway?
If of their children they must stand in dread and feare alway?

the Othoman family: Which great perfection as it woon vnto him the loue and fauour of the G men of warre, and alſo of all the people in generall: ſo did it haſten his ſpeedie death; onely Selymus his cruell vncle enuying him life. After he had got theſe poore innocents into his hands, he ſent for diuers of his great doctors and lawyers, demaunding of them, Whether it were not better that ſome fiue, eight, or ten perſons ſhould be taken away, than that the ſtate of the whole empire ſhould with great effuſion of bloud be rent in ſunder, and ſo by ciuile warres be brought in danger of vtter ruine and deſtruction? Who although they well perceiued whereunto that bloudie queſtion tended, yet for feare of diſpleaſure they all anſwered, That it were better ſuch a ſmall number ſhould periſh, then that the whole ſtate of the empire ſhould by ciuile warre and diſcord be brought to confuſion; in which generall calamitie thoſe few muſt alſo of neceſſitie H periſh with the reſt. Vpon colour of this anſwere and the neceſſitie pretended, he commaunded theſe his nephewes before named, to be led by fiue of his great captaines into the caſtle of PRVSA, where they were all the night following moſt cruelly ſtrangled. It is reported, that Mahometes with a penknife ſlew one of the bloudy executioners ſent into his chamber to kill him; and ſo wounded the other, as that he fell downe for dead: and that Selymus being in a chamber faſt by, and almoſt an eye-witneſſe of that was done, preſently ſent in others, who firſt bound the poore prince, and afterward ſtrangled him with the reſt: whoſe dead bodies were buried at PRVSA amongſt their aunceſtours. The crueltie of this fact wonderfully offended the minds of moſt men, inſomuch that many euen of his martiall men filled with ſecret indignation, for certaine daies abſented themſelues from his preſence, ſhunning his ſight as if he had beene ſome fierce or raging lyon. I

1513 Of all the nephewes of old Baiazet, onely Amurat and Aladin (the ſons of Achomates) yet Selymus ſeeketh after the liues of Amurat and Aladin, the ſons of Achomates his brother. remained, whom he purpoſed to ſurpriſe vpon the ſudden, and ſo to rid himſelfe of all feare of his brothers children; hauing then left none of the Othoman familie, but them and his two brethren vpon whom to exerciſe his further crueltie. Theſe two young princes had a little before recouered the citie of AMASIA, from whence they were the Sommer before expulſed by their vncle Selymus, at ſuch time as Achomates their father was glad to flie into the mountaines of CAPADOCIA. Selymus fully reſolued vpon their deſtruction, ſent Vſegi one of his Baſſaes with fiue thouſand horſemen, who by great iourneies trauelling to AMASIA, might vpon the ſudden come vpon theſe two yong princes, and take them altogither vnprouided and as then fearing no ſuch danger: which was thought no great matter for the Baſſa to doe, foraſmuch as he might with K his light horſmen eaſily preuent the fame of his comming; and the citie of AMASIA where they lay, was neither well walled, nor as then furniſhed with any ſufficient garriſon for defence therof: beſide that, Achomates himſelfe was at that time abſent, buſied in taking vp of ſouldiers vpon the frontiers of CARAMANNIA. But Muſtapha the old Baſſa, by whoſe eſpeciall meanes Selymus had obtained the empire (as is afore declared in the life of Baiazet) being prinie vnto his wicked purpoſe, and now in mind altogither alienated from him, deteſting his moſt execrable tyrannie, both for the vnworthy death of Baiazet his father, and the guiltleſſe bloud of ſo many young princes his nephewes by him ſhed without all pitie; and hauing compaſſion of the imminent danger whereinto theſe two brethren were now like alſo to fall; by ſecret and ſpeedie meſſengers gaue them warning of the comming of the Baſſa, and of all that was entended a- L gainſt them. Who vpon ſuch knowledge giuen, preſently aduertiſed Achomates their father thereof, and laid ſecret ambuſh themſelues for the intercepting of their enemies. So that within few daies after, the Baſſa comming with his horſmen towards AMASIA, fell before he was aware into the middeſt of his enemies: at which time alſo Achomates following him at the heeles, ſo Vſegi Baſſa taken priſoner. ſhut him in with his armie on euerie ſide, that moſt of his men being ſlaine, he himſelfe with diuers other captaines were taken priſoners and brought to Achomates, and by his commaundement committed to ſafe cuſtodie.

Now it fortuned, that ſome of Achomates ſouldiers ſcoffing at the priſoners whom they had taken, told them how they had been deceiued, and how all the matter had been carried (ſo hard a thing it is to haue euen the greateſt counſels in court kept ſecret) boaſting that they wanted not M their friends, euen of ſuch as were moſt inward with Selymus, who ſecretly fauoured the better cauſe, and would not long ſuffer the cruell beaſt to rage further: All which things Selymus his ſouldiers reported againe after they were raunſomed and returned home. But Vſegi the Baſſa lying ſtill in priſon, and getting certaine knowledge of the whole matter, by ſecret letters gaue

Selymus

A Selymus to vnderſtand, that Muſtapha the great Baſſa whom he moſt of all truſted, had ſecret intelligence with Achomates, and had bin the only cauſe of the loſſe of his armie.

Selymus of late enuying at the great honour and authoritie of Muſtapha, and wiſhing him dead (whoſe deſert he was not able, or at leaſtwiſe not willing to requite) cauſed him vpon this accuſation without farther triall to be ſecretly ſtrangled in his own ſight, and his dead bodie (as it were in ſcorne of his former felicitie) to be caſt out into the ſtreet for euery man to gaze vpon. This was the ſhamefull end of this traiterous Baſſa, who had of long time at his pleaſure commanded all things in the Turkiſh empire, and was for riches, power, and authoritie, next vnto the emperours themſelues: but now lyeth as a dead dog in the ſtreet, no man daring for feare to
B caſt earth vpon him. A rare ſpectacle of the vncertaintie of worldly felicitie, and a worthie example of diſloialtie. But Achomates hearing what had happened to Muſtapha, in reuenge thereof in like maner executed Vſegi Baſſa his priſoner; and according to his courteous nature ſet all the reſt of the priſoners at libertie.

Muſtapha Baſſa ſhamefully murthered.

Vſegi Baſſa put to death.

Selymus thirſting after nothing more than the guiltleſſe bloud of his brethren and nephewes, vpon whom he had againſt all right vſurped the kingdome, wherof he neuer thought himſelfe ſufficiently aſſured ſo long as any of them breathed: began with the firſt of the Spring to deuiſe with himſelfe how he might firſt take away his brother Corcutus, who then liued at MAGNESIA, and hauing caſt off all hope of the empire, gaue himſelfe wholly to the ſtudie of philoſophie, which he (ſeduced with ambition) had in euill time a little before forſaken; but now retiring
C himſelfe therto againe, as to his greateſt contentment, ſpent his time in quiet contemplation, not attempting any thing againſt his cruell brother vſurping the empire. Selymus reſolued vpon the deſtruction of this harmeleſſe prince, ſuddenly commanded his captains to make choiſe of ten thouſand horſemen to be in readineſſe within three daies, giuing it out that he would make an inroad vpon the ſudden into CAPADOCIA. In the number of theſe horſemen Antonius Mænaninus a Genoway, author of this hiſtorie (as he reporteth of himſelfe) was one.

All things being in readineſſe againſt the appointed time, Selymus in perſon himſelfe ſet forward with his armie from PRVSA, ſtill keeping the way on the right hand; ſo that the ſouldiours who thought they ſhould haue marched directly into CAPADOCIA and ſo to AMASIA, as it was before commonly reported; began now to perceiue by the contrarie courſe they held, that they
D were to go for LYDIA and IONIA. When a valiant ſouldiour among the reſt, who had ſometime ſerued one of the Baſſaes in Corcutus his court, by diuers circumſtances gathering the intention of Selymus, ſecretly conuaied himſelfe out of the armie; and being excellently well mounted, taking the neereſt way, came to MAGNESIA, and gaue Corcutus warning of the comming of his brother. Corcutus conſidering the great danger he was in, richly rewarded the meſſenger; and leauing his houſe in ſuch order as it was wont to be, fled with two of his ſeruants to the ſea ſide, in hope to haue found paſſage either into CRETE, or elſe RHODES.

The next day after Corcutus was departed, early in the morning came Selymus to the caſtle of MAGNESIA before the riſing of the ſunne, in hope to haue found Corcucus yet in his bed: but being deceiued of his expectation, he fell into a great rage, and with cruell torments examined
E all his brothers ſeruants & eunuchs, What was become of him and where he had hid himſelfe? and with much adoe got it out of them, That he had warning of his comming by a fugitiue ſoldiour, and was thereupon fled; but whither they knew not. Wherefore Selymus ſtaid there fifteene daies, during which time he cauſed diligent ſearch to be made all ouer the countrey, and alongſt the ſea coaſt for to haue apprehended him. But when after much ſearch he could heare no tidings of him, he cauſed all his brothers treaſure and rich furniture to be truſſed vp, and to be ſent by ſea to CONSTANTINOPLE. So leauing one of his captaines with a thouſand horſemen in garriſon at MAGNESIA, he returned againe to PRVSA with as much ſpeed as he came from thence: verily ſuppoſing that his brother was for ſafegard of his life, by ſea fled into ITALIE. All this while Boſtanges, Selymus his ſonne in law, lying with a fleet of gallies vpon the coaſt of Io-
F NIA, had taken from Corcutus all hope of eſcaping by ſea: ſo that he was faine to hide himſelfe in a caue neere vnto the ſea ſide not far from SMYRNA, liuing in hope that after a few daies the fleet would depart, and ſo he ſhould find ſome opportunitie to eſcape.

Selymus taketh the ſpoile of his brother Corcutus.

After he had thus a great while in feare moſt miſerably liued with countrie crabs, and other like wild fruit (a poore diet for a man of ſtate) and was with extreame neceſſitie enforced to ſend his man for reliefe to a poore ſheepheards cottage therby, he was by a country peaſant diſcouered

Corcutus taken. red to Caſſumes, who with too much diligence ſought after his life: and being by him appre- G hended, was carried towards the tyrant his brother at PRVSA.

Right welcome to Selymus was the report of his taking: who as ſoone as he vnderſtood that he was within a daies iourney of PRVSA, ſent one Kirengen-ogli (who of his ſquint looke was called Chior Zeinall) to ſtrangle him vpon the way, and to bring his dead bodie to PRVSA.

This captaine comming to Corcutus in the dead time of the night, and awakiug him out of his ſleep, told him his heauie meſſage; how that he was ſent from his brother Selymus to ſee him executed, which muſt as hee ſaid preſently be done. Corcutus exceedingly troubled with theſe heauie newes, and fetching a deepe ſigh, deſired the captaine ſo long to ſpare his life, vntill he might write a few ſhort lines vnto his brother Selymus. Which poore requeſt being granted, he H called for pen and paper, and readily in Turkiſh verſe (for he had ſpent all his time in ſtudie) reproued his brother of moſt horrible crueltie; vpbraiding him, that he had not only moſt diſloially thruſt his father out of his empire, but alſo moſt vnnaturally depriued him of life, of whom he had before receiued the ſame: and not ſo content, had moſt tyrannouſly ſlaine his brothers children; and now like an vnmercifull wretch thirſted after the guiltleſſe bloud of himſelfe, and Achomates his brethren. At laſt concluding his letters with many a bitter curſe, he beſought God to take of him iuſt reuenge for ſo much innocent bloud by him moſt vnnaturally ſpilt. And when he had thus much written, he requeſted the captaine, that it might togither with his dead bodie be deliuered vnto Selymus. So without any farther delay he was according to the tyrants
The lamentable death of Corcutus. command preſently ſtrangled. The next day after, when the dead bodie was preſented vnto Se- I lymus, he vncouered the face therof to be ſure that it was he, and ſeeing a paper in his hand, tooke it from him: but when he had read it (for all his cruell nature and ſtonie heart) he burſt out into teares; proteſting, that he was neuer ſo much grieued or troubled with any mans death as with his: for which cauſe, he commaunded generall mourning to be made for him in the court, and with princely ſolemnitie buried his bodie. Three daies after, he cauſed fifteene of thoſe diligent ſearchers who firſt found Corcutus, to haue their heads ſtruck off, and their bodies to be flung into the ſea, ſaying, That if he were by any extremitie driuen to flie and hide his head, they would not ſticke to ſerue him in like manner as they had done his brother.

Now of all the poſteritie of Baiazet remained none aliue to trouble the cruel tyrants thoughts but only Achomates and his two ſons: who vpon the approch of the Spring, ſet forward with K
his armie from AMASIA, excited by the often letters of his friends, who aſſured him that Selymus might vpon the ſudden be eaſily oppreſſed, if he would with all expedition come to PRVSA; forasmuch as the Ianizaries and Europeian horſemen, the vndoubted ſtrength of his armie, were at that time abſent, and he himſelfe as one hated both of God and man, could not in ſo ſudden and vnexpected danger tell what he were beſt to do, or which way to turne himſelfe: wherfore they willed him without delay to haſten his comming, and not to expect the milder weather of the Spring, leaſt in the meane time Selymus ſhould call togither his diſperſed forces: God (they ſaid) did oftentimes offer vnto men, both the opportunitie and meanes to do great matters, if they had the power to lay hold thereon, and therefore he ſhould do well now by celeritie and courage to ſeeke to better his euil fortune, which but a little before had bereft him of his fathers king- L dome: for if Sommer were once come on, he muſt either gaine the victorie by plain battel, which would be a hard matter, or elſe get him packing out of CAPADOCIA and all ASIA the leſſe.

Achomates, who before had promiſed vnto himſelfe better ſucceſſe, as well for the great ſtrength he had of his owne, as for the new ſupplie of horſemen he had procured from Hyſmaell the Perſian king; but eſpecially for the hope he had, that Selymus generally hated for his late crueltie, ſhould in the time of the battell be forſaken of his owne ſouldiors; yeelded to the perſuaſion of his friends, who with many pleaſing words ſet before his eies glorious things, eaſie to be ſpoken, but hard to be effected. Wherefore, when he was come into GALATIA with ſomewhat more than fifteene thouſand horſemen, hauing for haſt left his footmen by eaſie marches to come after him: Selymus aduertiſed of his comming, by ſpeedie meſſengers ſent for his horſ- M men to PRVSA. In the meane time whiles he is leuying other common ſouldiours, and expecting the reſt of his forces; fortune, which alwaies fauoured his attempts, did then alſo auert the danger prepared for him by the vnfaithfulneſſe of his followers, and ſhewed vnto him the open way to victorie. For Achomates ſecret friends which were in Selymus his campe, continuing firme in their good wil towards him, did earneſtly by letters perſuade him (being alreadie ſet forward,

A ward, and now come as farre as PAPHLAGONIA) to make haſt, and to come before Selymus his forces were come together: for that he had ſent for the Ianizaries and Europeian horſemen, and did with all ſpeed and diligence make all the preparation he could poſſibly; which for all that would all come too late, if he ſhould vpon the ſuddaine come vpon him before he were prouided. Which letters being by chance intercepted, gaue Selymus certaine knowledge both of his brothers purpoſe and comming, together with the treaſon entended againſt him by his owne ſeruants: wherefore executing them who had writ thoſe letters, he in their names cauſed others to the ſame effect to be written to Achomates, perſuading him with all ſpeed poſſible to come ſtill on, and not to ſtay for his footmen, for that Selymus might eaſily be oppreſſed with a few
B troupes of horſemen, if Achomates would with ſpeed but come & ſhew himſelfe vnto his friends and fauourites: who vpon the firſt ſignall of battaile would raiſe a tumult in the armie, and vpon the ſuddain kill Selymus, vnaduiſedly going too and fro in the battaile. Which letters ſo written, Selymus cauſed to be ſigned with the ſeales of them whom he had before executed, & found meanes to haue them cunningly deliuered to Achomates, as if they had been ſent from his friends: who giuing credit to the ſame, and preſuming much vpon his owne ſtrength, doubted not to leaue his footmen, who followed eaſily after him, vnder the conduct of Amurath his ſonne; and came and encamped with his horſemen neere vnto the mountain HORMINIVS, vpon the bank of the riuer Parthemius. Selymus alſo departed from PRVSA, and hauing receiued into his armie ten thouſand Ianizaries (but a little before come ouer the ſtrait) ſent before Sinan Baſſa, Ge-
C nerall of his Aſian horſemen, to know & make proofe of the ſtrength of his enemies. The Baſſa not knowing as yet where Achomates lay, neither of what force he was, being deceiued by the darkeneſſe of the morning, fell into a place of diſaduantage, where he was ſet vpon by Achomates, and hauing loſt ſeuen thouſand of his men, was glad with other eight thouſand which were left, to flie backe vnto Selymus.

Treaſon againſt Selymus diſcouered.

Sinan Baſſa diſcomfited by Achomates.

For all this loſſe, was not Selymus diſcomfited, or doubtfull of the victorie, but forthwith marched on forward to the riuer Elata, which runneth directly out of the mountaine HORMINIVS into PONTVS, watering moſt large fields vpon the right hand, which at this day are called the plaines of the new land. So did Achomates alſo, who although he knew his brother to be euery way too ſtrong for him: yet being encouraged with the late victorie, and in hope that
D his friends in Selymus his armie (whom he vainely ſuppoſed to haue beene yet liuing) would in the very battaile doe ſome notable matter for him, and that victorie would follow his iuſt quarrell; reſolued neither to retire backe, neither to expect the comming of the reſt of his armie. The riuer was betwixt the two campes, and the number of both armies certainely diſcouered: yet could not Achomates (to whom the open fields offered a ſafe retreat vnto the reſt of his armie) poſſeſſed with a fatall madneſſe, be perſuaded (conſidering the greatneſſe of the danger) in time to prouide for the ſafetie of himſelfe and his army, carried headlong (as it ſeemed) by inceitable deſtinie to his fatall deſtruction, which preſently after enſued.

Selymus a little before the going downe of the Sun, with his armie paſſed ouer the riuer Elata, and gaue generall commaundement through all his camp, that euery man againſt the next day
E ſhould be ready for battaile: and in a wood not far off placed a thouſand horſemen in ambuſh, vnder the leading of Canoglis his wiues brother, a valiant young gentleman, whom his father had a little before ſent from TAVRICA vnto his ſonne in law with a choſen companie of Tartarian horſemen: vnto him Selymus gaue in charge, that when the battaile was ioyned, he ſhould ſhew himſelfe with his horſemen vpon the backe of his enemies, and there to charge them.

Selymus with his armie paſſeth ouer the riuer.

As ſoone as it was day, Selymus in a great open field put his armie in order of battaile, placing his horſemen in two wings, ſo that all his ſpearemen were in the right wing, and the archers and carbines in the left: In the maine battaile ſtood the Ianizaries with the reſt of the footmen. On the other ſide Achomates, hauing no footmen, deuided his horſemen into two wings alſo.

Whileſt both armies ſtood thus raunged, expecting but the ſignall of battaile, a meſſenger
F came from Achomates to Selymus, offering in his maſters name, to trie the equitie of their quarrell in plaine combat hand to hand: which if he ſhould refuſe, he then tooke both God & the world to witneſſe, that Selymus was the onely cauſe of all the guiltleſſe bloud to be ſhed in the battaile, and not he: whereunto Selymus anſwered, that he was not to trie his quarrell at the appointment of Achomates: and though he could be content ſo to doe, yet would not his ſoldiers ſuffer him ſo to aduenture his perſon and their owne ſafetie: and ſo with that anſwere returned the meſſen-

ger backe againe to his maſter, giuing him for his reward a thouſand aſpers. G Achomates hauing receiued this anſwere, without further delay charged the right wing of his brothers armie, who valiantly receiued the firſt charge: but when they were come to the ſword, and that the matter was to be tried by handie blowes, they were not able longer to endure the force of the Perſian horſemen; who being well armed both horſe and man, had before requeſted to be placed in the formoſt rankes, by whoſe valour the right wing of Selymus his armie was diſordered, and not without great loſſe enforced to retire back vpon their fellows. Which thing Selymus beholding, did what he might by all meanes to encourage them againe, and preſently brought on the left wing with their arrowes and piſtols, in ſtead of them that were fled: and at the ſame time came on with the Ianizaries alſo, who with their ſhot enforced Achomates his horſemen to retire. Achomates himſelfe carefully attending euery danger, with greater courage H than fortune came in with freſh troupes of horſemen, by whoſe valour the battell before declining was againe renewed, and the victorie made doubtfull: but in the furie of this battell whileſt he was bearing all downe before him, and now in great hope of the victorie, Canoglis with his Tartarian horſemen riſing out of ambuſh, came behind him, & with great outcries cauſed their enemies then in the greateſt heat of their fight to turne vpon them: at which time alſo the footmen ſtanding cloſe together aſſailed them afront, and the horſemen whom the Perſians had at firſt put to flight, now moued with ſhame, were againe returned into the battaile: ſo that Achomates his ſmall armie was beſet, & hardly aſſailed on euery ſide. In fine his enſignes being ouerthrowne, and many of his men ſlaine, the reſt were faine to betake themſelues to flight. Where Achomates hauing loſt the field, and now to late ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe by flight, fell with his I horſe into a ditch, which the raine falling the day before, had filled with water and myre: and being there knowne and taken by his enemies, could not obtaine ſo much fauour at their hands as to be preſently ſlaine, but was reſerued to the farther pleaſure of his cruell brother. Selymus vnderſtanding of his taking, ſent Kirengen (the ſame ſquint-eyed captaine which had before ſtrangled Corcutus) who with a bow ſtring ſtrangled him alſo. His dead bodie was forthwith brought to Selymus, and was afterwards by his commandement in royall manner buried with his anceſtours in PRVSA.

Achomates ſtrangled.

Now Amurat, Achomates his ſonne, vnderſtanding vpon the way by the Perſian horſemen (who ſerred together, had againe made themſelues way through the Turkes armie) of the loſſe K of the field and the taking of his father, returned backe againe to AMASIA: and there after good deliberation, reſolued with his brother to betake themſelues both to flight; he with the Perſian horſemen paſſing ouer the riuer Euphrates, fled vnto Hyſmaell the Perſian king: but Aladin the younger brother paſſing ouer the mountaine AMANVS in CILICIA, fled into SYRIA, and ſo to Campſon Gaurus the great Sultan of ÆGYPT.

Amurat and Aladin, the ſons of Achomates, flie the one into Perſia, and the other into Egypt.

After this victorie, Selymus hauing in ſhort time and with little trouble brought all the leſſer ASIA vnder his obeiſance, and there at his pleaſure diſpoſed of all things, determined to haue returned to CONSTANTINOPLE: but vnderſtanding that the plague was hot there, he changed his purpoſe, and paſſing ouer at GALLIPOLIS and ſo trauelling through GRECIA, came to HADRIANOPLE, where he ſpent all the reſt of that Summer, and all the Winter following: L and afterward when the mortalitie was ceaſed, returned to CONSTANTINOPLE; where it was found, that an hundred and threeſcore thouſand had there died of the late plague.

Hyſmaell the Perſian king, whoſe fame had then filled the world, hearing of the arriuall of Amurat, ſent for him, and demaunded of him the cauſe of his comming. The diſtreſſed yong prince, who but of late had loſt his father, together with the hope of ſo great an empire, & now glad for ſafegard of his life to flie into ſtrange countries, oppreſſed with ſorrow, by his heauie countenance and abundance of teares, more than by words, expreſſed the cauſe of his comming: yet in ſhort ſtrained ſpeech, declared vnto him, how that his father, his vncle, with the reſt of his couſins, all princes of great honour, had of late beene cruelly murdered by the vnmercifull tyrant Selymus: who with like furie ſought alſo after the life of himſelfe and his bro- M ther, the poore remainders of the Othoman familie, who to ſaue their liues, were both glad to flie, his brother into ÆGYPT, and himſelfe to the feet of his imperiall maieſtie.

Hyſmaell moued with compaſſion, and deeming it a thing well beſeeming the greatneſſe of his fame, to take the poore exiled prince into his protection and to giue him releeſe, willed him to be of good comfort, and promiſed him aid. And the more to aſſure him thereof, ſhortly after

gaue

A gaue him one of his owne daughters in mariage. For it was thought, that if Selymus for his tyrannie become odious to the world, ſhould by any meanes miſcarrie (as with tyrants commonly falleth out) that then in the Othoman familie, ſore ſhaken with his vnnaturall crueltie, none was to be preferred before this poore prince Amurat: beſides that, it was ſuppoſed, that if he ſhould inuade him with an armie out of PERSIA, that vpon the firſt ſtir, all the leſſer ASIA, mourning for the vnworthie death of Achomates, would at once reuolt from him, who for his crueltie and ſhamefull murthers had worthily deſerued to be hated together both of God and man.

Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring Hyſmaell furniſhed Amurat his new ſonne in
B law with ten thouſand horſemen, willing him to paſſe ouer the riuer of Euphrates at ARSENGA, and to enter into CAPADOCIA, as well to make proofe how the people of that countrie were affected towards him, as of the ſtrength of the enemie: after whom he ſent Vſta-Ogli, the moſt famous chiefetaine amongſt the Perſians, with twentie thouſand horſemen mo, with charge, That he ſhould ſtill follow Amurat within one daies iourney: and he himſelfe with a farre greater power ſtayed behind in ARMENIA, doubting to want victuall if he ſhould haue led ſo great an armie through thoſe vaſt baron and deſolate places, whereby he muſt of neceſſitie paſſe.

Amurat marching through the leſſer ARMENIA, and entering into the borders of CAPA- 1514
DOCIA, had diuers townes yeelded vnto him by his friends; ſome others he tooke by force, Amurat ſpoileth
C which he either ſacked or els quite raſed; and brought ſuch a generall feare vpon the inhabitants Capadocia.
of the prouince, that the people ſubmitting themſelues vnto him all the way as he went, it was thought he would haue gone directly to AMASIA, had not Chendemus (an old warlike captain whom Selymus had left for his lieutenant at ASIA, with a great armie come to meet him at SEBASTIA, which at this day is called SIVAS. This Chendemus had alſo long before aduertiſed Selymus both of the preparation and comming of the Perſians, as ſoone as he had learned by his eſpials that they were paſſed the riuer Euphrates. Vpon which news Selymus came preſently ouer into ASIA, and commaunding all his forces to meet together at PRVSA, had with wonderfull celeritie leuied thereabout fortie thouſand common ſouldiers. Which ſo ſoone as Amurat vnderſtood, as well by ſuch priſoners as he had taken, as by aduertiſment from his friends;
D although he was verie deſirous to haue fought with Chendemus, yet doubting that if Selymus ſhould with his wonted celeritie come againſt him, he ſhould be intangled in the ſtraits of the mountaine ANTITAVRVS, he retired backe againe to Vſta-Ogli. But Selymus who all that yeare had in his haughtie thoughts been plotting ſome ſuch notable exploit as were worthie his greatneſſe, ſtanding in doubt whether he ſhould by ſea and land inuade HVNGARIE, the RHODES, or ITALIE, at that time ſore ſhaken with ciuile wars: hauing now ſo fit an occaſion giuen him by the Perſian (to the great ioy of all Chriſtendome) conuerted himſelfe wholly vnto the Eaſt, and in thirtie daies march came to ARSENGA. Where ioyning his armie with Chendemus, when he vnderſtood that his enemies hauing harried the countrey, were againe retired; prickt forward with the griefe of the iniurie, and deſire of reuenge, with hope of victorie he reſolued to follow Selymus reſolueth to inuade the Perſian.
E after them foot by foot, and forthwith to enter into ARMENIA the greater, the principall prouince of the Perſian kingdome.

But the difficulties of this notable expedition, which were in counſell propounded by them which had beſt knowledge of thoſe countries, were great and many, all which by his own good hap and inuincible courage, he himſelfe afterwards ouercame: for the ſouldiours which had in ſhort time alreadie marched by land out of ILLIRIA, EPIRVS, and MACEDONIA, into CAPADOCIA, muſt of neceſſitie in this long expedition take vpon them new labours: they were to endure the ſharpe and pinching cold of the huge mountaine TAVRVS, and by and by after the moſt vehement and ſcorching heat in the plaines of ARMENIA the leſſer, with extreame thirſt, hunger, and moſt deſperate want of all things; and well the more, for that the Perſians in their
F retreat ſpoiling the countrie as they went, had vtterly deſtroyed all that might ſerue for the vſe of man, of purpoſe to leaue nothing to their enemies, but want of all things, if they ſhould purſue them: beſides that, his moſt expert captaines ſtood in no ſmall doubt of the pettie princes of ARMENIA the leſſe, and the mountaine king Aladeules, whom they were to leaue behind them at their backes, without any great aſſurance of their friendſhip, who they well knew would faile them, if any thing ſhould happen otherwiſe than well to Selymus, either in battell, or for want of victuals, or in the difficulties of the paſſages. For they were to be relieued with victuals from the Armenians: and Aladeules forces then in readineſſe, were neither for number nor power to be contemned; who alſo with caſtles commodiouſly placed and ſtrong garriſons, at his pleaſure commanded all the ſtraits, paſſages, and entrances, which led out of CAPADOCIA into ARMENIA and the Perſian kingdome: for all the mountaine countries were vnder his commaund, and his kingdome ſtretched from the mountaines called SCODRISCI neere vnto PONTVS, all alongſt the great mountaine TAVRVS vnto AMANVS, which diuideth CILICIA from SYRIA. G

Amongſt the reſt, old Chendemus viceroy of NATOLIA, a man of great experience, and of all others in greateſt credit, fauour, and authoritie with Selymus, perſuaded him to ſtay a while in CAPADOCIA, and there to refreſh his Europeian ſouldiors alreadie wearie of their long trauell, and ſo to expect the comming of his enemies. And to diſſuade him from the dangerous expedition into PERSIA, ſpake vnto him as followeth: H

Chendemus diſſuadeth Selymus from going further against the Perſians.

It is not to be thought (moſt mightie and inuincible emperour) that the Perſians are fled for feare, becauſe they retired before they ſet eye vpon vs their enemies: it is a fineneſſe, and they plainely goe about to intrap vs, whiles they by flight make a falſe ſemblant of feare. Know we not what cunning heads, what able bodies PERSIA breedeth? will they feare the naked Turkiſh light horſeman or archer, which with their couragious barbed horſes and themſelues ſtrongly armed, feared not the Scythian ſhot? or (if that bee too little) which by their valour haue vanquiſhed ſo many nations, and gained vnto their king ſo great and large an empire? Thinke you, that you haue either greater or better forces than had long agoe Caſſumes your vncle? or great Mahomet your grandfather? who diuers times prooving their forces againſt this enemie, were more than once put to the worſt, I my ſelfe then ſeruing in their campes neere vnto TRAPEZONDE and the mountaines of NICOPOLIS. I will not denie, but that the great ordinance which you carrie with you may ſtand you in great ſtead, ſo that fit place may be found to beſtow ſo many field pieces in: but this ſcorched ground, the frozen and abrupt mountaines, with the vaſt and ſolitarie plaines beyond them, terrifie mee, whom all the armed forces of our enemies in place of great aduantage could not diſmaie. You muſt fight, not only with your valiant enemies, but with the difficulties of nature alſo. Neither may your maieſtie giue anie credit to the Armenians, or Aladeules, princes of moſt doubtfull faith; although at your firſt ſetting forward, they ſhew a faire face and ſeeme neuer ſo friendly: for they will but expect and await ſome fit occaſion to take you at an aduantage, and ſo to ſet vpon you when you leaſt feare them. But admit you were aſſured of victorie, O with how much warme bloud of your beſt ſouldiours ſhall you buy the ſame? with what other ſouldiors, with what other forces will you defend GRÆCIA, if the Chriſtian kings hearing that you for inlarging your empire, or deſire of fame being gone into the farthеſt part of ARMENIA, ſhall in the meane time inuade you? Wherefore if it be better and more wiſedome with ſafetie to defend your own, than with danger to ſeeke for that is other mens; if princes of greateſt pollicie haue repoſed the glorie of their victories, not in the greatneſſe of the ſlaughter of their enemies, but in the ſafetie and preſeruation of their owne ſouldiors: ſpare to obiect your ſelfe and your armie to moſt manifeſt danger, and vnaduiſedly to commit all at once to the hazard of good fortune: which being a moſt tickle and vnconſtant miſtreſſe, if ſhe ſhall but once dallie with your dangerous attempts, you ſhall through your raſhneſſe in farre ſhorter ſpace tumble downe headlong from the type of ſo great maieſtie, than you haue thereunto a while agoe by your rare vertues worthily aſpired. I K L

Selymus as he was of a rough and fierce nature, ſo would he haue all things done according to his owne deuiſe and direction. And though he were not a little moued with this ſpeech of ſo graue a counſellor and moſt expert commander, and ſaw many of his captaines troubled with the imagination of the future danger: yet in a fume, refuting ſome little of that which Chendemus had ſaid, he diſmiſſed the counſel; proteſting openly, that he would proceed in his intended purpoſe, hap what hap ſhould, from friend or fo: although that old fellow were (as he ſaid) ſo carefull of his life, that he feared to die an honourable death. Which Selymus had no ſooner ſaid, but preſently others about him, accuſtomed to ſerue his humour, which enuied at the glorie and wealth of old Chendemus, tooke hold vpon thoſe words: and beginning with the greatnes of his forces, the valour of his ſouldiors, the ſtore of his artillerie, with his owne inuincible fortune; made eaſie matters of all the former difficulties, and with great words labored to extenuat M

all

A all that the graue Baſſa had before ſaid concerning the proweſſe and power of the enemie. After that, they began to diſcredit Chendemus, ſaying, That he (being a martiall man, and of knowne reſolution in all his moſt warlike actions) had not ſaid as before, for want of courage, or any diſtruſt he had of the victorie, but of purpoſe to hinder that moſt honourable expedition, and to cut off all hope of victorie, which was (as they ſaid) as good as alreadie gotten; being before loded with Amurat his great promiſes, and the gold of PERSIA. Wherefore they wiſhed him to beware of the ſlie old Fox his wiles and treaſon, and to proceed on in his expedition ſo much the more boldly: and not to thinke that his ſouldiors would refuſe any danger or labor, ſo long as they ſaw courage in himſelfe, but would be readie (as they ſaid) to vndertake the moſt deſperat difficulties of warre; and deſired nothing more, than to be conducted into thoſe
B far countries, where by their martiall proweſſe and valiant acts they might make their emperour Selymus equall with the Great Alexander, and themſelues comparable to his Macedonians. And to worke the vtter deſtruction of this moſt faithfull counſellor without all recure, theſe falſe flatterers ſuborned bold faced accuſers, who falſly and ſhamefull affirmed, that he had receiued great ſums of mony from Amurat, and did not therefore in time go againſt the Perſian robbers, whereby all the former calamities happened (as they ſaid) to that prouince: for which pretended cauſes, Selymus commanded Chendemus without farther hearing, to be ſlaine. But in deed to terrifie others from like libertie of ſpeech, and withall to teach them to deeme thoſe deuiſes and counſels as moſt excellent, which their ſoueraigne ſhould as it were by diuine inſpiration find out himſelfe; and ſo to accept of them without contradiction. The ſudden death of
C this moſt faithfull counſellor Chendemus, ſtrucke an exceeding feare into the minds of all men, for that ſo honourable a perſonage, of late in ſo great fauour and credit with his ſoueraigne, was without hearing executed; whom they had knowne as a man of great account, both for his proweſſe and policie, to haue ſtood faſt on Selymus ſide, firſt in his wars againſt his father, and of late againſt his brother: not doubting but that Selymus by nature cruell, and ſuſpitious euen of trifles, would with like tyrannie not ſpare men of meaner calling, which ſpared not his deereſt and moſt ancient friends.

Chendemus Baſſa by the commandment of Selymus ſlaine.

Selymus marching from ARSENGA came to the confines of the leſſer Armenian kings, and of Aladeules: where by his embaſſadours he requeſted the kings of thoſe nations (who were then in armes) that they would ioine their forces with his againſt the Perſian, and to go with him
D into ARMENIA the Great: promiſing that when the warres were happily ended, he would giue vnto them all ſuch territorie as ſhould chance in thoſe warres to be taken from the enemie, as a reward of their aid. But theſe poore kings, which hated both Hyſmaell and Selymus for the manifold iniuries they daily receiued in the frontires of their dominions, lying in the middeſt betweene them, (as commonly it falleth out that the weakeſt goeth to the wals) craftily expecting the euent of this war, would not openly ſhew themſelues, but anſwered that they had taken vp armes for no other purpoſe, but for the defence of themſelues and their kingdomes. Not meaning in that doubtfull warre, to beare themſelues as enemies vnto either of thoſe great princes their friends and neighbours, of whoſe iuſt grieuances they were not able or worthie to determine: yet if he would without hoſtilitie, in peaceable manner paſſe through their dominions,
E they promiſed to giue free paſſage vnto him and his armie: and after he were entred into ARMENIA the greater, to relieue him with ſuch prouiſion of victuall as their bare countries could affoord.

Selymus thus deceiued of this his firſt hope (for why, he thought thoſe poore kings would at the firſt either for loue or feare haue beene readie to haue done him all the ſeruice they could) diſſembled his griefe for the preſent, as wholy bent againſt Hyſmaell: fearing, that if he ſhould by word or deed offend thoſe neuter princes, he ſhould haue thē at his back his moſt aſſured & vndoubted enemies. Wherfore paſſing the mountains called SCODRISCI, he came in eight daies vnto the great mountaines called MOSCHII, which the famous riuer Euphrates with his mightie ſtreame and hugie broken bankes ſeparateth from the great mountaine ANTITAVRVS, and F with perpetuall ſteepe ridges runneth into IBERIA and CHOLCHIS, and on the Eaſt diſcouereth ARMENIA the greater. Here Selymus with enſignes diſplaied marching alongſt the banke of the riuer, departed not from the ſame, for feare to lacke water in that hoat and drie countrey: and ſo held on his way directly Eaſtward, leauing the countrey of ARMENIA the leſſe vpon his left hand, and the frontiers of the kingdome of Aladeules on the right, vntill he came to the mountaine PERIARDO. This great mountaine, famous by the rising of two great and notable G riuers out of it, is for the wonderfull fertilitie of all things, of the barbarous people called LEPRVS, which is say, fruitfull: for Euphrates and Araxis there running out of two diuers and contrarie marshes, with many armes, water and inrich that champain and drie countrie. Selymus hauing made so great a iourney, and yet not able so much as by report to vnderstand what was become of Hysmaell his great and populus armie, which he knew was but a little before departed out of CAPADOCIA; as a man in doubt, and halfe afraid, stayed and emcaped his armie at the head of the riuer Euphrates: and from thence sent out his scouts euery way, if happily they could intercept some which might giue him knowledge of his enemies. But the Armenians, whether it were for feare of the comming of the Turks, or that Hysmaell their king had so commaunded, were all before fled out of that part of the countrie whereby Selymus was to passe H with his armie, and hauing forsaken their houses, had carried away with them, or else by fire destroyed whatsoeuer might serue for the vse of man.

Selymus sendeth out his scouts, who return with bad newes.

The Turkish scouts after they had by the space of two daies scoured vp and down the countrie, returned backe againe to Selymus, not hauing taken so much as any one man; shewing vnto him, that all things were destroyed before him, and nothing left but wide fields and a most desolate countrie, without any appearance of man or beast: and that they were of opinion, that either the Armenian guides were deceiued in the way, or else had of purpose brought them into such desart places, wheras wanting pasture for their horses, and food for men, they must needs together perish with hunger. Which their present feare was greatly increased by the weak kings whom they had left behind them at their backs; but especially Aladeules, who either for shame I or feare had a few daies at the first holpen the Turks with victuals, but after they were farther entred into ARMENIA, performed nothing of that he had before most faithfully promised: seeking therein the fauour of Hysmaell, who he thought would with the same good fortune vanquish the Turks, that he had not long before the greatest part of the East. Selymus perplexed in mind, began now to suspect treason, to feare famine, to dread the desarts and forsaken places, and with griefe of mind to call to remembrance all that old Chendemus his faithfull counsellor had before most truly told him: for all that, he shewed himselfe vnto his souldiors with cheerful countenance, as a man nothing dismaied: which his firme constancie seemed to promise vnto their discouraged minds good successe, with speedie victorie. Wherefore calling vnto him his guides, and such as best knew the countrey, and vnderstanding by them, that on the right hand K beyond the mountaine PERIARDO lay the most fruitfull countrie of all ARMENIA, he rise with his armie, and compassing the hill toward the North, turned downe toward the riuer Araxes, and aboue the citie of COY passed his armie ouer the riuer, his footmen by little bridges, and his horsemen by foords: for Araxes, vntill it haue receiued such riuers as fall into it out of the marshes of the PERIARDO, runneth but with a small streame, and is in some place easie to be passed ouer.

Selymus passeth ouer Araxes.

Selymus had scarcely well got ouer the riuer, and incamped his armie, when Vsta-Ogli, who hauing ioyned his forces with Amurath, lying incamped not farre off; and fearing least the citie of COY and the vnprouided citizens should by the sudden comming of the enemie be op- L pressed, quickly rise with his armie, and set forwards to meet with the Turks: for that citie of all others in that countrie, for fresh fountaines and riuers most pleasant, wherein the Persian kings for the great plentie of all manner of fruit, and wholesomenesse of the aire, leauing TAVRIS, were wont to spend most part of the Summer, had then in it many rich citizens and sumptuous buildings; which Vsta-Ogli thought good betimes to rescue, and not with dishonour to loose that rich citie, looking as it were vpon it, and leauing it vnto the enemie, to suffer him there to refresh his hunger-starued souldiors with plentie of all things. Cassinus an Armenian borne, and present in those wars, did by many probabilities (as Iouius writeth) shew vnto him, that this citie of COY was in ancient time that most famous citie called ARTAXATA, which Domitius Corbulo destroyed. Neither did Hysmaell himselfe (although he had but a little before sent the greatest M part of his forces against the Coraxeni, who were then risen vp against him in rebellion, as he that made no great reckoning of the Turks, or euer thought that they durst haue come so farre into ARMENIA) make any delay, but forthwith, as soone as he had heard of the comming of Selymus, came also in person himselfe vnto his armie.

By chance Vsta-Ogli (who contrarie to all mens expectation had vntill then shunned to fight,

A or come in ſight of his enemies, of purpoſe with leſſe danger and loſſe of men, to ouerthrow them afterwards, being ſore weakened and almoſt ſpent with long trauell and want of victuals) lay then incamped neere the citie, when as the Turkes ſcouts, vpon the comming of Hyſmaell, perceiued by the great riſing of the duſt, and by the neighing of the Perſian horſes, that ſome greater power was at hand. Which ſo ſoone as it was noiſed in the Turkiſh campe, they began to reioice exceedingly, & to conceiue the firſt hope both of their ſafetie and victorie; glad, that now meeting with their enemies, they ſhould either by victorie turne their labour, toile, famine, and extremities wherewith they had of long time ſtriuen, into eaſe and plentie of all things, or els by honourable death end all their miſeries at once: for many of the horſemen, eſpecially of
B them that came out of EVROPE, whoſe horſes were ſtarued for want of forrage, and the common footmen ſpent with long trauell, and grieuouſly troubled with the flix (who trauelling in the extreame heat of the Sunne, had for moſt part liued vpon crabs and other wild fruits, with a bad ſupping made of meale and vineger, and almoſt deſparing to get the ſight of their enemies) began now to die in euery corner.

Hyſmaell as ſoone as he was come within ſight of his enemies, repoſing great confidence as well in the valour of his ſouldiers as in his owne rare fortune, the more to terrifie them, thought it good forthwith to giue them battell: whereupon he ſent an herauld vnto Selymus, accompanied with certaine skilfull ſouldiers, which ſhould in beſt ſort they could take view of the number and force of their enemies, of their artillerie, and in what ſort they lay incamped; and to tell
C him, That for as much as he had no title vnto ARMENIA, nor that the Turks had at any time claimed any intereſt therin, he could not but maruell, why he had againſt all right entered with his armie into his dominion: but if he happily vpon a vaine preſumption, to the imitation of Alexander of MACEDON, ſhould thinke ſo much of the world his owne as he could by the ſword and his owne fortune win, he ſhould then make himſelfe readie againſt the next day to make proofe of his owne fortune and the forces of others, not inferiour to his owne.

Hyſmaell ſtandeth an herauld to Selymus.

Whereunto Selymus anſwered, That the freſh remembrance of the manifold iniuries done to the Turkes by the Perſians, was ſuch, as might giue him iuſt cauſe to take vp armes: for as much as long agoe both his grandfather Mahomet the Great, and his vncle Caſſumes, and euen of late his father Baiazet, & he himſelfe alſo in his warres againſt his brother Achomates, had re-D ceiued great wrong and diſhonour from the Perſians. All which things, although they were of themſelues important, yet he eſteemed not of them as ſufficient cauſes of warre, but only ſought after his enemie Amurath, his brothers ſonne, who had of late ſpoiled CAPADOCIA: whom if he would quietly and friendly deliuer vnto him, as the mutuall lawes of amitie and friendſhip amongſt princes for the maintenance and preſeruation of their eſtates and kingdomes required, then he would withdraw his forces, and peaceably returne into his kingdome: otherwiſe, he threatned with fire and ſword to deſtroy, not the frontires of ARMENIA, but euen the heart of PERSIA. And ſo diſmiſſing the herauld, both the armies for that day lay ſtill in their trenches, expecting the dreadfull euent of battell.

Selymus his anſwer vnto Hyſmaell.

The next day Selymus by perſuaſion of his captaines brought his armie into the open field,
E and in order of battell ſet forward againſt his enemies, which lay about two miles off, thinking that Hyſmaell, a prince of ſo great name, would without delay accept of battaile: yet what ſtrength the Perſian king was of, what number of men he had, what manner of horſemen, how armed, and with what weapons, he could not certainely learne: for beſide that the Perſians are by nature ingenious and ſubtill, the ſouldiors generally ſo reuerenced and loued Hyſmaell their king, that no one was found to haue gone from him to the Turke; wheras many reuolted from Selymus to him, as it was afterwards learned of the Perſian captaines.

The order of Selymus his battell.

Selymus, who had at that time foureſcore thouſand horſemen vnder his enſignes, placed Caſan Baſſa his lieutenant Generall of EVROPE, with his Europeian horſemen in the right wing; and Sinan Baſſa with his Aſian horſemen in the left: and before them both, the Acanzij (which F are voluntarie horſemen, the forerunners of the Turkes armie) who in hope of ſpoile follow the Turkes warres out of all countries: in the middle battaile he placed the Aſapi or common ſouldiors; which baſe and halfe-naked people, as men of little worth or eſtimation, are commonly thruſt into the front of the Turkes battells, to receiue the firſt furie of the enemie, and to blunt their ſwords, more than for any other good ſeruice: directly behind them he beſtowed his great artillerie, guarded with foure thouſand horſemen: laſt of all followed himſelfe with his his choſen pentioners and Ianizaries compaſſed about with ſmall field-pieces and his cariages, G as with a double trench: for he had (as their manner is) ſo inuironed himſelfe round with his ſadled cammels, made faſt one to another with long chaines, that they ſtood him in ſtead of a ſtrong trench, from whence he might ſpeedily relieue any part of his diſtreſſed armie; and in caſe of extremitie, being in the middle of his ſtrength, he may as out of a ſure fortreſſe repreſſe the furious aſſault of his enemies. He alſo commanded his footmen in the vauward of his battell, that vpon the approch of the enemies horſemen they ſhould ſpeedily withdraw themſelues aſide into two parts, leauing ſpace for the great ordinance which was placed behind them to play in the middle betweene them. On the contrarie part, Hyſmaell, who by the Turks fugitiues vnderſtood all the deuiſes of his enemies, calling vnto him the chiefe commanders of his armie, H ſhewed vnto them, that there was no doubt of the victorie, ſo that they could ſhun the furie of the great artillerie: which he aſſured them would eaſily be done, if when they ſaw the Turkiſh footmen diuide themſelues, they would alſo in like maner withdraw themſelues into two parts, and giue place to the fury of the great ordinance: for which purpoſe he cauſed two great enſigns to be diſplayed, whereunto they ſhould at the time appointed retire, the one for himſelfe and thoſe whom he conducted, the other for Vſta-Ogli, and the reſt of his armie.

Hyſmaell with thirty thouſand Perſians giueth battell to Selymus with three hundred thouſand Turkes.

Hyſmaell (as Iouius reporteth) had in his armie about thirtie thouſand horſemen, without any footmen, amongſt whom were ten thouſand men at armes, reſolute gentlemen, of great experience, all gallantly mounted vpon courageous barbed horſes, and themſelues brauely armed both for the ſhew and the terrour of the enemie; their weapons were a good launce, a ſure ſci- I mitar, and a horſemans mace: the reſt were armed with ſtrong cuiraſſes and headpieces, and were either archers on horſebacke, or elſe vſed light horſemens ſtaues, made of Aſh after the Spaniſh faſhion, wherewith they ſerued at the halfe ſtaffe. As for gunns they had none, in which thing only, and number of men, they were inferiour to the Turks. But ſuch was the inuincible courage and noble minds of the Perſians, that contemning the huge multitude of their enemies (who were in number about three hundred thouſand) and making no great reckoning of the great artillerie, they doubted not with ſo few to giue them battell.

Hyſmaell hauing giuen the ſignall of battell, came on with his armie, exhorting his ſouldiours then to remember the honour they had long before gotten in many battells, and coura-geouſly to follow him their ſoueraigne, whom they by their worthie ſeruice and many victo- K ries, had made the greateſt monarch of the Eaſt, telling them, that they ſhould haue now to do but with naked men, whoſe weapons were but weake ſtaues and light targuets, and their horſes little poore iades, almoſt dead with hunger, neuer able to abide the firſt charge of his valiant men at armes.

On the other ſide, Selymus perceiuing the comming of his enemies by the riſing of the duſt, cauſed knowledge to be giuen through his armie by his captaines and officers, that the time of battell which they had ſo long wiſhed for, was now come; wherein if they would worthily acquite themſelues againſt thoſe their proud enemies, they ſhould to their immortall fame extend the Turkiſh empire from the Perſian ſea vnto the mountaine CAVCASVS: but if they cowardly forgetting their ancient proweſſe, ſhould faint in the time of the battell, they were not L then to thinke by any meanes to eſcape by flight backe againe through thoſe great plaines and deſolate countries; where they ſhould by the way either ſhamefully periſh, or elſe to their perpetuall infamie be taken priſoners, and as baſe ſlaues, during their liues be inforced to ſerue the Perſian women: for as much as beſide the great diſtance of the place, both the great riuer Euphrates, and the huge mountaine TAVRVS, and the faithleſſe king Aladeules, who had ſhut vp all the paſſages, did cut off all hope from them, if they ſhould be ouercome, by any meanes poſſible to eſcape backe againe into CAPADOCIA.

The great and mortall battell between Selymus and Hyſmaell.

When Hyſmaell was come neere with his armie, and the Aſapi vpon ſigne giuen diuiding themſelues, made place for the great artillerie to play, as was before appointed; he alſo preſently diuiding his horſmen, charged the right wing of the Turks armie, with ſuch force, that after a M moſt terrible fight betwixt the halfe armed Turks, and the valiant Perſian men at armes, Caſan Baſſa the great commander of the Europeian horſemen, with the formoſt of that wing, being ſlain, and many mo after them, he inforced all that wing to retire vnto that place where Sely- mus himſelfe with the Ianizaries ſtood. On the other ſide, Vſta-Ogli hauing receiued no little harme by the Turks great ordinance, becauſe he had not ſo ſpeedily cleered himſelfe and his fol-

A followers of that danger, as had Hyſmaell, charged the Aſian horſemen in the left wing, and there in bloudie battell made great ſlaughter of the enemie, but not with like good hap as did Hyſmael: for whiles he moſt couragiouſly in the formoſt rankes aſſailed his enemies, he was ſtrucke with a ſmall ſhot and ſlaine. With whoſe fall the Turkes were greatly encouraged, inſomuch as that they which but now were glad to giue ground, and had loſt the third part of that wing, began a freſh to renew the battell, and valiantly to withſtand the Perſians; and with their harquebuſiers (wherewith the Perſian horſemen were wonderfully terrified) draue them headlong vpon the Turkes common footmen. The Perſians whether it were forced by neceſſitie for that they had loſt ſo great a commander, and not well able to gouerne their horſes terrified with the thun- Vſta-ogli ſlaine.
B dring ſhot, or elſe for that the open ſide of the footmen preſented vnto them greater place of aduantage, ſerring themſelues together brake through the middle of the battell of thoſe Turkiſh footmen, and bearing them downe before them with a mightie ſlaughter, came to the great ordinance and there ſlew the canoniers, who diſcharging their field pieces at all aduentures, in that great medly made a foule ſlaughter, as well of their owne men as of their enemies. And ſo without ſtop (as victorious conquerours) made way through the middeſt of their enemies, vntill they came to the right wing: where Hyſmaell was ſtill hardly charging the Europeian horſemen, who hauing before loſt Caſan their Generall, and being many of them ſlaine or wounded, were alreadie enforced to retire; but now charged afreſh vpon the ſide, had much adoe to endure the furie of their enemies, but as men in extreame danger, were glad to crie to Selymus
C for helpe.

In this hard diſtreſſe, Selymus in two places opened his carriages, wherewith he ſtood as it were entrenched, and preſently ſent out part of his horſemen. And by and by turning himſelfe vnto his Ianizaries, ſaid, This dayes victorie is reſerued (moſt worthie ſouldiours) vnto your valour and labour: wherefore now valiantly ſet forward, and as freſh and couragious men, aſſaile your wearied enemies; their horſes are all on a water with ſweat, and the men themſelues faint vnder the waight of their armour. But yet for all that Selymus could ſay, the Ianizaries were not very forward, but ſtood ſtill, as men willing in ſo great a danger to keepe themſelues within the ſafegard of their munition. Wherefore whileſt they at their leiſure ſet forward, the Perſians in the middeſt of the heat of this victorie, compaſſing in the Europeian horſemen, ſlew them downe right, Selymus
D looking on and wiſhing in vaine to helpe them. Fabritius Carrectus great maſter of the RHODES, who of all theſe things had certaine intelligence, writ to Leo the tenth then biſhop of ROME, that the Ianizaries refuſed to be commanded by Selymus, and were not by any perſwaſion or entreatie to be enduced to relieue the diſtreſſed Europeian horſemen; but as men diſtruſting the euent of the battell, choſe rather in their ſtrength to expect the ſucceſſe thereof, than with moſt manifeſt danger to expoſe themſelues vnto the violence of the Perſian horſemen, which had as a tempeſt ouerborne the vantguard of the Turkiſh footmen.

The Perſians were now ready on euery ſide to haue aſſailed Selymus in his greateſt ſtrength: when Sinan Baſſa, although the wing he led was ſore rent and weakned, yet following the Perſians through the middeſt of the heaps of the ſlaine footmen, came in, in good time for Selymus,
E and with certaine freſh troups which had eſcaped the furie of Vſta-ogli, reſtored the battell before almoſt loſt: but eſpecially by the inuincible courage of Alis-beg and Mahomet his brother, diſcended of the honourable familie of the Molcozzij, which for nobilitie amongſt the Turkes is accounted next vnto the Othomans; both of them for courage reſembling their warlike father Malcozzius, famous for that wofull expedition he made into FRIVLI againſt the Venetians in the raigne of Baiazet. Selymus alſo not yet diſcouraged but ſtill in hope, commanded all the great ordinance wherewith he was enuironed, which he had reſerued as his laſt refuge, to be diſcharged: by the violence whereof, ſuch ſlaughter was made, as well of his owne men as of his enemies, mingled together, that what for duſt, what for ſmoake, and thundring of the artillerie, hauing on both ſides almoſt loſt the vſe of ſight and hearing; and their horſes being ſo terrified The terrour of the battell betweene Selymus and Hyſmaell.
F with the thundring report of the great ordinance, that they were not now to be ruled, the battell was broken off, the victorie yet doubtfull. The Turkiſh hiſtories to expreſſe the terrour of this day, number it amongſt their diſmall daies, tearming it The onely day of Doome.

Hyſmaell in this furious battell, hauing receiued a wound vnder his left ſhoulder with a ſmall ſhot; by perſuaſion of his friends withdrew himſelfe to haue his wound ſearched: which thing vndoubtedly was the ſafegard both of Selymus & his armie. For the Perſians by and by following ing their king, left the victorie now in all mens opinion almoſt gotten. But after that Hyſmaell G perceiued the wound was not deepe, for that the ſtrength of his armor had ſo broken the force of the ſhot, that it pierced not far into his bodie, he was about to haue charged the Turks afreſh: but vnderſtanding of the death of Vſta-ogli, in whom for his ſingular experience in martiall affaires, he had repoſed his greateſt confidence; and his captains alſo perſuading him not to make ſo light reckoning of his wound, the griefe whereof he yet felt not, being warme, but to haue regard to his own health: he in ſeemly order ſoftly marched away in ſuch ſort, that his departure had no reſemblance of flight. And paſſing by the citie of TAVRIS, willed the chief of the citizens to open the gates of the citie to Selymus (if he ſhould come thither) and to receiue his garriſons, rather then by vaine conſtancie to fall into vtter deſtruction: and ſo marched himſelfe into the H confines of MEDIA.

But the Turkes intangled with many difficulties, hauing no hearts for feare, nor ſtrenght for wearineſſe to purſue their enemies; yet comming to the Perſian tents, tooke them without reſiſtance: where beſide the rich pauillions wrought with needle worke of ſilke and gold, and much other pretious furniture, many noble ladies and gentlewomen were found, which after the manner of the Perſians had followed their husbands in thoſe warres; whom Selymus cauſed to be all freely ſet at liberty vntouched, excepting one of the wiues of Hyſmaell whom he detained and gaue her in mariage to one of his Baſſaes. Some which were preſent at this battell, reported that amongſt the heapes of them that were ſlaine, were found the dead bodies of diuers Perſian women, which being armed, and following their husbands, died with them in the battell; whom I Selymus cauſed to be honeſtly buried.

The Perſian tents taken by the Turkes.

This was that notable battell fought in the GALDERAN fields neere vnto the city of COY, betwixt theſe two great princes, the ſeauenth day of Auguſt in the yeare of our Lord 1514. In which battell Selymus loſt aboue thirtie thouſand men, amongſt whom was Caſan Baſſa his great lieutenant in EVROPE, ſeauen Sanzackes, in which were the two Malcozzian brethren, who labouring the one to reſcue the other were both togither ſlaine. Beſide his common footmen of whom he made leaſt reckoning, he loſt moſt part of his Illirian, Macedonian, Seruian, Epirot, Theſſalian, and Thracian horſemen, the vndoubted flower and ſtrength of his army, which were in that mortall battell almoſt all ſlaine, or grieuouſly wounded.

Selymus for all this great loſſe, by the confeſſion of his enemies hauing gotten the victorie, K and receiuing embaſſadours from COY and the cities thereabout, and the great citie of TAVRIS promiſing to relieue him with whatſoeuer hee needed, and to doe what elſe he ſhould commaund: marched directly to TAVRIS, deſiring both to ſee and poſſeſſe himſelfe of that citie, as one of the chiefe pallaces of the Perſian kings. This citie is two daies iourney diſtant from COY where the battell was fought, and is probably ſuppoſed to de the famous citie called in auncient time ECBATHANA, about an hundred and fiftie miles diſtant from the Caſpian ſea. The citiſens were readie at the comming of the Turkes, and brought them great ſtore of victuals out of the gates of the citie, where Selymus had lodged his armie in the ſuburbs, thinking it no ſafetie to lodge within that great and populous citie; contenting himſelfe to haue the gates thereof deliuered vnto him, which he kept with ſtrong guard. Some report that Selymus durſt not truſt the L Perſians, and therefore neuer went into the citie but diſguiſed in the habit of a common ſouldiour. Yet ſome others ſay, that he did with great magnificence banquet in the ſtately pallace of the Perſian king, and there had great diſcourſe with them of TAVRIS concerning his late victorie. But whileſt he thus ſtaied at TAVRIS, and with himſelfe purpoſed to ſpend that winter in ARMENIA; he called togither his great captaines and commaunders of his armie, to know how they liked thereof: who fearing his diſpleaſure, wholy referred themſelues to his owne reſolution. Onely Muſtapha his chiefe Baſſa chanced to ſay, That it were good that the minds of the Ianizaries and the other ſouldiers of the court ſhould therein be knowne. Which his ſpeech, Selymus tooke in ſuch euill part, that he preſently commanded him out of his ſight, and depriued him of his greateſt honour: and the more to diſgrace him, ſent one of his ieſters after him, who M in great ſcorne and deriſion comming behind him, cut off part of his tulipant that hung downe as the faſhion was. But the Ianizaries vnderſtanding the matter, and much offended with the indignitie offered vnto the great Baſſa whom they deerely loued, riſe vp altogither in armes, & told Selymus flatly, That they would not in any caſe winter ſo far from home in the enemies countrey: and therefore that it were beſt for him betime to conſider of the matter, for that they were

A were reſolutely ſet downe to forſake him if he would needs ſtay, and not with ſpeed returne. Selymus much troubled with this inſolencie of the Ianizaries, and hearing dayly, that Hyſmaell with new ſupplies out of IBERIA, ALBANIA, and PARTHIA, was comming vpon him with greater power than before; and conſidering withal, with what difficultie and danger hee had eſcaped in the late battaile, preſerued rather by his good fortune and force of his great artillerie, than the valour and proweſſe of his ſouldiers; and withall ſuſpecting the multitude and ſtrength of the Tauriſians, of whoſe fidelitie he could make no reckoning; he changed his former determination, and reſolued to turne againe into CAPADOCIA: whereupon hauing contrarie to his promiſe exacted a great maſſe of money from them of TAVRIS, he departed
B thence, carrying away with him three thouſand families, the beſt artificers in that citie, eſpecially ſuch as were skilfull in making of armour and weapons, and ſo with ſpeed retired towards the riuer Euphrates, a longer way than that whereby he came: fearing to returne againe by the head of Araxis and the mountaines PERIADES, for meeting the Iberian and Albanian horſemen, who were reported to be then comming againſt him.

Hyſmaell vnderſtanding of his departure, followed after with as much ſpeed as he could, leauing behind him for haſt his carriages and ſuch of his ſouldiers as were not able to endure ſo long and ſpeedie a march: yet for all his haſt (for ſo much as Selymus was gone a great way before him) he could not ouertake any part of his armie, vntill he was come to the great riuer Euphrates; where Selymus ſtaying two daies, and hauing made diuers little boats, was paſſing
C ouer his footmen: which becauſe they were not ſufficient for the ſpeedie tranſportation of ſo great a multitude, many for haſt ſwam ouer the riuer vpon bladders, & ſome aduentured to get ouer vpon the broken peeces of their carriages, which they had for that purpoſe burſt in ſunder. Selymus himſelfe got ouer to the farther banke in a little boat, hauing before cauſed all his horſemen with their horſes at once to take the riuer, of purpoſe to breake the violence of the ſtreame, whereby his footmen and cammels with their burdens got ouer with leſſe danger, and ſome of his field peeces were alſo with leſſe difficultie tranſported. Yet for all the ſpeed he could make, the Georgian horſemen, the forerunners of Hyſmaell his armie, being come within ſight before the Turkes were all got ouer, raiſed ſuch a feare and a ſtirre all alongſt that ſide of the riuer, that two thouſand of the Turkes were in their haſtie paſſage there drowned, diuers field peeces left
D ſticking in the mud, and much of their baggage carried away with the force of the riuer. The Georgians contenting themſelues with ſuch things as were left, purſued them no further: for the wheeles of the Turkes carriages entangled together with the violence of the ſtreame, had ſtaied a great part of the Turkiſh traſh, floating in the riuer: & much more was in diuers places driuen vpon the ſhore, all which the Georgian horſemen eaſily drew out. Hyſmaell in the meane time reioycing at nothing more, than that hauing chaſed away his enemies, he had alſo recouered much of the great ordinance whereby he had before receiued ſo great hurt.

Selymus passing the riuer Euphrates, receiueth great losse.

Selymus by ſpeedie flight thus got out of the hands of the Perſians, found his paſſing much more dangerous at the mountaine ANTITAVRVS, than he had before thought of: For Aladeules the mountaine king hauing now his fortune in contempt, and diligently waiting for his
E prey, had with his ſauage people before taken all the ſtraight paſſages of that mountaine countrey; who euery night in theeuiſh manner aſſailed the Turks, as they with their weake and wearie companies paſſed through thoſe rough and broken wayes: and robbing their carriages, preſently fled into their haunts and places of refuge in the thicke woods and rockie mountaines. Aladeules himſelfe in the meane time, by whoſe fraud all this was done, euery day excuſing himſelfe, as if it had beene done againſt his will, by the rude mountaine people enured to ſuch deſperate robberies, whom neuertheleſſe he ſaid he would in ſhort time ſeuerely chaſtiſe ſo ſoon as he could finde the authors thereof. In the meane while, for faſhion ſake ſending a little ſpare prouiſion for certaine dayes, did euery night rob and ſpoile the Turkes by his ſouldiers, as they could take them in places of aduantage. Againſt which miſcheefes Selymus could neither by F policie, neither his ſouldiers by induſtrie prouide any ſufficient remedie. Wherfore diſſembling the iniuries he daily receiued, purpoſing to be thereof in time reuenged, together with the foule and trecherous dealing of that faithleſſe king; holding on his way, he with much adoe came at length to TRAPEZOND, and from thence to AMASIA, where he ſpent that winter in repairing his ſore weakened armie, purpoſing with the firſt of the Spring to make warre vpon Aladeules and the mountaine people, who in his returne had done him ſo great harme and iniurie, Selymus commeth to Amaſia.

In

In this ſort Iouius, one of the great hiſtoriographers of that time, reporteth the aforeſaid wars betwixt Hyſmael and Selymus, whoſe credit in that matter other writers haue ſince for moſt part followed. Howbeit, Io. Ant. Mænauinus, a Genoway, who ſerued in theſe warres, doth in his booke concerning the Turkiſh affaires, dedicated to the French king, much otherwiſe report the ſame: which to ſatisfie the deſirous reader, I haue thought good here in few words to ſet downe, as it is by himſelfe reported. G

The former hiſtorie as it is reported by Io. Ant. Mænauinus a Genoway, preſent at doing thereof.

Selymus (ſaith he) with his armie in number about three hundred thouſand men, being come to the riuer Euphrates, found the bridge broken downe by his nephew Amurat, and his enemies encamped in conuenient place on the farther ſide of the riuer, with their forces greatly encreaſed by new ſupplies lately ſent from the Perſian king: ſo that there was then in the Perſian armie about ninetie thouſand men horſe and foot, the horſemen for moſt part furniſhed with two horſes apeece for ſeruice: and though Selymus did what he might, to know whether the Perſian king were in perſon himſelfe in the campe, or elſe (which he moſt feared) was raiſing of greater forces in PERSIA, yet could he by no meanes learne the truth of that he deſired. Wherefore repairing againe the broken bridge, he firſt ſent ouer his two great lieutenants of GRÆCIA and NATOLIA, who paſſing ouer the riuer, encamped themſelues as they thought conuenient. The next morning, about two houres before the riſing of the Sunne, Amurat ſuddenly aſſailed the great commander of GRÆCIA, Caſan Baſſa, in his trenches, and by plaine force diſcomfited the Turkes, and by good fortune tooke from them their tents: whereupon ſuch a terrour and feare came vpon the other great commander of NATOLIA, that his ſouldiers thruſting themſelues for feare into the riuer, ſwam ouer with great danger, and againe ioyned themſelues with the reſt of the armie. Selymus troubled with the great loſſe thus receiued, cauſed all his great artillerie to be placed all alongſt the hithermoſt banke of the riuer Euphrates; and becauſe the enemie ſhould not perceiue the ſame, raunged certaine companies of his ſouldiers before the ordinance, as if they ſhould preſently haue paſſed the riuer: who vpon ſignall giuen, ſhould forthwith withdraw themſelues and giue place to the great ordinance bent vpon the enemie. But when fire was giuen to theſe great pieces, many of them being ouercharged, burſt in ſunder, and ſlew diuers of the Turkes: many alſo of their horſes and mules being neere vnto the riuers ſide, and terrified with the thundering ſhot, leapt into the riuer, and were there drowned together with their riders. The Perſians alſo hauing receiued great loſſe, retired farther off for feare of the great artillerie. So Selymus without reſiſtance paſſing ouer the riuer, marched forthwith toward the enemie: whom the Perſians as men nothing diſmaied, notably encountered. The battell was of long time doubtfull, and much bloud ſhed on both ſides: and if the approch of the night had not broken off that mortall fight, the Perſian armie rather ouercharged with the multitude of the enemie, than vanquiſhed by valour, had vndoubtedly receiued a great ouerthrow; but through the benefit of the night, they without further loſſe eſcaped the purſute of the Turkes. Vpon this victorie, Selymus left his carriages and baggage with his footmen; and taking with him only his horſemen, ſet forward, with intention to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the regall citie of TAVRIS, before the fame of the late fought battaile could be carried thither: the Perſians in the meane time being no leſſe carefull of their affaires. The day before, ten thouſand freſh horſemen well appointed, which had not yet beene in the battaile, were comming to Hyſmaell: theſe he craftily laied in the Turkes way, commanding them vpon the approch of the enemie to flie, as if it had beene for feare. Selymus in the morning hauing deſcried theſe horſemen at hand, ſuppoſing them to be ſuch of his enemies as being ouertaken with the night were not able to follow the reſt of his armie, exhorted his ſouldiers couragiouſly to purſue their diſcouraged enemies. H I K L

The Perſians ſeeing the Turks, of purpoſe betooke themſelues to flight; and they ſuſpecting no deceit, followed faſt after them, vntill that about mid day being wearie of the purſute, and comming to a little riuer which was in their way, they there ſtaied to refreſh themſelues: and after they had taken a ſhort repaſt, againe purſued the Perſians, ſtill leauing behind them ſuch as were not able ſo faſt to follow, prickt forward with hope, that before night they ſhould ſurpriſe and ranſacke the rich citie of TAVRIS. The Turkiſh horſemen thus drawne farre from the footmen, the Perſian horſemen left in ambuſh, in the meane time ſet vpon the Turkes footmen, lying (as they ſuppoſed) in great ſecuritie, and with a great ſlaughter ouerthrew them: at which time they alſo tooke all Selymus his treaſure and great artillerie. Which ouerthrow was by M

A ſpeedie poſts, about two a clocke in the night made knowne to Selymus (who now in his mind alreadie conceiued the ſacking of TAVRIS) and withall, that the fierce enemie was following him at the heeles. Selymus wonderfully abaſhed with this vnexpected newes, and the loſſe of his footmen, forthwith began to retire: which the ten thouſand Perſians which had before of purpoſe fled, perceiuing, now turning themſelues vpon the retiring Turks, charged them hardly: ſo Selymus encloſed both before and behind by his enemies, receiued a great ouerthrow. And the Turks thus hardly beſet and almoſt deſpairing of their liues, & hauing loſt their enſignes, brake out ſidewaies betwixt their enemies and fled. Selymus ſeeing all deſperat and forlorne, betooke himſelfe to flight alſo with the reſt: and paſſing the riuer Euphrates, brake downe the bridge which he had but a little before repaired, for feare the Perſians ſhould further purſue him; and
B with much trouble and no leſſe danger comming at length to AMASIA, aſſembled thither the reliques of his diſcomfited armie. Such of the Turkes as remained behind, and were not able in flight to keepe way with the reſt, were all ſlaine by the Perſians.

The Genoway authour thus concludeth his Hiſtorie, That the Perſian king did not more reioyce at this victorie, than did he himſelfe for the ouerthrow of the Turkes, hoping in that their ſo great a confuſion, to free himſelfe of his long and miſerable thraldome, & to find a way vnto his natiue country and parents: as afterwards he did, for flying firſt to TRAPEZONDE and there taking paſſage into EVROPE, he came to HADRIANOPLE, from whence he trauelled by land on foot to SALONICA, & there chancing vpon certain ſhips of Chriſtian merchants which had brought corne thither, he was by them tranſported into the iſland of CHIOS; from whence
C he ioyfull returned to GENVA his natiue countrey, after he had amongſt the Turks endured ten yeares captiuitie: moſt part wherof he liued as a page in old Baiazet his priuie chamber, and the reſt as a ſouldier of the court in the raigne of Selymus; and therefore well acquainted with the faſhion of the Turkes court, and manners of that barbarous nation.

Now ſhall it not (as I hope) be much from our purpoſe, here with Iouius a little to digreſſe, in comparing theſe two great princes Hyſmael and Selymus togither; who in that time had filled the world with the glorie of their fame: that wearied with bloudie broiles, and the wonderfull chances of warre, we may a little repoſe our ſelues with matter of a milder vaine, neither vnpleaſant nor vnprofitable.

Selymus and Hyſmael compared togither.

D Theſe two mightie princes, as they were for royall diſcent, ſtrength of bodie, courage of mind, riches, and power, equall, and had therby obtained like fame and renowne: ſo in conditions and qualities of mind, and martiall diſcipline, they much differed. Firſt of all (beſide the mutuall hatred of the one nation againſt the other, deliuered as it were by ſucceſſion from their grandfathers and fathers) theſe two princes, and ſo likewiſe their ſubiects alſo, were at great ods about an idle queſtion of their vaine ſuperſtition, the one preferring & honouring Ebubekir, Homaris, and Ottoman, as the moſt true and rightfull ſucceſſours of their great prophet Mahomet: the other with no leſſe deuotion honouring Haly, and deteſting the three former; differing otherwiſe in few or no points of their moſt fond ſuperſtition: yet did they vnder the colour and zeale of their religion (as they would haue it) both pretend iuſt cauſes of warre, although their euill
E diſſembled ambitious deſires, plainly declared vnto the world, that they both ſhot at one and the ſame marke, viz. By confirming their power & ſtrength to extend the bounds of their great empires. For Hyſmael of purpoſe affected the fame and glorie of Darius and Xerxes, the auncient Perſian kings; who hauing ſubdued ASIA, with great boldneſſe paſſed ouer into EVROPE: and Selymus, the greatneſſe of Alexander of MACEDON, who ſubuerted the Perſian empire. Which their aſpiring thoughts, masking vnder the vaile of zeale towards their religion, ſeemed not altogither vaine, fortune with like indifferencie immoderately fauouring their bold ambitious and endleſſe deſires. But in Hyſmael appeared ſuch a wonderfull deuotion and grauitie, that his haughtie thoughts were with the reuerend maieſtie therof couered: wheras in Selymus, his inhumane crueltie did blot and obſcure all his other princely vertues: for he with reward and puniſhment retained the maieſtie of his empire, but with greater fame of ſeueritie than bountie.

F Becauſe it was expedient in the exact diſcipline of that ſeruile gouernment, whereof the greateſt ſtrength of the Othoman empire conſiſteth, to vſe all rigor and ſeueritie: Otherwiſe then it ſtood with the ſtate of Hyſmaell, who leuied alwaies his armies of his nobilitie and men free borne, with whom temperat iuſtice, ciuile courteſie, and popular clemencie, are of greateſt force, to win their fidelitie, faith, and loyaltie: for that there is no man well born, which feareth not more the

blemiſh

blemiſh of infamie than the heauineſſe of puniſhment: ſo that it was not to be maruelled, if Hyſmaell by ſuch honourable vertues did mightily defend the glorie of his maieſtie and renowme. G Vnto theſe his rare vertues, was alſo ioyned a comelineſſe of face (the faireſt gift of nature) well beſeeming ſo great a monarch: for he was well coloured, quicke eyed, yellowbearded, and that which amongſt the Perſians is accounted the ſigne of auncient nobilitie, hooked noſed; and was withall exceeding eloquent: By which good gifts, he wonderfully woon vnto himſelfe both the eyes and hearts of ſuch as beheld him. But in Selymus his ſterne countenance, his fierce and piercing eies, his Tartar-like pale colour, his long muſtachoes on his vpper lip, like briſtles, frild back to his neck, with his beard cut cloſe to his chin, did ſo expreſſe his martiall diſpoſition and inexorable nature, that he ſeemed to the beholders, to haue nothing in him but miſchiefe and cruelties. Which diuerſitie of countenances was alſo accompanied with no leſſe diuerſitie of affecti- H ons, and ſo conſequently with farre vnlike manner of gouernment. For Hyſmaell was of nature courteous and affable, eaſie to be ſeene and ſpoken withall, doing nothing that beſeemed his regall function, but in the ſight of all men: His manner was to dine openly in the companie of his nobilitie, delighting much in hauking and hunting, accompanied with his noble men, and the embaſſadours of forraine princes: He would oftentimes run, leape, and proue maſteries with his chiefe courtiers, being himſelfe a moſt excellent horſeman and cunning archer: In his exerciſes he was ſo popular, that he would not ſticke openly to bare himſelfe and ſwim in his princely bathes: his wiues, the beautifull daughters of his nobilitie or neighbour princes, ladies of great chaſtitie, he neither loathed nor diuorced; after the auncient manner of the Perſian kings, who alwaies vſed moſt tenderly to loue and cheriſh their wiues, doing them all the honour poſſible I in court, as partakers of all their fortune; and carried them, their children, nurſes, and richeſt furniture into their fartheſt warres, to their great trouble and charge, by the preſence of ſo deere pledges the more to encourage their minds in time of battell. Whereas Selymus contrariewiſe did all things in ſecret, eating his meat alone without any company, attended vpon with his pages and eunuches onely, and ſatisfying natures want with ſome one ſimple diſh of meat: Hee ſeldome went abroad but to the church, vpon the friday the Turkes chiefe Saboth; and then ſo beſet with his pentioners and other ſouldiers of the court, that although he vſed to ride alone mounted vpon ſome couragious horſe, yet was it a hard matter by face to know him amongſt ſo many armed men, who with great pride and inſolencie kept backe the beholders: Hee was ſeldome ſeene abroad in the citie, chuſing rather for his recreation to paſſe ouer in his gallie into K
Asia, and there alongſt the ſea coaſt to take the ayre: His wiues he would not ſuffer to come to court, neither vſed their companie but for procreation ſake, and that (as was thought) without any great good countenance or familiaritie; for that he being not greatly giuen to women, but more delighted with vnnaturall pleaſure, thought a mans bodie & mind to be not a little weakned with the allurements of women; wherefore he ſeldome reſorted to the cloiſter of choiſe paragons in the middeſt of Constantinople, ſhut in on euerie ſide with high and blind wals. Thoſe daintie pieces, either taken from their Chriſtian parents, or by chance ſurpriſed by pirats, are there moſt curiouſly kept by auncient matrons and old eunuches, by whom they are with all diligence inſtructed in the principles of the Mahometane law, and to reade the Arabian L tongue, and withall, cunningly and comely to ſing, play, dance, and ſow: But Selymus of all others vſed ſeldomeſt to ſee theſe allurements, as a man not greatly delighted with women, or deſirous of many (and oftentimes vnfortunat) children; hauing but one ſonne (Solyman) by the daughter of Muhamet a Tartar king, who afterwards by the ſufferance of God, prooued a great plague to the Chriſtian commonweale. Such ſpare time as he had from his ſerious and waighty affaires, hee vſed to ſpend in walking in his gardens with ſome of his Baſſaes or other great courtiers; and in beholding & noting the noble mens children there ſporting themſelues, would diſcourſe and conſult of many things of great importance. Some houres he would ſpend in the bathes, and in reading the hiſtories of his auncеſtors and other forraine princes: imitating therin his grandfather Mahomet the Great, who cauſed almoſt all the hiſtories of the famous princes M of the world to be tranſlated into the Turkiſh language, and their liuely counterfeits to be with cunning hand drawn, that by their worthy examples he might be the more enflamed to extend his fame and glorie. He would many times ſcoffe at the great buſineſſe of his father Baiazet, who (as he ſaid) was ſo drowned in the ſtudie of Auerrois (determining nothing certainly of the nature of the ſoule) and the motions of the heauens, that he deſired rather the name of a ſharpe diſputer

Selymus tyrannicall.

Hyſmaell courteous.

Selymus churliſh.

A disputer amongst the idle professors of Philosophie, than of a renowned chiefetaine amongst his valiant souldiors and men of war.

One of the Persian embassadors finding him pleasantly disposed, demanded of him why he did not weare his beard long, as his father Baiazet and other great princes of that age had done, therby to seeme vnto their subiects of greater maiestie: to whom he answered, That he liked not to carrie about with him such an vnnecessarie handfull, whereby his Bassaes might at their pleasure lead him vp and downe the court, as they had done his father: Noting therby, that Baiazet whilest he yet liued, had beene too much ouerruled by the Bassaes; which he could by no meanes endure, following no mans aduise but his owne in whatsoeuer he tooke in hand.

B But to come vnto the Persians themselues, they in their wars had great disaduantage of the Turkes: for as they were strong in horsemen, so were they destitute of expert trained footmen, by whose only meanes the Turkes haue atchiued their greatest victories, and performed their greatest warres. Beside this, it was a great want in the Persians, that they had not the vse of guns, against whose furie no sufficient resistance can be made, or force of man opposed: as appeared by the lamentable example of Vsun-Cassanes at ARTENGA, and now of Hysmaell in the Calderan fields; whose victorious armies of horsmen were in both places put to the worse by the terrour and violence of the Turkes artillerie. For the naked Turkish horseman is not to be compared with the Persian man at armes; who comes into the field armed with a strong cuiras, a sure headpiece, and a good targuet: whereas the Turkish Europeian horsemen, altogether naked, C vse onely a square or crooked buckler, wherewith they doe scarcely couer themselues: and the Asian horsmen, bucklers made of soft reeds, wouud round, and couered with some kind of silk. The Persian horsemen also, wearing their pouldrons and gauntlets, and bearing staues of good ash, armed at both ends, fight with them as occasion serueth at the halfe staffe, after the maner of the Numidians, and with doubling and redoubling their often thrusts from on high, do easily wound or kill the vnarmed Turks, with their horses: whereas the Turkish horsemen, after the manner of the Græcians, couching their staues in their rests, doe at the first course most commonly breake the same, being made of light and brittle firre, and so presently come to their scimitars, or horsemens maces, being in all other things far inferiour to the Persian man at armes. As for the Turkish archers on horsebacke, they are in no respect to be compared with the Persi-D ans; who well mounted and surely armed, and vsing both greater and stronger bowes, shoot more deadly arrows, & so make small account of the Turks. So that all things well considered, the Persian armie, deuoted to their king aswell for the great and firme opinion conceiued of his high courage and diuine spirit, as for that they were to him by faith obliged; although it was in number farre inferiour, yet had it been of the Turks inuincible, if it had not been ouerwhelmed by the cruell, cowardly, and murthering artillerie and wonderfull multitude of men. The cause why Hysmaell out of so many great and large prouinces then vnder his obeisance (able in auncient times with their multitude to couer the face of the earth, and to drinke the riuers drie) brought now so small an armie against the Turkish emperour, breaking into the heart of ARMENIA, was for that Hysmaell to win the hearts of the people by bountie, had remitted a great E part of his customes and tributes, so as then stood best with his policie, hauing but lately aspired vnto the kingdome, and thrust downe his neere kinsmen, the posteritie of Vsun-Cassan and Iacup, the rightfull inheritours thereof: so that his cofers being emptie, and wanting money, the sinews of warre, he was not able to raise so great an armie as otherwise he might out of those populous kingdomes and countries, yeelding plentifully all things necessarie for the vse of man. Wheras with Selymus it was far otherwise: whose horsemen, footmen, captaines, canoniers, both at sea and land, officers of peace and wars, receiued their daily wages and monthly paies in readie money, of his treasurers and paymasters: for defraying of which charge he neuer wanted coyne, hauing an inestimable masse of money alwaies in store in the seuen towers at CONSTANTINOPLE: and his yearely tributs and reuenewes still exceeding all his charges by F a fourth part. The strength of the Persian king consisted in three kind of souldiors: the first were they which were accounted soldiors of the court: the second, such as were by custome and dutie bound to serue him in his wars: and the third, such as were sent vnto him from the princes his neighbours and confederates. Those which were accounted souldiors of his court, had their certaine stipends, and were altogether maintained of the kings charge; of whom according to the old custome of the Persian kings, they at certaine times receiue armour, horses, apparrell, tents, and wages, euery one as he is in place and degree. And being attended vpon with a gallant and strong garrison of these, he maintaineth the maiestie of his court, especially when he rideth in prograce. The nobilitie and ancient gentlemen of his countrey, who hold lands and possessions discended vnto them from their ancestors, or holden by the gift of the king, are sent for in time of warres, and are of dutie bound to performe such like seruice as the nobilitie and gentlemen of ITALIE, FRAVNCE, and SPAINE do vnto their soueraignes: these hardly amount to the number of twentie thousand, wherof it is well if the third part come well armed; the rest content themselues with headpieces and iacks, and vse for their weapons either horsmens staues or bowes, which the can most cunningly handle, discharging their arrowes very neere vnto that they aime at, either forward or backward. They which come vnto him from forreine princes, confederat or tributarie, are commonly sent from the kings and princes of IBERIA, ALBANIA, and the countries bordering vpon MEDIA and ARMENIA; who being halfe Christians, beare a mortall hatred against the Turks. Hysmaell the Persian king had then vnder his dominion these great and famous countries, ARMENIA the greater, SVLTHANIA, PERSIA, ASSYRIA, MESOPOTAMIA, MEDIA, and PARTIA: whereof ARMENIA is the chiefest, famous for the great citie TAVRIS, called in ancient time ECBATHANA: this countrie yeeldeth vnto the Persian king his best footmen; but his choice horsemen come from out of PERSIA, and especially from SCYRAS, called of old CYRIPOLIS: next vnto them are from ASSYIA, the chiefe citie whereof is BAGADAT, called in ancient time BABYLON. The Medes and Parthians are of all others accounted the best archers next vnto the Scythians.

The countries subiect to Hysmaell.

1515 But now to returne againe from whence we haue a little too farre stayed. Selymus after his great expedition against Hysmaell, wintering at AMASIA, by his lieutenants and captaines in EVROPE and ASIA, raised such a power, that with the first of the Spring he entred againe into the confines of the Persian kingdome, with a greater armie than before, and that somewhat sooner than the extreame cold of that part of ARMENIA (subiect to the snowie mountaine TAVRVS) would either well suffer, or that the enemie thought it had been possible for him to haue so done. There was vpon the further side of the riuer Euphrates a strong towne called CIAMASSVM, situate a little aboue that place where the riuer Melas (much celebrated by the Græcian Poets) falleth into the riuer Euphrates: which towne for the commodious situation thereof, standeth vpon the first entrance of the passage into ARMENIA the great, the Persians had furnished with a strong garrison: this towne Selymus thought good in any case to be master of, by taking whereof, and of some other holds thereabout, he should open a faire way for himselfe into his enemies countrie. Hysmaell at the same time was gone with all his power against the Hyrcanians, Bactrians, & other sauage people dwelling neere vnto the Caspian sea, then vp in arms against him: which wished opportunitie Selymus taking, and making a bridge ouer the riuer Euphrates, passed ouer with his armie, came before the towne, and laid hard siege to the same before his enemies were well aware of his comming. The Turks at their first approch compassing the citie round with their huge multitude of harquebusiers and archers, draue the defendants from the wals; and still without rest or intermission bringing on fresh men, as Selymus had before taken order, and others at the same time breaking open the gates, and in diuers places scaling the wals, enforced the defendants to forsake their standings, and to retire themselues into the market place; where although they were before sore spent with labour and wounds, yet did they there with wonderfull courage a great while notably withstand the multitude of their enemies still swarming in, and in defence of their countrie, like resolute men, fought it out vnto the last man.

Selymus with a new armie entreth into Armenia.

Selymus hauing taken and ransacked CIAMASSVM, with two other small castles which the defendants had for feare before abandoned, although he was with a deadly hatred & ambitious desire prickt forward against Hysmaell, and thirsted after nothing more than the subuersion of the Persian kingdome: yet he thought it not good further to enter into ARMENIA, before he had out of those forrests and mountaines chased the mountaine king Aladeules, who but the yeare before had most trecherously done him and his armie so many iniuries in his return from the Persian expedition. For Aladeules not without cause fearing his owne estate, as soone as he vnderstood that Selymus had againe taken the field, and that he was come to the riuer Euphrates, and so to CIAMASSVM, speedily assembling his forces, had in short time raised a great armie for the defence of himselfe and his kingdome: purposing that if Selymus should go farther into

A into ARMENIA, then after his wonted maner to looke on as a beholder, and by the euent of the war to take occasion of prey, and by shutting vp the passages of his countrie, at his pleasure to rob and spoile the Turks in their returne. Wherfore Selymus leauing a garrison at CIAMASSVM, retired backe againe ouer the riuer Euphrates vnto the mountaine ANTITAVRVS, where it was reported that his enemies lay.

This Aladeules (as is aforesaid) ruled ouer the rude and sauage mountaine people, inhabiting the great mountaines TAVRVS and ANTITAVRVS: which mountaines as it were linked together one to another, run from the mountaines called SCODRISCI, and the borders of CAPADOCIA, with a perpetual rising, through many large prouinces and countries vnto the great Aladeules his kingdome.

B mountaine AMANVS, and vttermost bounds of CILICIA. The people of this countrie were by nature fierce and warlike, more famous for nothing, than for the want of all thing; who as men dwelling in a rough and bare countrie, could little or nothing profit by husbandrie: yet in such places as would beare any pasture, they had their breed of horses and cammels, and did with all diligence vse grasing; but the greatest part of their liuing consisted in hunting and stealing. These are supposed to haue had their beginning from the Galatians, Capadocians, Armenians, and the old inhabitants of ASIA the lesse, which by long and continuall wars in former ages, and especially by the lamentable irruption of the Scythians, were enforced to forsake their cities and dwellings, and for safegard of their liues to flie into those rough and desolate mountaines. These distressed people searching euery hill and euery dale, and following the opportu-

C nitie of the riuers and fountaines, but especially the mildest temperature of the aire, and fauorable aspect of the Sunne, built in many places poore countrie villages, and afterwards diuers faire townes: where in processe of time they growing to better estate, there rise vp some amongst them, which ouerruling the rest, ambitiously tooke vpon them the name of kings; desiring to be had in regard, and to be feared of their neighbours, although they commaunded but ouer rough woods and ragged rockes. Neere vnto the confines of Aladeules kingdome is the citie ORPHA, which many suppose to haue been the famous citie EDESSA, because that as yet there remaineth certaine monuments of Baldwin in Latine letters; who after his brother Godfrey was possessed of HIERVSALEM, is reported to haue taken EDESSA, and there raigned. Nor far from thence is also the auncient citie AMYDA, which at this day is called CARAMIDA, ioyning

D vpon MESOPOTAMIA: which countrey lying betweene the two great riuers Euphrates and Tigris, is now called DIARBECHA. The chiefe citie of Aladeules kingdome was MARAS, so called as may be thought of the faire riuer Marsias running through it out of the mountaine CÆLENE, taking the name of Marsias, ouercome by Apollo, and made famous by the verses many learned Poets. But Aladeules, after he saw that Selymus with his armie was entered into the frontires of his kingdome, and drawing neere vnto him, brought downe all his horsmen, in number about fifteene thousand, from the mountaines into a faire large valley; commanding his footmen, whereof he had great store, to keepe the mountaines on the right hand and the left: where hauing the high rockie mountains and strait passages, much for his aduantage, he determined in that place which he had long before chosen and fortified, to expect the comming

E of his enemies. Selymus considering the disaduantage of the place, although he perceiued the victorie could not without great losse of his men be obtained; and before persuaded that his enemies would neuer haue willingly been drawne to battaile: yet made no doubt to aduenture his fortune, presuming vpon the multitude and strenght of his armie. Wherefore he commaunded Sinan Bassa the Eunuch (whom hee had made generall of the Europeian horsemen in stead of Casan Bassa before slaine) with a square battell to charge the enemie afront, for as much as the place would not suffer him to range his battell in length, nor to vse any wings: and he himselfe with his Ianizaries and Asian horsemen followed after in the rereward. Neither were the souldiors of Aladeules vnmindfull of themselues or of their king, who valiantly fought in the head of the battell: but hauing spent their arrowes, did couragiously receiue the furious assault of the Selymus assaileth Aladeules.

F Turkes: and standing close to them, still keeping the aduantage of the ground, did with such force repulse them, that the old beaten souldiors of the Turkes, seemed little or nothing to preuaile either with their multitude or valour: for the Turkes by reason of the straightnesse of the place, could not inclose them on either side, and were beside grieuously wounded by Aladeules footmen, who standing vpon the sides of the hils with their darts and arrowes from aboue, ouerwhelmed the Turks in the valley. When Selymus saw that Aladeules, contrarie, to his expectation made ſtrong reſiſtance, and valiantly withſtood his forces; he drew certaine companies of harquebuſiers out of his own ſquadrons, and ſent them to relieue their fellowes: and at the ſame inſtant commanded the Ianizaries for all the danger to mount the hill. Then the mountaine people terrified with the ſtrangenes of the ſhot, and not able to abide the force thereof, by and by turned their backs, and by knowne waies fled into their ſure haunts in the mountaines and woods faſt by. Yet the greateſt ſlaughter fell amongſt theſe footmen, who when they ſaw the horſemen put to flight, and the Ianizaries comming vp the hils againſt them, did with much difficultie, by ſteepe and broken waies clamber vp the high mountaines: as oftentimes it falleth out, that both the ſtrength of mens legs and other their wonted forces faile them moſt, when ſurpriſed and ouercome with ſudden feare, they deſire to run and flie faſteſt. The Turkes hauing them in chaſe, had the killing of them vntill the going downe of the Sunne. The horſemen with the king, vpon their ſwift horſes, well acquainted with thoſe rockes and rough waies, with little loſſe retired themſelues into the further and ſtronger places of the mountaines.

Aladeules flieth into the mountaines.

Aladeules after this diſcomfiture, finding himſelfe in all things farre inferiour to his enemie, thought it beſt by protracting the war, to wearie him out: wherefore as the Turks purſued him, and burnt the poore countrey cottages ſtanding in their way, he ſtill fled from mountaine to mountaine, neuer offering battell or ſhewing himſelfe, but in places of great aduantage. And therefore Selymus fearing leaſt in that barren rough and vnknowne countrie, he ſhould either want vittaile or by ſome other meanes intrapped, if he ſhould ſtill with his whole armie follow after his ſtrong enemies; vpon the ſeuenth day left off to purſue them any farther. And encamping himſelfe in the moſt conuenient place of that countrie, ſent Sinan Baſſa with his light horſemen, who carrying with them certaine daies victuals, ſhould ſtill at the heeles follow the enemie, and with all ſpeed and pollicie poſſible, hunt after the king himſelfe. Selymus in the meane time curiouſly inquiring of the countrey captiues after the ſtrength of Aladeules, and what means he had to maintaine the war: found, that he had taken with him his beſt men both horſe and foot; and had commanded the countrie people to forſake the villages, of purpoſe to leaue all deſolat to the enemie: and hauing ſurely intrenched himſelfe vpon a certaine ſtrong rocke (whither he had before conuaied great ſtore of prouiſion) was reſolued not to giue battell vnto his enemies, vntil he had drawn them into the impregnable ſtraits of the mountains, where their hugie multitude ſhould little auaile them, but to increaſe their owne loſſe. Another cauſe there was alſo (as they ſaid) for that he feared to be betraied by Alis Beg his kinſman, Generall of his horſemen; who firſt fled in the late battell: whoſe vnfaithfulneſſe and hatred might ſeeme to proceed of a iuſt ground, for that Aladeules had in former time treacherouſly murthered his father, vpon a iealous ſuſpition of his aſpiring to the kingdome.

Selymus vnderſtanding all this, cauſed the captiues to haue their yrons ſtruck off, and in ſteed of their giues lading them with gifts and promiſes, ſent them to Alis Beg with ſecret letters and rewards, to perſuade him in ſo fit a time to reuenge his fathers death; which thing if he would performe by ſome notable exploit vpon Aladeules, he ſhould both purchaſe vnto himſelfe great credit with Selymus, and alſo the kingdome. Theſe homely meſſengers according as was giuen them in charge, hauing imparted the matter to Sinan Baſſa, within few daies had ſo wrought, that Alis Beg (whom the deſire of a kingdome togither with Selimus his rewards prickt forward to ſeeke reuenge) was eaſily drawne to ioine hands with Selymus. And when he could no other way hurt Aladeules, who miſtruſting all things, warily looked vnto himſelfe; he found the means to go ouer to Sinan Baſſa, carrying after him a great part of Aladeules his beſt horſemen: by whoſe meanes the reſt alſo which remained being with rewards corrupted, one companie after another came at laſt all ouer vnto the Baſſa. Aladeules circumuented with this vnexpected treacherie, which neuer before thought it poſſible that his men ſhould all ſo ſuddenly haue forſaken him and reuolted vnto the Turks; was now glad to repoſe all his hope in ſecret flight. But Sinan Baſſa and Alis Beg, hardly purſuing him as he fled thorough the mountaines, hiding himſelfe in rockes and the thicke woods, and laſt drew him out of a caue, being betraied by the countrie peaſants. Aladeules being brought to Selymus, was within a few daies after put to death, and his head in great deriſion afterwards caried about through all Asia the leſſe: and afterward by way of barbarous oſtentation, ſent by Selymus to the Senate of Venice, as a loathſome teſtimonie of his victorie. Aladeules thus dead, Selymus reduced all his kingdome into the forme of a prouince, which he diuided into three parts; and after the manner of the Turkiſh gouernment, appointed Aladeules taken and brought to Selymus, is put to death.

A pointed to euery part a Sanzacke: yet ſo, that Alis Beg ſhould be chiefe ouer the reſt, with ſuch ſoueraignetie as that he wanted nothing of a king but the name only. And for the better gouernment of all things in that new gained kingdome, he left Sinan Baſſa there all the reſt of that ſummer; with commaundment, that after he had ſet all things in good order, he ſhould winter at ICONIVM: and he himſelfe with a ſmall traine returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, for he had heard, that whileſt he was buſied in his wars againſt Hyſmaell and Aladeules in ARMENIA, that the Hungarians had made diuers incurſions into SERVIA, and ſpoiled that countrie. Wherefore for feare of loſing SAMANDRIA (which ſtanding neere to Danubius, for the conuenient ſituation thereof is reputed the bulwarke of SERVIA and THRACIA) he ſent Ionuſes Baſſa then
B gouernor of BOSNA with eight thouſand horſemen, who paſſing the riuer Sauus entred into Selymus inuadeth Hungarie.
CROATIA as far as CATINVM: and at the ſame time tranſported another armie ouer Danubius into HVNGARIE, to the intent that the Hungarians at one inſtant beſet with double danger, ſhould be inforced to feare their owne ſtate; and with all to ſhew vnto the world, of what ſtrength and power the Othoman emperours were. Deeming it to concerne much, both for the preſent, and the time to come, to the daunting of the Chriſtians; if he ſhould by his happie attempts make it knowne, that he could at once eaſily and readily maintaine ſo many and ſo puiſſant armies, and wage ſo great wars in diuers parts of the world, and ſo far diſtant one from another.

In the end of the yeare, when he had thus with double inuaſion repreſſed the Hungarians, he
C ſpent the Winter following at HADRIANOPLE and CONSTANTINOPLE, in making of greater preparation for war than euer he had before from the beginning of his raigne. For he was aduertiſed, that the great monarches of the North his neighbours, namely Maximilian the emperour, Vladiſlaus king of HVNGARIE, and Sigiſmundus king of POLONIA, with the princes of GERMANIE, had combined themſelues together to make warre vpon him. But after he had learned by his ſure intelligencers (whom he had with great charge ſent into all parts of EVROPE, diligently to obſerue what was done in the courts of thoſe great princes) that all the great meetings of the Chriſtian princes proued nothing but glorious words and ſumpteous banquets; he being rid of that vaine feare (God ſo appointing) turned himſelfe and all thoſe his wonderfull preparations againe toward the Eaſt, to the great quiet of Chriſtendome in generall.

D Yet leaſt happily in the abſence of himſelfe and of his armies, the Chriſtian princes might take occaſion to inuade his dominions, he ſtrengthened the frontires of his empire with moſt ſtrong garriſons: and left his ſonne Solymon (who afterward proued the great ſcourge of Chriſtendome) at HADRIANOPLE with a ſtrong power, and Pyrrhus Baſſa his tutor (a man of great wiſedome and gouernment) at CONSTANTINOPLE. This great Baſſa was of CILICIA, a natiue Turke borne, which was a thing accounted ſtrange, foraſmuch as the great Baſſaes were alwaies choſen of the Chriſtian bloud. After that, he ſent Cherſeogles (whom of all others he moſt truſted) with his armie in BYTHINIA, and made Zafferus an Eunuch Admirall of his nauie, which he had but a little before built, and with a wonderfull labour and charge rigged forth. Then ſtaying a few daies at CONSTANTINOPLE to ſee the young ſouldiors, but then choſing Ianizaries; 1516 Selymus goeth to Iconium.
E he departed thence and went to his old armie, lying with Sinan Baſſa at ICONIAM, purpoſing to haue againe inuaded the Perſian.

When he was come thither, he vnderſtood that Campſon Gaurus Sultan of ÆGYPT (with a great armie leuied in ÆGYPT and IVDEA) was come into SYRIA, giuing it out that he would aid the Perſian king his confederat, and with all hoſtilitie enter into CILICIA, if Selymus ſhould farther proceed to inuade Hyſmaell the Sophi his friend and allie. Selymus perplexed with theſe news, & fearing that if he ſhould once paſſe ouer the riuer Euphrates, Campſon lying ſo neere in readines, ſhould forthwith breake in at his backe into ASIA by the mountaine AMANVS, and ſo indanger that part of his dominion, ſtaied at ICONIVM, & ſent his embaſſadors with great preſents to Campſon to pacifie him, if it might be. The chiefe men in this embaſſage were the Cade-
F leſcher, a man of great account amongſt the Turks, and of them exceedingly reuerenced for the opinion they had of his great knowledge in the Mahometan ſuperſtition, who afterwards wrot the Commentaries of this war; and Iachis a great captaine. The ſcope of whoſe embaſſage was, to entreat Champſon, that he would not hinder or diſturbe Selymus from making war vpon the Perſian king; who had ſo often and ſo forcibly inuaded his dominions in ASIA, and by bringing in a new forme of ſuperſtition, had corrupted and altered the moſt certaine grounds of the Mahometane religion. And if they found him resolutly set downe and not to be by any condi- G ons remoued, then with all possible diligence to learne his strength and farther designes, so far as by any meanes they could, and with all speed to make their returne.

The causes mooving Campson to fall out with Selymus.

But Campson now far spent with age, and liuing in the height of worldly blisse, although he knew it fitter for him at those yeres to giue himselfe to ease & quietnesse, than to thrust himselfe into wars and other princes quarrels; yet thought this expedition to be for many causes both good and necessarie. First, he deadly hated the man for his inhumane crueltie, and therefore could neuer be persuaded to renew the league with him which he had in former time made with his father Baiazet: Besides that, he desired to abate and represse his audacious insolencie, grown alreadie by his prosperous successe beyond the bounds of reason: for Selymus hauing taken TAVRIS, ouerthrowne the Persians, and slaine Aladeules, began now to seeme terrible to all H the princes that bordered vpon him; and there were many which said he was another Alexander, who whilest other princes sate still as men a sleepe, did in the meane time plot in his victorious mind, the monarchie of the whole world. But aboue all things, the feare of the losing of SYRIA, and consequently the losse of all his kingdome (the quickest motiue for stirring vp of the suspitious minds of the greatest princes) most enforced Campson to take in hand this war: For as much as the goodly kingdomes of ÆGYPT, IVDEA, and SYRIA, oppressed with the intollerable gouernment of the proud Mamalukes, and therefore lesse faithfull to the Ægyptian kings, were in daunger to reuolt to the Turks, if the Persians should by any mischance or fortune of war be of the Turkes vanquished. For which cause Campson in the beginning of this war, so- I licited by the Persian embassadors, had made a firme league and confederation with Hysmaell: and also moued with the miserie of the wofull young prince Aladin the sonne of Achomates, was in mind persuaded, that the cruel Turkish tyrant might by his and the Persian kings forces, easily be thrust out of his empire in ASIA and EVROPE. For Aladin, who after the death of Achomates his father fled to Campson the Sultan of ÆGYPT (as is before declared) had liued three yeares as a forlorne and distressed prince in the Ægytian court, and by all meanes he could deuise incited the Mamalukes to reuenge the iniuries and crueltie of his vncle Selymus. The eldest sonne also of the late king Aladeules, a goodly young prince, hauing at once lost his father, his kingdome, and whatsoeuer he held else, was in good time fled to the Ægyptian king; and had so filled the minds of all men with the indignation and detestation of Selymus his exceeding cru- K eltie, that the princes of the Mamalukes of their owne accord came to Campson, humbly beseeching him to take vpon him so iust a warre: and if by reason of his great yeares he should think himselfe vnable to endure the trauell thereof, it would then please him yet to giue them leaue of themselues to take the matter in hand, for the repressing of the insolencie of that great and wicked tyrant.

The order of the Mamalukes.

These Mamalukes farre excelled the Turkes, not onely in strength of bodie, skilfull riding, and goodly armour, but also in courage and wealth. Beside that, they had not forgotten with what small power they had vnder the leading of Caitbeius their great Sultan. ouerthrowne the Turkes great armies in CILICIA, first at ADENA, and afterward at TARSVS, where they tooke prisoners, Mesites Palæologus the great Bassa, and Cherseogles, Baiazet his sonne in law: by which L victorie they grew into such a proud and vaine conceit of themselues, as if they had beene the only souldiours of the world, able of themselues to vanquish and ouercome whomsoeuer they should set vpon. These so valiant souldiours, were for the most part of the poore people called in auncient time Getæ, Zinchi, and Bastarnæ, borne neere vnto the Euxine sea and the fens of Mæotis, especially on that side where the riuer Corax falleth into the Euxine sea: which country is of later time called CIRCASSIA, of the people called CERCITÆ neere vnto CHOLCHIS. These miserable and wretched people, the Valachians, Podolians, Polonians, Roxolanes and Tartars dwelling by TAVRICA (puld from their mothers breasts, or by other violent meanes surprised) sold vnto merchants; who culling out the best for strength of bodie, or aptnesse of wit, conuaied them by sea to ALEXANDRIA, from whence they were continually sent to the great M Sultan of ÆGYPT: and by his appointment were at CAIRE (after the old manner of that people) deliuered to masters of fence and such other teachers, who carefully instructed them, being shut vp in their schooles, in all manner of feats of actiuitie: where after they were become able to bend a strong bow, and taught cunningly to shoot, leape, run, vault, ride, and skilfully to vse all manner of weapons, they were then taken into pay, and receiued into the number of the

A kings horſemen or Mamalukes: and ſuch of them as proued cowardly or vnapt, were made ſlaues vnto the reſt. So that they ſeeing all honour, credit, and preferment, laied vp in martiall proweſſe, did with all diligence and courage employ themſelues to militarie affaires: and therein ſo well profited, that oftentimes they which at the firſt were but bare and baſe ſlaues, of the meaneſt of the Mamalukes, by many degrees of ſeruice riſe at length to the higheſt degrees of honour. All theſe Mamalukes were the children of Chriſtian parents, from the time of their captiuitie inſtructed in the Mahometane ſuperſtition: for no man borne of a Mahometane father, or of a Iew, could be admitted into the number of the Mamaluke horſemen: which was ſo ſtraightly obſerued, that the honour of a Mamaluke horſeman neuer deſcended vnto the ſons
B of the Mamalukes, yet might they by law inherit their fathers lands, poſſeſſions, and goods: by which reaſon the ſonnes of the Sultans themſelues neuer ſucceeded their fathers in the kingdome. Hereby alſo it came to paſſe, that many Chriſtians of looſe life, or condemned for their notorious offences, flying thither, and abiuring the Chriſtian religion, and ſuffering themſelues to be circumciſed, being men meet for the warres, grew by degrees to great honour: as did Tangarihardinus the ſonne of a Spaniſh mariner, who by his forwardneſſe and induſtrie grew into ſuch credit and authoritie with Campſon the great Sultan, that almoſt all things were done by his aduice and counſell; & was diuers times by him employed in moſt honorable ſeruice, being ſent embaſſadour both to Baiazet the Turkiſh emperour, and to the ſtate of VENICE, about matters of great importance. Yet his impietie eſcaped not the hand of God, for at length by
C the enuie of the court he was brought into diſgrace, thruſt out of his place, and caſt into priſon, where he loaded with cold yron, moſt miſerably died. Neither was it to be maruelled if the Mamalukes were growne to that exceſſe of wealth, for as much as the Ægyptians and Syrians being miſerably by them oppreſſed, were not ſuffered to haue the vſe either of horſe or armour, neither admitted to any matters of counſell; but being impoueriſhed and brought low with heauie impoſitions and daily iniuries of the Mamalukes, gaue themſelues wholly to the trade of marchandiſe, husbandrie, and other mechanicall occupations: ouer whom the Mamalukes had power and commaund, as imperious maſters ouer their ſeruants, and would with greater inſolencie than is to be beleeued abuſe the poore countrey people, beating and ſpoiling them at their pleaſure, and not ſo contented, rauiſhing their wiues and daughters without re-D dreſſe. The Ægyptians (a people in ancient time much renowned for their valour and proweſſe) were by theſe maſterfull ſlaues kept in this miſerable thraldome & ſlauerie about the ſpace of three hundred yeares. For after the declination of the Romaine empire, that rich countrey falling into the gouernment of the Conſtantinopolitane emperours, the Ægyptians ſoone wearie of the proud and auaritious ſoueraignetie of the Greekes, called in the Saraſins, by whoſe helpe they expulſed the Greekes, and after choſe the General of the Saraſins for their king, after whoſe name the Ægyptian kings were of long time called Caliphes, as they had of ancient time beene called by the names of Pharo and Ptolomey.

The imperious gouernment of the Mamalukes in Egypt, Iudea, and Syria.

The laſt of theſe Caliphes raigned at ſuch time as the Chriſtians vnder the leading of Godfrey and Bohemund, paſſing as conquerours through ASIA and SYRIA, erected the kingdome of E HIERVSALEM. Hee being inuaded by Almericus ſixt king of HIERVSALEM, and finding himſelfe too weake, prayed aid of the Sultan of SYRIA, who ſent him Sarraco, a valiant captain, with a ſtrong power to aid him: but Sarraco no leſſe vnfaithfull than courageous trecherouſly ſlew the Caliphe, in whoſe aid he came, and tooke vpon himſelfe the kingdome. After Sarraco ſucceeded Saladine his brothers ſonne, who vtterly extinguiſhed the name and authoritie of the Caliphes in ÆGYPT, whom Sarraco had yet left as high prieſts. This Saladine oftentimes vanquiſhed the Chriſtian armies in SYRIA and IVDEA, and at length quite ouerthrew the kingdome of HIERVSALEM, as is in the former part of this hiſtorie to be ſeen. Saladine dying, left the kingdome of ÆGYPT to his brother, whoſe poſteritie ſucceſſiuely raigned of long time there, vntill the time of Melechſala. This Melechſala (laſt of the free borne kings, and of the po-F ſteritie of Saladine) had great and mortall warres with the Chriſtians, wherein hauing loſt moſt of his beſt ſoldiers, & repoſing no great confidence in the Ægyptians, thought good to ſtrengthen himſelfe with a new kind of ſouldiers, meere ſlaues bought for money. For at that time the Tartars breaking into ARMENIA and CAPADOCIA, and ouerrunning the people called COMANI ioyning vpon CAPADOCIA, made generall ſpoile of that people, as of priſoners taken by law of armes. Of this baſe people, Melechſala for a little money bought a great multitude,

which he tranſported into ÆGYPT, and furniſhed them with armes: by whoſe proweſſe he not G onely defended the frontiers of his kingdome, but alſo beſiged Lewes the French king in his trenches not farre from DAMIATA, called in ancient time HELIOPOLIS, or PELVSIVM, and ſhortly after in plain battaile tooke him priſoner, as is long before declared. But in the pride of this victorie, Melechſala was by the conſpiracie of theſe his new ſouldiers ſlaine: in whoſe place they ſet vp one Turqueminius, a deſperat fellow of their owne companie, honouring him with the title of the great Sultan of ÆGYPT. Turqueminius of a baſe ſlaue now become a great monarch (after the manner of men) forgetting his old companions which had ſo highly promoted him: and hauing them in great diſdaine, was by one of them (called Clotho) ſuddainely ſlaine; for which fact he was by thoſe baſe ſouldiers, his companions, choſen Sultan in his place:
who for the ſhort time of his raigne did much for the confirming of that ſeruile monarchie: yet H was he at length ſlaine alſo by Bandocader, ſometimes one of his fellow ſeruants, who alſo ſucceeded him in the kingdome. After him in long order ſucceeded many valiant men of the ſame ſeruile ſtate and condition, whom for breuitie I wittingly paſſe ouer. Amongſt the reſt, Caitbeius (of whom we haue before ſpoken in the life of Baiazet) was for wealth and martiall proweſſe moſt famous; who according to the manner of his predeceſſours, did with greater bountie and care maintaine that ſeruile gouernment, than any of them who had before him raigned in Æ-GYPT: and was for his notable gouernment and noble acts iuſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt princes of that age. After whoſe death great troubles aroſe in that ſeruile monarchie about the ſucceſſion. Whereby the Mamalukes drawne into diuers factions, ſome ſeeking to preferre one, and ſome another, had in foure yeares ſpace with ciuile warres ſore weakened their eſtate, I and ſlaine diuers of their greateſt princes which had aſpired vnto that kingdome. For appeaſing of which miſcheefes, tending to the vtter ruine of their kingdome, the great courtiers and cheefe men amongſt the Mamalukes with one conſent offered the kingdome to Campſon Gaurus (or as the Turkes call him) Canſaues Gauris, of whom we now ſpeake, a man of great integritie and courage, and altogether free from ambition. He, terrified with the dreadfull example of ſo many kings whom he had ſeene in ſhort time miſerably ſlaine by the ambitious aſpiring of other proud competitors: when he was ſore againſt his will hoiſt vp vpon the ſhoulders of the nobilitie and cheefe ſouldiers, and ſo carried into the court, as their manner was, began earneſtly to refuſe the kingdome and to withſtand their choice, excuſing himſelfe as vnfit for ſo high a place; and with teares ſtanding in his eyes, beſought the other great lords his friends, that they K would forbeare to thruſt him, well contented with his priuat life, into that glorious place ſubiect to ſo many dangers: and the rather, for that he neither had money to giue bountifully vnto the ſouldiers of the court, as other the Ægyptian Sultans had accuſtomed; neither held that ſuffici-encie and authoritie as was requiſit for repreſſing of ſuch violent and ſeditious tumults as were too rife in that troubleſome time and confuſion of all things.

The nobilitie on the other ſide perſuaded him, That he would not vpon a fooliſh obſtinacie or vaine modeſtie refuſe the offer of his preſent good fortune, but couragiouſly to take vpon him the gouernment of the ſtate, now ſore ſhaken with ciuile diſcord, together with the regall dignitie, which was with the generall good liking of all men ſo frankely offered vnto him. At L laſt they all by ſolemne oath promiſed vnto him, That they would with all their power, policie, and wealth, maintaine and defend the maieſtie of his ſtate; and that the men of war ſhould not demaund their wonted largeſſe, before the ſame might by his receiuers and treaſurers be raiſed of his cuſtomes and other reuenewes of the crowne. By which perſuaſions Campſon encouraged, ſuffered himſelfe to be ſaluted Sultan, and ſo tooke vpon him the gouernment. Afterwards, when he had giuen vnto the men of war ten millions of duckats, by the name of a largeſſe, and by his moderat gouernment had cauſed men generally to haue his proweſſe & wiſedome in admiration; he did with ſuch policie and dexteritie reforme the ſhaken ſtate of that kingdome, before rent in ſunder with ciuile warres, taking away by poiſon and other ſecret deuices ſome few, the cheefe authors of ſedition, that for the ſpace of ſixteene yeares neither tumult nor noiſe of M warre was at any time heard of in all SYRIA or ÆGYPT. Worthie vndoubtedly the name of a moſt excellent and fortunat prince, if when he had by ſingular wiſedome and policie eſtabliſhed the generall peace and proſperitie of his kingdome, he could haue there contented him-ſelfe to haue liued in quiet, and in the winding vp of his life not raſhly haue thruſt himſelfe into the dangerous quarrels of other princes.

The moderat and happy gouernment of Campſon.

The

A The Cadeleſcher and Iachis (Selymus his embaſſadours) departing from ICONIVM, came in few daies to Campſon the great Sultan, who then lay encamped neere vnto the riuer ORONTES, at this day called FARFAR. Theſe embaſſadours entertained by Campſon with greater bountie than courteſie, and ſhortly after their comming hauing audience in his pauilion; did with moſt temperat and calme ſpeech deliuer their embaſſage. To whom Campſon anſwered, That it was the ancient cuſtome of the Ægyptian Sultans (foraſmuch as they held the chiefe place in their religion) with all care and induſtrie to keepe the other Mahometane kings and people in peace and concord amongſt themſelues; whereof hee for his part had beene alwaies moſt deſirous: and was for no other purpoſe come with his armie into his prouince of SYRIA, than to perſuade Selymus to peace. Who if he would needs wilfully proceed in his intended warres a- Campſon his anſwere to the embaſſadours of Selymus.
B gainſt Hyſmaell the Perſian king, his friend and confederat, he would then do what ſhould ſtand with his honour and place, and not longer ſuffer all to go to wracke, for the vaine pleaſure and furie of one inſolent and ambitious man. He ſaid alſo, That he had of long time before ſeene into Selymus his inſatiable, fierce and troubleſome diſpoſition; who hauing moſt vnnaturally procured the death of his good father the old emperour Baiazet, and ſlaine his brethren, princes of great valour; ſeauen of his nephewes, princes of no ſmall hope; with many other of his beſt friends and faithfull counſellors; could make no end of his ambitious tyrannie. Wherefore they ſhould tell Selymus, that one and all the conditions of peace ſhould be, if he would from thenceforth deſiſt from inuading of Hyſmaell, and reſtore to Aladeules his ſonne, his fathers kingdome, which had of long beene vnder the defence & protection of the Ægyptian Sultans,
C as of right and reaſon he ought to doe: he ſhould in ſo doing beſide his fauour and friendſhip which might greatly ſtand him in ſteed, reape greater fame and glorie by an aſſured and honourable peace, than by doubtfull and dangerous warre.

The embaſſadours, although they knew right well that Selymus would not for any threats giue ouer his enterpriſe or lay downe armes; yet to the intent they might the ſooner be diſpatched, and ſo in time aduertiſe Selymus of the Sultans ſudden comming, ſeemed wonderfully to like of his motion for peace, and to giue good hope by their reaſonable perſuaſions to induce Selymus to like thereof. Foraſmuch as they were of his ſecret counſell, and meh able to doe much with him; whereby they truſted (as they would haue had the Sultan to beleeue) it would eaſily be brought to paſſe, that thoſe ſparkes might be quenched, which all things ſtan-
D ding vpright had not as yet kindled the fire of warre. So they being by Campſon rewarded, and hauing leaue to depart, trauelling day and night, returned to Selymus, who was then come to CÆSAREA.

Campſon alſo remouing from ORONTES, came into COMAGENA vnto the famous citie of ALEPPO, which citie is probably ſuppoſed to haue been built of the ruines of the ancient citie HIERAPOLIS, by Alepius the emperor Iulianus his lieutenant; who in that prouince did many notable matters, & called that new built citie after his owne name. It is ſituat neere vnto the riuer Singa, which riſiug out of the mountaine PIERIVS, with many turnings and windings runneth thorough Comagena, and being but a ſmall riuer, falleth at length into the riuer Euphrates. This
E citie Hyalon king of the Tartars tooke and burnt, at ſuch time as the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt made warre with the Ægyptian kings, for the kingdomes of SYRIA and IERVSALEM. Which calamitie notwithſtanding, it was againe repeopled, and is at this day a famous citie, for the commodious ſituation thereof much frequented with merchants from the furtheſt parts of the world: It is ſcarce fiue daies iourney from TRIPOLIS and BERYTVS the great ports of SYRIA, and is alſo neere vnto the Turkes and Perſians: ſo that the riches of the Eaſt are thither commodiouſly conuaied out of Turkie, ouer the mountaine AMANVS which parteth CILICIA from SYRIA: and ſo likewiſe out of PERSIA and MESOPOTAMIA ouer the riuer Euphrates, where the citie BYRTHA of late time bounded the kingdome of the Ægyptian Sultans, from the Perſian.

Selymus vnderſtanding by his embaſſadours (who had diligently noted all things in the Sul- Selymus conuerteth his forces from the Perſians againſt Campſon.
F tans campe) both of the comming, and of the number of his enemies; and alſo enformed of the Sultans proud anſwer, who had ſo peremptorily preſcribed vnto him ſuch vnreaſonable conditions as pleaſed himſelfe: thought good to alter his purpoſe, and now to conuert his forces an other way than he had before determined. For that to enter farther into ARMENIA, leauing ſo puiſſant an enemie as Campſon at his backe, ſeemed a thing too full of danger: and to giue ouer the the enterprise he had with so great care and charge vndertaken, at the appointment and pleasure of another man, stood neither with his honour or state. Wherefore in a matter so doubtfull, he resolued vpon a notable and necessarie point, well fitting the greatnesse of his mind. He made shew as if he would haue gone directly against the Persian, as he had before determined; and that the more certain report of this his purpose might be carried to Campson, he sent before part of his armie with his carriages to the citie SVASSIA, in old time called SEBASTA (it standeth in the frontiers of the Persian kingdom, where the great riuer Euphrates pent vp with the rocks of the mountaine TAVRVS, breaketh againe violently forth into MESOPOTAMIA: but turning himselfe vpon the right hand, purposed to passe the mountaine TAVRVS, & breaking suddenly into COMAGENA to come vpon the Sultan before he were well aware of his comming. Wherefore calling vnto him his trustie Ianizaries, with the other souldiers of the court, he openly with cheerfull countenance declared vnto them what he had resolued to doe, with the reasons of the alteration of his former determination: perswading them, that the victorie would easily be atchieued, if they as couragious souldiers would with all celeritie (before the Mamalukes could perceiue they were returned) get vp to the top of the mountaines, and recouer those difficult passages; not fearing the vaine names and titles of the Mamalukes. For why (said he) the strength of those horsemen is long since decaied and gone: the old Mamalukes, who in the time of Caitbeius were of some fame and reputation, are all dead. You shall in battell meet but with a sort of gallant horsebreakers rather than souldiers, which can cunningly mannage their horses in sport, to the pleasure of the beholders, but know not how to encounter the enemie, or to endure to be wounded: who as carpet knights effeminat with long peace, and corrupted with excesse and delicacie of their great cities, neuer saw their foes entrenched, or armed enemies, neither euer heard the sound of a trumpet but at plaies or shewes. Wherefore you are to make but small account of them, being furnished with no store of ordinance or strength of footmen. But as the reuerend interpretours of our sacred lawes and religion, hauing orderly performed all their obseruances, doe diuine vnto vs all happinesse: so you as men full of hope, set forward cheerefully vnto most assured victorie ouer your proud enemies. For God no doubt fauoureth the quarrell of men iustly prouoked, and offereth means of victorie to such as take vp iust and necessarie armes. Yet to ouercome the enemie, and to enioy victorie indeed, wholy consisteth in the courage and valour of them, which deeme nothing better or more honourable than to spend their liues for the honour of their prince and countrey. Heere the Ianizaries shaking their weapons, forthwith cried out with cheerfull voice, That he should lead and conduct them whither soeuer he would: saying, That they were readie as couragious men, to ouercome all the difficulties of those hard passages, and patiently to endure all the labours and dangers incident to that warre.

Selymus, by the mountaine people hauing found out the easiest passages, resolued to passe ouer the mountaine with his armie in three places: and so appointing three great companies of the common souldiers and countrey people, for the opening of the straight passages; he commaunded the rough and vneuen waies to be made plain and smooth, for the transporting of his ordinance, and the broken passages to be cast euen, that so his baggage and carriages might the better passe: and the more to encourage his souldiers to take paines, he promised present reward to al such as in transporting of his ordinance, should take any extraordinarie pains. Wherby it came to passe, that the same being of the smaller sort bearing bullet of no great height, was in short time by the cheerfull labour of his souldiers, drawne ouer those great hils and dales: so that in fiue daies all his armie with his baggage and carriages were got ouer the mountaine TAVRVS, and come into the plaines of COMAGENA. For that mountaine where it taketh the name of AMANVS, which is almost in the middle where the riuer Euphrates parteth the mountaine TAVRVS, and the bay ISSICVS, is neither exceeding high, or yet impassable: for as it commeth neerer the sea, it is not so rough as elsewhere, but is in many places inhabited and tilled by the mountaine Cilicians, a fierce kind of people accustomed to labour and toile, who are now called Caramannians, which is to say, the inhabitants of the blacke mountaines; for that the burnt rocks of the mountaine seeme a farre off to be blacke.

Alis-beg which betraied Aladeules, whom Selymus had a little before sent for, as soon as the armie was come downe into the frontiers of the enemies country, with a strong power of his light horsemen, speedily ouerran all that countrey which is at the foot of AMANVS and TAVRVS: therby to vnderstand of the countrey people and such as they could take prisoners, where Campson

A ſon lay with his armie ; and alſo by keeping the paſſages to doe what poſſibly might be done, that Selymus his comming might not be knowne to the enemie.

But Campſon, who with no leſſe vanitie than pride had fondly flattered himſelfe, onely by the authoritie & greatneſſe of his name to haue terrified Selymus, and ouerruled him at his pleaſure ; could not be perſuaded that he was come ouer the mountaine AMANVS, vntill certaine newes was brought him, that he was encamped with a moſt puiſſant armie within two daies march of him. With which vnexpected newes being ſore troubled, and in the middeſt of that danger to ſeeke counſell, as one which began rightly to conſider of his owne ſtrength, and the ſtrength of his enemie ; began then to doubt what were beſt for him to doe, and in great perplexitie ſometime hoped wel, and by and by was as a man halfe diſcouraged and diſmaied. And
B now become exceeding carefull both of his honour and himſelfe, he began to doubt, whether it were better for him to giue place to ſo great a danger, and ſhunning battell to retire with his armie into places of more ſafetie ; or elſe couragiouſly to abide the comming of his enemies, and to hazard the fortune of a battell, although it were vpon great diſaduantage : Foraſmuch as he reputed it farre more honourable after the example of his predeceſſors from whom he had receiued that great kingdome (both gotten and kept by martiall proweſſe) to die with honour in the field ; than by ſhamefull and vnwoonted flight, either to blemiſh their militarie glorie continued aboue the ſpace of 300 yeares, or for loue of a ſmall remainder of life, being now 77 yeares old, to ſeeme willing to reſerue vnto obloquie and ſhame his laſt daies, depriued of all honour and reputation.

C There were amongſt his cheefetaines many, which preferred wholeſome counſell before that which was in ſhew more glorious : but aboue all others one Iamburd, ſurnamed Gazelles, (ſometimes the follower of great Caitbeius) a valiant man of great honour, for his long experience in martiall affaires, and at that time gouernour of APAMIA. He, as he was of opinion, That to fight with the Turks armie, conſiſting for moſt part of expert ſoldiers, with ſo ſmall a power, were a thing of deſperat danger ; ſo was he alſo, that it were good ſpeedily to retire, and to chuſe the citie of DAMASCO, as the fitteſt place for thoſe warres : for as much as the Turkes armie could make no haſt after them, by reaſon of their footmen and carriages, ſo that they might at eaſe and with ſafe retire ; and there calling together all the Mamalukes which were in garriſon in IVDEA and ÆGYPT, and entertaining the Arabians their neighbours, to protract the war
D vntill Winter, when as they might eaſily diſtreſſe the enemie for want of victuall. And that it was not to be feared, that ALEPPO, if it were furniſhed but with a reaſonable garriſon, could by and by be taken of the enemie, who had but ſmall field peeces not fit for batterie. Beſide that, in ſhort time aide would come from the Perſians out of MESOPOTAMIA ; yea and Hyſmaell himſelfe hearing of the Turkes expedition into SYRIA, was like ynough to breake into ASIA the leſſe : neither would the Chriſtians refuſe to furniſh them with great artillerie from the Iſlands of the RHODES and CYPRVS againſt that common enemie, if they were thereto in time requeſted. All which things being laied together, he ſaid the Sultan might afterward vpon euen hand, goe into the field, if he ſhould thinke it ſo much to concerne his honour, to giue his ene-
E mies battaile. But for as much as the greateſt warres, which at the firſt had moſt violent and moſt furious motions, by the politicke enemies delay did moſt commonly in time grow calme, he ſhould not therefore make too much haſt to aduenture the fortune of battaile : for that the errours of warre, which many times chanced through the ouerſight or raſhneſſe of the cheeftains, might well of good men be lamented and deteſted, but hardly or neuer recouered or amended.

Gazelles his graue and conſiderat ſpeech had much moued both the Sultan and others : yet the cheerefulneſſe of the ſouldiers, and fooliſh hardineſſe of the Mamalukes did ſo fill Campſons eares, that he could not hearken to ſo good and wholeſome counſell : for as ſoone as they heard certainely of the comming of the Turks, they began to leape and daunce, and to reioice among themſelues, that the time was come wherein they might make proofe of their valour, and win to themſelues honour. For now (as they ſaid) was come that time they had long wiſhed for wher-
F in they would by notable ſlaughter of their enemies, aduance the honour and maieſtie of Campſon their Sultan far aboue the fame of Caitbeius. And ſome euen of the cheefe men about Campſon, vpon flatterie and vaine oſtentation, alledging how honourably and with what ſmall labour they had before ouerthrowne the Turkes great armie at TAVRVS, perſuaded him, that the victorie would eaſily and without any great danger be gotten. But eſpecially Cayerbeius gouernor

of ALEPPO and of the prouince of COMAGENA (who after his warre ended, was in reward G of his foule treason by Selymus vnworthily preferred to the greatest honours of ÆGYPT) extolling with glorious words the faithfulnesse, courage and valour of the Mamalukes, and extenuating the strength and power of the enemie, forced his wits to the vttermost to ouerthrow the wholsome counsell of Gazelles.

A secret grudge betweene Campson and Cayerbeius gouernour of Comagena.

For this Cayerbeius for all his faire face bare a grudge in heart against Campson, because he had some few yeares before poysoned his brother, whom he had in iealousie, being a man next to himselfe of greatest power, wealth, and authoritie amongst the Mamalukes, and withall of an aspiring mind. Whereupon Cayerbeius afterwards thinking it good to looke to himselfe, and doubting the like practise to be intended against himself; being, as the manner of that kingdome was, summoned to a parliament at CAIRE, faigned himselfe sicke, and would not come: where- H with Campson was not a little offended, yet for a time he thought it best to dissemble the matter and to await some fitter opportunitie for the taking away of that proud man, so forgetfull of his dutie, and bearing himselfe against his soueraigne, as if he had been an absolute king in his owne prouince. This he thought might most couertly be brought to passe, if he should vpon the occasion of the present warre (as it then fell out) or else vnder the colour of going in person himselfe to the riuer Euphrates, come to ALEPPO: for it was the manner of the ancient Ægyptian Sultans, not to account themselues worthie of the name of a Sultan or great Generall, before they had as Caitbeius had of late done, encamped their armie vpon the side of the riuer Euphrates at the citie BYRTHA (which standing vpon the banke of the riuer, retaineth at this day both the ancient name and fame) and there with solemne pompe had in the sight of the armie forced their I horses into the riuer to drinke: giuing to vnderstand by that ceremonie, the greatnesse of their empire, and that they were readie by force of armes to proue, that all those countries were theirs which lay alongst the riuer Euphrates, from the mountaine TAVRVS vnto the deserts of ARABIA. But the consideration of this war letted that he did not at his first comming oppresse him, because he deemed it to stand best with his present affaires: and not yet knowing the purpose of Selymus, to expect the motions of the Turkes and Persians, and to deferre the execution of his wrath against Cayerbeius, vntill the end of the warre: for feare least the other Mamalukes, dismayed with the hainousnesse of the suddaine fact, should either reuolt from him, or else raise some mutinie or rebellion in that populous citie. For Cayerbeius had by his courtesie and boun- K tie many strong companies in the armie fast bound vnto him: and beside that, was of greatest credit and authoritie with them of ALEPPO, hauing in his keeping a strong citadell, built vpon the rising of an hill in the middest of the citie, which he kept with a strong and sure garrison.

But whiles Campson doth thus slowly and considerately purpose his destruction, many of the Sultans secret friends, to him more officious than faithfull, secretly aduised Cayerbeius to beware of the Sultan, and by some good meanes in time to prouide for his owne safetie. He vnderstanding of the danger, and thinking all delay deadly, sent secret messengers vnto Selymus, discouering vnto him the cause of his greefe, and promising as occasion should serue to come ouer vnto him, and to deliuer into his power the castle with the heart of the citizens, and all the strength of his owne horsemen; thereby to prouide for his owne safetie, to reuenge his brothers death, and L to further his victorie against Campson: and for performance of promises on both sides, required secret hostages to be giuen. By the same messengers he also aduertised him, what strength the Sultan was of, persuading him in any case to make hast to giue him battaile before hee had gathered any greater power. Selymus nothing doubted to condiscend to all that the traitor had requested, promising of himselfe farre greater things than euer he had required: assuring himselfe of the victorie, if his enemie should lose so much of his strength by the reuolt of so great a commaunder.

Campson enforced by the generall consent of his souldiers, and the violence of his ineuitable destinie, then at hand, reiecting the good and faithfull counsell of Gazelles, at such time as Selymus was reported to be at hand; resolued according to the counsell of the traitour Cayerbeius, M to dare him battell. He lay conueniently encamped vpon the riuer Singa, almost ten miles from the citie, in such sort as that his souldiers might vse the benefit of the riuer, and remoued from the houses and pleasures of the citie, might yet neuertheless be easily releeued with the store and plentie thereof.

The Mamalukes notable souldiers.

The Mamalukes were scarce in number twelue thousand, but euery one of them, according

A as he was of greater place or calling, ſo had he attending vpon him mo ſeruants, well furniſhed with horſe and armour. A goodly and inuincible armie, if the battell might haue been tryed by true valour. The Mamalukes wearing their beards long and rough, with graue and ſterne countenance, hauing ſtrong and able bodies, vſed ſuch cunning in all their fights and battels, that after they had giuen the firſt charge with their launces, they would by and by with wonderfull actiuitie vſe their bowes and arrowes, caſting their targuets behind them; and forthwith the horſemans mace or crooked ſcimitar, as the manner of the battell or place required. Their horſes were ſtrong and couragious, in making and ſwiftneſſe much like vnto the Spaniſh Iennets; and that which is of many hardly beleeued, ſo docible, that at certaine ſignes or ſpeeches of the rider, they would with their teeth reach him vp from the ground a launce, an arrow, or ſuch like
B thing; and as if they had knowne the enemie, run vpon him with open mouth, and laſh at him with their heeles, and had by nature and cuſtome learned, not to be afraid of any thing. Theſe coragious horſes were commonly furniſhed with ſiluer bridles, guilt trapping, rich ſaddles, their necks and breaſts armed with plates of yron: the horſeman himſelfe was commonly content with a coat of maile or a breaſtplate of yron. The chiefand wealthieſt of them vſed headpieces; the reſt a linnen couering of the head, curiouſly foulded into many wreathes, wherewith they thought themſelues ſafe ynough againſt any handie ſtrokes: the common ſoldiors vſed thrumd caps, but ſo thicke, as that no ſword could pierce them.

Campſon of all his armie made foure battels: The firſt was committed to Cayerbeius, becauſe it was in his owne prouince where the battell was to be fought. The ſecond was led by Sybeius, The order of Campſons battel
C who for his wonderfull actiuitie was of them called Baluano, which in their language ſignifieth a tumbler, or one that ſheweth feats of actiuitie; he was gouernour of Damasco, a man of ſingular faith and valour. Theſe two great commanders were appointed at once to charge both the wings of the Turks armie. After them followed Gazelles with the third battell, to ſecond either the one or the other of the two formoſt, as need ſhould require. Campſon himſelfe led the fourth, all gliſtering in guilt armour, behind the reſt almoſt a mile and a halfe. The laſt was left for defence of the campe.

But Selymus according to his wonted maner ſo ordered his battaile, that his Aſian horſemen The order of Selymus his battel were in the right wing, his Europeian horſemen in the left, his Ianizaries and artillerie in the maine battaile: before whom, in the middle betweene the two wings he had placed his moſt va-
D liant and gallant penſioners, amongſt whom, contrarie to his wonted cuſtome, he choſe to ſerue that day.

Cayerbeius as ſoone as he was come neere the enemie (in token of his braue courage) gaue a hote charge vpon the Europeian horſemen; and by and by, as if he would haue compaſſed in that wing, wheeled a great way about behind them: where chancing vpon a great companie of ſcullions, drudges, and other baſe people that followed the campe, with an infinit number of cammels, and carriages, he made there a great ſtirre, with little ſlaughter, that as a valiant and cunning traitor he might in the ſelfe ſame time ſatisfie the expectation of his valour and of his treaſon togither. In the other wing, the gouernour of Damasco to enter vpon the open ſide
E of the enemie, forbearing to charge him afront, and turning about his troups on the left hand, entred ouerthwart their ranks; where the Mamalukes fought with ſuch furie, that hauing made great ſlaughter of the Aſian horſemen, they brake in amongſt them, as if it had beene a raging flood, bearing all downe before them, vntill they came to the enſignes in the middeſt of that wing: neither could Muſtapha the Beglerbeg (who was by birth an Hungarian, and Selmus his brother in law) neither the Imbrahor-Baſſa (or maſter of the houſe) although they did what they might to withſtand him, after the firſt were ouerthrowne, ſtay the reſt, but that they would needs turne their backs and flie. So Sybeius as a valiant conqueror hauing cut in two pieces the right wing of the enemies battell, and thruſting in betwixt the battell of the footmen and the backs of the penſioners, brought a great terrour and feare vpon the whole maine battell. The matter was now brought to extreame danger: for Selymus by the breaking in of Sybeius was al-
F moſt cut off from his footmen, in whom he had repoſed his greateſt confidence. And now the Ianizaries were hardly charged by Gazelles, who following the fortune of Sybeius, had ſet vpon the head of the enemies battell. The Aſian horſemen alſo being put to the worſe, and cut in pieces, found no meanes how to reſtore againe their diſordered battell.

In this extremetie Sinan Baſſa in good time came in with his horſemen: by his comming, for that he had been but lightly charged by Cayerbeius the traitour, and had brought with him ma- G ny freſh troupes of horſemen, the furie of the Mamalukes was repreſſed, the Turkes againe encouraged, and the victorie ſhortly after wrung out of the Mamalukes hands; the great artillerie being by the commaundment of Selymus at the ſame time diſcharged amongſt them, by the terrible thundring whereof, the Mamalukes horſes ſomewhat troubled, could not ſo well as before be ruled: neither could the men themſelues, although they were of wonderfull courage, much preuaile, being on euerie ſide oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies. Yet in that diſtreſſe being nothing diſmaied, although they were by Cayerbeius and their good fortune forſaken, they were not to ſeeke either of courage or direction: but ſerring themſelues cloſe togither, they brake through the middeſt of their enemies, with great ſlaughter of the Europeian horſemen, and hurt of the penſioners; and ſo with ſpeed fled towards the campe and citie. After H whom followed Sinan Baſſa with the readieſt and freſheſt trougs of his horſemen: for Selymus, (who that day in the extreame heat, for his wonderful paines, courage, and direction, ſeemed vndoubtedly greater than himſelfe) riding vp and downe, called earneſtly vpon his ſouldiours to vrge the victorie, and with all ſpeed to purſue their flying enemies.

Campſon had now (his deſtinie ſo leading him) ſet forward, of purpoſe to come to the reliefe of his men ſent before; or if the Turks ſhould be ouercome, to be partaker of the victorie: when vpon the way, he vnderſtood by them that fled, that Cayerbeius was reuolted, his armie ouerthrowne, and the terrour ſo great, as that the flight of his ſouldiours was not now poſſibly to be ſtaied: beſide that to augment the feare, it was reported, that the multitude of his enemies, and force of their artillerie was ſo great, that they were not then to be incountred. With which hea- I uie newes, the proud old man, who in the perpetuall courſe of his good fortune had neuer taſted of euill hap, was readie for ſorrow and griefe of mind to haue ſunke downe to the ground.
The death of Campſon. And forthwith, his owne men, and the enemie purſuing them, comming vpon him, who in their headlong courſe without regard ouerthrew whomſoeuer they met, euerie man making ſhift for himſelfe without reſpect of others harmes: he being a corpulent man of great yeares, and beſide the heauineſſe of his armour troubled alſo with a rupture, ouercome with heat and griefe of mind, fainted in that great preſſe; and ſo falling downe, was without regard troden to death, after he had with great maieſtie gouerned the kingdomes of Ægypt, Iudea, and Syria many yeares. The valiant Tetrarches of Damasco and Tripolis, whileſt others fled for life, either to the campe or to the citie of Aleppo, labouring in the hindermoſt of their flying troupes to K repreſſe the force of their purſuing enemies, were both fighting, honourably ſlaine. Selymus erecting a few tents in the ſame field wherein the battell was fought, and keeping moſt part of his armie in armes, ſlept not all that night, but ſtood faſt as a man not yet aſſured of his victorie or good fortune; fearing leaſt men of ſo great valour as were the Mamalukes, ſhould in the couert of the night returne and ſet vpon him in his campe: for he knew right well, that they were ouercome and put to flight, rather by the treacherie of Cayerbeius, and furie of his great ordinance, than by the valour of his ſoldiors. But Gazelles and the other Mamalukes, after they certainely vnderſtood of the death of Campſon, hauing giuen their horſes a ſhort bait, departed in haſt from Aleppo to Damasco. The next day Selymus remouing with his armie, tooke the rich L
Aleppo deliuered to Selymus by Cayerbeius the traitor. tents of his enemies full of all princely ſtore, which he gaue vnto his ſouldiors for a prey: and marching from thence to Aleppo, had the citie peaceably deliuered vnto him by Cayerbeius where he fauourably tooke the citizens into his protection; and the more to win their hearts, granted vnto them greater priuiledges than they had in former time enioyed.

In this battell were ſlaine not aboue a thouſand Mamalukes, but of their ſeruants and followers a greater number; mo being ſlain in the flight than in the fight, when as their horſes fainting for heat, and dying vnder them for thirſt, many of them were enforced to betake themſelues to their feet, and ſo were eaſily ſlaine of euerie baſe horſeman. For a great number of goodly horſes dyed there, which being foggie fat, and delicately brought vp in cold ſtables, could not endure the vehemencie of the heat and that vnacquainted trauell: for that day all things were M burnt with the ſcorching heat of the Sunne.

This famous battell was fought the ſeuenteenth of Auguſt, in the yeare of our Lord 1516, the verie ſame day (which is ſtrange to tell) whereon but two yeres before, he had obtained the victorie againſt Hyſmaell the great Sophi in the Calderan fields. Selymus loſt in this battell three thouſand horſemen: whereby it may eaſily be gathered, that he had their receiued a notable

A dle ouerthrowe of his horſemen; if Sinan Baſſa in the left wing, which by the treaſon of Cayerbeius eſcaped with ſmal loſſe, had alſo happened vpon his Sybeius, as the other Generall did.

The dead bodie of Campſon found two daies after without any wound appearing therupon, was by the commandment of Selymus laied forth in open place for all men to behold; that ſuch as belieued him yet to liue, and to be gone to repaire his armie at CAIRE, might be out of all hope of his retune; and others that were alreadie reuolted, might thereby be the more confirmed, as now out of all feare of him. Not long after, when the dead bodie began to putrifie and grow noiſome, and to conuince the fame of his eſcape, had lien openly to the view of all men by the ſpace of three daies, it was without any funerall pompe or ſolemnitie ſimply buried in the moſt ancient temple of ALEPPO. Of the riſing and fall of this great man, Ianus Vitalis hath writ-
B ten this elogium or epitath.

The dead bodie of Campſon laid out for all men to view.

In English thus.

Fortune, well cal'd both deafe, and blind,
And thereto fond withall,
Thou setst the beggar vp aloft,
To worke his greater fall.
Thou peeuish dame, more sudden than
The thunder clap from hie, Reiects the suits of greedie wights,
Which to thee call and crie.
And lauishly consumes thy selfe,
And whatsoelse thou hast,
On such as craue nothing of thee,
Nor wish not to be grac't.
As Camson Gaurus seeking nought,
Ne crauing ought of thee:
Againſt his will by souldiours rage,
Was raised from base degree.
And soaring vp aboue the clouds,
Made king of Ægypt land,
Receiu'd amongst the highest stars,
Did there in glorie stand.
But forthwith falling thence, oppresst
With rebels, war, and age:
Became the scorne of thine ouerthwart
Most fierce and fickle rage.
And so with life, togither lost
A world of wealth also:
Which with his stately kingdome great,
He greatest did forgo.

Selymus hauing receiued the citie of ALEPPO into his obeisance, sent Ionuses Bassa before him with a great part of his light horsemen, to pursue his flying enemies to DAMASCO, whither he himselfe in few daies after came also with the rest of his armie, when he vnderstood that his enemies were departed thence and fled to CAIRE. They of DAMASCO, thinking it not to stand with their good to stay the course of his victorie, and with their liues to hazard the Selymus comming to Damasco.

A the great wealth of that rich citie; without delay presently opened vnto him the gates at his comming. By whose example other cities alongst the sea coast moued, especially TRIPOLIS, BERYTVS, SYDON, and PTOLEMAIS, sending their embassadors, and receiuing in the Turks garrisons, yeelded themselues in like manner.

Not long after Selymus held a great counsell in his campe, which then lay vnder the wals of DAMASCO: for he would not bring his souldiours into the citie for troubling the quiet and populous state thereof, togither with the great trade of merchandise, which at that time was with wonderful securitie kept there by merchants of diuers countries, comming from far, euen from the remotest parts of the world. And in the campe such was the militarie discipline of that most
B seuere commaunder, that the souldiours (knowing the victorie to giue them no whit the more libertie) suffered the fruitfull orchards and gardens of the citizens, in the most plentifull time of Autumne, to rest in safetie vntouched, without any keeper. By which seuere and strait gouernment he so politickly prouided against all wants, that his campe was in all parts furnished with plentie of all things necessarie, and that at prices reasonable. There taking vnto him men skilful in the lawes and customes of the countrey, and calling before him the embassadors of all the cities of the countrie; he heard and decided the greatest controuersies of the Syrians, appointed gouernours ouer the prouinces and cities, tooke view of the tributs and customes, and abrogated many customes and tributes due vnto the old Sultans, which seemed either vnreasonable or grieuous to the people; thereby to gaine the fame of a iust and bountifull conqueror.

Notable discipline in Selymus his armie.

C When he had thus set all things in order in SYRIA, and sufficiently rested and refreshed his armie, and especially his horses which with long and continuall trauell were growne maigre and leane: he of nothing more desirous than of the conquest of ÆGYPT, and the vtter subuersion of the Sultans state and Mamalukes gouernment; sent before Sinan Bassa into IVDEA with fifteene thousand horsemen, and a strong regiment of harquebusiers selected out of the Ianizaries and other souldiors, to trie the passage of that countrie, and to open the way for him to GAZA: which was thought would be vnto him very troublesome, by reason of the wild Arabians roaming vp and downe that countrie. The citie of GAZA standeth neere the sea towards ÆGYPT, not far from the sandie desarts, whereby men with much difficultie and dangerous trauell passe out of SYRIA and so to CAIRE.

D In the meane time, the Mamalukes who vnder the conduct of Gazelles were come to CAIRE, with all the rest of their order which were thither assembled from all parts of the kingdome, entring into counsel togither (as it often falleth out in time of danger and distres) without all contention or enuie, chose Tomombeius (of the Turks called Tuman-bai) a Circassian borne, to be their king. He was then the great Diadare, and by his office next in honour and power vnto the Sultan; whose prowesse & policie was such, that he onely in the opinion of all the Mamalukes was thought able and sufficient to stay and vphold the afflicted and declining state of their kingdome. He by their generall consent and good liking promoted to the state of the great Sultan, thinking (as truth was) his owne maiestie, and the remainder of the Mamalukes hopes, to be wholy reposed in armes and the fortune of battell: began with great carefulnesse and singular
E industrie to prouide armour, weapons, and horses from all places; he also caused great store of ordinance to be cast, and mustered great companies of such of his slaues as seemed meet for the wars: beside that, he entertained for pay many of the Moores and Arabians his neighbours. He also for great reward hired men skilfull of the countries, to go through the desarts of the Palmyrens into MESOPOTAMIA, and so to Hysmaell the Persian king with letters: earnestly requesting him to inuade the Turkes dominions in ASIA the lesse, or with all speed to breake into COMAGENA, being by the departure of the enemie left bare and destitute of sufficient garrisons: and farther to aduertise him, That Selymus who then lay in the borders of IVDEA, might easily be inclosed with their two armies, and so be vanquished, or for want of victuals distressed: and the rather, for that there was no fleet of the Turks vpon that coast; able from sea to relieue
F their armie by land, or yet to transport them thence in case they should by chance of war be distressed, and so thinke to returne. In which doing, he should both relieue the Ægyptian Sultan his friend and confederat, for his sake brought into so great danger; and also without any great trouble or perill notably reuenge himselfe of so many shamefull iniuries as he had before receiued from that his most capitall enemie. Whilest Tomombeius doth these things, Sinan Bassa the forerunner of Selymus, hauing easily repulsed diuers companies of the wild Arabians, who in ſon, ſeemed a matter both perrillous and vnreaſonable, forthwith yeelded their citie vpon reaſo-Gaza yelded to Sinan. ble compoſition: and with the plentie therof relieued the Turks Baſſa, giuing him great (but diſſembled) thanks, that by his means and the good fortune of Selymus, they were deliuered from the cruell bondage of the Mamalukes: promiſing for the remembrance of ſo great a benefit, for euer to remaine his faithfull ſeruants. Sinan commended their readie good will, required of them all ſuch things as he wanted, or had occaſion to vſe, which they ſeemed willingly to deli-uer: and ſo lodged his armie neere vnto the wals of the citie, within the defence of the gardens, purpoſing in that place to expect the comming of Selymus. H

In the meane time (as he was a man of great experience, and moſt skilfull in martiall affaires)
he ſought by all means to get knowledge of that deſart and vnpeopled countrie, not inhabited for lacke of water; and eſpecially of the nature of the great ſands wherby Selymus was with his armie to paſſe; he alſo woon by rewards the inhabitants of the countrie thereabout, by large offers to procure vnto him the fauour of the chiefetaines and leaders of the Arabians, neere vnto thoſe places, and alſo to eſpie what the Mamalukes did at CAIRE, and wherin they repoſed their chiefe confidence, and forthwith to giue him knowledge thereof.

On the other ſide, the citizens of GAZA, in heart enemies vnto the Turks, as daily feeling the grieuances of the preſent armie, aduertiſed Tomombeius of the comming of Sinan Baſſa: and that that part of the Turkes armie might eaſily be oppreſſed before the comming of Selymus, if a I ſtrong power of Mamalukes were ſent thither vnder the conduct of skilful leaders: promiſing, that if the Mamalukes would at an appointed time vpon the ſuddaine in the night ſet vpon the ſleepie Turks, they would at the ſame inſtant ſallie out of the citie vpon the campe, and there with fire and ſword do what harme they could for the ouerthrow of the enemie.

Of this deuiſe, Tomombeius and the Mamalukes liked well, and ſo without delay ſent Gazelles
ſix thouſand choſen horſemen, and a great number of the Arabians to performe the exploit vpon Sinan: for Gazelles, in that his wholeſome counſell had bin by Campſon and others reiected (who being ſtraight way deſirous of battell, had raſhly caſt themſelues and the whole ſtate into ſo great calamitie) and afterwards in the greateſt danger of the battell hauing performed all the parts of a politicke and valiant chieftaine, was growne into ſuch credit, that all men held a great K opinion both of his valour and direction.

Sinan aduertiſed of the comming of Gazelles, goeth ſecretly to meet him. But he was ſcarcely well ſet forth, when aduertiſement was giuen vnto Sinan by his Syryan intelligencers, That the Mamaluks with the Arabians were comming through the ſandie deſarts vpon the ſuddain to oppreſſe him; and that they would be with him before two daies were expired, for as much as they had ſet forward vpon the ſpur without any carriages or baggage to let them. Which ouerture in good time giuen, as it was the ſafegard of Sinans armie, ſo was it of greateſt importance & moment for the obtaining of the full conqueſt of ÆGYPT afterward.
But Sinan Baſſa, although he knew nothing of the trecherie of them of Gaza; yet as a man of a prouident and ſubtill wit, ſuſpecting that ſuch a thing might happen, becauſe he would not at L once haue to do with a double enemie, reſolued to go and meet the Mamalukes vpon the way, and to giue them battell. Wherefore with great ſilence diſlodging his armie betwixt ten and twelue a clocke in the night, he ſet forward and marched out of ſight of the citie, about fifteene miles toward ÆGYPT. There was neere vnto that place a little low village, wherein trauellours vſed commonly to lodge, for the commodiouſnes of a liuely and plenteous ſpring which there riſeth: there by chance both Sinan Baſſa had purpoſed to ſtay, and Gazelles in like maner had alſo determined to reſt a few houres to refreſh his armie, that he might by night, after he had well refreſhed his horſes, come vnlooked for vpon his enemies at GAZA; when newes was brought to both the Generals almoſt at one inſtant, by the forerunners of both the armies, That the ene-mie was at hand. M

Gazelles not a little troubled with that vnexpected newes, for that he perceiued himſelfe diſ-appointed of his purpoſe; and vnable to fight with his enemie in plaine battell, eſpecially his horſes being ſore wearied with trauell, was inforced vpon the ſuddaine for the ſafegard of him-ſelfe and of his followers, to reſolue vpon a new reſolution: yet nothing diſcouraged, with cheerefull countenance and liuely ſpeech exhorted his ſouldiors, to make themſelues readie for battaile,

A battaile, & that which they could not by policie bring to paſſe, they ſhould now by plain force performe. Sinan on the other ſide hauing ſomewhat ſooner ſet his men in order of battell than had Gazelles, for as much as he had before at good leiſure taken order what he would haue done, if it ſhould come to the point of battell: with conſtant looke and long perſuaſions full of hope, encouraged his ſouldiers to fight. But the concluſion of all his ſpeech was, That they ſhould play the men, and not once thinke of flight, for as much as all places about them would be ſhut vp and become impaſſable, if they obtained not the victorie: and that aboue all things they ſhould perſuade themſelues, that no one of them could that day periſh, but ſuch as the immortall God had by the ineuitable law of fatall deſtinie appointed to die: and that with like hazard
B valiant men found life in the middeſt of their enemies weapons, that cowards by immutable deſtinie found death in their ſafeſt flight.

The Baſſa had placed his harquebuſiers in the wings of his battell, which were raunged of a great length in thin rankes, therby to vſe their peeces at more libertie, and with more eaſe to encloſe the enemie: in the middle were placed the horſemen, to receiue the firſt charge of the Mamalukes. Gazelles approching the enemie, ſent before the troupes of the Arabian light horſemen to trouble the wings of his enemies battell, and with a ſquare battell of his Mamalukes charged the middle battell of the Turks. The battell was a great while moſt terrible, and the victorie doubtfull: for although the Turkes in number farre exceeded, yet were they not able to endure the armed and couragious Mamalukes, but were glad to giue ground; and quite diſor-
C dered by the breaking in of the Mamalukes, as men diſcouraged, began to looke about them which way they might flie: when by the commaundement of Sinan, the harquebuſiers, who with the firſt volley of their ſhot had repulſed the Arabians, wheeling about, encloſed all the enemies battell. By which meanes both men and horſe were a farre off ſlaine, with the multitude of the deadly ſhot: where true valour helped not them, ſo on euery ſide encloſed. For where any troupe of the Mamalukes preſſed forward vpon the Turkes, they quickly retired, and in all places of the battell as much as they could ſhunned to encounter their enemies with their horſemen, labouring onely to gaule them with ſhot. Gazelles ſeeing his horſes ſpent with extreame wearineſſe, and that he was not to expect any further helpe, his Arabians now beginning to fall from him; and alſo conſidering that many of his moſt valiant ſouldiers were either ſlaine or D wounded, and hauing alſo himſelfe receiued a great wound in his necke; he with the reſt of his armie made way through the middeſt of his enemies, and hauing loſt diuers of his enſignes, fled backe againe to CAIRE through the ſame ſandie deſerts whereby he came. In this battell was loſt the gouernour of ALEXANDRIA, and Orchamus gouernour of CAIRE (both men of great account amongſt the Mamalukes) and beſide them a great number of Arabians, with a thouſand or more of the Mamaluke horſemen. Neither got Sinan a ioyfull or vnbloudie victorie hauing loſt aboue two thouſand of his beſt horſemen, and amongſt them certaine commanders, men of great marke.

The battell betweene Sinan Baſſa and Gazelles.

The Turkes wearie of this battell, which had eudured from noone till night, and many of their horſes fainting vnder them, were not able to purſue their enemies, and therfore encamped
E themſelues in the ſame place where the battell was fought, neere vnto the fountaine. The day following they at leiſure gathered the ſpoile, and cutting off the heads of their enemies, which were eaſily knowne by their long and rough beards, faſtened them vp vpon the Date trees growing thereby, as well in witneſſe of their worthie labour, as by that ſtrange and horrible ſpectacle to feed the eyes of their fierce emperour, who was ſhorty after to paſſe that way, and ſo to manifeſt vnto him the victorie of that day.

In the meane time, they of GAZA vpon the riſing of the Sunne, perceiuing the Turks campe left emptie, as men not able longer to diſſemble their couert trecherie; and vainely ſuppoſing that Sinan Baſſa vpon ſome knowled of the comming of the Mamalukes, had for feare retired backe into places of more ſafetie, ſuddenly ſet vpon ſuch as were left in the campe, which were F for moſt part ſick and weake men (yet in number many) whom they moſt cruelly ſlew: & preſently after ſet vpon two thouſund of the Turkes horſemen, ſent from Selymus to Sinan, which by chance were come thither the ſame day, enquiring with great carefulneſſe what was become of the Baſſa and his armie; and ſpoiling them of their carriages, put them to flight. Who after that diſcomfiture, ſuppoſing the Baſſa (whom they had thought to haue found at GAZA, tarrying for the comming of Selymus) by ſome miſhap or policie of the enemie to haue bin loſt with all his armie, and therefore fearefully retiring, were vpon the way miſerably ſlaine by the Ara- G bians: neither had any one of them eſcaped, if they had not met with Iuleb the gouernour of ACHAIA at the citie of RAMA: for he was alſo ſent from Selymus to Sinan Baſſa with a ſtrong companie of Græcian horſemen, by whoſe comming the furie of the Arabians was well repreſ-ſed. Yet theſe pilfering people ſtill calling forth to the prey more & more of their leaders which dwelt in the mountaines adioyning, and being growne to a great armie, ouertooke the Turkes at a village called CARASBARA, where they enforced them to fight in a place of great diſaduan-tage. For the Arabians hauing before taken certain ſtraits, which cloſed in the paſſage at the further end of a large valley, ſhewed themſelues at once, before, behind, and on both ſides of the Turkes: their weapons were bow and arrowes and long ſpeares armed at both ends, which they nimbly handled, after the manner of the Moores. Theſe weapons they moſt skilfully vſed H vpon their ſwift horſes, and both in their charge and retreat wounded their enemies deadly. So that the Turkes in number few, and for their horſemens ſtaues inferiour to their enemies, durſt not offer to charge them; but keeping cloſe together, hardly defended themſelues, ſtill making way as they might: and had vndoubtedly beene brought into extreame danger to haue beene vtterly loſt, had not Iuleb with foure peeces of artillerie which he brought with him for his defence, driuen them which kept the ſtraits from their high places, and ſo opening the way, with all ſpeed brought thorow his men: which ſtraits once paſſed, and comming into the open fields, he with more ſafetie marched forward, skirmiſhing a farre off with the enemie with his archers and harquebuſiers, and diſcharging his fieldpeeces where he ſaw the greateſt and thickeſt troups of thoſe wild people. I

On the other part, the Arabians diſperſedly houering about them in troupes, were ſtill in the taile of the armie, and ſuch as were wounded or weake and could not follow the reſt, they ſlew; and ſought by all meanes to hinder their iourney, not ſuffering them (circumuented with ſo many dangers) either to refreſh themſelues, or to take any reſt. This was vnto the Turks a moſt diſ-mall day, for many of them tormented with thirſt, and weakened with wounds and extreame labour, gaue vp the goſt; and now no helpe remained in this deſperate eſtate, being ſtill beſet and hardly laied to with the multitude of thoſe fierce and deſperat enemies: when ſuddainely a great number of other Turks came to them in the mid way vnlooked for, being now in deſpaire and euen at the laſt caſt. For Selymus hauing left the Imbrahor-Baſſa with a ſtrong armie vpon the borders of PERSIA, for the defence of SYRIA and ASIA, and hauing ſent for new ſup- K plies of ſouldiers to CONSTANTINOPLE, which ſhould with a great fleet be tranſported into SYRIA, had now remoued from DAMASCO: and the better to prouide for victuals and forrage, which began now to grow ſcant in that waſted countrey, euery day ſent before great troupes and companies of his armie, as it were at certaine appointed times.

Selymus doubting Sinan Baſſa to haue beene, loſt, becommeth melancholie.

So Iuleb deliuered of the preſent danger by the comming in of theſe freſh ſouldiers, met with Selymus the next day, and in order told him all that had happened vnto him and his firſt troups at GAZA and RAMA, and all the way after: and alſo what they ſuppoſed by coniectures to haue chanced to Sinan Baſſa with his armie, for the manifold wyles of ſo dangerous enemies.
With which newes Selymus became exceeding melancholie: and thereupon thought it not L good to goe any further, before he perfectly knew how all ſtood with Sinan, in whoſe fortune he had repoſed all the hope of his good ſucceſſe in that ſo great an enterpriſe. But whileſt he was in this dumpe, ſuddenly came the Syrian ſpies, who declaring vnto him all that Sinan Baſſa had done, conuerted that melancholie paſſion into no leſſe ioy and gladneſſe: for he ſaw that by that victorie, ÆGYPT was laid open vnto him, and his deſires as good as halfe accompliſhed in leſſe time than euer he expected.

Newes of Sinans victorie comforteth Selymus.

The next day after, he remoued with his armie to RAMA, and by the way as he went (to the terrour of others) burnt the dwellings together with the wiues and children of thoſe Arabians, who but a little before had done ſo much harme to his men in their paſſage. And from thence ſending before his footmen to Sinan Baſſa at GAZA, he himſelfe with his horſemen turned out M of the way vpon the left hand to HIERVSALEM, to viſit that moſt ancient and famous citie, ſo much renowned both for the antiquitie thereof, and the fame of the religion of the Iewes. That vnpeopled and deſolate citie lay then defaced with the hugie ruines of the old ſacred and ſtately buildings; not inhabited by the Iewes, the ancient inhabitants thereof (who for their inexpiable guilt, as men exiled out of the world, haue neither country or reſting place) but for moſt part by a few

A a few poore Christians, who to the great shame and scorne of the Christian name, paied yearely a wonderfull tribute vnto the Sultan of ÆGYPT for the possession of the sacred sepulchre: when as the Christian princes flourishing at that time with glorie, power and wealth, could not by any motiue of immortall glorie or fame, be incited to reuenge so great an iniury; but deeming it (as should seeme) better agreeing with their state, to spend their time in idle vanities or mortall warre one against an other, than in the quarrell of the most true and Christian religion.

Selymus hauing reuerently worshipped the auncient monuments of the old prophets, and done especiall sacrifice vnto his great prophet Mahomet; gaue vnto the Christian priests keepers of the place (as vnto good and deuout men) money to maintaine them for six moneths: and
B staying at HIERVSALEM but one night, marched in foure daies to the rest of his army at GAZA. Where by the way, he had continuall skirmishes both day and night with the Arabians: for they according to their wonted manner, were desperatly at hand in euerie place; and where the straightnesse of the waies enforced the Turks to extenuat their rankes, there would they be readie to skirmish with them, and suddenly vnlooked for come to handie blowes: and when they came into the vallies, they tumbled downe the mountaines vpon them great stones which they had for that purpose before prouided. At which time the Turkes harquebusiers in whom they had greatest confidence, serued them to little purpose: for the weather was so tempestuous and extreame moist with continuall raine, that the pouder in their flaskes became wet and vnseruiceable, and hardly could they keepe fire in their matches. Yet by the valiantnesse of the Ianizaries
C the matter was so vsed, that neere vnto the person of the emperour no great harme was done by those naked robbers: for climbing vp the hils with pikes in their hands, they driue them from their standings, and enforced them to abandon the straights and high places.

But Sinan Bassa who after his victorie returning to GAZA, had put to death the authors of the late reuolt, confiscated their goods, and exacted of the people in generall a great sum of money, as the iust punishment of their false treacherie: hearing now of the comming of Selymus, went to meet him with his victorious souldiers, furnished with the spoiles of their enemies. Whom Selymus most honourably receiued, and gaue generally to the captaines, and particularly to the most valiant of the common souldiers, garments of silke, with a great sum of money in reward of their good seruice. 1517 Sinan Bassa meeteth to meet Selymus and commeth to Gaza.

D After that, he staied but foure daies at GAZA, for that he thought it not good to giue any long time of breathing vnto his discouraged enemies, now twise ouerthrowne, or to suffer the new Sultan (not yet well setled in his kingdome) to grow stronger by new preparations & supplies raised in the most populous and plentifull countrie of ÆGYPT. Which to let, although it required great hast in setting forward, and serued as spurs vnto him naturally hasting to glorie and renowne; yet was his armie to be refreshed after so long and painfull trauell, and great prouision to be made for the carriage of water vpon camels all the way through the drie solitarie and sandie deserts. For betweene GAZA and CAIRE lie vast vnpeopled and barren sands, which moued by the wind, rise vp in billowes in manner of a wrought sea so troublesome, that oftentimes it is not possible to see for dust: & the light sands in many places gauled deepe with E the wind, wonderfully troubleth the wearie passengers. But such a sudden calme ensued the great raine which fel but a few daies before, that Selymus vnto his great good fortune wanted nothing that he could wish, for the happie conducting of his armie: for the ayre was become so calme, that there was no blast of wind to raise the sand to trouble their sight; and withall such plentie of water was found almost in euerie place by reason of the aboundant raine, which being not yet sunke farre into the sand, afforded them water in such plentie if they digged but two foot deepe, that the souldiers commonly thought it needlesse to carrie any bottle of water for feare of thirst. Yet for all that, the wild Arabians failed not in all that passage, on euerie side to houer about the Turks armie (as haukes ouer their pray) and suffered none of them to straggle out of order, or stay behind the armie, but they were straightway snatcht vp and slaine. Against whom Selymus
F prouided an easie remedie, by placing his field pieces in diuers parts of his armie, which by the direction of the leaders (as euerie man happened to be neerest vnto the danger) were forthwith discharged vpon the roaming enemie. And in the reareward of his armie were placed strong companies of harquebusiers, for defence of the weake and feeble soldiors, who could but softly follow the armie, and were therefore most subiect to danger.

By this meanes Selymus with some small losse receiued from the Arabians, in eight daies

all his armie, and therefore fearefully retiring, were vpon the way miſerably ſlaine by the Arabians: neither had any one of them eſcaped, if they had not met with Iuleb the gouernour of ACHAIA at the citie of RAMA: for he was alſo ſent from Selymus to Sinan Baſſa with a ſtrong companie of Græcian horſemen, by whoſe comming the furie of the Arabians was well repreſſed. march drew neere to CAIRE, Sinan Bassa going before him, who with his Europeian souldiers G still kept one daies iourney before. There is a village about sixe miles distant from the citie of CAIRE called MATHAREA, famous for the plentie of most excellent baulme: which liquor of all others most fragrant and soueraign, distilled out of low trees there planted, whose vttermost rind the people cut with yuorie kniues to giue the liquor passage: which baulme, for the notable vertues thereof, being not elsewhere to be had, mens diseases and wanton desires haue made of a wonderfull price. Into that place neere vnto a village called RHODANIA, had Tomombeius conuaied all his new and old prouision of artillerie; and had drawne deepe ditches ouerthwart all the field, and crosse the high way, which he had closely couered ouer with weake hurldes and earth, as if it had beene firme ground. And he with his Mamalukes (in number about twelue H thousand) and a great multitude of Arabian horsemen lay in places conuenient, of purpose that when the Turkish battels should approach, they should first feele the force of his great ordinance before they came within the shot of their arrowes, and forthwith vpon great aduantage, with all his forces suddenly to set vpon them disordered and entrapped. All which things were so cunningly and so politikely dispatched and done, that there was none in the Sultans armie which doubted of the good successe of that day: and a great mischiefe had vndoubtedly befallen the Turkes, had not fortune which fauoured Selymus and frowned vpon Tomombeius (or more truely to say, the fatall period of that kingdome so requiring) by the false treacherie of a few, frustrated the great endeuours of the Mamalukes.

Tomombeius seeketh to entrap the Turkes.

There was in the Sultans armie amongst the souldiers of the court, foure Epirot Mamalukes, I who grieued to see Tomombeius contrarie to their desires, preferred vnto the kingdome by others of a contrarie faction: whether it were vpon a malicious disposition, or vpon hope of reward and better entertainement; or for that in so great a declination of their kingdome, they thought it good to seeke for new friends of more assurance, fled secretly to Sinan Bassa, as to a most famous captaine and one of their owne nation. For this great commaunder Sinan, Selymus his right hand, was borne in a poore countrey village of EPIRVS, in the mountaine countrey of AMBRACIA, whom a wonderfull mischance preferred to that height of credit and wealth: for it is reported, that a sow kept in the house wherein he was born, bit off his genitories, being then but a child, as he lay by chance sleeping in the shadow; and being made of greater esteeme by that mishap, was by them which tooke vp delicat minions for the Turkish emperour, brought K to CONSTANTINOPLE, and presented to the great emperour Mahomet, Selymus his grandfather: where fortune by the fatall direction of his good hap, aduanced him to his appointed honours, whom she had long before dismembred. By these fugitiue Mamalukes, Selymus and Sinan were instructed of all the deuises of the enemie, and especially what stratagems Tomombeius had with great cunning and policie deuised: whereinto they must needs fall, if they should go directly on, and not forsake the hie way. Wherfore guided by the same fugitiues, they fetch a great compasse on the left hand, and by an vnused way, before it was day hauing escaped the front of their enemies campe, with all the dangers prepared for them; they came and shewed themselues at their backs in order of battell, with their great artillerie readie bent, because they were desirous without de ay to ioyne battell.

Tomombeius now too late perceiuing that his plot was discouered by the treason of some of his owne people, although he was therewith aboue measure grieued; for that all which he had with so great industrie and the labour of so many men brought to passe, was through spitefull fortune made frustrat, and in a moment brought to nought: yet for all that (as he was a man of an inuincible courage) presently entred into his wonted and deepe deuises, and calling vnto him his chiefe commaunders, quickly told them what he would haue done. Now in this short moment of time, he was to doe many things at once; the signall was to be giuen for the souldiers to mount their horses, and to make themselues readie; the order of his campe was to bee changed; his battell to be ordered; his souldiers to be encouraged; and all his great ordinance, as the case required, quite contrarie way to be turned: all which things, as they could but hardly and troublesomely by one commaunder be directed, so were they hastily and disorderly at once done by many. But aboue all other things, the great concourse of people for turning and remouing the great artillerie most troubled the well ordering of the rest: for many of them were hugie yron pieces of great waigh, made fast in stocks of wood, with rings and yron claspes, after the old and rude manner of ship ordinance; which for their exceeding & ponderous waight,

The comming of Selymus vnexpected way, maketh great confusion in Tomombeius campe.

could

A could not be out of their places remoued, but by the ſtrength of many horſes, and the great labour of men, with leauers and roules put vnder them: and ſuch as were mounted vpon carriages when they were drawne through all parts of the campe, with the great clamor of the diſordered and haſtie people, ſome drawing, ſome thruſting forward the ſame, with their tumultuous ſtirre and doings, wonderfully troubled the other ſouldiers as they were mounting to horſe and repairing toward their enſignes. But two things maruellouſly helped theſe difficulties, the ſoldiers cheerefulneſſe, and conſtancie; which was ſuch as paſſeth credit: For they did not vpon any apprehenſion of feare faile either in hope or courage, as oftentimes it happeneth in ſuddaine accidents, wherein euen the old approued ſouldiers doe many times faile of their wonted valor.

B And although they were twice ouercome in battell, yet ſtill they were of greater ſpirit and confidence, as men deſtitute neither of courage or skill, but onely of fortune.

Wherefore Tomombeius hauing with much adoe ordered this battell, and his ſouldiers with great cheerefulneſſe deſiring the ſignall to be giuen, commaunded all the multitude of his Arabians to compaſſe in the wings of the enemies battell behind, and ſo to skirmiſh with them: that ſo (if it were poſſible) the Turkes horſemen might with the danger of the doubtfull fight with ſuch an vncertaine enemie, be diſordered before he ſet forward to charge them with his troups: and withall commaunded his great ordinance (which was now turned vpon the enemie) to be preſently diſcharged. So did the Turks likewiſe, diſcharging at once from a conuenient diſtance both their greater & ſmaller ordinance, and ſpeedily recharging them, brought them within an

C arrow ſhot; ſo that for a good ſpace they lay beating the one the other on both ſides with their great artillerie onely: in which manner of fight the Ægyptian canoniers were almoſt all ſlaine, and many of their fieldpieces broken by force of the enemies ſhot. For Selymus had in his camp many excellent and skilfull canoniers, whom he had with great entertainement allured out of ITALIE and GERMANIE: and eſpecially of thoſe refuce Iewes, which by the zeale of king Ferdinand being driuen out of SPAINE, afterwards to the ſhame of the Chriſtians, diſperſed thoſe rare and deadly deuices through the Eaſt. The cheefe of theſe canoniers was one Iacobus è Regio Lepidi, a cunning enginer, who but a little before ouercome by the Turks rewards, abjuring the Chriſtian religion, reuolted vnto the Mahometane ſuperſtition.

Chriſtian canoniers ſerue the Turkes againſt the Egyptians.

But after that the Mamalukes had brought the matter to battell on both ſides, they gaue out a

D moſt hideous and dreadfull crie, and with exceeding furie aſſailed the Turkes in three places: for Selymus ſtill keeping his wonted order, approched his enemies with his battell in forme of an halfe Moone. Muſtapha Baſſa had the leading of the Aſian horſemen in the right wing: and Ionuſes Baſſa of the Europeians in the left: he himſelfe ſtood in the maine battell with the ſquadron of his truſtie Ianizaries, and great ſtore of artillerie: but Sinan the Eunuch Baſſa, generall of the field, led after him a great number of moſt valiant horſemen, drawne out of euery troupe to be readie againſt all the vncertaine euents that might happen in the battell; vnto whom he ioyned fiue hundred harquebuſiers, Ienizaries, men of wonderfull courage and actiuitie, ſelected out of Selymus his owne ſquadron, to relieue ſuch part of the armie as ſhould chance to be moſt preſſed by the enemie.

The order of Selymus his armie. Sinan Baſſa Generall of the field.

E So almoſt at one time, whileſt Tomombeius ſtood in the maine battell againſt Selymus, and the wings of the Mamalukes with equall battell encountred the wings of the Turkes, and the Arabians alſo valiantly charging them in the rereward as they had in charge, foure ſharp battels were at once made in diuers places. It is reported by ſome that were preſent in that battell, that what for the clamour and crie of ſouldiers, what for the noiſe of drums and trumpets and ſuch like inſtruments of warre, what for the thundering of ordinance, clattering of armour, and riſing of the duſt, all mens minds were ſo confounded and abaſhed, that running on headlong as men furious and deſperat, when neither their ſpeeches could be heard, their tokens knowne, their enſignes ſeene, or captains vnderſtood, miſtaking one another in that hurly burly, they ſlew many of their friends in ſteed of their enemies: for neuer battels met together with greater hatred, nei-

F ther did euer two great kings with leſſe care of their perſons and ſafetie more reſolutely or deſperatly make ſhew of their ſtrength and courage. For both of them with like danger both of themſelues and of their armies, ſeeing plainly that they had put both their liues and kingdomes to the hazard of a battell, promiſed vnto themſelues no other hope of ſaftie, but what they ſhould obtaine by victorie. Gazelles deſirous both of honour and of reuenge, to requite the Europeian horſemen with like ſlaughter as he had before receiued from them not far from GAZA, with

with wonderfull furie aſſailed Ionuſes Baſſa, and at the firſt encounter brake his firſt rankes, and ouerthrew certaine of his guidons: at which time the Arabians preſſing couragiouſly in at their backes, enforced thoſe victorious troupes, which in all battels had hitherto carried away the priſe (the very flower of THRACIA, THESSALIA, EPYRVS, MACEDONIA, and GRÆCIA) to flie and ſhew their backes, which neuer enemie had before that time ſeene. At which time Sinan Baſſa carefully attending euery accident, came ſpeedily in with his moſt valiant troupes of freſh men vpon the ſide of the enemie, and reſtored againe the battell, now declining and foulely diſordered. But whiles Sinan, who in this his laſt worthie labour had interrupted the manifeſt victorie of Gazelles, was with an inuincible courage valiantly fighting in the head of his battell, he was by the comming in of the courageous captain Bidon with his Mamalukes, ouercharged and ſlaine. His moſt valiant followers alſo labouring to reſcue and carry away his dead bodie, were by Gazelles vnfolding his troupes (that ſtanding thin, they might at more libertie vſe their ſwords, in which manner of fight the Mamalukes far excelled the Turks) for moſt part ſlaine, and the reſt put to flight: and that choſen companie of fiue hundered of the moſt valiant Ianizaries, now deſtitute of their horſemen, when they had moſt couragiouſly done what was poſſible for men to doe, being compaſſed round with the Mamaluke horſemen, were all in a trice cut in peeces and troden vnderfoot. Thus reſteth this Eunuch Baſſa in the bed of fame, who liuing, had the leading of this moſt warlike emperour Selymus, his greateſt armies in his moſt dangerous warres.

Sinan Baſſa with moſt of his followers ſlaine by Bidon.

Muſtapha in the other wing of the Turkes battell comming on courageouſly with his Aſian horſemen, did ſore preſſe the left wing of the Ægyptians (whereof Helymis the Diadare, and Giapal, two valiant captaines had the leading) who but a little before had receiued great harme by the great ordinance which was diſcharged out of the middeſt of Selymus his battell ouerthwart the field: Which Muſtapha perceiuing, and deſiring to blot out the old infamie he had before receiued, did fiercely preſſe vpon them, ſo diſordered, and with his whole troupes ouerthrew their broken rankes; and gliſtering in his bright armour, with a loud voice encouraged his Aſian ſouldiers, exhorting them that day with valiant proweſſe or honourable death, to recouer their ancient honour of late loſt in the fields of ALEPPO,

At the ſame time alſo Tomombeius breaking through the middle battell of the Turkes horſemen, was entred into the ſquadron of the footmen, with his crooked ſcimitar giuing many a deadly wound, himſelfe being a valiant big made man, and of great ſtrength. The Arabians had alſo in a ring encloſed the vttermoſt parts of the Turks armie, & in many places enforced them to turne their battell vpon them, being ſore charged with a doubtfull fight both before and behind: when Selymus ſet forward with his battell of footmen, and his ſquadron of Ianizaries, his laſt and moſt aſſured refuge in that his hard diſtreſſe, whoſe inuincible force, neither the courageous barbed horſes, nor their victorious riders were able to abide: for part of them with their harquebuſiers, and the reſt with their pikes, had ſo ſtrongly ſet the front of their battell, that nothing was able to ſtand whereſoeuer that firme battell, linked together as if it had been but one whole entire bodie, ſwayed. Yet was this cruell battell continued with diuers fortune on both ſides, from foure of the clocke vntill the going downe of the Sunne; neither was there any part of their armies, which had not with diuers ſucceſſe and change of fortune, endured the furie of that battell: for both the victors and the vanquiſhed being enraged with an implacable hatred one againſt another, fought deſperately as men prodigall of their liues: The Mamalukes diſdaining to haue the victory wrong out of their hands by them whom they had in ſo many places diſcomfited, and the Turkes taking it in no leſſe ſcorne, that they, whom but of late they had ouercome and vanquiſhed in two great battels, ſhould now the third time make ſo ſtrong reſiſtance. So that on both ſides their fainting hands and bodies both wearied and weakened with wounds, ſupported only with anger and obſtinacie of mind, ſeemed yet ſufficient to haue maintained that bloudie battell vntill the next day, if the darkeneſſe of the night now comming on, had not made an end of that dayes ſlaughter.

Tomombeius vndoubtedly vanquiſhed, and fearing to be vtterly ouerthrown, firſt cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, that his Mamalukes which were indeed not able to withſtand the Ianizaries, might not ſeeme to be put to flight, but rather as men commaunded, to retire. Which hee thought did concerne much both for the encouraging of his ſouldiers, and for the keeping of his own credit and eſtimation with his ſubiects. For now the ſelfeſame fortune which had deceiued his

A his firſt hopes, ſeemed vnto him (as it fareth with men in diſtreſſe, yet ſtill hoping for better) to promiſe him more proſperous ſucceſſe, if he were not diſcouraged: but reſeruing ſuch remainders of his forces as were left, he ſhould againe couragiouſly renew the war.

The battel thus broken off by the approch of the night, the Turkes as victors enioying the tents and great artillerie of their enemies, purſued the Mamalukes vntill midnight, who held on their way to CAIRE, in maner as if they had fled. This great battel was fought vpon a Thurſday the foure and twentieth day of Ianuarie, in the yere 1517. The Diadare was taken in the flight mortally wounded, and with him the valiant captain Bidon, hauing in the battell one of his legs broken in the knee with a faulſhion ſhot, wherwith his horſe was alſo ſlaine vnder him. Selymus B commanded them both the next day to be ſlain, either for that their wounds were ſuppoſed to be incurable, or els for that it was his pleaſure, with the death of thoſe two honourable perſonages to appeaſe the angrie ghoſt of Sinan Baſſa, whoſe death he wonderfully lamented.

Selymus cauſeth the Diadare and the valiant captaine Bidon to be ſlaine.

The Turkes although they ſtill preuailed, yet was their armie greatly impaired euen in their proſperous ſucceſſ and fortunat battels: the fourth part of their armie was conſumed with ſickneſſe and the ſword, and that daies labour had tyred a great number of their horſes, beſide the long iourney they had before indured. For which cauſes Selymus was inforced to ſlacke ſomewhat of his accuſtomed haſt: for as yet he had no experience of the diſpoſition of the Ægyptians which dwelt at CAIRE; neither could he vnderſtand by any certaine report, where Tomombeius ſtaied, or vpon what reſolution he reſted. Which things not throughly known, he thought C it not good to commit himſelfe and his armie into that moſt populous and ſpacious citie: but ſtaying foure daies at the village of MATHAREA and RHODANIA, carefully prouided for his wounded ſouldiors, and cauſed the bodies of ſuch as were ſlaine to be buried; but the dead carkaſſes of his enemies he left to the birds of the aire and beaſts of the field. And afterward remouing his campe thence, that he might more commodiouſly water, he came into the plaines between old CAIRE and BVLACH.

In the meane while Tomombeius nothing diſcouraged with ſo many miſhaps, gathering together the Mamalukes from all places, encamped his armie commodiouſly betweene the new citie of CAIRE and the riuer Nilus, he alſo armed eight thouſand Æthyopian ſlaues (which kind of men he had not before vſed, for the remembrance of their old rebellion,) beſide that he ope- D ning the old armourie, put armes into the hands of Mamalukes ſonnes, and Moores (his vaſſals) into the hands of the Iewes and Arabians alſo, and couragiouſly prepared for a greater and more mortall war than before. But for as much as there were many difficulties in the managing thereof, hauing almoſt loſt all his great artillerie, with many of his moſt valiant horſemen ſlaine in the former battels; he in his troubled mind did ſo caſt the doubtfull hopes of his laſt deuice, which cruell neceſſitie wrong from him, that for as much as he had by manly force nothing preuailed in open field, he would now altogether vſe policie: as he which of late hauing vnfortunately made proofe of his ſtrength, his forces yet all whole, thought it not good againe to aduenture the fortune of a battell: neither was he in hope if he ſhould ſo do, to be able with his ſmall power and deſperate ſupplies to protract the war vntill the heat of Summer, as he de- E ſired. Wherefore he reſolued by night to aſſaile the Turkes campe, and if poſſibly he could, to ſet it on fire. For which his deuice he ſeemed to haue two reaſons: whereof the one conſiſted in the ſpeedie execution, that he might deſperatly attempt to do ſome notable exploit in the night before the enemie ſhould perceiue the weakeneſſe of his power, which was not great, and ſcambled vp vpon the ſuddain; as alſo before he himſelfe ſhould grow into contempt with the naturall Ægyptians; who deſiring nothing more than to caſt off the ſeruile yoke of the Mamaluke gouernment, with wauering minds expected but ſome fit occaſion to rebel: the other was, that by the benefit of the night he might auoid the danger of the great ordinance; which in ſuddain accidents, and eſpecially in the darkneſſe of the night, ſerueth to little or no purpoſe; in which kind of ſtrength he had before to his great loſſe learned, that his enemies were far too F good for him. But theſe his reaſonable policies, when all things were in readineſſe to haue put the ſame in execution, were in like maner as the firſt ouerthrown by the treaſon of ſuch as ſecretly reuolted from him to the enemie.

The purpoſe of Tomombeius diſcouered to Selymus.

For Selymus vnderſtanding the whole plot, by certaine Mamalukes (which hauing the kings euill fortune in contempt, as it commonly falleth out with men in miſerie, daily forſooke him) commanded his armie to be alwaies in readineſſe, and making great fires in diuers places of his campe, kept moſt carefull and vigilant watch. By which his diligence it came fitly to paſſe, that G the night following Tomombeius approching his campe, was repulſed, with no ſmall loſſe of his firſt troups which vnaduiſedly were gone on too far: and had no doubt that night thereby receiued his laſt ouerthrow, but that he wiſely miſdoubting the vnwonted light of the fires ſhining in all parts of the campe, in time called backe his haſting troups, which were themſelues with more haſt than good ſpeed marching into the very mouth of the Turks great artillerie, bent of purpoſe vpon them.

Tomombeius diſappointed of his purpoſe, by perſuaſion of his chieftains tretired to CAIRE: for the Mamalukes ſtill put to the worſe in plaine field, thought it beſt to proceed in another manner; perſuading him, with the whole ſtrength of his armie to man all the conuenient places of that great citie, otherwiſe expoſed to the enemies pleaſure, and ſo to keepe the Turkes from H entring. For they as men brought to this extremitie, that they muſt now fight for their dwellings, liues, wiues, and children: thought it more honourable and better agreeing with their ancient glorie, ſo to do in their ſight, and in the entrance of their houſes, than elſewhere farther off. Wherefore the Mamalukes comming home to CAIRE, furniſhed all their families and flat roofs of their houſes with all manner of weapons: euerie one of them now humbly requeſting the Ægyptians, their neighbours, to take vp armes againſt the Turkes their ancient and mortal enemies, and not to ſuffer themſelues to be cowardly ſlain, their goods ſpoiled, and their wiues and children carried away into moſt miſerable captiuitie; foraſmuch as the mercileſſe and greedie enemie, if he ſhould once get the victorie, would no whit ſpare them, although they ſhould as neuters ſtand looking on, and helpe neither partie: for victorie (as they ſaid) alwaies full of inſo- I lent pride, would know no friend but ſuch as with reſolute hand did their vttermoſt deuoire in time of danger, for the obtaining thereof.

The Ægytians diuerſly affected towards the Mamalukes.

There were many of the wealthieſt of the Ægyptians, who as they thought the change of the ſtate would bee hurtfull to their trades and wealth, ſo were they readie in all they could to helpe the Mamalukes their old lords: ſo on the other ſide there were many of the middle ſort of the citizens, and a far greater multitude of the baſeſt ſort of the vulgar people, who hauing little or nothing to loſe, liued in hope now to make a gaine of other mens loſſes; and withall, remembring what miſerie & ſlauerie they had endured about the ſpace of three hundred yeres, vnder the proud gouernment of the Mamalukes, kept themſelues cloſe in their houſes, expecting K
the laſt euent of wars; and ſecretly reioicing in their hearts, that the time was come (God ſo appointing) wherein their outragious and cruell maſters ſhould be iuſtly and worthely puniſhed for their oppreſſion and hard dealing; and that which gladded them the more, that the reuenge ſhould be taken by the hazard of other mens liues, with which wiſhed ſpectacle they well hoped ſhortly to fiill their deſirous eies.

Tomombeius with much labour and greater care, fortified all the gates and entrances of the citie, appointed vnto euerie ſtreet a particular captaine, in euery publicke place encouraged the people, omitting nothing that could poſſibly be done or deuiſed; and that which in ſo great a calamitie and danger was of all other things the hardeſt, with cheerfull countenance and vndaunted courage, made ſhew of greateſt hope. The Mamalukes alſo, beſide the neceſſitie (which L in caſes of extremitie is of power to encourage and make deſperat the faint hearted coward) prouoked with emulation, ſtraue amongſt themſelues who ſhould beſt performe all the dueties of worthie captaines and ſouldiors: for euerie one of them according to his conceit and deuiſe, cauſed great ditches, or great timber logs to be caſt ouerthwart the ſtreets; ſome in couert trenches ſet vp ſharpe ſtakes, whereupon the enemie falling vnawares might be gaged; otherſome according to their ſtore, furniſhed the windowes and fronts of their houſes in the greateſt and moſt open ſtreets, with harquebuſiers: all which things with many mo were done with ſuch celeritie, that none of the beſt or moſt honourable of the Mamalukes refuſed to handle a ſpade or a mattocke, or to put his hand to any other baſe labour; ſo that nothing could be ſooner deuiſed, but it was forthwith performed.

The deſcription of the great citie of Caire.

This great and ancient citie of CAIRE was not compaſſed with any wals, yet were there diuers gates and entrances which led into it: wherof one broad ſtraight ſtreet came directly from the Eaſt gate vnto the caſtle and middle of the citie; the reſt were ſo narrow and crooked, that by them no great artillerie could poſſibly be brought, or ſouldiors enter without great danger. Into this place eſpecially, had Tomombeius conuaied his chiefeſt ſtrength: for that he knew his enemies

A enemies muſt of neceſſitie come in that way for the largeneſſe of the ſtreets; the other parts of the citie he kept with leſſe garriſons. But the innermoſt part where the caſtle ſtood, was kept with a verie great and ſtrong garriſon of moſt valiant ſoldiors: that whither ſoeuer the clamor of the enemie or danger of the battell ſhould call, they might ſpeedily from thence come with reliefe. For why, that citie of all others the greateſt, could not with ſo ſmall power as Tomombeius then had, be in euery place and entrance ſufficiently defended: for within the circuit of MEMPHIS (now called CAIRE) are contained three great cities, which ioined one to another with ſtragling bridges, make one citie; whereof the greateſt and moſt populous, is at this day called New CAIRE. It lyeth in length ſix miles, alongſt the riuer Nilus, from which it is equally diſtant a mile: the breadth thereof, exceedeth not a mile and a quarter. In the middeſt thereof
B is a caſtle ſtanding vpon a little riſing ground, ſomewhat higher than the reſt of the citie; more notable for the greatneſſe and beautie thereof, than for the manner of the fortification: for in it were many princely gardens, a faire ſtreet with many large galleries, diuers faire tilt-yards and courts, with ſtately chambers opening euerie way: the vtter part thereof was garniſhed round about with towers, fortreſſes, and beautifull battlements; from whence all parts of the citie, the riuer Nilus running by, and the high Pyramides were moſt pleaſantly to be ſeene. Not far from this princely pallace, is a lake made by the hand of man, the water wherein deriued from the riuer Nilus, is on euery ſide incloſed with moſt ſtately buildings: and is a place of wonderfull pleaſure, when as a man ſtanding at a window may take both fiſh and foule, whereof there is in the lake great ſtore. Another lake there is far greater and fairer than this, in forme of a triangle,
C in the vttermoſt part of this new citie of CAIRE toward BVLACH: it is filled at the riſing of Nylus by a great ſluce made of ſtone with yron floudgates; and being ioyned to the great riuer by a broad channel, is able to beare ſmall boats and barges: wherin gentlemen for their diſport vſed to ſolace themſelues both by day and night in courting their miſtreſſes. The houſes were all gallantly built afront all about the lake, with porches garniſhed with open galleries, and paued with ſmooth marble euen to the brim of the lake: there the citizens in their more proſperous times vſed to row vp and down in boats, and with pleaſant muſicke to delight the liſtening eares of the hearers. On the Eaſt ſide of this lake ſtood a moſt ſumptuous and ſtately pallace, the late worke of queene Dultibe wife of the great Sultan Caitbeius, for manner of the building and inward beautie far exceeding the other proud buildings of this pleaſant place: for the wals gli-
D ſtered with red marble, and pargeting of diuers colours, yea all the houſe was paued with checker and teſſeled worke; the windowes and gates were made of alablaſter, white marble, and much other ſpotted marble; the poſts and wickets of maſſie yuorie, checkered with gliſtering blacke ebonie; ſo curiouſly wrought in winding knots, as might eaſilier ſtay than ſatisfie the eies of the wondering beholder: neither was the furniture in it inferiour to the magnificence of the building, but ſuch as might fitly anſwere both a princes ſtate, and a womans quaint deſire. All which things ſhortly after (Selymus hauing obtained the victorie) carried to CONSTANTINOPLE; not ſparing the verie wals, but plucking them downe, ſo to take out the curious ſtones whole. Beſide the goodly buildings about that lake, in euerie place of New CAIRE was to E be ſeene the faire houſes of the chiefe Mamalukes; more commended for their commodiouſneſſe, than for the manner of their building. The reſt of the buildings of the citie was but low, repleniſhed with the common ſort of baſe people. There are yet extant in diuers places of the citie, three churches of the Chriſtians; whereof one is holden in greater reuerence than the reſt, for the fame of a low vault in the ground, where it is reported the virgin Mary flying the furie of Herod, to haue repoſed herſelfe with her child Chriſt Ieſus the Sauiour of the world: another dedicated to the virgin Barbara: and the third to S. George, which amongſt thoſe nations are of great fame. Vnto the citie of New CAIRE, the citie of BVLACHA is ioyned almoſt with continuall buildings. It is of an high and ſtately building, lying cloſe vnto the riuer Nilus, and was in Summer time frequented by the Mamalukes and other noble men, that they might at their pleaſure from their high places behold the inundation of that famous riuer: There land all the ſhips
F which come vp the riuer; yet the great meeting of the merchants is at New CAIRE. On the other ſide of the riuer ouer againſt BVLACH, are many cottages made of hurdles and leaues of date trees, the dwellings of poore fiſhermen and watermen. A little aboue BVLACH is old CAIRE, which is alſo ioyned vnto the new citie with continuall buildings; yet diſtant from it about two miles and an halfe, and ſtandeth alſo faſt by the riuer of Nilus. Ouer againſt it in the middest of the riuer is an Iſland, notable for the pleaſantneſſe of the gardens and banqueting houſes therin: In it is an ancient temple, famous for the loue of king Pharaos daughter, and the danger of Moſes (a moſt ancient hiſtorie, yet euery where there ſtill freſh in memorie.) But moſt part of the buildings of old CAIRE, are now grown into gardens and rude ruines. It is ſuppoſed by many probable coniectures, that there ſometime ſtood the ancient citie of MEMPHIS. Vpon the banke of the riuer, the late Sultan Campſon built a ſumptuous tower, ouertopping the caſtle in new CAIRE, to conuay water thither out of Nilus; which being by many wheeles and ingenious deuiſes forced into the top therof, and there receiued into great ceſterns, was from thence by pipes of ſtone and lead, conuaied into all places of the kings great pallace at new CAIRE. G

The pyramides of Ægypt.

About fiue miles diſtant from old CAIRE on AFRICKE ſide, ſtand the Pyramides, monuments of the barbarous Ægyptian kings vanitie; whoſe proud names and titles Time hath worne out of thoſe huge and wonderfull buildings, of purpoſe made for the vaine eterniſing of their fame and endleſſe wealth: ſo that of them it may now well be ſaid, H

Miramur perijſſe homines? monumenta fatiſcunt:
Interitus ſaxis nominibuſq; venit.

What wonder we that men do die? the ſtately tombes do weare:
The verie ſtones conſume to nought, with titles they did beare.

Within them are the ſupulchers of the old Ægytian kings, diuided into chappels, garniſhed with ſtone of great price curiouſly wrought. Yet are thoſe places loathſome of ſmell, and for darkneſſe thereof, dreadfull to behold: for as men go downe to come into them by a narrow way, almoſt ſwarued vp with rubbidge, their lights are oftentimes put out with the dampe of the earth, and ſwarmes of remiſe flying about their eares. Some hauing got to the tops of them report, that the watch tower of ALEXANDRIA, and the mouths of the riuer Nilus where it falleth into the ſea, is from thence well to be ſeene: and that for the great height of them, a man cannot ſhoot an arrow ſo high as the middeſt of the lower tower whereon the ſpire ſtandeth. Of theſe outragious buildings, are written many ſtrange and almoſt incredible things, as that an hundred thouſand men ſhould be occupied continually by the ſpace of twenty yeres, in building of one of them: during which time, the charges for roots, garlike and onions only, amounted to 1600 talents of ſiluer. Theſe wonderfull Pyramides only excepted, nothing is in the three cities more to be wondered at than the multitude of the people, who in number almoſt incredible go vp and downe euery ſtreet: but for moſt part ragged and torne, for that they which held any wealth, durſt not make any ſhew thereof for feare of the Mamalukes. The common people did then generally liue with mutton, hens, and riſe, whereof the countrie yeeldeth plentie: neither had they as yet the knowledge of the curious but vnwholeſome forced diſhes, and prouocations of gluttonie, which other nations had to their great coſt and hurt inuented. But again to our purpoſe. I K

Selymus encouraged his ſouldiers to the winning of Caire.

When Selymus vnderſtood aſſuredly that Tomombeius was retired into CAIRE, and that the Mamalukes hauing thither aſſembled all their ſtrength, were reſolued there to proue the vttermoſt of their fortune: he with his armie drew neerer vnto the citie, exhorting his ſouldiours to ſet down themſelues that day for euer to vanquiſh and ſubdue their enemies, whom they had ſo many times before ouerthrowne; and now a little to force themſelues for the gaining of the rewards due to their former labours and victories: which (as he ſaid) would be ſo many and ſo great, as they had not the full thereof before in their immoderat deſires imagined. Telling them moreouer, that there was but a few good ſouldiours left with the deſolat Sultan, who alreadie wounded and terrified, and notable longer to keepe the field, had made choice to end their daies in the ſight and armes of their wiues and children. Beſide that, he made them beleeue, that hee was voluntarily ſent for by the Ægyptians, deadly enemies vnto the verie name of the Mamalukes, whoſe vtter deſtruction they earneſtly expected: and had therefore promiſed him for the rooting vp of that wicked and cruell kind of men, to aſſaile them as accaſion ſerued out of their houſes, and ſo to further his victorie: yet neuertheleſſe he ſaid, That the accompliſhment of the whole matter, and to make a full conqueſt, conſiſted in the ſubduing of thoſe weake remainders of the vanquiſhed and ſcattered armie; for as much as they were not to bee accounted as men L M quite

A quite ouercome, which did yet liue in hope, with weapons in their hands, poſſeſſed of the chiefe citie and ſeat of their empire. Wherefore that they ſhould thinke, that in the fortune of that day reſted the good or bad eſtate and condition of all their liues, honours, and fortunes. Aſſuring them, that it would be a matter but of ſmall labour and trauell to bring it to a wiſhed end, if they would in that new kind of fight (as they had alwaies valiantly in other battels vnder his conduct) but reſolue with themſelues that they would ouercome.

This his ſpeech much enflamed the minds of his ſouldiors, but the hope of ſo great a pray much more: ſo that being in good order and readie, they expected but the ſigne of the aſſault. When Selmus entring by the gate called Baſuela, did at one inſtant thruſt in his horſemen at diuers places of the great citie; but his Ianizaries be brough in by the greateſt and largeſt ſtreet.

B At the firſt entrance of the citie, horſemen incountred with horſemen, and made a bloudie fight in the narrow ſtreets & lanes: but the footmen placing their culuerings & falcons before them, and ſuddenly diſcharging them where they ſaw the thickeſt troupes of their enemies, cleered the ſtreet directly before them. But when they came to the baricadoes and trenches, and were by force to remoue the timber logs and other like things lying croſſe the ſtreets, and ſo to paſſe the trenches, the Mamalukes on the other ſide valiantly withſtanding them; they fought with ſuch force and obſtinacie on both parts, that in the memorie of man was neuer a more fierce or cruel battell ſeene. For both the Mamalukes and the Turkes in that fight ſhewed the vttermoſt of their ſtrength and power; not ignorant that in that as in the laſt, they were to fight not for honour onely, but euen for their liues and empire: when as greateſt rewards, or els extreme miſe-

A moſt mortall battell fought in Caire.

C rie, were by dallying fortune on both ſides propounded both to the vanquiſhed and vanquiſher. At theſe baricadoes the Turks receiued great loſſe, as alſo at the trenches: for they vnaduiſedly running on, the hindermoſt ſtill bearing forward the formoſt, tumbled by heapes one vpon another into the couert trenches, and were there miſerably impailed vpon the ſharpe ſtakes, for that purpoſe before ſet vp by the Mamalukes. The women alſo and children, with manly courage threw downe ſtones and tiles, and ſuch other things from the tops of their houſes, and out at their windowes vpon the Turks: and they on the other ſide as they could eſpie them, fetcht them off from thoſe high places with their harquebuſies, or elſe violently brake into the houſes from whence they were aſſailed, & there fought with diuers ſucceſſe. But moſt part of the Ægiptians, diligently obſeruing the fortune both of the one and of the other (accounting them both

D for enemies) with diuers affection aſſailed ſometimes the Turks, and ſometime the Mamalukes, ſeeming ſtill notably to help that part whom they ſaw for the time to haue the better. Many cruell and moſt terrible incounters were at once made in diuers places of the citie: for as they croſſed from ſtreet to ſtreet, ſometime the one, and ſometime the other hapned vpon new troupes of enemies: and they which as victors purſued their enemies a front, were by others following them at the heeles, ſlaine downeright; ſo that in the victorie no man could aſſure himſelfe of ſafe. The lanes and ſtreets (a moſt horrible thing to behold) did ſo flow with the bloud of them which lay by heapes ſlaine, that the duſt which at the firſt riſe wonderfull thicke, was quite laid as with a plentifull ſhowre of raine: the ayre was darkened with the ſmoke of ſhot, and ſhowers of arrowes: and ſuch was the clamour of the people and ſouldiours, the clatte-

E ring of armour, and report of the artillerie, that the earth ſeemed to tremble, and the houſes to fall downe.

This dreadfull and doubtfull battell enured two whole daies & nights without intermiſſion: yet ſo, that the Mamalukes in number few, and vnable to endure ſo long labour and watching, giuing ground by little and little, and forſaking their firſt munitions, retired themſelues farther into the citie. The third day, beſet with the greateſt dangers that could be, as to loſe themſelues with all that they had (which commonly enforceth mens courages in their laſt attempts) they renewed the battell with ſuch reſolution, that they conſtrained the Turkes to retire a great way, and for haſt to leaue behind them certaine of their field pieces. With which repulſe it is reported, that Selymus diſpairing of victorie, commaunded to ſet fire vpon the houſes; moued thereunto with iuſt diſpleaſure againſt the Ægyptians, for that Ionuſes Baſſa, now his greateſt man of

A long and terrible battell.

F warre, had euen then before his face receiued a dangerous wound in his head, by a ſtone caſt out at a window.

Now were the houſes pittifully burning, and the Ægyptians weeping and wailing cried for mercie. The Turkes themſelues fought but faintly, expecting the ſound of the retreat: when newes was ſuddenly brought by many at once, that the enemies in the other ſide of the citie were, G by Muſtapha Baſſa enforced to retire, and afterward had betaken themſelues to flight, as to their laſt refuge. For Muſtapha by the ouerture of the Ægyptians and fugitiue Mamalukes, was directed to a faire broad ſtreet, where the Mamalukes had left their horſes readie ſadled & brideled; that if the worſt ſhould chaunce, they might thither retire, and taking horſe, ſpeed themſelues to ſuch places of refuge as they had before thought vpon. All theſe horſes, reſerued by the Mamalukes as their laſt refuge, Muſtapha tooke away, hauing before put to flight the garriſon which kept them, which was but weake, conſiſting for moſt part of horſeboies and muletours; as ſafe ynough in ſuch a place of the citie as was leaſt to be ſuſpected or feared.

This accident (as it oftentimes falleth out in great and vnexpected miſchances) did not a little daunt the courage of the Mamalukes: who now ſeeing themſelues hardly beſet, and that dread- H full battell by no other hope or helpe maintained, but onely by courage; being in their owne iudgement ouercome, betooke themſelues to flight. Moſt part of them haſting to the riuer of Nilus with Tomombeius (who in that battell had all in vaine proued the vttermoſt of his proweſſe and policie) being tranſported ouer the riuer in boats, fled into the countrie of SEGESTA: others of them hid themſelues in the houſes of the Ægyptians, and in the loathſome corners of the citie. A thouſand fiue hundred of the better ſort of the Mamalukes fled vnto the greateſt temple of their vaine prophet: where after they had a great while valiantly defended themſelues as out of a ſtrong caſtle, becauſe they would not yeeld themſelues but vpon honourable conditions, at laſt ouercome with thirſt, wearineſſe, and wounds, together with the furie of the great artillerie, they yeelded themſelues to the pleaſure of the conquerour: part of whom the furious ſouldiors ſlew in the porch of the ſame temple, and the reſt within a few daies after were ſent down the riuer to ALEXANDRIA, there to be afterwards murdered. I

Caire taken by Selymus.

Selymus hauing thus gained the victorie, forthwith ſent part of his armie to quench the fire then raging, and cauſed proclamation to be made through all the citie, That all the Mamalukes which would yeeld themſelues within twelue houres, ſhould be taken to mercie; but vnto ſuch as yeelded not within the appointed time, ſhould remaine no hope of life. Vnto the Ægyptians alſo that ſhould reueale the hidden Mamalukes, he propoſed rewards: but vnto ſuch as ſhould conceale them, he threatned to empaile them vpon ſtakes, and hauing ſold their wiues and children to burne their houſes: vpon which proclamation, many of the Mamalukes before crept into corners, came forth and yeelded themſelues, and were forthwith caſt into yrons. All which K were ſhortly after, contrarie to his promiſe, moſt diſhonorably murthered in priſon, becauſe (as it was giuen out) they ſought meanes to haue eſcaped. Many of the Ægyptians which would not breake the bonds of faith and fidelitie with the Mamalukes their old lords, being appeached by their malicious neighbours, moſt conſtantly died for their friends, for whoſe ſake they had vowed themſelues to death.

With this victorie the Turkes growing inſolent, ranſackt euery place of the citie, drew out the Mamalukes that had hid themſelues, and ſlew them, rifled the houſes of the Ægyptians, as wel friends as foes, and left nothing ſhut vp or in ſecret. And ſome there were, which at one time in the ſame houſes raged with couetouſneſſe, crueltie, and luſt: euery man fitting his owne hu- L mour, whereunto he was by nature or cuſtome inclined: for that in time and place of ſo great libertie, moſt men, but eſpecially the common ſouldior, flattereth himſelfe to the full, making conſcience of nothing, but meaſuring all thing according to his inſolent and diſordered appetite. The ſame day that Selymus tooke CAIRE, Gazelles (who but a little before by the commandement of Tomombeius was gone to THEBAIS, to aſſemble the Arabians and to entertaine new ſupplies) came to CAIRE; but finding all loſt, and ſeeing no poſſibilitie either by force or policie to preuaile, and therefore thinking it not good againe to proue the fortune of warre, which had ſo often with contrarie courſe fruſtrated the indeauours both of himſelfe and his partakers; he came to Selymus, vpon his faith before giuen for the ſafetie of himſelfe & his followers (which were three Arabian captaines, and a number of good horſemen) and being admitted to his pre- M ſence, in the middeſt of his greateſt captaines boldly ſpake vnto him as followeth.

Gazelles his ſpeech to Selymus.

If fortune, whom by thy great valour thou haſt woon to bee thy friend, had not enuyed our felicitie, thou ſhouldeſt not haue (moſt noble Selymus, at this time, after that all things haue giuen place vnto thy valour) matter whereby thou mighteſt excell others in worthineſſe of mind alſo. Whileſt

we

A we were in armes againſt thee for our liues and kingdome, our wealth and ſtate yet ſtanding whole, we alwaies as men proudly preſuming vpon their owne vaine ſtrength, made little account of thee or the name of the Turkes; yea, to ſay the truth, we hated thee as became enemies: But now that we haue to the vttermoſt of our power made proofe of thy force, and haue in all battels beene put to the worſe; admiring both thy wonderfull and diuine proweſſe, and moſt proſperous victories, not giuen thee without the prouidence of the immortall God, wee humbly come vnto thee by thy goodneſſe to better our hard and aduerſe fortune: that thou by ſparing and pardoning thy vanquiſhed and yeelding enemies (by which onely vertue men come neereſt vnto the gods) maieſt extend thy name and fame aboue the bounds of the reſt of thine immortall glorie. We haue faithfully ſerued Tomom-
B beius, ſo long as he held the ſtrength and maieſtie, yea but the name of a king, or liued in any countenance: but ſeeing he is (his deſtinie ſo requiring) driuen out of his country, and wandereth the deſarts, with vncertaine report whether he liue or not; we come vnto thee, rather as men of him forſaken, than ſuch as haue forſaken their prince; readie to ſhew vnto thee our loyaltie and valour in our better condition and ſtate: if we may by thy goodneſſe, changing our hard fortune, liue and ſerue vnder thy worthie conduct.

Selymus, for that he right well knew Gazelles both for his vertue and valour, wherewith valiant men win credit euen with their greateſt enemies) and alſo deſiring to ioyne in league and friendſhip with the Arabians (or rather Alarbes) whom he knew of all others to be moſt to be
C feared, receiued them all courteouſly: appointing vnto euery one of them an honourable penſion, and perſuading them to forget their old eſtate, willed them to looke for farre greater things of his bountie. Not long after, when as the Moores and wild Arabians, with certain Mamalukes that were fled to the citie of ACHASIA, made incurſions into the countrey about CAIRE, and oftentimes did cut off the Turkes which went any thing farre from the citie to ſeeke abroad for forrage, he ſent Gazelles with part of his armie to repreſſe them: who hauing quickly woon and ſackt ACHASIA, and ſlaine moſt part of thoſe aduenturers, to his own great praiſe, and the wonderfull contentation of Selymus, honourably returned in leſſe time than was expected.

In the meane time, Tomombeius in the countrey of SEGESTA (which is on the other ſide of Nilus towards CYRENAICA) miſerably beſet with ſo many miſcheefes, began to make head
D againe. There were come vnto him a ſtrong companie of Mamalukes from ALEXANDRIA, which he had by letters ſent for out of the garriſon of that citie, and many others had followed him in his flight from CAIRE. And there were not wanting many great men amongſt the Arabians and Moores (the inhabitants of that countrey) which promiſed him their helpe and furtherance. Beſide that, many of the Ægyptians, whoſe houſes and families were become a prey and bootie vnto the inſolent Turkes, promiſed him, That if he would by night come to CAIRE, they would raiſe ſuch a tumult in the citie, as ſhould eaſily worke the confuſion of the Turkes; for as much as they all hauing endured moſt horrible indignities and villanies, could no longer abide thoſe moſt inſolent men to rage and raine ouer them. They ſent him word alſo, that the Turks huge armie was now brought to a contemptible number, moſt part of them being ſlaine
E in the battell at CAIRE: and the reſt being for the greateſt part brought to extreame weakneſſe with wounds and ſickneſſe. For which cauſes, as Tomombeius his forces encreaſed dayly, ſo hope alſo, which neuer failed the poore vanquiſhed and diſtreſſed king, began now alſo to reuiue in his inuincible heart, aboue the condition of his miſerable eſtate. So that fawning fortune, which euen then moſt cruelly & deſpightfully went about vtterly to ſupplant him (of all other diſtreſſed princes moſt miſerable) ſeemed but then firſt to change her frowning countenance, and to promiſe vnto him more happie and proſperous ſucceſſe.

Albuchomar diſcouereth to Selymus the power of Tomombeius, and the trecherie of them of Caire.

Whileſt Tomombeius was making this preparation, one Albuchomar, an Ægyptian, for authoritie and wealth the greateſt man by farre in all the countrey of SEGESTA, whether it were to auert the miſerie of the preſent warre out of his countrey; or elſe by the pleaſure of his reuolt
F to gaine the good liking of Selymus, vpon whom all things ſeemed to fawne, came and certified him both of Tomombeius his ſtrength, & of the new practiſes of the citiſens of CAIRE. Whereupon Selymus cauſed ſtrong watch and ward to be kept in all places of that great citie: and ſuch citiſens as he ſuſpected to fauour Tomombeius, hee ſhut vp into the caſtle; which being before abandoned by Tomombeius, was then together with the citie in his poſſeſſion: and placed all alongſt the riuer boats furniſhed with men and artillerie, to keepe and defend the farther banke

of Nilus, and to impeach Tomombeius his paſſage ouer. Yet conſidering with himſelfe, with how great danger he had ſo many times fought with thoſe deſperat enemies, and what a difficultie it would be to intercept Tomombeius (protracting the warre in thoſe vaſt and vnknowne countries, and ſtill preparing greater forces, without whom he could nothing aſſure himſelfe of all his former victories) to proue if he might be woon by clemencie and bountie he reſolued to ſend embaſſadours vnto him, to perſuade him to lay downe armes, and after ſo many ouerthrowes, at length to acknowledge the fortune of the victor: and withall to promiſe him vpon the faith of a prince, That if he would come in and ſubmit himſelfe, he ſhould of the courteſie and bountie of the conqueror vpon conditions reaſonable repoſſeſſe that his late kingdome which he ſhould neuer be able by force to regaine: But if he would needs deſperatly proceed to make head againe, forgetting this offered grace, together with his owne diſabilitie, he ſhould afterward when the matter was againe tried by battell, by his owne iuſt deſert neuer more find at the hands of his angrie enemie any regard of his princely ſtate or dignitie. G H

The cauſes moning Selymus to ſend embaſſadors to Tomombeius.

For Selymus ſeeing himſelfe by the courſe of his victories drawne into a farre countrey; and not without cauſe fearing with ſo ſmall a power as he had left, to be oppreſſed in that ſo great and populous a citie, euen with the very multitude, men of doubtfull faith; thought it better by ſome honourable compoſition to aſſure himſelfe of ſome great part of that he had woon, than by going on to thruſt himſelfe with his armie into new dangers, with the hazard of all. Beſides that, he was certainely aduertiſed, That the Mamalukes before fled into diuers countries, were in euery place leuying new ſupplies of horſemen: and that the fleet which was gone into the Arabian gulfe againſt the Portingales, was daily expected at the port Svezzia, wherein were three thouſaud Mamalukes, vnder the leading of Amyraſes and Ray Salomon, two expert captaines, with great ſtore of good braſſe ordinance: by which good helpes Tomombeius ſtood in faire poſſibilitie to recouer his former loſſes, and to returne againe to Caire, whether he was by his ſecret friends moſt earneſtly inuited. But aboue all things, the care he had of the Perſians moſt induced him to thinke of peace: for feare, that if the Baſſa, whom he had left at the mountaine Tavrvs, ſhould not be able to withſtand the forces of the Perſian king, he ſhould ſo be excluded out of Asia the leſſer, and Syria alſo, before his fleet could from Constantinople arriue with new ſupplies of men and victuall at Alexandria. I

Selymus his embaſſadours ſlain by the Mamalukes.

Wherefore he ſent certaine of the moſt reuerend of his Turkiſh religious, and with them ſome of the moſt honourable Ægyptians, embaſſadours to Tomombeius: who paſſing ouer Nilus into the countrey Segesta, were without further hearing, with more than barbarous crueltie, ſlaine by certaine Mamalukes which chaunced vpon them: thinking thereby to gratifie Tomombeius, as yet not knowing of any ſuch matter, & to manifeſt their affection towards him, as alſo that they were not deſirous of any peace with the Turkes. K

This proud and inſolent fact vtterly brake Selymus his patience, and ſhortly after made an end of that mortall warre, together with the honour of the Mamalukes. For he being a man of an hot and cruell nature, euen when he was nothing at all moued, could by no meanes brooke that his enemies, ſo often vanquiſhed and put to flight, ſhould ſo lightly reiect his offers vnto them as the caſe ſtood, both honourable and profitable: and that worſe was, violate his embaſſadours againſt the law of nations, moſt religiouſly kept euen amongſt the moſt barbarous and ſauage people. Wherefore prouoked by ſo great an iniurie, he carefully prouided all things neceſſarie for his expedition into Segesta againſt Tomombeius. And becauſe it ſtood not with his honour (as he tooke it) not with the good of the preſent ſeruice, to paſſe the riuer by boats, he gathering together all the ſmall veſſels and lighters he could poſſibly, made thereof a large and ſtrong bridge ouer Nilus. L

Tomombeius vnderſtanding by his eſpials and from his friends at Caire of the preparations of Selymus, and of the bridge he had made; fearing alſo the reuolt of the country people, whom he probably ſuſpected to be alienated from him by the reuolt of Albuchomar, a man of ſo great power and authoritie amongſt them; determined once againe to proue the fortune of battell, which had ſo often deceiued his expectation. For he iuſtly meaſuring of his owne ſtrength, and finding himſelfe in all things inferiour to his mightie enemie, well ſaw, that he was neither able to protract the warres, neither in open field to abide his comming with all his forces; and to flie further into the deſarts, was as he deemed it, nothing elſe but to make ſhipwracke of that ſmall remainder that was left of his honour and credit. Wherefore by the aduice of his beſt captaines M

A (which was the laſt indeuour both of himſelfe and of the Mamalukes) he departed betime out of the prouince of Sngesra with foure thouſand Mamalukes, and twice as many Moores and Arabians, and trauelled day and night without intermiſſion to come to the riuer Nilus. By that deſperat attempt to deceiue the Turkes, ſuſpecting no ſuch thing from their vanquiſhed & weak enemie: as alſo by celeritie to preuent the fame of his comming; hoping ſo by his ſuddain and vnexected approch to ouerthrow that part of the Turkes armie which ſhould firſt paſſe the riuer, before they could poſſibly be relieued from the other ſide. Neither was he deceiued in the computation of the time, which he hauing before exactly caſt, with the manner of his trauell, fell out ſo fitly that he came to the place he deſired, euen at ſuch time as the Aſian horſemen
B were come ouer the bridge, as he had before gueſſed. The harbengers and pages of Selymus his chamber, which were gone ſomething further than the reſt, to make choice of the moſt commodious place for the erecting of the emperours pauilion, by the riſing of the duſt firſt perceiued the comming of the enemie. And Muſtapha the great Baſſa aduertiſed thereof, ſuddainly raiſed an alarum: which ſo vnexpected a matter brought a great feare both on them which were alreadie paſſed ouer, and alſo on them that were on the further ſide of the riuer.

ring to their enſignes, at the firſt onſet ſlew ſuch as made reſiſtance, and the reſt he diſcomfited and put to flight. Neither was Muſtapha the great commander (although he did what poſſibly he could, by his owne example to haue encouraged them) able either by his owne inuincible
C courage, or other perſuaſion, after his firſt rankes were ouerthrowne, to repaire his diſordered battell, or ſtay the flight of his men: for in that ſo hot and ſuddaine a skirmiſh all was full of tumult, ſlaughter, doubtfulneſſe, and feare: and all alongſt the banke of the riuer, both aboue and beneath the bridge, were to be ſeene fearefull companies of the Turkes, ruthfully looking vpon the riuer, and crying vnto their fellowes on the other ſide for helpe. Many forced by the furious enemie, tooke the riuer, and there periſhed: others ſtriuing at the end of the bridge to returne that way, and ouerborne by their fellowes or others continually ſent from the further ſide, or els amaſed with feare, fell into the riuer, and were there drowned. The bridge was ſo broad, that foure horſemen abreſt might eaſily paſſe ouer at once, and ſo great numbers of them in ſhort ſpace be conueyed ouer. But when the great ordinance (the Turkes cheefe ſtrength) was alſo
D to be tranſported, fewer troupes of horſemen were ſent ouer, than either the greatneſſe of the preſent danger or ſuddenneſſe of the chance required. Neither did their great artillerie as then ſtand them in any ſtead, for that it could neither ſo ſpeedily be conueyed ouer, nor without great hurt be diſcharged from the hither banke to the further, by reaſon of their owne men ſtanding betweene them and the enemie.

In the meane time Selymus, who in the beginning of the skirmiſh came downe to the riuers ſide, filled a great number of boats and other ſmall veſſels with his Ianizaries with their harquebuſies, and withall haſted his horſemen ouer the bridge to relieue their fellowes diſtreſſed on the further ſide: in which boats the nimble watermen vſed ſuch diligence in landing of ſome, and preſently in fetching ouer of others, that in ſhort time they had tranſported diuers bands of
E thoſe moſt readie and valiant ſouldiers: whoſe comming wonderfully comforted the Aſian ſoldiers, euen now at the laſt caſt, and readie to haue giuen ouer. Canoglis alſo, the Tartar kings ſonne and Selymus his brother in law, encouraging his horſemen to take the riuer, with loſſe of ſome few of his men recouered the further ſide, to the great admiration of the beholders: which in that naiton was not ſo much to be maruelled at, as they which by troupes with their horſes had oftentimes ſwam ouer the great riuers Taurus and Volga, no leſſe dangerous than was the riuer Nilus.

Tomombeius at the ſame time, for that he ſaw ſpeedie victorie to conſiſt in one thing eſpecially, ſerring his troupes together, ſtrained himſelfe with might and maine to haue gained the head of the bridge, that by plucking away ſome few of the firſt boats, he might ſhut in his ene-
F mies already come ouer; and by cutting the cables wherby the boats were faſtened to the bank, all the bridge with the Turkes vpon it, might be borne away with the force and violence of that great riuer: whereupon riſe a moſt cruell and deadly fight; for the reſolute Mamalukes in the front of their battell fought valiantly: and Muſtapha well conſidering the danger, had drawne vnto that place both his enſignes and his beſt ſouldiers: ſo that there was fought ſuch a fight, as a matter of ſo great conſequence required: The Mamalukes plainely ſeeing, that if they could obtaine

obtaine the place, they ſhould ſhortly after with little adoe, ouerthrow all the former victories G of their enemies. And the Turks no leſſe ignorant, that except they kept the bridge whole, they were all but loſt men that were alreadie come ouer; and that the reſt of the armie togither with their emperour ſo farre from home, and in the middeſt of his enemies, muſt of neceſſitie ſhortly after run the ſame fortune. But Muſtapha well relieued by the Ianizaries and the Europeian horſemen, which were now come ouer in great number, not only receiued the enemies charge, but preſſing vpon them, gained ground, and by little and little enforced them to retire. This is that Muſtapha the Hungarian, and Baiazet his ſonne in law, which for his owne glory and perpetuall fame, built that notable, ſtately, and ſumptuous ſtone bridge (of the ſpoiles of this victo-rie) ouer the riuer Stremon, which at this day men paſſing ouer into THRACIA wonder at, as H at a worke beſeeming the greatneſſe of the Roman empire.

Tomombeius, to giue a time of breathing to his Mamalukes, who, their horſes for wearineſſe
now fainting vnder thē, were not able longer to ſhew their wonted courage; & deſirous by them againe to proue the vttermoſt fortune of the battell, exhorted the Moores and Arabians a while to charge the enemie, which thing they after the manner of their fight valiantly performed. And The Mamalukes giue a freſh charge vpon the Turkes. ſhortly after, the Mamalukes hauing a little breathed themſelues and their horſes, came in afreſh and renewed the battell; with ſuch furie, that Selymus doubting the victorie (although he was by his moſt faithfull counſellors perſuaded to the contrarie) yet doubted not to aduenture the bridge, and in perſon himſelfe to goe and relieue his diſtreſſed ſouldiers: who by his comming in, encouraged, and in the ſight of their emperour deſiring euerie man for his part by ſome nota- I ble ſeruice to deſerue both credit and preferment, repreſſed the furie of the enemie; who in ſhort time after, by the comming on of certain freſh companies of Ianizaries, were notably repulſed, The Mamalukes put to flight. and ſo at length put to flight: whom the horſemen which were not in the battell, purſued all the fields ouer. At length alſo the Tartarians (who carried away with the force of the ſtreame, were ſomewhat long before they could recouer the farther banke and come to their enemies) were now come in alſo, and with their ſwift horſes following the chaſe, augmented the ſlaughter.

But Selymus aboue all things deſirous of Tomombeius, preſently commaunded Muſtapha the great Baſſa, Gazelles, and Cayerbeius, with certaine freſh troupes of light horſemen, to purſue him at the heeles, and if it were poſſible not to ſuffer him to eſcape: for ſo long as he liued, hee could not aſſure himſelfe of any thing he had yet gotten. Theſe vigilant captaines not vnmind- K full of their charge, following faſt after him, ouertooke him the next day at the fluce of a great deepe fen, where he had a little reſted himſelfe and his followers, being then about to cut off a wodden bridge, ſo to haue hindered the enemies purſuit. Some of his followers being there ſlaine, and ſome taken, he was againe enforced to flie. The third day when he had almoſt loſt all his men, and was come with ſome few into the territorie of the Secuſſane prince: theſe great captaines ſtill eagerly purſuing him, and denouncing vnto the poore countrey people which dwelt in villages thereabout, all extremities and tortures, if they did not with moſt diligent watch and ward ſo keep the paſſages of thoſe mariſhes, as that he ſhould not poſſibly eſcape; he was ſo beſet on euerie ſide, that for ſafegard of his life he was glad to hide himſelfe all alone in a to haue cauſed him to haue reuealed the great treaſures of Campſon his predeceſſor, which were thought to haue been by him hidden: in which moſt horrible and exquiſit torments, it is reported, that he with great conſtancie and ſterne countenance vttered nothing but certaine deepe ſighes and grones, ouercomming with patience the tyrannie of the proud conquerour: who after that, commaunded him in baſe and ragged apparell, with his hands bound behind him as a M theefe or murtherer condemned to die, to be ſet vpon a foule leane cammell, & ſo to be carried in deriſion through all the publicke and notable places of the citie; that the Ægyptians might ſee him whom they but a little before had adored for their king, by chaunge of fortune caſt into extreame miſerie, by moſt ſhamefull death to end both his life and empire together. When they had thus deſpightfully led him as it were in triumph, and brought him to the cheefe gate of the

A citie called Basvela, they there openly ſtrangled him with a rope: and that he might be the better ſeene, and become more contemptible to all that paſſed that way, they hanged him vp by the neck vpon an yron hooke in an arch of the ſame gate, and ſo left him to the worlds wonder. Palearius propounding him as a mirrour both of the better and worſe fortune, for all men to looke vpon, aptly deſcribeth both his happineſſe and miſerie in theſe few verſes following:

The miſerable end of Tomombeius, laſt Sultan of Egypt.

In all the Eaſt a king more bleſt was no where to be found,
Nor in the Eaſt one more accurſt liu'd not vpon the ground,
Than Tomombeius, Æ G Y P T S greeſe, ſometime for ſtore of gold,
Of power great for martiall force, and kingdomes he did hold.
But taken by his cruell foe, may good example be Both to the happie and diſtreſt, of mans vncertaintie.
Why doeſt thou fondly laugh? why doeſt thou vainely crie?
Canſt thou from henceforth ſtay thy ſelfe? and thinke th'art borne to die?
My garments were the royall robes, I wore the crowne of gold,
With richeſt ſtones moſt richly ſet, moſt glorious to behold:
My necke adornd with richeſt gems which I did ſometimes weare:
But now truſt vp in ſhamefull rope, behold me hanging here.

The Egyptians in doubt of their eſtate bewaile the death of Tomombeius.

This miſerie befell Tomombeius the 13 of Aprill, in the yeare 1517, vpon the Monday in Eaſter weeke. There were many which ſhed teares to behold that ſo cruell and lamentable a ſpectacle, who by their wofull countenance and pitifull lamentation ſeemed to deteſt that foule I and vnworthie death of their late Sultan: notwithſtanding that the Ianizaries reproued them therefore, and threatened them with death, who like giddie brained fooles (as they tearmed them) enured to the ſlauerie of the Mamalukes, ioyfully and thankefully accepted not of their deliuerance: for the Ægyptians were as yet vncertaine of their eſtate, and therefore as men in ſuſpence (not without cauſe) ſtood in doubt what ſhould become of themſelues: fearing leaſt the Turkes, a warlike nation, and a terrour to all the princes of E V R O P E and A S I A, nothing more courteous than the Mamalukes, ſhould with no leſſe inſolencie rage and tyrannize ouer them, vnder their warlike and cruell emperour. Beſides that, the wofull ſight of Tomombeius hanging in the gate, as the vnworthie ſcorne of fortune, wonderfully wounded their hearts: for why, it was yet freſh in their remembrance, that he with the good liking of all men, and generall fauour K of the nobilitie, with good fame riſe vp all the degrees of honour both in field and court, vnto the height of regall dignitie; and therefore greeued the more to ſee him by inuitable deſtinie caſt downe headlong, ſo ſhamefully to end his life and empire together. A notable ſpectacle vndoubtedly amongſt the rareſt examples of worldly fragilitie both to the happie and vnfortunat: the one, not to be too proud, or too much to flatter themſelues in their greateſt bliſſe; and the other, to learne thereby with patience to endure the heauie and vnworthie changes and chances of this wretched and miſerable world. And ſo much the more did Tomombeius ſo hanging, moue men to compaſſion, for that the maieſtie of his tall and ſtrong bodie, and reuerend countenance, with his long and hoarie beard, well agreed with his imperiall dignitie and martiall diſ- L poſition. The ſame fortune with Tomombeius ran alſo diuers of the princes of the Mamalukes, with ſome others of the common ſort alſo.

Tomombeius thus taken out of the way, and all the Mamalukes almoſt ſlaine, and no power of the enemie to be heard of in all Æ G Y P T to renew the warre: Selymus deuiding his forces, ſent them forth with his captaines, to take in the countries and prouinces of Æ G Y P T lying further off. They of A L E X A N D R I A after the battell of C A I R E hauing thruſt out the garriſon, and eaſily ſurpriſed the caſtle of P H A R V S (which the weake defendants choſe rather vpon hope of preſent reward to deliuer, than with doubtfull euent to defend) yeelded themſelues many daies before vnto the Turkes. D A M I A T A alſo, called in auncient time P E L V S I V M, opened their gates, and ſubmitted themſelues to the victors. There was no citie betwixt the riuer of Nilus M and the borders of I V D E A and A R A B I A, which yeeded not to the obedience of Selymus. The kings alſo of A F R I C K E bordering vpon C Y R E N A I C A, tributaries or confederats of the Ægyptian Sultans, ſent their embaſſadours with preſents to Selymus.

There remained now none but the wild Arabians (a people neuer to be tamed) & eſpecially they of A F R I C K E, who hauing loſt many of their friends and kinſmen in aiding Tomombeius, would

A would not (as it was thought) ſubmit themſelues vnto the Turkiſh obedience. This wandering kind of people, liuing for moſt part by theft, had filled the countries from Euphrates, where it runneth by the Palmyrens, with all the inner parts of ÆGYPT and AFRICKE vnto the Atlanticke ſea, with huge multitudes of men: and being deuided into many companies vnder diuers leaders, haue no certaine dwelling places, but liue an hard and frugall kind of life in tents and waggons, after the manner of the Tartars: their greateſt wealth is a good ſeruiceable horſe, with a launce, or a bundell of darts: they were alway at diſcord & variance amongſt themſelues, by reaſon whereof, they could neuer agree for the expulſing of the Mamalukes, who otherwiſe had not been able to haue ſtood againſt them, if they ſhould haue ioyned their forces together.

B So that the late Ægyptian Sultans ſeemed to hold their ſtate and empire amongſt ſo populous a nation, rather by their diſcord than their owne ſtrength. Wherefore Selymus hauing now by fit men vpon his faith before giuen allured many of their cheefetaines and greateſt commaunders to CAIRE, honourably both entertained and rewarded them. By whoſe example others moued, came alſo in daily: and hauing receiued their rewards, gaue the oath of their allegeance to Selymus. Others which could by no faire promiſes or words be woon, being cunningly intercepted by other captaines, and deliuered to Selymus, endured the paines of their vaine obſtinacie and mallice. The other remote nations toward ÆTHYOPIA, as they had in former time rather acknowledged the friendſhip than the command of the Ægyptian Sultans, ſo now induced with the fame of the victorie, eaſily ioyned in like amitie with the Turke.

Selymus cunningly reduceth the Arabians to his obedience.

C About the ſame time Selymus ſent certaine troupes of horſemen to SVEZZIA, a port of the red ſea (of old called ARSINOE) about three daies iourney from CAIRE: in which port Campſon the great Sultan (a little before the comming of the Turks) had with infinit charge and foure yeares trauell built a ſtrong fleet againſt the Portingals, who by their conqueſts in INDIA had taken away all the rich trade of the Indian marchandiſe into the gulfe of ARABIA, to the great hinderance of the Ægyptian kings cuſtomes: ouer which fleet (a little before the beginning of the Turkiſh warres) Campſon had appointed one Amyraſes and Ray Salomon Generals, with a ſtrong power of Mamalukes and great ſtore of ordinance, againſt the Portingals. Theſe valiant captains hauing yet done nothing in the ſeruice they were appointed vnto, as they lay at GIDDA (the port of the famous citie of MECHA, wherein is the temple of their great prophet

D Mahomet) vnderſtanding of the death of Campſon, & of the comming of Selymus into ÆGYPT, fell at variance betwixt thẽſelues; one of them being willing to continue his obedience towards the new Sultan, and the other no leſſe deſirous to follow the good fortune of the victor. Wherupon a mutinie ariſing among the ſouldiers, Amyraſes, who fauoured Tomombeius, was enforced to flie to MECHA. But ſhortly after, Ray Salomon requiring to haue him, and threatening all hoſtilitie except he were forthwith deliuered, he was apprehended by them of MECHA, fearing to haue GIDDA their port ſpoiled, and ſo ſent backe againe to the fleet. Ray Salomon, that he might be Admirall alone, his aſſociat being taken out of the way, and by ſome notable fact to inſinuate himſelfe into the fauour of the conquerour, cauſed Amyraſes in the night to be caſt ouer boord: and giuing to the ſouldiers two moneths pay, and ſwearing them to the obedience

E of Selymus, in few daies ſayling came backe againe to ARSINOE, where leauing the fleet, he came directly himſelfe to Selymus at CAIRE, of whom he was gratiouſly receiued. After that, all the princes which were before tributaries or confederates to the late Sultans of ÆGYPT, euen vnto the confines of Dauid the moſt mightie king of ETHIOPIA (whom ſome call Preſbiter Iohn) without delay entred into the like ſubiection or confederation with the Turkes.

ÆGYPT, with all the prouinces thereunto belonging, thus brought into ſubiection, Selymus about the beginning of Iuly ſayled downe the riuer of Nilus to ALEXANDRIA (Cortug-Ogli, a famous pyrat of HALICARNASSVS, ſitting at the helme of his gallie) there to take view of his fleet, but lately come from CONSTANTINOPLE with new ſupplies both of men and victuals, ſent from Pyrrhus Baſſa and his ſonne Solyman: which after he had well ſurueyed, and

Of this Cortug-Ogli ſee more in the life of Solyman.

F diligently viewed the wals of the citie, and of the caſtle of PHAROS, he returned againe to CAIRE. In the meane time, the Mamalukes in durance at ALEXANDRIA, were by his commaundement murthered euery mothers ſonne, in the entrance of the priſon. At which time alſo aboue fiue hundred families of the nobleſt and richeſt of the Ægyptians were commaunded to remoue from CAIRE to CONSTANTINOPLE, and a great number of women and children, of the race of the Mamalukes, were tranſported thither alſo in ſhips hired for that purpoſe

Into this fleet beside the kings treasure and riches, he conueyed all the publicke and priuate ornaments of that most rich and famous citie; with such a couetous and greedie desire of spoile, that the verie marble stons, commended either for the excellencie of the workmanship, or beautie of the stone, were violently rent out of the maine wals, to his great reproch and infamie. Lying at CAIRE, he with great pleasure beheld the rising of the riuer Nilus, which had then ouerflowed the countrie next vnto it; and that with such a desire, that he most curiously enquired of the old countrey men the measure and nature of the riuer: for by the diuersitie of the rising thereof (which they by certaine markes and measures well find out) they prognosticate sometime aboundant plentie, sometime extreame dearth, and sometime reasonable store: when as the violent riuer moderately or furiously breaking out, somewhile so drowneth the greatest part of the countrey, that all the seed season it lyeth vnder water, and at another time floweth so sparingly, that in many places it scarce layeth the dust, thereby foreshewing an vndoubted dearth: so that the Ægyptians then assure themselues of plentie, when as Nilus keeping a meane, pleasantly riseth neither to the highest or lowest markes of his inundation. G H

The Mamaluke kingdome, together with the name of the Mamalukes, thus ouerthrowne, and the conquest of ÆGYPT so happily atchiued: Selymus resolued to make his returne into SYRIA, and the rather, for that it was reported, That Hysmaell the Persian king was comming with his armie into MESOPOTAMIA, and so like ynough to breake into COMAGENA. Wherefore hauing as he thought good, disposed of all things, he left a strong garrison of his best souldiors in CAIRE, and appointed Cayerbeius that notable traitour, his deputie and great commander ouer all that great and new gotten kingdome of ÆGYPT, now conuerted into the forme of a prouince, as it remaineth at this day. Which honourable preferment so vnworthily bestowed, exceedingly both grieued and troubled Ionuses the great Bassa, before enflamed with the hope and iust desire thereof: For now that Sinan Bassa was dead, he puffed vp with the estimation of his owne worth and valour, and proud of the wound he had of late receiued in the presence of Selymus at the entring of CAIRE, and to the vttermost of his power suffering no man to grow neere him in credit and estimation; thought himselfe the onely man now left, to whom of all others, that especiall and honourable charge should in the iudgement of Selymus and of the whole armie of right be committed. Neither wanted he the generall good liking of the men of war, for immediatly after he was recouered of his wound, when he in the most magnificent house of the Diadarie at CAIRE (which he in the victorie had rather of himselfe vsurped, than by the gift of Selymus obtained) dayly kept princely cheere for all commers (no small meanes to gaine the loue of the common souldiours) and gaue frankly to them all, to some horses, to some beautifull slaues, to some money, plate, iewels, rich garments, faire armour, and such like; he woon vnto himselfe such fauour and credit, that whensoeuer he should (as the maner was) go to the castle vnto the emperour, he was brought thither with a great and goodly traine of his fauorites & followers, as the man in all mens iudgement designed to the gouernment of that great and rich kingdome. All which things highly offended the mind of Selymus, who as he was apt to suspect, and cruell where he feared, so did he also (in secret) enuie great vertues, accompanied with too much honour and power.

Cayerbeius the traitor made gouernour of Caire and Ægypt.

I K

Ionuses seeing Cayerbeius the traitour thus vnworthily promoted, ouercome with griefe and indignation (who as a man of a proud and haughtie mind, tooke it as done to his owne disgrace) yet colouring his inward discontentment by counterfeiting himselfe sicke, for certaine daies came not abroad; neuertheless still more and more tormented both with the iniurie (as he tooke it) done to himselfe, and the vnworthie preferment of the traitour, he could not so well containe himselfe, but that in his choler some words fell from him, whereby his discontentment was perceiued. It happened, that Cayerbeius comming of courtesie to visit him, and in the heat of the day familiarly calling for drinke (which was water and sugar, after the maner of the Ægyptians) immediatly after he had drunke, felt such grieuous and vnwonted gripings and tormentings in his stomacke and bellie, that many supposed him to haue beene poysoned by the Bassa: yet was he by the power and vertue of a more soueraigne and effectuall remedie preserued. Which report, whether it were true or no, was vncertaine: but certaine it is, that it sanke further into the mind of Selymus, than any man would haue thought. He had now also a little before heard, that many of those rich Ægyptian families, which he had before commanded to be remooued to CONSTANTINOPLE, had for great summes of money obtained of Ionuses (who

A (who had the whole ordering of that matter) that they might quietly and in ſafetie remaine ſtill in their owne countrie. Of which his couert dealing, great probabilitie was alledged by ſuch as repined at his honour, and ſecretly accuſed him, That thoſe princelike and exceſſiue charges and expences, which he was not able poſſibly to maintain of his ordinarie penſion, were roially ſupported with the embeſeled ſpoile and reuenewes of that new gotten kingdome. Which malicious ſuggeſtions, as they tended to the lightening of his credit, ſo alſo another crime (whether it were of fraudulent dealing or negligence, or other further reſpect, is vncertaine) comming in the necke of the other, wrought his vtter diſgrace, and finall confuſion: For Selymus after the maner of great princes (who more ſeuerely to puniſh the former offences, notably diſſembling their preſent anger, expect but the occaſion of ſome new crime) with vigilant eye waiting vpon
B his words and deeds, proſecuted him with a mortall and deadly hatred, with a full purpoſe to deſtroy him.

A few daies before it was certainely reported that Selymus would againe return into SYRIA, the ſouldiors appointed to be left in garriſon at CAIRE, alledging the great diſtance of the place, and the greater dangers they were to expect, with the labours by them alreadie endured, requeſted of the bountie of their moſt fortunate emperour, that they might haue their wages augmented. Which thing Selymus (neuer ſpare handed to his men of war) eaſily graunted, commaunding Ionuſes the ſtately Baſſa, that the ſumme they required, might be added to their accuſtomed wages, and ſo entered into his accounts for the wars. But he carried headlong with diſcontentment, made neither the treaſurers nor paymaſters acquainted with any ſuch matter as Selymus
C had before commaunded: of purpoſe, that the garriſon ſouldiors deceiued of their greater wages promiſed them by the emperour, might euen at the firſt begin to hate and contemne Cayerbeius, as author of ſo great an iniurie; that ſo the ſtate of CAIRE, and of that new gotten kingdome, diſquieted by the mutinie of the garriſon ſouldiors, Selymus enforced to change his former purpoſe, ſhould in ſtead of that ſtrange gouernor (hated of the Ægyptians for his late treaſon, and not beloued of the garriſon ſouldiors, becauſe he was to them a ſtranger) of neceſſitie ſend ſome of his owne Baſſaes, a Turke, for the better ſtay and aſſurance of that wauering and mightie prouince. But all theſe things (as commonly wicked purpoſes haue their foule euents) fell out in fine far otherwiſe than he had in his troubled mind before conceiued. For Selymus
D being departed out of ÆGYPT, and now on his way almoſt as far as HIERVSALEM, the garriſon ſouldiors at CAIRE, the pay day being now come, and receiuing no more but their old accuſtomed wages, moued with that euill dealing (as contrarie to the emperors promiſe and their generall expectation) began with more furie and rage than euer Ionuſes had before imagined, openly and inſolently to inſult and threaten the treaſurer and paymaſters, and with open mouth to raile vpon Cayerbeius their gouernour. With which ſo inſolent and opprobrious ſpeeches he aſtonied (as one not yet acquainted with the faſhions of the Turkiſh garriſons) togither with the paymaſters, in beſt manner they could excuſed themſelues vnto the ſouldiors, requeſting them not to thinke ſo hardly of them who were altogither innocent in the matter, and with patience to vnderſtand the truth of the cauſe; wherein if they ſhould on their part find any fraudulent or E euill dealing, they craued no fauour, either refuſed any puniſhment. Thus Cayerbeius and the paymaſters ſeeking by all meanes to auoid both the ſuſpition and the preſent danger: and the mutinous ſouldiors no leſſe haſtening to find out by whom they were ſo abuſed, and to be therof reuenged, it was at laſt with much adoe agreed, That truſtie meſſengers ſhould forthwith be ſent to Selymus, who was not yet gone out of IVDEA, to vnderſtand of him the truth of the matter.

Selymus commandeth the wages of his ſouldiors to be left in garriſon at Caire to be augmented.

Theſe ſpeedie meſſengers hauing with wonderfull celeritie diſpatched their iourney, ouertooke Selymus with his armie a little from LARISSA in IVDEA: and admitted to his preſence, orderly declared vnto him both the complaints of the ſouldiors, and the carefulneſſe of Cayerbeius and the paymaſters to excuſe the matter, togither with the daunger they were in, with all the other accidents whatſoeuer which had happened ſithence the time of his departure from F CAIRE. Which complaint ſo incenſed the mind of Selymus with new paſſions of anger and choller, being alreadie ſore alienated with former diſpleaſures, that he without further delay commaunded Ionuſes Baſſa to be brought before him to anſwere the matter: who although he were inwardly ſtrucken with the guilt of his owne conſcience, and ſurpriſed with a deadly feare, which appeared in his colour as pale as aſhes, ſeeing in the angrie face and countenance of his ſoue-soueraigne the most certaine tokens of his heauie displeasure: yet as he was a man of great spi- G rit, answered boldly, That he had forbidden the souldiors wages to be augmented, contrarie to his maiesties commaund, not vpon any euill meaning to haue inuerted that money to his owne vse, neither thereby to haue drawne any man of purpose into disgrace, as was by some his malicious enemies suggested, but vpon great reason, thereby to prouide for his maiesties cofers, wonderfully emptied with those late wars: beside that, the constant report of new troubles like to arise out of PERSIA, gaue good occasion for him to spare vnnecessarie charges: Whereas on the other side, as he said, the garrison souldiors were alreadie inriched with the plentifull spoiles of ÆGYPT, and in a most goodly citie possessed the sumptuous houses and lands of the Mamalukes, feeding vpon the goods of the Ægyptians, and had alreadie receiued both greater pay and more bountifull rewards from him, than euer any souldiors had from any his predecessors the H Othoman kings: in which case, if they were not past all modestie, they might well ynough take it in good part, if they were something restrained in their vnreasonable requests. He alleadged moreouer, that great princes which retaine their souldiours in reasonable pay in time of peace and war, ought sometime for warlike discipline, to require of them a moderation of their desires; least whilest they all striue with greedinesse for their priuat gaine, there want money afterwards in the common treasurie to maintaine a greater and more necessarie charge, wars still rising vpon wars; seeing that no commander were he neuer so valiant or fortunate, euer did any great matter in wars, if he wanted coine, the most proper instrument and verie sinues of war, answering vnto his other most heroicall parts and sufficiencie. But as he was yet thus speaking, Selymus full of wrath and indignation interrupted him, for if he should haue suffered him in lon- I ger discourse to haue recounted his former deserts & worthie seruice done, aswell in the time of his father Baiazet, as of late euen in his owne presence, he was like ynough to haue had of them that were able to do most with him, intercessors for him: and so without farther delay, caused him euen there in his own presence to be executed; saying moreouer, That others which would arrogantly presume to prescribe vnto their soueraignes what they had to do, should for euer after by the example of that most insolent seruant, be admonished of their dutie and condition. It is reported, that the soldiors in despight of Selymus wonderfully lamented the vnworthie death of this so worthie a man: For he, beside his notable and rare valour, so many times to his great honour in sundrie battels approued, had by the dexteritie of his Græcian wit, comelinesse of personage, militarie eloquence, and gallant maner of liuing, so woon the loue and fauor of all men, K that there was few or none in all the armie which did not acknowledge himselfe some way endebted and beholden vnto him; and did therefore condemne the emperours crueltie. They then began to tell how Mustapha surnamed Caloger, a man of wonderfull credit and authoritie both with Baiazet and himselfe, was in the heat of his furie slaine without hearing: And that in like maner of rage, old Chendemus a man of greatest honour and integritie of life, and of all the chieftaines which came out of the great emperour Mahomet his nurserie, the most skilfull, had been for his graue and wholsome counsell onely without cause murthered: Neither was then Bostanges his sonne in law forgotten: neither Cherseogles (the one most honourable for the great place he held in court and the mariage of Baiazet his daughter, and the other a man of no lesse L marke being his great Admiral, and bearing himselfe high vpon his infinit wealth, but more vpon his wife one of the daughters of Selymus) both which two noble gentlemen about two yeres before had their heads strucke off, no man well knowing wherefore, and their dead bodies cast out at the court gate to the terrour of the beholders, as a miserable spectacle of their own miserie and the emperors crueltie. Yea the remembrance of his old tirannie (renewed as it were with this late outrage) presented a fresh vnto all mens eyes the reuerend old emperor Baiazet his father, with his two brethren, Achomates and Corcutus, by right both called vnto the empire before him selfe; with many other young princes of the bloud, of great hope and expectation, who as all men knew, perished through the vnnaturall and execrable crueltie of this most mercileſſe man. So that men generally did both feare him and hate him. For as much as he without M all feare of God or regard of wordly shame, accounted no practise wicked or deuise detestable, that might serue for the better establishing of his kingdome; and had set downe in his mind, (long before corrupted with ambition and tyrannie) That it was far better for the assurance of his estate, to be feared of all than beloued of many: and therefore spared no mans life, of whom he had but the least suspition. Howbeit that the seueritie by him vsed against this so great a man

and

A and ſo gratious with the people, may in ſome ſort be excuſed, as iuſtly moued thereunto by the preſumptuous and malitious dealing of the proud Baſſa vnderhand, contrarie to the charge giuen him by his lord, to the perill of thoſe his great but late conqueſts both in ÆGYPT and SYRIA.

This great Baſſa, whileſt he yet liued and flouriſhed in the court, in nothing ſo much offended the minds of the people (who generally both loued and honoured him) as by the crueltie by him ſhewed vpon the perſon of the faire ladie Manto his beſt beloued wife. Who being a Greek borne, and adorned with all the good gifts of nature, wherunto her louely conditions were alſo anſwerable, was by Zebelia her firſt huſband (a man of great honour) carried with him into the
B wars, as his greateſt treaſure and chiefe delight. But he ſlaine, and ſhe by misfortune falling into the hands of the Turks (her enemies) remained ſo priſoner with them for a time; vntill that this great Baſſa Ionuſes ſhortly after (ſeeing her amongſt the other captiues there taken, ſo far to exceed the reſt as doth the Sunne the leſſer ſtars) ſurpriſed with her incomparable beautie, became of her amarous: and in too curious viewing of the captiue ladie, was by her himſelfe taken priſoner. Where finding her outward perfections graced with no leſſe inward vertues, and her honourable mind anſwerable vnto her rare feature, tooke her vnto his wife; honouring her farre aboue all the reſt of his wiues and concubines: and ſhe againe in all duetifull loyaltie ſeeking to pleaſe him, for a ſpace liued in all worldly felicitie and bliſſe, not much inferiour vnto one of the great Sultaneſſes. But long laſteth not the Sommer fruit of wanton loue, blaſted moſt times in C the bloſſome, and rotten before it be well gathered: For in ſhort time, the Baſſa more amorous of her perſon than ſecured in her vertues, and after the manner of ſenſuall men ſtill fearing leaſt that which ſo much pleaſed himſelfe, gaue no leſſe contentment to others alſo: began to haue her in diſtruſt, although he ſaw no great cauſe why, more than his owne conceit, not grounded vpon any her euill demeanor, but vpon the exceſſe of his owne liking. Which mad humour (hardly to be euer purged) of it ſelfe ſtil more and more in him encreaſing, he became ſo froward and imperious, that nothing ſhe could ſay or do could now ſo pleaſe or content him, but that he ſtill thought ſome one or other, although he wiſt not who, to be therein partakers with him. So fearefull was the iealous man of his owne conceits. Yet could he not chuſe but loue thoſe great perfections, wherat he could not ynough wonder; although he found no contentment therein,
D tormenting ſtill both himſelfe and her whom he ſo dearely loued with his owne paſſionat diſtruſt: vntill at length, the faire ladie grieued to ſee her ſelfe thus without cauſe to be ſuſpected, and wearied with the inſolent pride of her peeuiſh huſband, togither with his imperious commands; determined ſecretly to depart from him, and ſo to returne again into her own country. Which her purpoſe ſhe diſcouered vnto one of her eunuchs, to whom ſhe had alſo deliuered certain letters to be by him conuaied vnto ſuch of her friends, as whoſe helpe ſhe was to vſe in her intended flight: which letters the falſe eunuch opened, and ſo for the more manifeſting of the matter deliuered them vnto the Baſſa his maſter. Who therewith inraged, and calling her vnto him, forthwith in his furie, with a dagger ſtabd her to the heart and ſlew her: ſo together with the death of his loue, hauing cured his tormenting iealouſie. The liuely counterfeits of theſe two
E ſo notable perſonages thus vnworthily ſlaine, the one by the imperious command of his ſoueraigne, and the other by the cruell hand of her huſband, thou maieſt in the pages following behold, as they are by Beiſardus expreſſed.

If feature braue thou doest respect, thou canst none fairer see,
Nor in whose chast and constant brest could greater graces lie.
But whilst mismatcht she liu'd to mourne, enthrald to iealous braine, Vnhappie she with cruell hand was by her husband slaine.

But leauing this great Bassa with faire Manto vnto their rest, his course thus run, to returne againe vnto Selymus; who now come into STRIA, was by letters from the Himbracor-Bassa or master of his horse (whom he had left vpon the frontiers of his kingdome to attend the motions
F of the Persians) aduertised, That the Persian preparations which had raised such a hoat rumour of wars in the beginning of Winter, was growne cold in the heat of Sommer: and that he had seene in all the time of his aboad in those quarters, none but certaine stragling companies, making shew as if some greater power had been comming, which had many times made sudden roads into the countrey, with whom he had sundry times prosperously encountred: and that it

it was generally reported by such prisoners as he had taken, and by his owne espials also that G Hysmaell, troubled with the Hyrcanians and Tartars, had conuerted the greatest part of his forces against those nations: so that Winter now drawing fast on, and deepe snowes alreadie fallen vpon the mountaine TAVRVS, he could not though he would that yeare looke after ASIA the lesse, or SYRIA. There were that reported, that the Tartars which dwell betweene the two riuers Tanais and Volga, were by Selymus his procurement, and mony, set a worke to keep Hysmaell busied, by inuading the Iberians and Albanians, which were vnder his protection: which thing he wrought by the meanes of Mahomet his father in law, the Bosphorane king, who being of the same language and nation, by rewards easily induced the needie captaines of the Tartars his friends and confederats, to take vp armes against their neighbours.

The cause why Hysmaell inuaded not Selymus, wholly busied in the Egyptian warres.

Many men maruelled that Hysmaell the Persian king neglected so faire an opportunitie, wher- H by he might (as most men thought) haue thrust Selymus quite out of ASIA and SYRIA, whilest he was thus busied in ÆGYPT, yea and easily haue destroyed him, shut vp with all his power, especially at such time as the Ægyptian Sultans Campson and Tomombeius made so great resistance. But they which could better iudge of the matter, saw that Hysmaell was not of so great power and strength abroad, as at home: for his armie for most part consisted of gentlemen, or such as were by custome bound to serue him in his defensiue warres, voluntary men, and such as serued without pay. These as they were the most valiant horsemen of the East, so did they with singular valour worthily defend the kingdome of PERSIA, and also as occasion required, make warre with their neare neighbours: but if any longer expedition were to be taken in hand, that they could by no means away withal, accounting it a grieuous thing to depart from their wiues, I vnto whom they are so addicted that oftentimes they carrie them with them into the wars; and being a wanton & fine kind of people, are not able without wages to draw after them, according to their accustomed manner, so many carriages and horses as might serue both for their necessarie and wanton vses. With which difficultie the great king Vsun-Cassanes, Hysmaell his grandfather by the mothers side, was much troubled in his warres against Mahomet the Great: but was now much harder for Hysmaell to doe, for that hee hauing obtained his grandfathers kingdome by the meere good will of the people, easing them forthwith of their heauie impositions, alwaies thought the loue of his subiects (which is easily gotten with bountie and iustice) the surest riches of his kingdome; and that to commaund onely ouer the bodies and goods of his people, their harts altogether alienated and lost by most heauie and grieuous exactions, seemed not the part of a gratious and naturall prince, but of an outrageous & momentarie tyrant. K
Whereas Selymus on the contrarie part, who had by force, mischeefe, and most detestable practises stept vp into his fathers seat, had after the maner of the Othoman kings, reposed his greatest and most assured strength in a seruile and mercinarie kind of men, whom he might for pay as his owne creatures, at his pleasure draw farre from home, and as he best liked lead them from place to place, and countrey to countrey, for the enlarging of his empire and eterniſing of his name: and therefore according to the qualitie of his people, deemed true and ready power to consist only in money, and the seueritie of his owne commaund; whereby he had learned with most happie successe, in short time to obscure all the victories of the former Othoman kings, with L
the greatnesse of his owne.

1518 All the Winter following Selymus stayed with his armie in SYRIA, spending the time in visiting the ports and cities of that prouince, and setting of things in order, for the better assurance thereof. But vpon the approch of the Spring, when he certainely vnderstood, that by the procurement of Leo the tenth, then bishop of ROME, the Christian princes were entred into consultation to make warre vpon him, and that supplications with great solemnitie were made for that purpose, and honourable embassadours sent into all prouinces to stir vp the greatest kings of Christendome against him, he (leauing Gazelles his lieutenant in SYRIA) by great iournies returned to CONSTANTINOPLE: from thence as at hand to behold the deuises and motions of the Christian princes his enemies. In the meane time, fearing no alteration to arise in the pro- M uinces of SYRIA and ÆGYPT, for as much as he well saw, that Cayerbeius and Gazelles, his lieutenants, being at deadly hatred betwixt themselues (as well for old grudges, as for the late treason of Cayerbeius, the great cause of the ruine of the Mamalukes kingdome) would neuer agree in one against him, but rather with a certaine emulation striue betwixt themselues with diligence, faithfulnesse, and moderation, who should deserue best in well gouerning the prouinces by him committed committed to their charge, as indeed they did during the ſhort time of his raigne.

Selymus being arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE, and purpoſing from thenceforth to turne all his forces vpon the Chriſtians, cauſed wonderfull preparation to be made for his wars, but eſpecially at ſea: whereby it was thought, that he would either haue attempted the ſtrong Iſland of the RHODES (a great moat in his eye) or els ſome part of ITALIE. But as he was hatching this miſchiefe, or ſome other of no leſſe importance, and in the meane time delighted himſelfe with viſiting the cities of GRÆCIA and THRACE, and ſolaced himſelfe in the pleaſant countrie about HADRIANOPLE, he was ſuddenly attached with the hand of God, and ſtrucken in the reyns of his backe with a canker: which melancholie and deuouring maladie contemning all cure, did by little and little ſo eat and corrupt his bodie, as that he before ſo much honoured, became now loathſome and odious both to himſelfe and others. 1519

Selymus purpoſing to inuade the Chriſtians, is ſtruck in the reynes of his backe with a canker.

As he lay thus languiſhing, his incurable diſeaſe ſtill encreaſing, leaning his head in the lap of Pyrrhus the Baſſa, whom of all others he moſt loued, ſaid: O Pyrrhus, I ſee I muſt ſhortly die without remedie. Whereupon the graue Baſſa tooke occaſion to diſcourſe with him of many matters: and amongſt others, that it would pleaſe him to giue order for the well beſtowing of the great wealth taken from the Perſian marchants in diuers places of his empire: perſuading him to beſtow the ſame vpon ſome notable hoſpitall for releeſe of the poore. To whom Selymus replied, Wouldſt thou Pyrrhus, that I ſhould beſtow other mens goods, wrongfully taken from them, vpon workes of charitie and deuotion, for mine owne vaine glorie and praiſe? aſſuredly I will neuer doe it: nay, rather ſee they bee againe reſtored vnto the right owners. Which was forthwith done accordingly: to the great ſhame of many Chriſtians, who minding nothing leſſe than reſtitution, but making ex rapina holocauſtum, do out of a world of euill gotten goods cull out ſome ſmall fragments, to build ſome poore hoſpitall, or mend ſome blind way: a poore teſtimonie of their hote charitie.

Selymus lying thus ſicke to death, and rotting aboue the ground in his tent, as he was vpon the way going to HADRIANOPLE, ſent before Pyrrhus and Achmetes, two of his greateſt Baſſaes, to prouide for the ſolemniſing of the great feaſt, which the Turkes call Bairam (and is as it were their Eaſter) purpoſing to come after himſelfe at leiſure, as his weake bodie would giue him leaue: and kept with him onely Ferhates, the third of his greateſt Baſſaes and priuie counſellours. But ſuch was the furie of his foule diſeaſe, continually attainting him with intollerable paines, that ſhortly after the departure of the other two Baſſaes, he breathed out his cruell ghoſt, in the moneth of September, in the yeare 1520: neere vnto the citie CHIVRLI, in the ſelfeſame place where he had ſometime moſt vnnaturally aſſayled his aged father Baiazet, with purpoſe to haue ſlaine him, had not the fortune of the old emperour in a great battell preuailed both againſt his force and the treaſon of his own people. Thus intending the miſcheefe he could not performe, cut off by a loathſome and vntimely death, hee to the great ioy of all Chriſtendome ended his dayes, when hee had liued ſix and fortie yeares, and thereof raigned eight: which time of his raigne was nothing elſe but a moſt horrible and dreadfull time of bloudſhed. His dead bodie was afterwards ſolemnly by his ſonne Solyman buried in a new temple at CONSTANTINOPLE, which he to the imitation of his father and grandfather had for that purpoſe before built. Vpon his tombe is engrauen in the Greeke, Turkiſh, and Sclauonian tongues, this ſhort Epitaph. 1520

The death of Selymus.

The iuſt iudgement of God.

Hic maximus adſum Selym, qui orbem domui.
Non bella relinquo, ſed pergo inquirere,
Non vlla me fortuna potuit euertere:

In Engliſh thus,

Lo here I lie great Selymus, which held the world in feare:
The world I leaue, but not the wars, which I ſeeke though not here.
No fortunes force, or victors hand, could take from me the ſpoiles:
And though my bones lie buried here, my ghoſt ſeekes bloudie broiles.

tion of his kindred. A little before his death he commended his sonne Solyman to Pyrrhus Bassa; straightly charging him, that after his death he should leaue the Persian, and turne his forces altogither vpon the Christians. And the more to incense him to the effusion of bloud, he left him the liuely counterfeit of himselfe hanging at his bed side, with sundrie bloudie precepts breathing forth his cruell and vnmercifull disposition.

The Inſcription of the Table.

Sultan Selymus Othoman King of Kings, Lord of all Lords, Prince of all Princes, the ſonne and nephew of God.

On the right hand of the Table were written Greeke verſes to this ſence.

B

The prince that ſafely ſeekes to raigne, and hold his ſtate in quiet reſt, Muſt neuer ſuffer troubled care to harbour in his princely breſt:
Nor thinke it ſinne to ſpill the bloud of his moſt neere and deareſt kin,
Not of his brother, ſo thereby aſſured ſafetie he may win.
Law, faith, deuotion, and ſuch like, to breake them all he muſt not ſpare,
Nor conſcience make of any thing, to rid him from aſpiring care.
This is the way and onely meane that may protect a princes ſtate,
And ſet him ſafe without all feare, whileſt none may liue whom he doth hate.

The blondie and tyrannicall precepts left by Selymus to his ſon Solyman, which hee afterwards moſt aſſuredly kept as is to be ſeene in his life following.

On the left hand of the Table was written in the Sclauonian tongue.

Of him that ſeekes to worke thy woe, deſerue not to be counted kind:
But take him for thy mortall foe, and plague him with reuenging mind.
The rotten lym is cut away for feare of doing further harme:
The gentle prince doth beare ſmall ſway, if no abuſe can make him warme.
Forbearance makes men more offend, and to preſume of further grace,
It doth but ſtrength to rebels lend, to thruſt their ſoueraigne out of place,

D

At the lower end of the ſame Table was written in Turkiſh verſe.

What prince in perſon dareth not in open field to meet his foe,
And therewith vnappauled heart, his deadly darts himſelfe to throw:
But hides his head for feare of harme, and ſhuns the danger of the field,
When martiall minds with courage bold withſtand their foes with ſpeare and ſhield:
E Let him well know, how that in vaine he beareth armes but for a ſhow,
And that the honour of the field will neuer ſuch a coward know.
Ne let him hope to gaine the ſpoyle by any warres he takes in hand,
That feareth with courageous mind his enemies forces to withſtand.

THE LIFE OF SOLYMAN, THE FOVRTH, AND MOST MAGNIFICENT EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

THe death of Selymus was with all carefulneſſe concealed by Ferhates the onely Baſſa then preſent, for feare leaſt the Ianizaries and ſouldiours of the court getting knowledge thereof, ſhould after their wonted manner in the time of the vacancie of the empire, ſpoile the merchants and ſtrangers in places where they lay in garriſon, and eſpecially in the imperiall citie: and not ſo contented after their accuſtomed inſolencie preſcribe vnto the greateſt Baſſaes at their pleaſure. For preuenting whereof, Ferhates diſpatched a truſtie meſſenger with letters in poſt to Solyman the onely ſonne of Selymus, then lying at MAGNESIA, certifying him of the death of his father; and that he ſhould deſerue well of his peaceable ſubiects by haſtening his comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, whileſt all things were yet in good order, in time to repreſſe with his preſence the feared diſordered proceedings of his men of warre.

Solyman hauing to his great content peruſed the Baſſaes letters, as one deſirous enough of the empire; yet conſidering the cruel diſpoſition of his father (who vpon a meere iealous conceit of his aſpiring mind, and for certain words by him let fall in diſlike of his fathers extreame dealing, had practiſed moſt vnnaturally to haue taken away him hy poyſon: which danger he eſcaped only by the carefulneſſe of his mother, who miſdoubting the worſt, cauſed the poiſoned rich ſhirt ſent to him from his father to be firſt worne by one of his chamber, wherof he in ſhort time after died) and alſo that the letters were ſigned onely by Ferhates, and the news not ſeconded from any of the other Baſſaes: fearing ſome hidden & ſecred plot of his father tending to his deſtruction, durſt not aduenture to remoue from his charge, but returned the meſſenger as one to whom he gaue little or no credit. Ten daies thus ſpent, and the death of Selymus nothing as yet ſuſpected; Ferhates vnderſtanding by his meſſenger the warineſſe of Solyman, and that he expected more aſſured aduertiſement, ſent preſently vnto the other great Baſſaes Pyrrhus and Muſtapha at HADRIANOPLE, that they ſhould without delay repaire vnto the court: vnto whom at their comming he declared the death of the emperour. Which after they had ſeene to be true, they by another ſecret and ſpeedie meſſenger aduertiſed Solyman againe thereof, firming thoſe letters with all their hands and ſeales: whereby Solyman now aſſured of his fathers death, preſently put himſelfe vpon the way, and by long and painfull iournies in few daies came to SCVTARIVM, called in auncient time CHRISOPOLIS, ouer againſt CONSTANTINOPLE. Where he was met with the Aga or captaine of the Ianizaries, and by him tranſported in a gallie ouer that ſtraight paſſage to CONSTANTINOPLE; where at his landing the Ianizaries by the appointment of their captaine were readie to receiue him, knowing as yet nothing of the death of Selymus, vntill that Solyman being now in the middeſt of them, the captaine with a loud voice ſaid vnto them, Behold your emperour. Whereupon they all with great acclamation cried out, Long liue the great emperour Solyman: which conſent of the men of war, is vnto the Turkiſh emperours the greateſt aſſurance of their eſtate. And ſo with much triumph he was by them

Solyman hardly perſuaded that his father was dead.

brought into the roiall pallace, and placed in his fathers ſeat in the yeare 1520. in which yeare G alſo Charles the fift was choſen emperour of GERMANIE. The Ianizaries diſappointed by the Baſſaes of the ſpoile of the merchants, eſpecially Chriſtians and Iewes, receiued of the bountie of Solyman a great largious; and in the beginning of his raigne had their accuſtomed wages ſomewhat augmented alſo, to their wonderfull contentment.

Solyman was about twentie eight yeares old when he began to raigne, and was at the firſt ſuppoſed to haue bin of a mild and peaceable diſpoſition: ſo that the princes to whom the name of Selymus was before dreadful, were now in hope that a quiet lamb was come in place of a raging lyon. But in ſhort time they found themſelues in that their expectation far deceiued; and eſpecialy the Chriſtian princes bordering vpon him, vnto whom he became a far more dangerous enemie than was his father before him; conuerting his forces moſt part of his long raign vpon H them, which Selymus had almoſt alt ogither imployed againſt the kings of PERSIA and ÆGYPT, the greateſt princes of the Mahometan ſuperſtition.

The firſt that felt his heauie hand was Gazelles Gouernour of SYRIA: who preſently vpon the death of Selymus, thinking himſelfe now diſcharged of the oath of obedience which he had giuen to Selymus, but not to his ſucceſſours; and earneſtly deſiring to reſtore againe the kingdome of the Mamalukes lately ouerthrowne, gathered togither the remainder of the diſperſed Mamalukes, which ſpeedily reſorted vnto him out of all parts of ASIA and AFRICKE: and alluring with rewards the leaders of the wild Arabians, with great numbers of the countrie people of SYRIA diſcontented with the Turkiſh gouernment, entred into open rebellion, and by force of armes draue the Turks garriſons out of BIRTHA, TRIPOLIS, and diuers other cities I of SYRIA, taking them into his owne poſſeſſion. And the better to effect that he had taken in hand, he ſent embaſſadors to CAIRE, vnto Cayerbeius, who had of Selymus receiued the gouernment of Ægypt, the vnworthie reward of his horrible treaſon; perſuading him by any means to take reuenge of the iniurie and wrong before done to the Mamalukes, and by killing of the Turkes garriſons to make himſelfe Sultan of Ægypt, and reſtore againe the kingdome of the Mamalukes, offering him therein the vttermoſt of his deuoire and ſeruice. But Cayerbeius, either not truſting Gazelles his old enemie, or aſhamed by new treaſon to augment his former diſhonour, or els (which was moſt like) miſdoubting his owne ſtrength in performance of ſo great an enterpriſe: after he had attentiuely heard what the embaſſadors had to ſay, cauſed them preſently in his own ſight to be put to death as traitors, and with all ſpeed certified Solyman therof; K who without delay ſent ſent Ferhates baſſa with a ſtrong armie into SYRIA. Which thing Gazelles hearing, and hauing in his power moſt of the cities of SYRIA, retired himſelfe with all his armie into the ſtrong citie of DAMASCO; whither at length, Ferhates the great Baſſa by long march came alſo. Gazelles (reſolued to trie the fortune of the field, and ſo either by ſpeedie victorie or honourable death to end the matter, rather than to ſuffer himſelfe to be ſhut vp within the wals of the citie (vpon the comming of the Baſſa valiantly iſſued forth with all his power, and gaue him battel; which for the ſpace of ſix houres was moſt cruelly fought, and many ſlaine on both ſides. At length Gazelles being oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies (being eight times more in number) and hardly aſſailed on either ſide, was inforced to fight in a ring, and there L Gazelles ſlaine. performing all the parts of a worthie generall and valiant ſouldiour, honourably died togither with his Mamalukes in the midſt of his enemies, leauing vnto them a bloudie victorie. Gazelles thus ſlaine, the citie of DAMASCO with all the countrie of SYRIA without any more adoe yeelded againe vnto the Turks obedience, which the Baſſa tooke in ſo good part, that he would not ſuffer his ſouldiours to enter into the citie, then richly ſtored with commodities of all ſorts, brought thither by merchants out of diuers parts of the world.

Gazelles gouernour of Syria rebelleth againſt Solyman.

SYRIA thus pacified, the Baſſa went to CAIRE in ÆGYPT, and there commending Cayerbeius for his fidelitie, confirmed him in his gouernement; and enuaying againſt the crueltie of Selymus (ſo to pleaſe the Ægyptians) wiſhed them to hope for all happines vnder the peaceable gouernment of the new Sultan Solyman. And ſo when he had ſet all things in order in both the prouinces of SYRIA and ÆGYPT, returned againe to Solyman. M

The yeare next following, Solyman by the counſell of Pyrrhus Baſſa his old tutor (a mortall enemie vnto the Chriſtians) and by the perſuaſion of the Ianizaries reſolued to beſiege the ſtrong citie of BELGRADE, otherwiſe called TAVRVNVM, ſcituat vpon the borders of HVNGARIE, where the riuer Sauus falleth into Danubius. Which citie his great grandfather Mahomet (ſurnamed

A named the Great, and before him the warlike Amurath) had with all their power, long time before to their great losse and dishonour, vainely attempted. Wherein vntill that time were reserued the ensignes, then taken from the Turks, to their no small griefe, with other trophies of the glorious victories of the worthie captaine Huniades, and the great king Mathius Coruinus his sonne. Wherefore Solyman sending his armie before, was come as farre as SOPHIA a citie in SERVIA (the place where the Turkes great lieutenant in EVROPE is alwaies resiant) before that the Hungarians were aware of his comming: for they liuing at ease all the time that Vladislaus raigned, and now sleeping in securitie vnder the young king Lodouicus his sonne, a man of no experience; who contenting himselfe with the title of a king, suffered himselfe to be pilled and
B poled by his nobilitie and great clergiemen (inuerting all the wealth of the land to their owne priuat gaine) that he was not able to raise any sufficient power to go against his puissant enemie; especially his nobilitie, in whose hands rested the wealth of his kingdome, promising him much, but performing indeed nothing. Huniades with his hardie souldiours, the scourge and terror of the Turks, was dead long before; so was also Mathias that fortunat warriour: after whom succeeded others giuen to all pleasure and ease; to whose example the people fashioning themselues, forgot their wonted valour, & gaue themselues ouer to sensualitie and voluptuous pleasure. So that Solyman without let, presented his armie before the citie of BELGRADE, & with bat- Belgrade woon by Solyman.
C terie and vndermining in short time became lord thereof, hauing lost few of his people in that siege. How much the losse of that strong citie concerned the Christian common wealth, the manifold and lamentable miseries which afterwards insued by the opening of that gap, not vnto the kingdome of HVNGARIE only, but to all that side of Christendome, did, and yet doth most manifestly declare. It was woon by the Turkes the nine and twentieth day of August in the yeare 1521.

After the taking of the strong citie of BELGRADE, Solyman returning to CONSTANTINOPLE, 1522 brake vp his armie and there lay still almost all the yeare following. During which time, he caused great preparation to be made at CALIPOLIS and other his ports, for rigging vp of a great fleet: which caused the Italians, Venetians, and them of the RHODES, to looke about them, as men carefull of their estates, fearing that those forces would ere long be imployed against some or all of them.

D About the same time Philippus Villerius a man of great wisedome and courage, then follow- Philippus Villerius chosen great master of the Rhodes.
ing the French court, was in his absence by the knights of the RHODES chosen Great master of that honourable companie: who embarking himselfe at MARCEILLES, after a long and dangerous iourney (being not without the knowledge of Solyman hardly laied for at sea by Cortugogli a famous pirat of the Turks, whose two brethren the knights of the RHODES had but a little before surprised at sea and slaine, and then held the third in prison) arriued in safetie at the RHODES, where he was with great ioy and triumph receiued.

The great Bassa, by whose graue aduise Solyman was contented in all his waightie affaires to be directed, consulting with the other Bassaes of diuers great exploits which was first to bee taken in hand, for the honour of their emperour and inlarging of his empire, were of diuers opi-
E nions concerning the besieging of the RHODES. Pyrrhus the Bassa of greatest account, dissuaded the taking in hand of that action, as too full of difficultie and danger: producing for proofe thereof the example of the great emperour Mahomet, Solymans great grandfather; by whom it was vnfortunatly attempted, and in fine shamefully abandoned. But Mustapha next in place and reputation to Pyrrhus, extolling the power and fortune of Solyman, said, That the greatnesse of their emperor was not to be concluded within the attemps of his predecessors, as wel appeared by the late taking of BELGRADE; from whence first Amurat, and after him Mahomet, two of the most warlike princes of the Turks, had with great dishonour beene repulsed: and should no doubt with like good fortune preuaile against the RHODES also, being able (if need were) to bring more men before it than were stones in the wals thereof. Which hee so confidently affirmed, with extenuating the power of the Rhodians, that he seemed to make no doubt of the good successe of that warre: presumptuously affirming, that vpon the first landing of Solymans great armie, they of the RHODES would without delay yeeld themselues and their citie into his hands.

Amongst others of great experience, whose opinions Solyman was desirous to haue, before he would take so great a matter in hand, was the famous pyrat Cortug-Ogli, a man of a mischie-uous and cruell nature, but of great experience in sea matters. Who presented to Solyman by G Mustapha and Ferhates, two of the greatest Bassaes, going before him, after due reuerence done, and commaunded to deliuer his opinion, spake vnto Solyman as followeth:

Cortug Ogli the pyrat perswadeth Solyman to besiege the Rhodes.

The greatnesse of your deserts (most mightie and puissant emperour) maketh mee (being by you so commaunded) at this time frankely to speake what I thinke may bee for the glorie and honour both of your maiestie and empire. I dayly heare the pittifull lamentation of the miserable people of MITILENE, EVBŒA, PELOPONESVS, ACHAIA, CARIA, LYCIA, and all alongst the sea coast of SYRIA and ÆGYPT, bewayling the spoile of their countries, the ransacking of their cities, the taking away of their cattell and people, with other infinite and incredible calamities, which they dayly suffer of the crossed Rhodian pyrats, no man withstanding them: many a time heue these wretched H people holden vp their hands to me for helpe, most instantly requesting mee to bee a meane for them to your imperiall Maiestie, whereby they might be protected from the iniurie, rapine, and slaughter of these cruell rouers. Wherefore in their behalfe I beseech your sacred Maiestie, by the most reuerend name of the holy prophet Mahomet, and by your owne most heroicall disposition, to deliuer your afflicted subiects from these their most cruell enemies, and at length to set them free from the furie, captiuitie, and feare of these pyrats, more grieuous vnto them than death it selfe: and consider with your selfe, that this iniurie and insolencie tendeth not so much to the hurt of your poore subiects and oppressed people in priuate, as to the dishonour and disgrace of your imperiall name and dignitie; which if any other Christian king or prince should offer, your Maiestie I know would not suffer vnreuenged:
and will you then suffer these robbers, cut-throats, base people gathered out of all the corners of Chri- I stendome, to wast your countries, spoile your cities, murder your people, and trouble all your seas? for who can passe by sea to TRIPOLIS, DAMASCO, ALEXANDRIA, CAIRE, CHALCIDE, LESBOS, CHIOS, nay vnto this your imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, without most certain and manifest danger of these rouers? What haue wee heard euerie Spring this many yeares, but that the Rhodians had taken some one or other of your ports, led away your people into miserable captiuitie, and carried away with them the rich spoiles of your countries? And that which is of all other things most dishonourable, this they doe vnder your nose, and in your sight, in the middest and heart of your empire. Pardon mee I beseech you most mightie emperour, if I too plainely speake what I thinke: For whatsoeuer I say, I say it to no other end, but that you should now at length doe that which should many yeares agoe haue beene done. We your most loyall subiects may not, nor ought not, for the encrease of K our Mahometane religion, and for the enlarging of your empire and honour, to refuse to aduenture our goods, our bodies, our liues to all hazard and danger without exception. If you likewise be caried with loue of glorie and renowne, or rauished with the desire of neuer dying fame; in what warres can you more easily gaine the same, or better imploy vs your seruants, than in vanquishing and subduing the RHODES, the reputed bulwarke of Christendome, which onely keepeth vs from their countries? But some will perhaps say, your aunce stors haue in former times vnfortunately attempted that citie: so did they also BELGRADE in HVNGARIE: yet hath your happie fortune to your immortall fame brought the same vnder your subiection, being far more strongly fortified than it was in times past:
and doe you then despaire of the RHODES? Cast off such vaine and needlesse misdoubt, the Turkish em- L pire hath alwaies growne by aduentures and honourable attempts: therefore make hast to besiege it both by sea and land. If your subiects mourning vnder the heauie burthen of the Christian captiuitie, built it with their owne hands for the Christians; cannot they now at libertie, desirous of reuenge, and fitted with oportunitie, with like hands destroy the same? If it please you to vouchsafe but to looke into the matter (most dread Soueraigne) you shall see that there is a diuine occasion by the procurement of our great prophet Mahomet presented vnto your most sacred Maiestie, now that the Christians of the West are at discord and mortall war amongst themselues. Your Maiestie is not ignorant, that in managing of wars, the opportunitie of the time is especially to be followed; and that when occasion serueth, all remissenesse and delay is to bee carefully auoided: the changes of times are most tickle, and if you suffer your good hap now to passe ouer, you shall perhaps in vaine afterwards pursue the same when it is fled M and gone.

Solyman by nature an ambitious young prince, prickt forward thus also by the persuasions of Cortug-Ogli and others, seeking their further credit and preferment by fitting his ambitious humour: but most of all by the instigation of the Bassa Mustapha, resolued to goe in person himselfe

A ſelfe againſt the RHODES. And firſt to make ſome proofe of what ſpirit and courage Villerius the new choſen Great Maſter was of, in whoſe ſufficiencie the greateſt part of the defence of the citie was ſuppoſed to conſiſt: to him by way of a little cold friendſhip, he ſent a meſſenger with this ſhort letter thus directed.

Solyman by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, greateſt Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE and TRAPEZOND, moſt mightie king of PERSIA, ARABIA, SYRIA, and ÆGYPT, lord of ASIA and EVROPE, prince of MECHA and ALEPPO, ruler of HIERVSALEM, and Maſter of the Vniuerſall
B ſea: to the reuerend Father Phillippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Maſter of the RHODES, and Legat of ASIA greeting.

I am glad of thy comming and new promotion, which I wiſh thou maieſt long and happely enioy, for that I hope thou wilt in honour and fidelitie exceed all them which haue before thee ruled in the RHODES: from whom as my anceſtors haue withdrawne their hand, ſo I after their example ioine with thee in amitie and friendſhip. Ioy thou therefore my friend, and in my behalfe reioice of my victorie and triumph alſo: for this laſt Summer paſſing ouer Danubius with enſignes diſplaied, I there expected the Hungarian king, who I thought would haue giuen me battell, I tooke from him by ſtrong hand BELGRADE, the ſtrongeſt citie of his kingdome, with other ſtrong holds thereabouts: and hauing with fire and ſword deſtroied much people, and carried away many moe into captiuitie, as a triumphant conquerour, breaking vp mine armie, am returned to my imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, from whence farewell. Solymans letter to Villerius, Great Maſter of the Rhodes.

C The great Maſter hauing read theſe letters, and well conſidered of the ſame, perceiued forthwith Solymans meaning, and that peace was offered him in words and ſhew, but warre in deed and meaning. Which becauſe he was readie by force to repulſe, he rewarded the Turkes meſſenger, and ſent backe with him another of his owne, a priuat perſon. For the Rhodians did ſeldome vouchſafe to ſend any honourable embaſſadours to the Turkiſh emperours (with whom they for moſt part liued in hoſtilitie) either the Turkes to them. By this meſſenger he anſwered Solymans letters with other of like vaine, as followeth.

D

Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, to the Turke.

I right well vnderſtand your letters which your meſſenger brought vnto me. The friendſhip you write of, is as pleaſing to me as diſpleaſing to Cortug-Ogli your ſeruant, who went about to haue intercepted me vpon the ſuddaine, as I came out of FRAVNCE: but failing of his purpoſe, ſtealing by night into the Rhodian ſea, he attempted to haue robbed certaine merchants ſhips bound from IOPPE to VENICE: but ſending my fleet out of my hauen, I ſtied his furie, conſtrained the pirat to flie and for haſt to leaue behind him the priſes he had before taken from the merchants of CRETE. Farwell from the RHODES. The anſwere of Villerius to Solymans letter.

E By this anſwere Solyman perceiued, that hee was well met withall in his owne fineneſſe, and that he ſhould not ſo eaſily carrie the RHODES, as he had before done BELGRADE. Yet being fully in himſelfe reſolued to trie his fortune therein, hee called vnto him certaine of the cheefe commanders of his warres, to whom he opened his whole determination in his ſort.

Although I doubt not worthy cheefetaines, but that you are of the ſame mind now that you haue beene alwaies of, in the inuading of other nations: yet I haue thought it good in matters tending to the common glory and good of vs all, to vſe your generall aduice and counſell. Since the time that my father left this world, wee haue made warre with diuers nations and people: The Sirians by nature vnconſtant, and prone to rebellion, wee haue by force reduced to their former obedience: The Sophi, that
F mighty king, nephew vnto the great king Vſun-Caſſanes by his daughter the ſiſter of king Iacup, in heart and deed our mortall enemy, not contented with the kingdomes of ASSIRIA, MEDIA, ARMENIA the greater, PERSIA, and MESPOTAMIA, wee haue our forces ſhut vp within the compaſſe of his owne dominions: The laſt yeere running through HVNGARIE, both on this ſide and beyond Danubius, we tooke BELGRADE the ſtrongeſt fortreſſe of that kingdome: and whatſoeuer elſe we attempted, wee ſubdued. Yet for all that (to ſpeake plainely of my ſelfe) my minde greater in Solymans Oration to his men of war declaring his purpoſe of beſieging the Rhodes.

in conceit than mine empire, and the bloud of Othoman, findeth no contentment in theſe victories. G
For whatſoeuer you haue yet done, although it be great, yet I deeme it all but little, in regard of your worth: my deſire carrieth me further. This haue I alwaies aboue all things moſt earneſtly deſired, to ſet vpon the Rhodes, and vtterly to root out all the ſtrength and forces, yea the very name of thoſe Rhodian ſouldiers. And haue not you alſo no leſſe than my ſelfe deſired the ſame? How often haue I heard you crying out, The Rhodes, The Rhodes? I haue expected the time that being diſcharged of other warres I might here employ my whole ſtrength and power. That we ſo long deſired, is now come: there was neuer greater opportunitie of good ſucceſſe offered, a great part of the wals of the citie of the Rhodes now lying euen with the ground; which cannot in ſhort time be repaired, eſpecially in their want of coine. Beſide this, the garriſon in the caſtle is but ſmall, and their aid from France farre off, which will either come too late when the the citie is loſt, or that which I rather beleeue, neuer. H
For neither will the French king being at mortall warres with the Germane emperour, and lord of Italie) ſuffer his ſtorehouſes to be diſfurniſhed, or his ports bared of the neceſſarie defence of his ſhipping. Neither doe you beleeue that the Spaniards (diſtreſſed at home with famine, warre, and ciuile diſcention) will eaſily come hither out of Sicilia and Campania with ſupplies of men and victuall. But you may perhaps thinke, that great danger is to be feared from the Venetian fleet, and the Iſle of Crete, which I aſſure you is not ſo: for I know (although I will not now manifeſt the ſame) how I haue preuented that miſcheefe. Wherefore courageous ſouldiers (borne to the ſubduing of all Chriſtendome, much more of the Rhodes) with cheerefull hearts follow me your Soueraigne againſt theſe your moſt perfidious and cruell enemies. How long I pray you will you ſuffer that ſtaine and diſgrace to ſtick vpon the Othoman familie, and generally vpon all the name of the Turkes, which theſe Rhodi- I ans caſt vpon vs the laſt time they were beſieged? Which was not ſo much done by their valour, as by the vnfortunat counſell of my great grandfather Mahomet, calling home Meſithes Paleologus his Generall in that warre, for one vnluckie aſſault. But admit that their valour gained them victorie, will you therefore alwaies ſuffer theſe piraticall excurſions vpon our maine and Iſlands? the ranſacking of cities and countries? the carrying away of your cattell and richeſt ſubſtance? the captiuitie and ſlaughter of your wiues and children? the ſlauerie of you neereſt friends and kinſmen? So helpe me great Mahomet it ſhall not ſo be: I vow in deſpight of Chriſt and Iohn, in ſhort time to ſet vp mine enſignes with the Moone in the middle of the market place of Rhodes. Neither doe I ſeeke any thing vnto my ſelfe, more than the honour of the enterpriſe; the profit I giue vnto you my fellow ſouldiers, their coine, plate, iewels (which is reported to be great) their riches and wealth is all yours, to carrie home K with you vnto your wiues and children. Wherefore let vs now with all our forces and courage ſet forward to the beſieging of the Rhodes.

Solymans purpoſe thus made knowne, and the ſame with one accord of all his captaines well liked: Pirrhus the eldeſt Baſſa and of greateſt authoritie, who at the firſt diſſuaded the warre, ſtanding vp in the middeſt of the reſt, ſaid:

I cannot but much admire the great wiſedome and rare vertues of our young emperour, who ſo wiſely and aduiſedly hath declared all the deepe counſels of a worthie cheefetaine in taking of warre in hand. L Bleſſed be Mahomet, thrice and foure times bleſſed is this empire, bleſſed is our eſtate, and bleſſed are we with ſuch a prince, which carrieth with him in his warres not onely men and habiliments of warre, but moſt deepe wiſedome and policie. Which wholſome manner of proceeding, if we had alwaies before our eies, and would follow, we ſhould in ſhort time bring vnder our ſubiection not the Rhodes onely, but all the kingdomes of the Chriſtians. Yet beſide that which our emperour hath moſt carefully and conſiderately deuiſed, mine age and experience would exhort you, by gifts, promiſes, rewards, and all other meanes whatſoeuer, to corrupt if it were poſſible the very cheefe and principall citizens of the Rhodes, thereby to enter into their moſt ſecret deuices and counſels: which how it may be wrought, I will in few words giue you to vnderſtand. I as a man indifferent, deſirous of peace and quietneſſe, will by meſſengers and letters induce the Great Maſter to ſend ſome honourable embaſſage to our dread Soueraigne, which if I M can once bring him vnto, then let me alone with the reſt.

Solyman maketh preparation againſt the Rhodes.

This counſell of the old Fox pleaſed all the hearers well, but aboue others the emperor himſelfe, who gaue him in charge with all diligence and ſpeed, to proue what he could doe: the other captains he commaunded to prepare the greateſt forces they could, both for land and ſea ſeruice.

A ſeruice. Which preparation was ſo great both at CONSTANTINOPLE and other places, that it could not long be kept ſo ſecret, but that newes thereof was brought to the RHODES the fourth day of Februarie: which newes dayly increaſing and ſtill confirmed by more certaine reports, Villerius the great maſter for more certaine intelligence, ſent a Chriſtian of EPIDAVRVS, who could perfectly ſpeake the Turkiſh language, as a ſpie to CONSTANTINOPLE; who by ſecret letters from thence gaue him knowledge that the Turkes were preparing a great fleet, and raiſing a mightie armie, aduertiſing him alſo of a wonderfull proportion of artillerie prepared for batterie: but againſt whom was not commonly knowne, ſome deeming it to be for the inuaſion of ITALIE, ſome for the RHODES, others ſuppoſing it to be for CIPRVS or CORCIRA: which
B diuerſitie of coniectures, made many (whoſe conceits auerted from themſelues the fortune of that war) to be more careles and ſecure. But whileſt euery man was of opinion, that it was made againſt any man rather than himſelfe; certaine aduertiſement was giuen to the Rhodians from diuers places by letters from their friends and confederats, That the Turks did with extraordinarie diligence keepe ſtraight watch and ward in all their ports therabouts alongſt the ſea coaſt, otherwiſe than they were before accuſtomed: which ſeemed to prognoſticat ſome farther matter than the defence of their frontires. Villerius carefull of his charge, as the marke whereat the enemie aimed, prouided with all poſſible diligence great ſtore of victual, armour, weapons, ſhot, powder, and whatſoeuer els neceſſarie for the defence of the citie.

Villarius prepareth to make reſiſtance againſt the Turkes.

The new wals of the citie, and AVERONE fortreſſe, by Baſilius enginer to the emperor Charles
C the fift (a worke begun in the time of Fabritius Caractus the late Grand maſter, but not yet finiſhed) was now with all diligent labour ſet vpon, euery man putting his helping hand vnto ſo neceſſarie a worke. Whileſt theſe things are with ſo great endeauour and labour a doing, a meſſenger came from CONSTANTINOPLE, ſent from the old Baſſa Pyrrhus, a ſharpe witted and cunning fellow; who with much filed ſpeech in moſt ample manner doing his meſſage, by the way, painted forth the great towardlineſſe and courteous nature of the Turkiſh emperour Solyman, with the great commendation of Pyrrhus Baſſa his maſter: deliuering from both of them letters vnto the Great maſter of this purport.

Solyman by the grace of God King of Kings, Lord of Lords, &c. to the D reuerend father Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great maſter of the RHODES, and legat of ASIA, greeting.

I am certainly informed that my letters are deliuered vnto thee; which for that thou vnderſtoodeſt them aright, I cannot expreſſe how much it pleaſed me. Truſt to it, that I am not contented with the victorie I got at BELGRADE; I hope for another, nay I aſſure my ſelfe thereof, which I will not hide from thee, whom I am alwaies mindfull of. Farewell from CONSTANTINOPLE.

Solymans letter to Villerius.

Pyrrhus great counſellor to the mightie emperour Solyman, to Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great maſter of the RHODES
E and legat of ASIA, greeting.

Your letters, greater in meaning than character, I haue deliuered vnto our moſt mightie emperour: but the bearer thereof I would not ſuffer to come to his preſence, leaſt he ſhould be too much offended with ſo baſe a meſſenger. Vnto whom from henceforth ſend men of worth, commendable for their yeares and diſcretion, with whom his Maieſtie may (if he ſo pleaſe) conferre and conclude of matters concerning the common good: which thing if you ſhall doe, it ſhall neither repent you of the doing thereof, nor me of my counſell. The meſſenger I ſend, bringeth letters vnto you alſo from our great emperour; to whoſe diuine excellencie how you are to anſwere, you are alreadie admoniſhed. Farewell from CONSTANTINOPLE.

Pyrrhus Baſſa his letters to Villerius.

F

Theſe letters being openly read, drew the minds of the Rhodians diuerſly. Such as altogether wiſhed for peace, meaſuring others after their owne plaine meaning and integritie, commended the counſell of Pyrrhus, ſaying, That he being an old man of great experience, was not ſo deſirous of our quiet, as of the quiet of his prince & countrie: and therefore wiſhed by wiſdome to order that which the young prince ſought for by war, fearing the vncertainty of mans fragillitie, fragilitie, the common chance of warre, the violence of fortune, which hath oftentimes in a moment with a handfull of men ouerthrowne moſt mightie kings with their ſtrong armies. The perſuaſion of theſe men tooke ſuch effect, that one of the kinghts of the order called Raymund March, a Spaniard, a noble gentleman of great courage and verie eloquent, skilfull alſo in the Turkiſh tongue, and then moſter-maſter, was appointed to haue beene ſent embaſſadour vnto the Turkiſh emperour. Many there were of a contrarie opinion, which ſuſpecting fraud and deceit, ſaid it were good to beware of the enemies counſell: asking, to what end this embaſſage were? for ſhould we proclaime warre (ſay they) againſt the moſt mightie tyrant, not-yet our profeſſed enemie, who writeth all peace? or ſhould we intreat for peace, no warre as yet proclaimed? that he which as yet is afraid him ſelfe, may now vnderſtand that he is of vs feared. Beſides that, with what ſecuritie, with what face can our embaſſadours go, vnrequeſted of the Turkiſh emperour, without his ſafe conduct thorow thoſe countries which we daily burne and ſpoile? But they ſhall ſhew Pyrrhus the great Baſſaes letters forſooth, his protection, his credit and authoritie ſhall defend them from all iniurie and wrong; as though the ſeruant ſhould preſcribe lawes vnto his maſter, and ſuch a ſeruant as is moſt like vnto his maſter (that is) cruell, falſe of faith, a hater of all Chriſtians, but eſpecially of vs Rhodians: whom the mercileſſe tyrant hauing in his power, with his nauie and armie in readineſſe, ſhall with cruell torture enforce to diſcouer vnto him our prouiſion, the ſecrets of our citie and Order. This opinion of the wiſer ſort, was greatly confirmed by the too much curioſitie of the meſſenger which was ſent, who with all diligence enquired of the ſtate and ſituation of the citie, of the number and ſtrength of the Order. Wherfore in concluſion he was ſent backe again, accompanied but with one priuat ſoldier to carrie the Great maſters letters vnto the Turkiſh tyrant: the tenure whereof was thus. G H I Philippus Villerius Great maſter of the Rhodes, vnto the Turke greeting.

Villerius his anſwere to Solymans letters.

That you are mindfull of me, greiueth me nothing: and I am alſo mindfull of you. You repeat your victorie in HVNGARIE, wherewith not being contented you hope for another: nay you promiſe and aſſure your ſelfe thereof, before you haue attempted the warre. Beware you deceiue not your ſelfe; mens expectations neuer deceiue them more than in warres. Farewell from the RHODES. K

The other letters written to Pyrrhus, were to this effect.

Philippus Villerius Liladamus Great maſter of the Rhodes, to Pyrrhus the Baſſa.

Villerius his anſwer to Pyrrhus the Baſſa his letters.

I haue aduiſedly conſidered thy letters, with the behauiour and diſpoſition of thy meſſenger. As I contemne not thy counſell, ſo will I not follow the ſame, whileſt my men of warre doe ſpoile the countries and ports of thy lord and maſter; which I beare withall, by reaſon of the iniuries they haue ſuſtained of the Turkiſh pirats. But I will call them home, and will ſend embaſſadours vnto thy great lord: ſo that thou before ſend me ſafe conduct vnder thy maſters great ſeale, for their ſafe comming and returne. Farewell from the RHODES. L

But theſe letters were neuer deliuered vnto the great Turke, or the Baſſa: for as ſoone as the Turkiſh meſſenger was come ouer into the maine, he preſently tooke horſe, which was there in readineſſe for him, and poſted towards CONSTANTINOPLE with as much ſpeed as he could, leauing the Chriſtian meſſenger his companion behind him; who returning backe again to the RHODES, and telling what he had heard and ſeene, gaue them all great occaſion to diſpaire of peace: whereupon Villerius ſent into CRETE to hire certaine companies of Cretenſian archers. In the meane time aduertiſement was giuen vnto the Great maſter by letters from the iſland of NAXOS, That the Turkes were readie to put their fleet to ſea with the firſt appearance of the new Moone: which thing they moſt ſuperſtitiouſly obſerue in the beginning of all their great actions. The ſame newes was brought alſo by certaine merchants of the iſland of PATHMOS, who came to the RHODES with a great ſhip laded with corne from EVBŒA; vnder the colour of the ſale whereof, they (by the commaundement of the Turkes, to whom they were tributaries)

Villerius aduertiſed of the comming of the Turkes fleet. M

A ries) diligently noted all that was done in the citie, ſhortly to be beſieged. The Great maſter with no leſſe diligence, ſent diuers of his ſmall gallies amongſt the iſlands and alongſt the maine, to learne what might be of the enemies doings. Ioannes Lupus one of the knights of the order, and captaine of one of theſe gallies, meeting with a great ſhip of the Turks laded with corne, tooke her and brought her home to RHODES. But Alphonſus captaine of another of the gallies, lying in harbour in one of the iſlands, and ſuffering his men to ſtraggle too farre into the land, was ſet vpon by a Turkiſh pirat and taken.

About the ſame time the Turks by often fires made vpon the maine in the night ſeaſon, gaue ſigne vnto the Rhodians, that they were deſirous to haue ſome parley with them, as their man-
B ner was. Wherupon one Meneton a French man, one of the knights, by commandement of the reſt of the order, was ſent with a gallie well appointed to the maine to ſee what the matter might be; and with him was ioyned Iacobus Xaycus a paymaſter for the gallies, that he might of the inhabitants of the place, and his friends there dwelling, diligently enquire of all things concerning the intended warre: for this Xaycus, beſides that he was a skilfull ſea man and one that knew the coaſt well, had alſo good experience in ciuile affairs, and was wonderfully beloued & made of by the Turkiſh merchants whoſe language hee had perfectly learned. Drawing neere the ſhoare, he found the Turkiſh merchants making merrie vpon the maine, with their carpets, cotten wooll, and ſuch like merchandiſe about them as they vſed to exchange with the Rhodian merchants for woollen cloathes: vnto theſe merchants he gaue due ſalutations, gaging his faith
C for their ſafetie, and they likewiſe to him. But being requeſted to come aſhore to make merrie vntill one of his familiar and old acquaintance might be ſent for, who as they ſaid was not farre off; he anſwered, that he could not ſo doe, except they would firſt deliuer a pledge for him a ſhipboord. The perfidious Turkes laughing as it were at his needleſſe feare, willingly ſent their merchandiſe, and a pledge aboord the gallies. Xaycus then going aſhoare, and embracing the Turkiſh merchants which met him: vpon a ſigne giuen, was forthwith beſet on euerie ſide and taken priſoner, and by poſt horſes conuaied with all ſpeed to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was with moſt exquiſit torments that could be deuiſed for any man to endure, enforced to confeſſe whatſoeuer his cruel enemies could deſire. After Xaycus was by treacherie thus loſt, then began their prouident wiſedome to be highly commended, which were the occaſion, that the
D decree made for ſending embaſſadours vnto the Turke, was againe reuoked. The hoſtage giuen for Xaycius, being brought to the RHODES and examined, was found to be a ſimple countrey fellow whom the Turkes had of purpoſe well apparelled to deceiue the Rhodians: who frankly and plainly according to his ſimple knowledg, anſwered to all things that were of him demaunded; as that the Turkes were making great preparation for ſea vpon the coaſts of CARIA and LYCIA, and had taken vp many ſouldiers in the countries thereabouts to ſend vnto the frontiers of his dominions towards SYRIA, for defence of the ſame againſt the Perſians. All which was true: For Solyman to put the Rhodians out of all ſuſpition of inuaſion (whom hee knew carefully to obſerue his doings) ſent the ſouldiers whom he had leuied in the countries neereſt vnto the RHODES, farre away againſt the Perſian, as if he had meant nothing againſt
E the RHODES, and ſo vpon the ſudden to ſet vpon them with his armie brought out of EVROPE, before they were aware. But this his deuiſe ſerued to ſmall purpoſe, for the great Maſter perceiuing by many circumſtances, but eſpecially by that late calamitie of Xaycus, that the RHODES was the place the Turkiſh tyrant longed after; & fearing that delay might bring farther danger, cauſed a ceſſation from all other buſineſſe to be proclaimed, vntill all things neceſſarie for defence of the citie were accompliſhed: watch and ward was kept in euerie ſtreet, the great artillerie planted vpon the wals and bulwarks, companies appointed for the defence of euery place, the publike armorie full of all warlike prouiſion was open, all the ſtreets were full of men carrying weapons, ſome to one place, ſome to another. At which time a generall muſter was taken by the chiefe men of the Order, where were found about 5000 free men able to beare armes,
F amongſt whom were 600 knights of the Order, and 500 ſouldiers of CRETE; the reſt were for moſt part marriners, able bodies, who in the time of the ſiege did great ſeruice, encouraged by their ſea captaines: the iſland people which repaired into the citie, ſerued to little other purpoſe but to dig and carrie earth vnto the rampires: and the citizens (except it were ſome few of the better ſort) were for the moſt part weak and of ſmall courage, not able to endure any labour or paines, and yet hardly to be kept in order and gouerned, great ſpeakers, but ſmall doers, greater in ſhew than in deed. The great Maſter hauing carefully prouided and ordered all G things needfull for defence of the citie, and fearing nothing more than the faint hearts of the citiſens, cauſed them all to be called together; for encouragement of whom, he ſpake vnto them as followeth:

Villerius his Oration vnto the Rhodians.

Valiant gentlemen and worthie citiſens, wee heare that the Turke our mortall enemie is comming againſt vs, with a huge armie raiſed of diuers nations: from whoſe naturall crueltie and wonted periurie except we defend our ſelues by force, one and the ſelfeſame danger is like to befall me, my knights, and you all. For wee haue with common conſent and hand grieuouſly ſpoiled him both by ſea and land, and you are by booties taken by ſtrong hand out of his dominions, enriched: and at this day we keepe his people in greeuous ſeruitude, and he ours; but he iniuriouſly, and we moſt iuſtly: For his anceſtors (wearie of the darke dennes and caues of the mountaine CAVCASVS, their naturall dwelling) without right, title, or cauſe, incited onely with couetouſneſſe, ambition, and the hatred of our moſt ſacred religion, haue driuen the Chriſtians out of SYRIA: and afterwards, oppreſſed the Grecians in GRECIA; where not contented to haue deſtroied the people, with one ſimple kind of death (as barbariſme is euer cruell and mercileſſe) they haue with moſt exquiſit and horrible torments butchered many thouſand of that nation. All whom, this wicked proud youth (whoſe miſcheefe exceedeth his yeares) an euill neighbour to all men, not contented with the dominions of ARABIA, SYRIA, ÆGYPT, the greateſt part of ASIA, and of many other places moe, ſeeketh in tyrannie, murther, ſpoile, periurie, and hatred againſt Chriſt and Chriſtians, farre to excell: and forceth himſelfe to the vttermoſt of his power, to take from vs our Iſlands, and to ſubdue the Chriſtian countries; that ſo at length being lord of all, and commaunder of the World, he may at his pleaſure ouerthrow the Chriſtian cities, kill the Chriſtians, and vtterly root out the Chriſtian name, which he ſo much hateth. For the repulſing of which intollerable iniurie, we haue eſpecially choſen this Iſland of the RHODES for our dwelling place, becauſe the ſame ſeemed more commodious than any other for the annoying of this barbarous nation. We haue done what in vs lay, holpen by you: we know by proofe your great valor and fidelitie, which we now haue not in any diſtruſt. Wherefore I will not vſe many words to perſuade you to continue in your fidelitie and loyaltie, neither long circumſtance to encourage you to play the men: ſithence worthie minds are not with words either encouraged or diſmayed. But concerning my ſelfe and my knights of the Order, I will ſpeake a few words. I with them, with whom (as I hope) the Chriſtian princes and other my knights of the Weſt will in good time ioine their forces, are moſt readie and preſt to defend your ſelues, your children, your wiues, your goods, the monuments of your anceſtours and ſacred temples dedicated to the ſeruice of our God. Which opinion that it may remaine firme and fix in your minds, if nothing elſe, my faithfulneſſe in your warres, my bodie not yet altogether ſpent but able enough to endure paines and trauell, the nobilitie of theſe worthie knights of the Order, their loue towards you, and their hatred towards your enemies, were ſufficient to confirme: but beſide this, the ſtrength of this citie, which this noble Order hath with infinite charges ſo notably fortified with ditches, wals, towers, and bulwarkes againſt all the force and furie of artillerie, is ſuch, that no citie may worthely be compared, much leſſe preferred before the ſame. It is wonderfully ſtored with all kind of weapons and warlike proniſion: we haue laid vp plentie of wine, fleſh, and corne, in vaults, ſo that neither wet weather nor wormes can attaint the ſame: of wood and wholeſome water not to be taken from vs, things neceſſarie for men beſieged, we haue plentie: and able men ynow for the defence of the citie. All which things promiſe vnto vs aſſured victorie, and ſuch end of the warre as we wiſh for. Beſides this, Neceſſitie, which giueth courage euen vnto cowards, will enforce vs to fight. Yet ſtandeth on our ſide true religion, faith, conſcience, deuotion, conſtancie, the loue of our countrey, the loue of our libertie, the loue of our parents, wiues, children, and whatſoeuer elſe we hold deare: Whereas they bring with them the proud commaund of their captaines, infidelitie, impietie, vnconſtancie, a wicked deſire of your bandage, of your blood, and the blood of your parents, wiues, and children. Out of doubt (beloued citiſens) our good God will not ſuffer ſo many good vertues to be ouercome by their foule vices. Wherefore be you in minds quiet and ſecure, and trouble not your ſelues with forboding feare of your enemies; onely continue in the fidelitie and loyaltie which you haue alwaies kept inuiolat and vnſpotted toward this ſacred and honourable fellowſhip, in moſt dangerous wars, and hardeſt chances of fortune: and if need ſhall ſo require, with courageous hand ſhew your valour againſt your enemies, and make it known vnto the Spaniards, French, Italians, Hungarians, and Engliſh, That the Rhodians are of power to daunt the Turkiſh pride, and to auert their fleets and armies from ITALIE, which they haue

For they of* PETELINVM, beſieged by the Carthaginenſians, for want of victuall, thruſt their parents and children out of the citie, the longer to hold out the ſiege, and liued themſelues with hides and leather ſod or broyled, and leaues of trees, and many other homely things, by the ſpace of eleun moneths: and could not be ouercome vntill they wanted ſtrength longer to ſtand vpon the wals, and to hold their weapons in their hands. They of CASSILINVM beſieged by Hanniball, held out vntill a poore mouſe was ſold for much money. You muſt of neceſſitie keepe watch and ward in your Stations: if your houſes chance
C to be beaten downe with the enemies artillerie, you muſt haue patience: for why, they ſhall bee repaired againe, and it is not a matter of ſuch importance, that we ſhould therefore yeeld vnto our enemies, in whoſe courteſie and fidelitie no aſſurance is to be repoſed. For beſides that he is by nature cruell and vnfaithfull, he can by no meanes be gentle and faithfull towards vs, which haue done him ſo much harme: who onely (as he himſelfe ſaith) haue oftentimes to his griefe interrupted the courſe of the victories of him the conquerour both of ſea and land; whom he hath ſo many times aſſailed by open force with all his ſtrength, wit, craft, deceit, and policie: yet alwaies hitherto in vaine, almightie God ſtill protecting vs, whom aboue all things (moſt deare citizens) I wiſh you to ſerue and call vpon: For except he keepe and defend the citie, the watchmen do but watch in vaine.

D This cheerefull ſpeech wonderfully encouraged the hearers, eſpecially the vulgar ſort, eaſily carried away with pleaſing words. But whileſt they in their iolitie dreame of nothing but of triumph and victorie, the wiſer ſort poſſeſſed with care, ceaſed not to do what in them lay, to procure, That the good commonly forewiſhed, might in fine come to effect. Amongſt others, Clement biſhop of the Greekes, a man both for his place and deuout maner of liuing had in great reputation amongſt them, laboured earneſtly by dayly exhortations to perſuade the Greeks his countriemen in that great and common danger with heart and hand to ioine with the Latines in defence of the citie: for although the gouernment was altogither in the Great Maſter and his Knights, which were Latines; yet the people both of the Iſland and citie were for moſt part Greekes, who liked not altogether ſo well of the Latine gouernment, but that they did manie
E times repine thereat. Howbeit the matter was at that time ſo ordered by the good perſuaſion of the biſhop, aud good gouernment of the Great Maſter, that they all agreed as one man to ſpend their liues in defence of the citie; and were ſo far from feare of the comming of the barbarous enemie, that many of the vulgar people, in whom appeareth commonly more heat than wit, wiſhed rather for his comming than otherwiſe. But looke what they had fondly wiſhed, proued afterward to their coſts ouer true. For within a few nights after, the Turkes by fire made in the night time vpon the maine, gaue ſigne of parley vnto the Rhodians. Whereupon a gallie well appointed, with a long boat, was preſently ſet forth to ſee what the matter was: which drawing neere vnto the ſhore, was hailed by a Turke, accompanied with a troupe of horſemen, deſiring the captaine of the galley to ſend ſome on ſhore, with whom they might more conueni-
F ently parley: which thing the captaine refuſing, What, ſaid the Turke, art thou afraid of Xaycus fortune? To whom the captaine in threatening manner anſwered againe, Xaycus whom you haue contrarie to your faith and oath taken, troubleth me not; neither am I afraid of you, whom I truſt not: but if you haue any thing to ſay, let me heare it, or els get you further off, otherwiſe I will ſpeake to you by the mouth of the cannon. Then one of the Turkes comming to the water ſide, laid downe letters vpon a ſtone, ſaying, that in them was contained that they had in charge:

which said, he presently set spurs to his horse, and departed with the rest of his companie. The captaine sending out his long boat for these letters, found them directed in this sort: G

Solyman by the grace of God King of Kings, Lord of Lords, most mightie Emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE and TRAPEZONDE, &c. vnto the reuerend father Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great master of the RHODES, to his knights, and all his people in generall.

The purport of which letter was as followeth: H

Solymans threatening letters to the Rhodians.

The compassion I haue of my distressed subiects, and the great iniurie you doe mee, hath moued mee to wrath. Wherefore I command you without delay to yeeld vnto me the Island and citie of the RHODES, willingly and charitably graunting you leaue safely to depart with all your riches, or to tarrie if you so please vnder my obeisance, your libertie and religion in no part infringed with any tribute or imposition. If you bee wise, preferre friendship and peace before bloudie warre: for vnto them which are by force subdued, are reserued all extremities which the miserable vanquished vse to suffer of the angrie conqueror: from which neither your owne force, nor forreine aid, nor huge wals, which I will vtterly ouerthrow, shall be able to defend you, fare you well. All which shall assuredly be performed, if you shall make choice rather of my friendship than of my force: wherein you shall neither be deceiued nor circumuented; I take to witnesse God the creator of heauen and earth, the foure writers of the Euangelicall historie, the foure score thousand prophets descended from heauen, and amongst them our highest prophet Mahomet, the reuerend ghosts of my father and grandfather, and this my sacred and imperiall head. From our pallace at CONSTANTINOPLE. I

When these letters were openly read in the counsell chamber at the RHODES, some were of opinion, That it was good to answere the Turkish tyrant roundly, therby to giue him to vnderstand that they were not afraid of his threats: othersome thought it no wisedome with hard words to prouoke so great an enemie to further displeasure. Thus whilest euery man would haue framed an answere according to his owne disposition, in conclusion it was agreed vpon, to giue him no answere at all. K

The same day these letters came to the RHODES, which was the fourteenth day of Iune, one of the Turks great commanders at sea with thirtie gallies, the forerunners of the Turkish fleet, arriued at the Island of CHOS, famous in ancient time for the birth of Hippocrates the great physition, and the wonderfull picture of Venus left there vnperfited by Apelles, which for the excellencie therof neuer man durst afterward take in hand to perfect: which fruitfull and pleasant island was then at the arriuall of the Turks, part of the dominion of the RHODES. The Admiral of this fleet here landing his Turkes, began to burne the corne which was then almost ripe, with the countrie villages round about. With which iniurie, Preianes gouernor of the Island (a man of great courage and valour) moued, with a chosen companie of footmen, and certaine troupes of horsemen, suddenly set vpon the Turks, in diuers places dispersed abroad far into the countrie, with such a terrible crie of the countrie people, and instruments of war, that the Turks being therewith amazed, ran away as if they had bin mad, and were many of them slaine without resistance; and had not the gallies lien neere the shore, to receiue them that were able to flie thither, there had not one of them which landed escaped the hands of the Island people. The Turks hauing receiued this losse, left the Island, and put to sea againe. L

The Rhodians for the most part now assured and out of doubt of the comming of the Turks, by the persuasion of Gabriell Pomerolus vicemaster, and other men of great experience, pluckt downe the suburbes of the citie, and laid them euen with the ground, their pleasant orchards also and gardens neere vnto the citie, they vtterly destroyed; the great master for example sake beginning first with his owne, being a place of great delicacie, lying vnder the wals neere vnto the French bulwarke: and taking into the citie all such things as they thought needfull for the enduring of the siege, they vtterly destroyed all the rest, were it neuer so pleasant or commodious, within a mile of the towne, leauing all that space as euen and bare as they could possibly make it; to the intent, that the enemie at his comming should find nothing neere the citie whereof to make vse. But whilest the pleasures and delights of the suburbes are thus in defacing, another M

A more heauie and wofull ſight preſented vnto the eies of the citizens, filled the citie with greater mourning and penſiueneſſe than did the comming of the enemie. The miſerable multitude of the poore countrie people, ſome bringing wood, ſome corne, ſome cattell, ſome foules, and other ſuch neceſſaries as they had, out of the countrie into the citie (for ſo the Great maſter had commaunded) after whom followed great numbers of women and children weeping, with diſchiueled haire, ſcratching their faces and tearing themſelues after the manner of the countrie, wringing their hands and caſting vp their eies to heauen, beſeeching God with heauie countenance and flouds of teares to defend the noble citie of the RHODES, and themſelues from the furie of their enemies. Which multitude of countrie people with their prouiſion, being packt vp into narrow rooms in the houſes of the citizens, and their cattel ſtaruing for want of fodder, B afterwards corrupted the aire; whereof inſued rotten agues and the flix, during the time of the ſiege. But after the citie was giuen vp, ſuch a plague and mortalitie followed, as deſtroyed great numbers of the Turks and poore Chriſtians; which knowing not whither to go, choſe rather there to die than to forſake their natiue countrie.

The feare of the countrey people

The Generall of the Turkiſh fleet which landed in the Iſland of CHOS, and was of purpoſe ſent by Solyman to prouoke the Rhodians to battel at ſea; before he with his whole power came to beſiege the Iſland, came daily with twentie gallies halfe thoſe narrow ſeas ouer, betwixt LYCIA and the RHODES, leauing the reſt of his fleet riding at anchor at the promontorie called GNIDVM (not farre from the citie of RHODES) readie to aide him as need ſhould require: this maner of brauerie he vſed many daies togither, hoping thereby to allure the Rhodians out C of their hauen to giue him battell; knowing, that if he ſhould therein obtaine the victorie, it were at that time little leſſe than the taking of the citie, or if he could by cruell fight but weaken the forces of the Rhodians, he ſhould therein do his maſter good ſeruice, and greatly further his victorie by diminiſhing the number of the defendants. When he had many daies without intermiſſion in this proud manner come halfe ſeas ouer, and ſometimes paſſing further came and lay at the mouth of the hauen, as it were daring them to fight: the Rhodians not wont to be ſo braued at their owne doores, moued with the intollerable inſolencie of this proud Turke, by their continual importunitie cauſed the Great Maſter to call a counſel, to conſider whether they ſhould fight with this fleet of the Turkes or not. The councellors by the appointment of the Great Maſter aſſembled: the Chanceller, a man of great authoritie and ſpirit, famous for his no- D ble acts both at home and abroad, and chiefe of them which were of opinion this fleet of the Turks was to be fought withall, ſaid:

The chancellor his ſpeech perſwading the Rhodians to fight with the Turkes gallies.

So great diſgrace was not longer to be ſuffered, but preſently reuenged: For (ſaid he) the hugie fleet of the Turks, I do not ſay at whoſe force and fight, but at whoſe verie name many men do tremble and quake (which for all that is vnto vs no great noueltie, for euerie yeare we heare of the like) is as a head to be ioined vnto theſe pyraticall gallies, as members; and then will it be moſt expedient (which will be a moſt eaſie thing for vs to do, hauing the better both for ſtrength of ſhipping and number and valour of men) to giue that great head ſuch a blow and wound, by cutting off theſe limbes, that it ſhall euer after ſtagger and faint for want of ſtrength: or elſe there is no other fleet at all prepared againſt E vs to follow this, and then this diſcomfited we ſhall be at quiet. Which thing in my iudgement (though others which feare their owne ſhadowes and the falling of heauen, ſay otherwiſe) is moſt like to be true: for the great Turke is not ſo ſottiſh to come hither, the fitteſt time of the yeare being ſo far ſpent, in the latter end of Iune, to beſiege this citie, and ſuch a citie as he knoweth to be moſt ſtrong, wanting nothing that is needfull, and thorowly manned with valiant ſouldiours, from whence his anceſtors haue beene with loſſe and ſhame repulſed: when as the remainder of the Sommer will be ſpent, before he can encampe himſelfe and place his batteries; and Winter time as you know is vnfit for any ſiege, eſpecially in this Iſland, wherein they can find no hauen or harbour to reſt in. Wherefore on Gods name let vs ſet vpon our proud enemies: and let vs not for a few threatning words ſent vnto vs from a fearfull youth, vpon a fineneſſe and pollicie leaſt we ſhould follow the tayle of his fleet bound for ſome other F place, ſit ſtill like cowards within our wals with our hands in our boſomes, as men which for feare and dread durſt not to ſhew their heads. Which our cowardiſe and want of courage we (forſooth) call Fabius his pollicie: but I would to God we were like Fabius, but I feare we ſhall proue more like Antiochus, the Ætholians, the Vitellians, all whoſe courage conſiſted in words, vainly hoping to gaine the victorie by ſitting ſtill and wiſhing well. But the helpe of God is not to be gotten by womens prayers and ſupplications cations or theſe faint-hearted pollicies, which cowards call aduiſed counſell : but victorie is gained by aduenturing and expoſing our ſelues to danger and perill. G with theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches he ſo moued the multitude, which commonly conceiueth moſt courage vpon the greateſt vncertainties, that they deſired that they might fight, ſaying, That they would waſh away that foule diſgrace with the bloud and ſlaughter of their enemies; for why, they wanted not weapons, courage, or hands (as they ſaid) to doe it withall.

For all this, the grauer ſort of the counſell (without whoſe conſent the maſter might in ſuch caſes doe nothing) thought it not good in ſo dangerous a time to aduenture any great part of their forces, which they ſhould afterwards want for the defence of their citie. The Turkiſh generall deceiued of his expectatiõ, and perceiuing that the Rhodians would not be drawn forth H to battell at ſea, withdrew his fleet twelue miles off, vnto a place called VILLANOVA; where caſting anchor and landing his men, he burnt the corne all thereabouts which was now almoſt ripe, but forſaken of the people as a thing deſperate: as for the people themſelues, they were all fled, and had retired themſelues either into the citie of the RHODES, or elſe into ſtrong caſtles in other places of the Iſland.

The worthie cõmendation of the Great maſter.

At the ſame time, certain troupes, of horſemen ſent forth to haue skirmiſhed with the Turkes that were burning of the corne, were by a meſſenger ſent from the Great maſter, cõmanded to retire: For the prouident Generall ſought by all meanes to reſerue his ſoldiors for greater dangers, which he juſtly feared in the expected ſiege: during which time he ſhewed himſelfe a moſt politike captaine and braue ſoldior, he would many times by day eat his meat with his ſoldiors I as one of them, and moſt part of the night keepe watch himſelfe walking vp and downe, reſting himſelfe when he was wearie vpon ſome ſtone or piece of timber or other homly ſeat, as it chãced. In time of aſſault he was alwaies more forward & aduenturous than the graue cõunſellors wiſhed, fearing neither ſhot nor enemie: yet did he alwaies more commend diſcreet counſell grounded vpon reaſon, than proſperous actions commended but by their euents. And that which a man would wonder at, amongſt ſo many cares in middeſt of ſuch diuers and dãgerous chances, he carried alwaies ſuch a grace and majeſtie in his cheerfull countenance, as made him to be of the beholders both reuerenced and loued. All the time he could ſpare from the neceſſarie cares of his waightie charge, from aſſaults, & the natural refreſhing of his body, he beſtowed in prayer and ſeruing of God; he did oftentimes ſpend the greateſt part of the night in the church K alone praying, his headpiece, gorget and gauntlets lying by him: ſo that it was commonly ſaid, that his deuout praiers and carefulneſſe would make the citie inuincible.

The Turks fleet deſcried at ſea troubleth the Rhodians.

The ſix and twentith day of Iune early in the morning, newes was brought into the citie from the watch-tower ſtanding vpon S. Stephens hill about a mile from the citie, That a moſt hugie fleet was diſcried at ſea, making thitherwardes all alongſt the Weſterne coaſt of LYCIA. this bad newes much troubled the citie, although it was not of moſt men vnexpected; all places was filled with tumult and hurly burly, euerie man meaſured the greatneſſe of the danger by the meaſure of his owne feare, & ſuch a pitifull crie was in euerie place as is vſually in cities preſently to be beſieged. Hereupon publike praiers were made through all the citie, and euerie man L with great deuotion beſought the God of heauen, That as it was his pleaſure that the Rhodians ſhould at that time be the champions of the Chriſtian religion; ſo he would giue them ſtrengh and victorie againſt their enemies, and to turne the calamities of warre vpon the enemies of his name. Their deuotion ended, the gates of the citie were ſhut vp, and people from all places ran vnto the wales, great flockes of women, children, and aged men not able to ſtand without a ſtaffe going forth of their houſes to gaze vpon that dreadfull fleet (wherein was aboue 200 ſailes as is reported) filled the ſtreets, the tops of the high towers and houſes. The formoſt of the fleet was the Admirall of CALIPOLIS, to whom Solyman had committed the charge of all his nauie, and to aſſaile the citie by ſea: The rearadmirall was Cara Mahometes an arch pirat, who was afterwards ſlain with a great ſhot out of the citie. The viceadmirall in the middle of the fleet with a M great ſquadron of gallies, hauing a faire Weſternly wind, ſtrucke ſaile directly before the mouth of the hauen (which was on both ſides defended with two ſtrong towers well furniſhed with great artillerie) and began to row towards the citie: whereupon an alarum was raiſed, the trumpets ſounded, and many haſted vnto the bulwarke which defended the left ſide of the hauen, which the enemie ſeemed to direct his courſe vnto; and was in deed more ſubiect to danger

A than the other. But the Turke ſeeing himſelfe in danger to be ſunke with ſhot from the bulwarke, was glad to get himſelfe farther off vnto the reſt of the fleet: the Rhodians from the wals with lowd outcries ſcornfully deriding him for his fooliſh attempt. This great fleet in exceeding brauerie and triumph paſſing by the citie in ſight of the Rhodians (ſtanding vpon the wals with enſignes diſplayed) did not more terrifie them, than they were themſelues terrified to behold the ſtrength of the citie and cheerefulneſſe of the defendants. But paſſing on, they came to the promontorie which the inhabitants call Bo, about three miles diſtant from the citie, Eaſtward: which ſmall harbour being not able to receiue ſo great a fleet, many of the gallies were enforced to ride it out at ſea, where they were by ſhot out of the citie oftentimes indangered and enforced
B to get them farther off. Whileſt the enemie was there landing his great ordinance and other inſtruments of war prepared for the ſiege, chuſing a place for his campe, tranſporting his land ſouldiors from the maine into the Iſland, viewing the ſtrength and ſituation of the citie, and in what place he might with moſt eaſe aſſault the ſame: the Rhodians in the meane time were not idle, but ſunke diuers deepe ſounds in many places of the citie neere vnto the wals, to diſcouer the enemies mines; and fortified their bulwarks with greater rampires; in which worke euerie man put to his helping hand without reſpect of age or calling. The Graund Maſter about that time ſent Lodouicus Andugus one of the knights of the Order, into SPAINE to Charles the emperor; and Claudius Ducenuillus another of the order alſo, to ROME to the Cardinals, and Italian knights of the Order; and from thence into FRANCE vnto the French king with letters craning
C the aide of theſe Chriſtian princes, for reliefe of the citie by ſea and land beſieged. But all in vain, for they carried away with the endleſſe grudge of one againſt another, or reſpecting only their owne eſtates, returned the embaſſadors with good words, without reliefe.

The Great maſter by his embaſſadours craueth aid of the chriſtian princes.

At this time Preianes gouernor of CHIOS (of whom we haue before ſpoken) a man comparable with any of the captains of that age, an excellent ſouldiour both by ſea and land, valiant and therto fortunat, of an inuincible courage, brought vp in the wars from his childhood; when he had by the ſpace of two or three daies hid himſelfe in the rocks at ſea, for feare of the Turkes great fleet, came by night in a ſmall pinneſſe to the RHODES, hauing deceiued the Turks watch: at whoſe comming the Rhodians wonderfully reioiced, for the ſouldiors repoſed greater confidence in no man than in him: And if any great exploit were to be done, him the Maſter truſted
D aboue any other: he alwaies in armes during the ſiege, encouraged the ſouldiors, ſearched the watch, ſuruaied the bulwarks, repaired the breaches; and ſuch labours as others accounted extreame miſeries, he cheerefully endured, as if they had bin but his pleaſures and recreations. At the ſame time alſo Gabriell Martiningus of BRIXIA, a moſt skilful enginer, came to the Rhodes out of CRETA; by whoſe induſtrie and cunning, 55 mines which the Turks did with infinit labour and charge make (by reaſon of the ſpringing of the water, and hardneſſe of the rockes) during the ſiege, were all by countermines diſappointed and defeated.

The commendation of Preianes.

The citie of the RHODES is ſcituat on a plaine ground, on euerie ſide to be beſieged, onely
E Northward it is defended with a goodly hauen, from whence it lyeth all Weſtward: betwixt it and the hils round about it, lieth a ſtonie plaine ground, not verie broad, but of greater length; theſe hils are full of ſprings, and orchards planted with Oliues, Fig-trees, Vines, and ſuch other fruits as ſuch drie and ſandie ground wil beare. But what by nature wanted, was by the hand and induſtrie of man ſupplied; for it was compaſſed about with a moſt ſtrong double wall, & deepe trenches, threatning the enemie with thirteene ſtately towers: and ſure againſt all aſſaults, with fiue mightie bulwarks: with diuers goodly faire gates: and that which was the greateſt defence of all, within the citie was alwaies kept a moſt exact & ſtraight forme of warlike diſcipline. The defence of the whole citie was thus proportioned: From the French tower (which with the greatneſſe and hight thereof ſeemed to mate the skie) ſtood the Frenchmen with the French Lillies in their enſignes, vnder their Commander Ioannes Abbinus a noble knight of the Order: from thence to S. Georges gate lay the ſtout Germains, with the Eagle in their enſignes: in the F third ſtation were placed the French Auergnois, with the Spaniards, for that the ditches in that place were neither ſo deepe nor broad as elſewhere: in the fift place lay the Engliſh garriſon, ouer whom the grand maſter himſelfe commanded: after them ſucceeded they of NARBONA: and laſt of all the Italians, in valour not inferiour to any of the reſt, vnder the leading of Petrus Balinus and Gregorius Morgutas. In euerie one of theſe ſtations were diuers valiant knights of the Order, whoſe names (worthie of eternall memorie) for breuitie we paſſe ouer, all men of themſelues ſufficient to haue taken vpon them the whole charge. G

A Turkiſh woman ſlaue, conſpireth to fire the citie.

The enemie was not buſier without the citie in placing his batterie, but traiterous minds were as buſie within to haue betraied the ſame. A Turkiſh woman, ſlaue to one of the rich citizens, had conſpired with certaine other her complices, at ſuch time as the Turkes ſhould giue aſſault vnto the towne, at one inſtant to ſet on fire the houſes wherin they dwelt in diuers places of the citie, that the defendants drawn from the wals to quench the fire, the Turkes in the meane time might the more eaſily enter. But this treaſon was in good time reuealed, and the offendors worthily executed.

The Turks had not at yet placed their batterie, when as they tooke a certaine hill, whereon ſtood the church dedicated to Coſmus and Damianus, directly ouer againſt the Engliſh ſtation: from thence (as it ſeemed, rather for exerciſing of their ſouldiours than for any great harm they H could do ſo farre off) they began with ſmall battering pieces to ſhoot into the citie: and afterwards they began to dig mines, and to caſt vp trenches: for the performance of which kind of worke, and for the filling vp of the towne ditches, they had brought with them fiftie thouſand pioners, men better acquainted with countrie labour and keeping of cattell, than with warres; which being inforced vnto their labour day and night, ſomtime with ſtripes, and ſometime with death, did with incredible celeritie bring that to paſſe, which was before thought impoſſible.

The painefulnes of the Turkes pioners.

They cut waies through the moſt hard ſtonie rockes, raiſing the plaines as high as mountaines, with earth brought two miles off, and laying the mountaines euen with the plaines, and yet they neuer wrought in ſafetie, but were miſerably rent in ſunder with the great ordinance out of the towne: and that which moſt of all troubled them, the Rhodians ſallying out vpon theſe ouer- I laboured people, hauing neither courage nor skill to defend themſelues, but truſting onely to their heeles, ſlew great numbers of them, and not of them only, but of others alſo appointed for their defence, whom the Rhodians (taking courage of their feare) fiercely purſued & ſlew downright. And when many others iſſuing out of the campe in great companies, thought to haue relieued their fellowes, the great ordinance before of purpoſe placed to moſt aduantage, ſo thundered from the wals amongſt the thickeſt of them, that the ground lay couered with the bodies and weapons of the dead Turkes. With which maner of fight, after the Rhodians had twice or thrice troubled the enemie, the Turkes for their more ſafetie wrought moſt vpon their mounts by night, keeping moſt ſtrong watch, for defence of their poiners, which for more aſſurance K they doubled in the day time, and bent their artillerie againſt the places which the Rhodians vſed to ſallie out at: which did not ſo much keepe them in, as the feare of weakning themſelues by often ſallies, knowing that one man was vnto them a greater loſſe, than vnto the enemie an hundred. Amongſt others which in the beginning of this great ſiege forced the vttermoſt of their deuices to the deſtruction of the Turks, were certaine mariners, who hauing the Turkiſh language perfectly, by leaue of the Graund Maſter (diſguiſing themſelues in the habit of Turks) departed by night out of the hauen in a ſmall boat, loaded with apples, plums, peares, millons, grapes, and ſuch other fruits as the time of the yere affoorded; and in the darknes came alongſt the coaſt, vnto that part of the Iſland whereunto the paſſage was out of the maine. There as if they had been Turks come from the maine, they landed their commodities, which the Turkiſh L ſouldiors bought greedily. When they had thus ſold their fruits, and in ſelling thereof diligently noted the ſpeech and talke of the ſouldiors concerning the ſiege, and were now readie to depart: certaine Turks which greatly diſliked the hard beginning of this ſiege, ſeeing themſelues if they did but ſtir, in danger to be ſet off with ſhot out of the towne, earneſtly requeſted the marriners to take them with them into the maine: which to do, at the firſt the marriners diſſembling, refuſed, as a thing dangerous: & beſides that, their boat was too little to receiue ſo many as would willingly haue gone with them. Yet with much adoe they ſuffered themſelues to bee intreated to take in ſeuen or eight, ſuch a number as the knew they could well maſter: who in hope of paſſing ouer into the maine, were (contrarie to their expectation) brought priſoners to the RHODES, where they were by Preianes brought vp to the top of the higheſt tower of S. Iohns M church, from whence they might ſee all about the countrey, and well deſcrie all the manner of the Turks camp, which they ſimplie diſcouered vnto the captain, and whatſoeuer els they were demanded: and amongſt other things confeſſed, that the ſouldiors were greatly diſcontented with the ſiege, hauing in the beginning thereof loſt ſo many men, and that they were readie to riſe in mutinie againſt their captaines, and would hardly by them be commaunded out of their trenches

A trenches and cabbins, ſaying, that all they did was but loſt labour: and that they ſhould find it another peece of worke to win the RHODES, than they had at BELGRADE: wherefore if they were wiſe, they ſhould in time depart before they had receiued further harme both from the enemie, and for want of neceſſaries, wherewith the ſouldiers began alreadie to be pinched. All which was then ſuppoſed to haue been ſpoken by the captiues to pleaſe them in whoſe power they now were: yet it appeared afterwards to bee all true. For Pyrrhus Baſſa conſidering the troubled ſtate of the campe, and the generall diſcontentment of the ſouldiers, whom he was at that time gladder to pleaſe than to puniſh, writ vnto Solyman at CONSTANTINOPLE, That if he would the ſiege ſhould goe forward, he ſhould without delay come in perſon himſelfe to the
B camp, for that the ſouldiers without regard of ſhame were readie to riſe in mutinie and to abandon the ſiege, refuſing to be commaunded by their captaines.

In the meane time whileſt Solyman prepareth himſelfe to ſet forward, the Turkiſh captaines vnderſtood by certaine fugitiues (whereof in all warres ſome are to be found) that the high ſteeple of S. Iohns church ſerued them of the towne for a watch tower: for which cauſe, and for deſpight of the Croſſe ſtanding vpon the top thereof, they laboured nothing more, than with continuall ſhot to beat downe that tower; which whileſt they were doing with great diligence, Solyman himſelfe came into the campe the 28 day of Auguſt in the afternoone: where finding in his armie all the ſignes of cowardiſe and feare that could be ſpoken of or deuiſed, and nothing done according to the command of ſuch as he had appointed for that charge, but all things out
C of order; he tooke more greefe to ſee that great diſorder, than he did pleaſure and good hope of two hundred thouſand ſouldiers which were in his armie. Yet for all that he was inwardly chafed with the heat of youth and indignation, againſt his own people as well as the Rhodians, he moderated himſelfe betwixt his owne rage and the offence of his ſouldiers, and calling them together, cauſed them to be diſarmed, not leauing among them ſo much as a ſword: and compaſſing them in with fifteene thouſand harquebuſiers whom he had brought with him well appointed, he ſtept vp into his royall ſeat, there ſet on high for the purpoſe; where ſitting downe, he pauſed a good while without any word ſpeaking, as if he had conſidered with himſelfe, whether he ſhould onely puniſh the authors of the mutinie, or elſe with the puniſhment of many to reuenge ſo foule a ſedition, little differing from open rebellion. But following in himſelfe the D milder reſolution, he thought it ſufficient to correct the multitude and common ſort of ſouldiers with ſharpe and bitter words: and after generall ſilence made, brake out into this choſlericke ſpeech.

Solyman cometh into the campe.

Slaues (quoth he) for I cannot find in my heart to call you ſouldiers, What kind of men are you now become? are you Turkes? men wont both to fight and ouercome? verely I ſee the bodies, countenances, attire, and habit of my ſouldiers; but the deeds, ſpeeches, counſels and deuiſes of cowardly and vile traitors. Alas how hath my opinion deceiued me? that Turkiſh force and courage is gone, the valour and ſtrength both of bodies and mindes, wherewith the Arabians, Perſians, Syrians, Ægyptians, Seruians, Hungarians, Bulgarians, Epirotes, Macedonians and Thracians were ſubdued,
E is loſt; forgetting your countrey, your oath, the commaund of your captaines, your obedience, and all other warlike diſcipline, you haue againſt the maieſtie of my empire refuſed to fight, like cowards betaken your ſelues to flight, for vaine feare of death and danger, not beſeeming men of warre. If any man ſhould at home but haue named the RHODES in your feaſts, amongſt your pots, in your aſſemblies or great meetings, you could then with your tongues brag to pull it downe, you had much adoe to hold your hands: heere when I would make proofe of your force and courage, it is nothing. But you thought perhaps, that the Rhodians ſo ſoone as they ſaw your enſignes before their gates, would ſtraight way yeeld themſelues and their citie into your power: Let all men ceaſe ſo to ſay or thinke, and beleeue me that know the truth, This baſe and infamous denne (which you ſee) is full of F moſt cruell beaſts, whoſe madneſſe you ſhall neuer tame without much labour and bloudſhed. Yet ſhall we tame them; for why nothing is ſo wild but it may at length be tamed: which except I bring to paſſe, I am fully reſolued and haue vowed vnto my ſelfe, Either heere to die or ſpend my daies: and if euer I doe or ſay otherwiſe, let this my head, my fleet, mine armie, and empire, be for euer accurſed and vnfortunate.

Solymans chollericke Oration to his ſouldiers.

And ſo without further ſpeech, deſiring rather to be accounted of his ſouldiers gentle than ſeuere

ſeuere, he pardoned them all their former offences, and ſwore them all againe to his obedience G
This mutinie ſo appeaſed all things were afterwards done with better ſucceſſe and greater care both of the ſouldious and commaunders. Firſt they planted in diuers places twelue great bombards, where with they threw vp ſtones of hugie waight into the ayre, which falling downe into the citie might breake downe the houſes and whatſoeuer elſe they lighted vpon: with the fall of Apella, a traitor one of theſe, the Great maſter was like to haue been ſlaine. Howbeit this proued a deuiſe of more terror then danger, for with 200 ſuch ſhot were but ten men ſlaine; which thing amongſt others, Apella a traiterous fugitiue declared vnto the enemie, with whom he had intelligence, as he himſelfe confeſſed being taken vpon ſuſpition and examined: for which his treaſon he was iuſtly executed.

The Turks batterie. The force of the batterie was more feared, wherin the Turks had planted fortie great pie- H ces of batterie, and amongſt them twelue Baſilisks (ſo aptly named of the ſerpent Baſiliſcus, who as Plinie writeth, killeth man or beaſt with his ſight) with theſe pieces the Turkes battered the wals continually; but lying ſomewhat farre off, did no greate harme.

At the ſame time alſo Solyman cauſed batterie to be laid againſt the tower of Saint Nicholas, ſtanding vpon a narrow piece of ground pointing far into the ſea, defending the hauen vpon the right hand, where ſometime ſtood the great Coloſſus of the Sunne, accounted the greateſt amongſt the ſeuen wonders of the world. Which caſtle was both ſtrongly and ſumptuouſly built at the charges of the dukes of BVRGONDIE, as appeared by their armes there engrauen in many places in marble. This tower was valiantly defended by Guido a French man, who had the charge thereof, with 300 ſouldiours, amongſt whom were 30 knights of the Order. I

The Turkes artillerie planted againſt the tower, was by the skilfulnes of the Chriſtian canoniers in ſhort time diſmounted with ſhot from the tower, and many of the gunners ſlain: ſo that they were glad to ſurceaſe any more to batter the tower by day, but lying ſtill all the day they began to batter the ſame by night, wherein they preuailed no more than they had before done in the day time; for the defendants warily obſeruing ſuch places as were likeſt for the enemie to place his batterie in, did ſo aptly place their ordinance againſt the ſame, and ſo to good purpoſe, that the Turks ſwore, there doings were by ſome means diſcouered vnto the enemies. So when they had in vaine beſtowed 500 great ſhot, and made a ſmall breach which they durſt not once attempt to enter, they ſhamefully abandoned that place alſo.

All this while Pyrrhus was buſie in working of mines to vndermine the citie, two and thirtie K of which mines the defendants fruſtrated with countermines; in which kind of worke many
The Engliſh bulwark blown vp. were loſt on both ſides: yet for all the carefulleſſe of the Chriſtians, the Engliſh bulwarke was vndermined by the enemie, and vpon the fourth day of September part thereof blown vp, with ſuch violence, that vnto them in the citie it ſeemed at the firſt to bee a generall earthquake; and therwith diuers Engliſh men were there ouerwhelmed. The Turks attempting preſently to enter, were by the grand Maſter and his followers with great ſlaughter repulſed.

But Muſtapha the Baſſa comming on with freſh ſupplies, and crying out of the cowardiſe of them which retired, renewed the aſſault: where for a while was fought a moſt ſharpe and cruell fight, the leaders cherefully encouraging their ſouldiors, and they likewiſe doing what was poſ- L ſible for men to do. All mens eares were filled with the thundring of the ſhot, noiſe of trumpets and drums, and crying of men. And vnto the Turkes it ſeemed that ouer their heads it rained deadly ſhot, ſtones, and fire: for the townſmen and women mingled with the ſouldiours caſt downe vpon the Turks, fire, ſtones, timber, and whatſoeuer els came to hand: ſo that they vnable longer to endure the courage and force of the Chriſtians, turned their backs and ran away by heaps, not expecting any ſigne of retreat, euerie man ſeeking to ſaue one: amongſt whom as they fled, the great ordinance ſhot off from the wals made a wonderfull ſlaughter. At this aſſault of the Turks were ſlaine (as ſome write) almoſt 2000, and amongſt them the maſter of the Turks ordinance, a man whom Solyman greatly loued: which victorie the Chriſtians gained not without ſome loſſe; for beſides ſome few others that were ſlaine, fiftie knights of the Order (men M worthie of eternall memorie) there ended their daies alſo.

The Turks aſſault the Engliſh bulwark the ſecond time, and are againe repulſed. The fift day after (which was the ninth day of September) Solyman by the perſuaſion of Muſtapha the great Baſſa, commaunded a freſh aſſault to be giuen to the Engliſh bulwarke, which was attempted by the Turkes with greater reſolution than the firſt. Seuen enſignes of the Turks were broken in by the ruines of the bulwarke, and had enforced the defendants, oppreſſed with number

A number to giue ground, when the Graund Maſter comming in with the enſigne of the Order, guarded with a companie of moſt valiant knights, draue them out againe by force, and made good the place. Muſtapha ſeeing his men retire, couragiouſly reſtored the battell by bringing on of new ſupplie, and other captains with threats, ſtrokes, and terror of death, enforced the ſouldiors (who had before turned their backs) now againe to fight. So that there began a more cruell fight than had before beene from the beginning of the ſiege; which was vnto the Chriſtians more dangerous, for that they were ouerwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkiſh ſhot. But in that extreamitie no man regarded either danger, or life, only this they remembred, That thoſe were their barbarous enemies, whom they muſt either victoriouſly ouercome or die therefore:
B with which furie the aſſault was continued by the ſpace of three houres, vntill at length Muſtapha with his Turks diſcouraged, with the loſſe of 2000 of their fellowes, & of three great noble men whom Solyman eſpecially fauoured, and ſore beaten by the Spaniards out of their flankers, were inforced to retire. Few of the Chriſtians in reſpect of ſo many enemies were ſlaine: yet had the enſigne of the Order bin then loſt, Ioachimus Cluys the enſigne bearer hauing both his eies ſhot out, had not Emericus Ruiaulx an Auernois, and one of the knights of the Order, with incredible courage reſcued the ſame.

After this ſecond aſſault, falling out ſo vnluckilie to the Turkes, Muſtapha the great Baſſa began to grow in contempt with Solyman: and Pyrrhus to keepe his credit by doing ſomething, with continual batterie of 17 great pieces did batter the mount neere vnto the Italian bulwark. Muſtapha Baſſa falleth into diſgrace with Solyman.

C At which time alſo Caſſius, Gouernour of BITHYNIA, annother of the Turkes great commaunders, laboured by vndermining to haue ouerthrowne the French bulwarke: ſo glad they were to attempt any thing to content their imperious great lord and maſter. But the indeauours of Caſſius was by countermines through the carefull diligence of Grabriell Chierus, hauing charge of thoſe works, fruſtrated: and Pyrrhus in the other place after he had by hot aſſault ſlaine them which were appointed for the defence thereof, and gained the mount, and brought a great feare vpon the citie, was againe with great loſſe ſhamefully repulſed, and by the commandement of Solyman cauſed to retire. At this aſſault the gouernor of EVBOEA, Solyman his lieutenant general, a man of great honour (if any of the Turks ſlaues are ſo to be accounted) was ſlaine, for whoſe death Solyman was exceeding penſiue and heauie.

D Muſtapha the Baſſa finding himſelfe in diſgrace with Solyman for the two vnfortunate aſſaults by him giuen at the Engliſh ſtation, determined if it were poſſible by a third to recouer his loſt credit: and for his better ſucceſſe therein, agreed with Achimetes another great commander, at the ſame time to aſſault the Spaniſh bulwarke: according to this reſolution Achimetes hauing with a mine ſodenly blown vp a great part of the wall of the Spaniſh ſtation, in the thick of the duſt and ſmoke, preſently entred his men, who by the ruines of the wall recouered the top of the rampires. Muſtapha alſo at the ſame inſtant hardly charged the Engliſh, ſo that in both places was made a hard and doubtfull fight. Muſtapha deſiring nothing more than with better ſucceſſe now to redeeme his former diſhonour, did what he might to incourage the ſouldiours, calling vpon them by name, and putting them in remembrance of their former victories. The Rhodi-
E ans on the other ſide mindful of their former honour, with the greatneſſe of the preſent danger, valiantly repulſed the enemie, and forced him with ſhame to retire. In this aſſault many Engliſh men were ſlaine, and Preianes alſo ſore hurt, hauing before ſlaine many of the Turks. Muſtapha beſide the loſſe of his men, had alſo two of his enſignes taken by Chriſtopherus Vaulderick Commendator of the Germain knights. Achimetes hauing woon the top of the wals, had there ſet vp the Turkiſh enſignes; but by the valiantnes of the defendants, & by means of certain ſmall pieces of ordinance, by Martiningus aptly placed in the houſes before the new made breach, and by force of ſhot out of the flankers on both ſides of the breach, whereof none fell in vaine, he was againe enforced to forſake the wals and to retire. The Engliſh bulwark aſſaulted the third time by Muſtapha. The Turks enſignes aduanced to the top of the wals are againe caſt downe.

The three and twentieth day of September the Turkiſh captaines hoping by meanes of a F mine which they had made againſt the Auergne bulwarke, to enter and win the citie; approaching the wals with great multitudes of ſouldiours, readie to haue entred vpon the blowing vp of the mine, which being met with a countermine out of the citie, wrough not ſuch effect as was by them expected: ſo that hauing receiued ſome harme, ſtanding in a place of great diſaduantage, and done nothing, they returned againe into the campe. Yet the expert captaines probably coniecturing that the wal might be inwardly ſhaken by the mine, although it were not by them them outwardly perceiued, caused that part of the wall to be most violently battered all the rest of that day and night following: and by the furie of their artillerie, made a faire and large breach. All that night was heard in the Turkes campe an vnwonted clattering of weapons, and of men running too and fro, as if there had been some great matter a doing; which the Rhodians coniectured (as the truth was) to be a signe of some great assault to be shortly giuen. G

Another breach made in the wals.

Solyman resolued the next day with all his force to assault the new made breach, after he had by himselfe in a melancholly mood walked vp and downe in his tent a great part of the night, sent for the chiefe commanders of his armie, to whom he declared his mind as followeth:

Your valour and wisedome (worthie captaines) needeth not any exhortation, yet the desperat madnesse of our enemies maketh me to speake vnto you these few words. Who whilest they yet doe, as from the beginning, as men without reason desperatly defend their citie rent with our artillerie, shaken with our mines, their churches and houses beaten downe about their eares, wearied and worne out with slaughter, labour, and wounds, which must needs befall men so often times assaulted: they worthely seeme vnto our souldiers men of inuincible force and courage; which opinion to haue remoued, much concerneth the happie and wished successe of our assault. Wherefore I would haue you with effectuall persuasion and bountifull promises to hearten on our men to the winning of this citie. Besides this, you shall open vnto them my purpose and intent, and that they should not thinke that they are brought hither to besiege one citie: but that in taking this one, they shall vpon the matter make a way into all the dominions of the Christians. Heere be the kinsmen, aliance, and friends of all the kings, princes and potentates of Christendome: heere is all our enemies treasure, the spoile whereof promised vnto our souldiers may serue to great purpose to encourage them forward: heere is store of ordinance, armour, and other warlike prouision, which shall both furnish vs, and in time to come miserably confound the rest of the Christians. We shall beside this, enioy a most goodly and rich citie, with a hauen of all other most commodious, from whence all things necessarie for warre may at all times as occasion shall require, by land and sea be supplied: which as they shall be to vs things of great importance, so shall we despoile our enemies of farre greater. This is their castle, storehouse, treasurie and armorie: this is the verie receptacle and place of refuge for all such as trouble the Turkes by sea: from hence shall we haue free scope and passage into Apvlia, Calabria, Sicilia, and many other Christian countries. But as for your selues valiant captaines, when as I consider how that you haue within these few moneths by your valour and wisedome subdued vnto my empire the strong citie of Belgrade, which my great grandfather Mahomet that mightie emperour could not with all his power get; I rest in great hope that these fierce and obstinat Christians shall not long be able to defend themselues in these their dens and lurking places. H I K

Hauing ended this speech, the captaines euerie one vnto his companie, made knowne what the great emperours will and pleasure was; and open proclamation made thorow all the camp, wherein the spoile of that rich citie was all granted vnto the souldiers as a prey and reward for the paines they were to take.

Solyman heauie with sleepe and care, laid himselfe downe vpon his pallet to take his rest. But the Great master (to whom the vnaccustomed stirre of the enemie portended some great matter) all that night in armes painfully viewed euerie part of the citie, cheerfully encouraging his souldiers to remember, That they did watch for the safetie of their countrey, their liues and libertie. It fortuned the same night, that a poore Christian seruing a Turke in the campe, calling secretly vnto the watchmen vpon the wals, gaue them warning that the Turkes prepared the next day to giue a generall assault vnto the citie. Which thing when the Great master vnderstood, because he would haue nothing done rashly or fearefully (as it commonly happeneth in things done vpon the sudden) called togither his knights, and spake vnto them as followeth. L

The Great master his oration vnto his knights

I am glad sacred companions and fellowes in armes, that the time is come when in one battell getting vnto your selues great honour, and defending your countrey, you may be iustly accounted the worthie defenders and reuengers of the Christian commonweale and name. The people against whom we are to fight to morrow, assaileth vs onely presuming vpon their multitude: But if wee measure valour, not by number, but by courage and prowesse, vndoubtedly a few resolute men will easily ouercome a multitude of cowards. You know your enemie, and the manner of his fight: you are to fight (most M

A (moſt worthie knights) with them whom you haue alwaies vanquiſhed at ſea, and in iuſt battell ſometimes ouercome by land, at ſuch time as with their whole power they aſſaulted your wals: omitting in the meane time manie hot skirmiſhes, wherein you euer put them to the worſt: Wherefore you and they in the aſſault to morrow ſhall haue ſuch courage, as conquerours and men conquered vſe to haue. Neither will they fight becauſe they dare fight, but becauſe the great tyrant and violent commaund of their captaines enforceth them thereunto. Wherefore remembring what you are by birth, what opinion the Chriſtian commonwealth hath conceiued of you, where you are and what you haue taken vpon you; take vp your armes with iuſt furie and indignation, and fight againſt them, following one franticke youth, as if you ſaw your ſlaues bearing armes againſt you: whereunto you are enforced, not onely by the indignitie of the wrong by them offered, but alſo by neceſsitie, which of it ſelfe is of power to make cowards va-
B liant and hardie. For heere we are in an Iſland from whence we cannot eſcape, and in a citie, whoſe rent and battered wals doe not ſo much protect and defend vs, as our weapons: wherefore to morrow wee muſt heere either vanquiſh them, or die therefore: to morrow ſhall giue vnto vs either ioyfull victorie, or a moſt honourable death.

As he was yet thus ſpeaking, news of the approch of the enemie cauſed him to make an end: and euery man haſted with ſpeed vnto the place of his charge. The enemie comming faſt on, with a moſt horrible crie (as their manner is) fiercely aſſailed the citie in fiue places, where the Engliſh, Spaniſh, Italians, Narbonenſes, and Auergnoys had their ſtations. To the aſſault of euery of which places, Solyman had appointed ten thouſand Turkes. Muſtapha the Baſſa
C calling vpon the name of his great prophet Mahomet, and promiſing vnto the ſouldiers the rich ſpoile of the citie, fiercely aſſailed the Engliſh ſtation, from whence he had been three times before ſhamefully repulſed. Pyrrhus the other great Baſſa with like furie aſſaulted the Italian ſtation. In both places was maintained a cruell and deadly fight; the Turks fighting for the prey, and the Rhodians for their liues and libertie. Neither was there any, of what degree or order ſoeuer, which did not that day fight for defence of the citie. The prieſts and religious were not then exempted, but fought among the other ſouldiers; women, children, and with them the aged fathers, beyond the ſtrength of their bodies and courage of their minds, brought weapons vnto the defendants, ſome ſtones, which they had digged out of the ſtreets, ſome burning pitch-barrels, ſome hoopes with wild fire, ſome ſcalding oyle, ſome boyling pitch: which being caſt
D downe vpon the enemies, troubled them ſo, as nothing was more feared; for vpon whom ſoeuer it fell, it ſtucke faſt, and ſo ſcalded their bodies, that they were glad to caſt downe their weapons to teare off their clothes, wherewith many of them rent off the skin and fleſh alſo. All which things fell ſo thicke vpon the Turkes, as if it had rained fire and ſtones: beſides the deadly ſhot, which amongſt ſuch a multitude of enemies neuer fell in vaine. The Great Maſter hauing a carefull eye ouer euery part of the citie, after he had well relieued the Italian ſtation, which was at the firſt hardly diſtreſſed by Pyrrhus, left there Antonius Monterollus, one of the knights of the Order, with ſuch companie as he thought conuenient for the ſafetie of that place, & went himſelfe with the reſt vnto the Engliſh ſtation, which was then hardly laied to by the Baſſa Muſtapha. But whileſt hee was there buſied in repulſing the enemie, and had now well relieued the E place, a ſuddaine crie ran alongſt the wals, That the Spaniſh bulwarke was alreadie poſſeſſed by the enemie. With which heauie newes he was not a little troubled, but leauing there Emericus Gombaulus, one of the knights of the Order, with a choſen companie of ſouldiers for defence of that place; he with his guard haſted vnto the Spaniſh ſtation, which he found by a wonderfull chance alreadie taken by the enemie. In the beginning of the aſſault, certaine Turkes to ſhun the danger of the ſhot, had for feare hidden themſelues at the foot of this bulwarke amongſt the ſtones, which had before been beaten downe with the batterie: in the meane time, other Turks of the ſame regiment, vnder the leading of the valiant captaine Achimetes, hotly charged the Spaniards on the right hand of the bulwarke, not medling with the bulwarke it ſelfe, as a thing of greateſt ſtrength: the valiant ſoldiers appointed for the defence of the bulwarke, ſeeing their F fellowes and countreymen diſtreſſed faſt by them on the right hand, could not endure to ſtand ſtill as lookers on, but left the bulwarke, and went to the place ſo hardly aſſaulted. Where whilſt they were valiantly encountering the enemie, the cowardly Turkes who had before hid themſelues for feare, hearing all ſilent ouer their heads, and thereby gueſſing (as the truth was) that the defendants were drawn thence vnto ſome other place more diſtreſſed; to colour their feare, and proue their good fortune, like tall fellowes, crept out of the holes wherein they had before for G feare hidden themſelues, and ſecretly crawling vp the battered wals of the bulwarke, got into it before they were diſcouered: where finding none but a few ſouldiors (who buſied in remouing of a great piece vnto a place more conuenient for the annoying of the enemy, had laied downe their weapons) they ſuddenly ſet vpon them, ſlew them, ouerthrew the Chriſtian enſignes, and ſo became maſters of that ſtrong fort. The Turks without ſeeing that, wonderfully commended the valor of thoſe men, and blaming themſelues of cowardiſe, made great haſt through the middeſt of the towne ditch to get vp into the bulwarke to helpe their fellowes. But in going through the ditch, they were ſo cut off with ſhot on both ſides out of the flankiers, that few of them could get vp into the deſired bulwarke. And the great Maſter with a crew of valiant ſoul-diors, nothing fearing the armed enemie, now in poſſeſſion of the bulwarke ouer their heads, H

tius a Frenchman, both Knights of the Order, with a companie of Cretenſian ſouldiours brake into the bulwark by a gate which the Turks had not as yet boulted, and being once got in, they made of the Turks a quicke diſpatch; for whom they ſlew not with the ſword, they inforced to miſchiefe themſelues for haſt backe againe ouer the wals. The bulwarke thus againe recouered, which had bin two houres in poſſeſſion of the enemie, and the citie deliuered of a wonderfull feare, the Great Maſter (well worthie of that name) leauing a ſufficient number of ſouldiors for the keeping of that fort, went with the reſt of his companie vnto the place where the Spaniards with the reſt of the defendants ſore charged by Achimetes, and now wearied and almoſt ſpent, had much adoe to hold out: who incouraged with the ſight of the Great Maſter, as if victorie I had attended vpon him, with great cries and ſignes of ioy valiantly and with great ſlaughter repulſed their enemies, as if they had bin freſh men. Long it were to recount the deadly fight and hard aduentures which befell at the aſſault of the other two ſtations of the Auergnoys and Na-bornenſes: but the Turks were in euery place put to the worſt, and lay by heapes ſlaine in the maſts) beholding the miſerable ſlaughter of his men, and no hope of gaining the citie, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, a thing welcome both to the Rhodians and the Turks. In this terrible aſſault, which endured by the ſpace of ſix houres, diuers of the knights of the order were ſlaine, eſpecially of the French and Spaniſh nation, with a hundred and fiftie common ſouldiours, all worthie of eternall fame: and of the Turks (as they which write moſt modeſtly report) twentie K thouſand. The yong tyrant was ſo much offended with the ſhamefull repulſe he had receiued at this laſt aſſault, that he fell into a rage againſt all them who had perſuaded him to enter into that action, but eſpecially againſt the great Baſſa Muſtapha, whom he accuſed as an vnfaithfull coun-ſellour, and chiefe perſuader of that vnluckie war; who flattering him in his vaine humour, by extolling his forces aboue meaſure, & falſely extenuating the power of the enemie, aſſuring him that vpon the firſt approch of his armie they would yeeld themſelnes without reſiſtance, had drawne him into that dangerous expedition, like to ſort to the great diſhonour of himſelfe and all the Othoman familie: for which doing he adiudged him worthie of death, and in great furie

The executioner now readie to giue the fatall ſtroke, Pyrrhus the moſt ancient of all the Baſſaes, moued with compaſſion, and preſuming of his great fauour with the tyrant, whom he had from his childhood had the charge and gouernement of, ſtept forth, and appealing vnto his mercie, earneſtly requeſted him to ſpare his life. Wherewith Solyman was ſo filled with wrath and indignation, that for his preſumption, and for ſending for him to CONSTANTINOPLE, to come to that dangerous ſiege, he commanded him to be executed alſo. All the reſt of the counſellors

the matter, the heat of his furie being ſomething ouer, ſuffered himſelfe to bee intreated, and graunted them their liues: vnto Pyrrhus for his great age and wiſdome, and to Muſtapha for his

A weius ſake, who was the tyrants naturall ſiſter, ſometime the wife of Boſtanges.

All the time of this ſiege, the Turkes great fleet, furniſhed with men and all manner of warlike prouiſion, lay before the entrance of the hauen without doing any thing at all: for the Admirall being no man of warre, ſeeing the mouth of the hauen chained, and the caſtles vpon the entrance full of ordinance, and ſtrongly manned, durſt not attempt either to enter the hauen, or beſiege the caſtles: for which his cowardiſe, and for that he had negligently ſuffered prouiſion both of victuall and munition to be conueyed into the citie during the time of the ſiege, to the great releefe of the beſieged, he was by Solyman adiudged to die a moſt cruell death: but by the mediation of Achimetes, one of his beſt men of warre, the ſeueritie of that ſentence was chan-
B ged into a puniſhment, vnto any noble mind more grieuous than death it ſelfe: For he was by Solymans commaudement, openly ſet vpon the poupe of the admirall gallie, and there as a ſlaue receiued at the hands of the executioner a hundred ſtripes with a cudgell, and ſo with ſhame was thruſt out of his office.

Solymã diſplaceth his Admiral & puniſheth him as a ſlaue.

After that Solyman had in ſo many places with all his power ſo long time in vaine beſieged the RHODES, his haughtie courage began to quaile, ſo that he was vpon point to haue raiſed his ſiege, and left the Iſland, yea the greefe he had conceiued, went ſo neere him, that he many times fainted and lay ſpeechleſſe, as if he had beene a dead man. The remembrance of ſo many vnfortunat aſſaults, the death of ſo many worthie captaines, the loſſe of ſo many valiant ſouldiors (ſufficient to haue ſubdued a great kingdome) ſo much grieued him, that a great while after
C he ſhunned the companie of men, and would not ſuffer himſelfe to be ſpoken withall: vntill at length he was again by Abraham his minion, a man in whom he tooke ſingular pleaſure, recomforted, and perſuaded to continue the ſiege; for that Time (as he ſaid) which worketh all things, would at length tame the fierceneſſe of his enemies, whom the ſword could not vpon the ſuddaine ſubdue. In the meane time Solyman for his pleaſure, and to ſhew vnto the Rhodians, that he purpoſed not to depart, began to build a ſumptuous caſtle vpon the top of the mount PHILERMVS in the eye of the citie. During which time diuers letters were ſhot into the citie with Turkiſh arrowes out of the campe, wherein many of Solymans moſt ſecret counſels were reuealed, & the reuolt of a great man promiſed, which the Rhodians by many circumſtances gathered to haue been Muſtapha, who could not eaſily forget the iniurie ſo lately offered vnto him by D Solyman: needs it muſt be ſome one of Solymans ſecret coũſel, otherwiſe he could not haue reuealed ſo great ſecrets as it were out of the boſome of Solyman. But ſee the chance, at the very ſame time tidings came vnto Solyman, That Cayerbeius the gouernour of ÆGIPT was dead: in whoſe place Solyman ſent Muſtapha to CAIRE, as gouernour of ÆGIPT, by that honourable preferment again to pleaſe his diſcontented mind, after which time no more letters came into the city.

Solyman exceedingly greeued with the repulſe and loſſe receiued at the ſiege of the Rhodes, was vpon point to haue left the ſame.

Now the Turkes began to make faire warres, their terrible batteries began to grow calme, and for certaine daies it ſeemed by the manner of their proceeding, that they purpoſed rather by long ſiege than by aſſault to take the towne. Neuertheleſſe the enemies watching day and night in their trenches, vſed all the policie they could, ſometimes offering vnto the ſouldiors vpon the wales great rewards, if they would yeeld vp the citie, and ſometimes threatening them as faſt: &
E to breed a diſlike amongeſt the defendants, they would oftentimes ſay that Solyman deſired only to be reuenged vpon the Latines, without meaning any harme vnto the Greekes.

It was now the beginning of October, and Winter began to grow faſt on, great raine, with terrible thunder and lightening, and mightie tempeſts heauens threats, then fell ſo aboundantly, that the Turks before wearied in bodie with labour and wounds, were now alſo in mind diſcouraged. And that more encreaſed their feare, the ſea was growne ſo rough, that the admirall was not able in that open & dangerous ſea longer to ride it out with his gallies: but was enforced to ſlip his ankers, and as he might to run his gallies on ground. In theſe troubles wherewith both Slyman himſelfe and al his armie were at furtheſt of their wits, and almoſt quite diſcouraged,
F Achimetes one of his moſt valiant and expert captaines came to comfort him, and promiſed if he would continue the ſiege, in ſhort time to make him an open way into the citie: Vpon confidence whereof, Solyman to encourage his fainting ſouldiours, now ſcarce able for cold and lacke of courage to hold their weapons in their hands, cauſed them to be aſſembled before his pauilion, where from a high place he comforted them in this ſort:

Achimetes, promiſeth to make a way for Solyman into the citie.

Solyman cõforteth his ſoldiors and perſuadeth them with patience to endure the ſiege.

I am not ignorant (moſt valiant ſouldiors) what great things you endure for mine honour, and the the glorie of mine empire. This continuall threatnings of the heauens, this immoderat raine, this ter- G rible thunder and lightning, the coldneſſe of the weather, the want of neceſſaries, with the manifold miſeries of this long ſiege, doe much perſuade me, to giue you leaue to lay downe armes and to take your reſt. But firſt let vs conſider if vnto men of courage it be not a diſhonour, for the tediouſneſſe of raine and tempeſt, to leaue vnto our enemies the victorie already in our hands, and ſhamefully to forſake our trenches, forts, mounts, ouertopping not onely the wals of the citie but mating the heauens, with ſuch other like worke made with my infinit charge and your great trauell, all for the taking of this citie. Truly this warre either ſhould not haue beene taken in hand at all; or being once begun, is to be ended for the honour of the Othoman empire. Which for ſo much as it could not bee accompliſhed in Sommer; the reputation of mine empire in common, and the regard of the commo-ditie of euerie one of you in priuat, enforceth mee to performe it in Winter. For if wee ſhall from H hence depart with our armie, who doubts but the enemie, not onely for deſire of reuenge, but alſo ſtrained by neceſſitie, hauing loſt all hee had of his owne, will prey vpon your countries, houſes, and goods, and will bring you, your wiues, and children, into a farre more miſerable ſlauerie and bondage than that wherein he himſelfe now is? Wherefore I aduiſe you to continue the ſiege, and neuer to depart before you haue attained vnto the end of your deſires. And admit there were no neceſſitie in the matter, yet the honour and fame of the action ought to impoſe vpon you a reſolution both of bodie and mind to endure the ſiege: For the eies and countenances of all nations, eſpecially the Chriſtians, are fixed vpon you; whom when they ſhall vnderſtand not to be able to endure the field one Winter, they will of right call you Sommer birds, which ſo ſoone as any ſtorme ariſeth looke after your houſes and places of repoſe. It is reported, that the Gracians for a ſtrumpet beſieged Troy tenne yeares; and ſhall I not the Turkes, vexed and oppreſſed with ſlaughter, robberies, inuaſions both by ſea and land, and that more is with the ſeruitude of 214 yeares, endure one Winters ſiege? They will ſay, that the terror of your name is but vaine, and that fame hath encreaſed the ſame (as many other things mo) which not ſeene, are more feared in farre countries amongſt men of ſmall experience: And that now euerie man may ſafely enough abide your force, which make your inuaſions rather vpon a furie and braue-rie than vpon any good reſolution, which in all kind of warre (but eſpecially in beſieging of cities) is moſt neceſſarie: whereof many being by naturall ſituation and fortification impregnable, time hath with her handmaides, Famine and Thirſt, ouercome and vanquiſhed, as it ſhall doe this citie of the Rhodes:

againſt which beloued in armes there is a ſecret miſchiefe prepared, which may not in this open audience be publiſhed; for it is as neceſſarie that the vulgar ſort ſhould be ignorant of ſome things, as to K know the ſame.

Many thought, that this was ſpoken rather of pollicie than vpon any good ground: and although his hoat perſuaſion had little moued the cold courage of his deſpairing ſouldiers, yet the regard of duetie in that moſt loyall nation, with the greedie expectation of ſo great a ſecret, ouercome all other difficulties; ſo that they departed (at leaſtwiſe in ſhew) contented to endure whatſoeuer ſhould befall.

Achimetes author of this great expectation, and the onely hope of Solymans ſucceſſe, came oftentimes and aſſailed the Vaumures of the Auergne ſtation, which although they were not L verie high, yet were they alwaies valiantly defended by the Rhodians. It fortuned, that this warlike captaine daily attempting the Vaumures, in the end by force obtained the ſame: and ſo poſſeſſed of the place he ſo much deſired, deſperatly kept it vntill greater help came running in, who with wonderfull expeditiō (with matter for that purpoſe before prepared) clapt vp a ſtrong and defenſible couering in manner of a penthouſe againſt the towne wall, betwixt the wall and the vaumure, vnder which they ſhrowded themſelues from the defendants; which was an eaſie matter for ſuch a multitude to doe, the ditches of the towne in that place being now filled vp ſo high, that the defendants could not out of the flankers ſcoure the ditch, nor yet without manifeſt danger come to caſt any thing downe vpon them from the top of the wals: for the Turkes harquebuſiers which lying vpon their mounts, higher than the battered wals of the citie, ſuffe- M red none to appeare vpon them without danger. So that the Rhodians who erſt thought themſelues at great quiet, were now ouertaken with a ſudden and vnexpected miſchiefe: which at the firſt filled the citie with feare and heauie ſilence, which ſtraightwaies after brake out into pitifull outcries and lamentations. The Turkes lurking vnder their penthouſe, laboured with mattocks and pickaxes to dig vp the foundation of the wall; and Preianes forward and couragious to do

A what might be done threw downe vpon the Turkes, fire, ſcalding oyle, burning pitch, wilde-fire and ſuch things. But when the miſerable men which ſhrunck from the worke for feare of the fire, were againe beaten forward by their imperious commanders, and preſently ſlaine if they made any delay, and freſh men ſtill thruſt on in ſteed of ſuch as were hurt or ſlaine: the fatall work begun the ſeuenth day of October, went apace forward, with the great & continuall labor of theſe wretched ſlaues. A great number of the common ſouldiors whom the Turks call Aſapi was imployed in this worke: of whom Solyman in this ſiege of the Rhodes, and other his expeditions, made not much more account but as of pioners to worke in mines and to caſt vp trenches, and oftentimes with their bodies to fill towne ditches to make a way for the Ianizaries to paſſe ouer vpon: they by the conſtraint of Achimetes vndermined the wal, and as they wrought,

The miſerable ſtate of the common ſouldiors of the Turks and the ſmall account is made of them.

B ſhoared vp the ſame againe with timber, whereunto they afterwards ſet fire, hoping by that meanes to ouerthrow the wall: which falling not out according to their expectation, for that they had not farre enough vndermined it, they aſſaied with great hooks and ſtrong ropes to haue pulled it downe. But the Rhodians with their great ordinance from the Auergne bulwarke, quickly put them from that mad worke with great ſlaughter, and fruſtrated all their long labor. Achimetes thus diſapointed of his purpoſe, ſtood in great doubt whether he ſhould giue ouer the enterpriſe, for that he ſaw he labored in vaine, or elſe in that dangerous place to expect ſome better hap, the onely meane to ſaue him from the tyrants heauie diſpleaſure; who as hee knew meaſured all things by the euent. Solyman vnderſtanding by Achimetes that the wall (although it was not ouerthrowne as was expected) was yet ſore ſhaken and weakned with vndermining,

C cauſed his batterie to be planted againſt that part of the wall ſo vndermined: which ſo many waies weakned, and now ſore battered, fell downe daily more and more. For remedie whereof, the Rhodians laboured day and night to raiſe a new wall, in ſteed of that which was beaten downe.

At the ſame time Solyman perſuaded by the generall opinion of all his great captaines, that the citie was that day or neuer to be taken, determining to giue another generall aſſault, cauſed proclamation to be made thorow his campe: wherein he gaue the ſpoile of the citie vnto his ſoldiors, and the more to encourage them, ſpake vnto them in few words as followeth.

Solyman encouraged his ſouldiers to a freſh aſſault.

D Fortune at the length valiant ſouldiours, hauing notably proued your courage and patience, now offereth vnto you the worthie rewards of your labour and paines. The victorie and wealth of your enemies which you haue ſo much deſired, is now in your hands. Now is it the time to make an end of this mungrell people, of whom more are ſlaine than left aliue; and they not men, but the ſhadowes and ghoſts of men, feeble and ſpent with hunger, wounds, wants, and labour: who will I know reſiſt you, not becauſe they ſo dare, but becauſe of neceſſitie they ſo muſt, enforced thereunto with all extremities. Wherefore now reuenge your ſelues of the falſhood, crueltie, and villanies of theſe Chriſtians, and make them a wofull example to all poſteritie, that neuer man heereafter preſume to offer iniurie to a Turke, in whatſoeuer ſtate he be. The way is already open into the citie, there is a faire breach made whereby thirtie horſemen may at once enter: nothing wanteth but courage in you to aſſaile the ſame.

E The ſouldiers encouraged with this ſpeech of their emperour, made great ſhew of cheerefulneſſe, and promiſed to doe their vttermoſt deuoire, threatning vnto the Chriſtians moſt horrible death and miſerable captiuitie.

In the meane time the great ſhot flying continually thorow the breach, did beat downe many houſes in the citie; but the countermure new built againſt the breach ſtanding vpon a lower ground, it ſeldome toucht, to the great good of the Rhodians. The ratling of the falling houſes, the horrible noiſe of the enemie, with the thundring of the great artillerie, wonderfully terrified the miſerable citizens: in euery place was heard the lamentation of women and children, euery thing ſhewed the heauineſſe of the time, and ſeemed as altogether loſt and forlorne. The day thus troubleſomely ſpent, the night followed much more troubleſome; and after the night, the

F day of aſſault of all other moſt dreadfull: for with the dawning thereof, the glittering enſignes of the enemie were ſeene flying in the wind, and the Turks cheerfull with the hope of ſpoile and victorie, haſted towards the breach with great outcries and ſongs, after their countrey manner: and there before one of the gates of the citie called S. Ambroſe gate, ſet downe a great number of their enſignes deckt with garlands, in token of victorie. time saylng too and fro before the hauen, made shew as if it would haue assailed the citie on G that side: who had seen the citie so beset, would haue said that it would at one instant haue bin besieged both by sea and land; and to most mens iudgements, it seemed that the Rhodians state should that day haue taken end and been destroyed. Yet for all these extremities, the Rhodians were nothing discouraged, but looking vpon their weapons as the onely remainders of their hopes, not regarding any danger, vpon the alarum giuen came running out of their houses by heaps vnto the wals, like desperat men opposing their bodies in stead of the battred wals against their enemies in defence of their countrie. There needed neither exhortation nor commaund of captaine, euerie man was vnto himselfe a persuader to fight valiantly in defence of the citie;
and one of them propounded vnto another the cruell death, the miserable seruitude, the mocks and taunts they should indure, if they should chance to come into the proud enemies hand: all H which was to be auoided either by honourable victorie or death. The Turkes conducted by Achimates, fiercely assailed the breach, which was by the Rhodians (standing vpon the ruines of their wals) valiantly defended. In the meane time, the dismaied matrons and maidens, some in their houses with heauie harts expected the woful destruction of the citie and themselues, other-some in the churches with flouds of teares and lamentable cries, poured forth their prayers to the Almightie, crauing his helpe in that their hard distresse, and to protect them against their barbarous enemies. The deadly fight at the breach, was on both sides with great courage and force maintained. The Turkes were in good hope forthwith to win the citie, if they did but a little more straine themselues: and therefore to terrifie the Rhodians the more, oftentimes in their fighting gaue out most terrible outcries: and the Rhodians accounted the Turks as good I as vanquished, for that they being so many in number, and in a place of such indifferencie, had not yet preuailed: beside that, they were greatly incouraged with the greatnesse of the common danger, and the sight one of anothers valour: so that by their inuincible courage the Turks were inforced shamefully to retire. The Rhodians seeing their enemies turne their backs, gaue a great shout in derision of them: the Turks disdaining that they in number many (and now victors, if they should with a little resolution maintaine the assault they had begun) should be so derided of a handful of men as good as alreadie vanquished; with great indignation returned againe to the breach, & more furiously assailed the Rhodians than at the first. At which time the citie had vndoubtedly bin taken, had not they which defended the ends of the wal, yet standing on both sides of the breach, out of their baricadoes with their shot ouerwhelmed the Turks thronging in K at the breach; and others with murthering shot out of the flankiers of the new built wal so cut them in sunder, that a greater slaughter for the time was hardly in any place seene. Achimates beholding the wonderfull slaughter of his souldiours, and that he fought with great disaduan-tage and losse, against desperate men, who resoluing to die feared no danger, gaue ouer the assault, and againe retired: leauing behind him in the breach and towne ditch the carkases of fiue thousand of his dead Turkes, besides many more which afterwards died vpon the hurts their recieued.

This assault was giuen vnto the towne the last day of Nouember, a day dedicated to S. An- drew: after which time the captaines of the Turkish armie, although the dispaired not of the vi- L ctorie, yet terrified with so great slaughter of their men, resolued with one accord no more to attempt the citie with any notable assault; but by sundrie great trenches to be made thorow the middest of the ruines of the wals, to get into the citie; and with mattoks and pickaxes to ouer-throw the new made wall and another baricadoe which the defendants had made within the same: and in the meane time whilest this was in doing, to keepe the Rhodians still busied with continual skirmishes and alarums. This deuise put in execution by the wonderful labor of such a multitude of people, serued the enemie to greater purpose than all that hee had before done:
who daily ouerthrowing or destroying the new fortifications which the Rhodians made in steed of them which were before ouerthrown, & by little and little creeping on further, draue the defendants to that extremitie, that they were glad to pull down many of their houses, therwith M to make new fortifications, and to make their citie lesse, by casting vp of new trenches: so that in short time they were brought to that point, that they could not well tell which place to fortifie first, the enemie was now so far crept within them: for the ground which the enemie had thus gained within the citie, was almost 200 paces in breadth, and 150 paces in length.

The Turks trouble the Rhodians with continuall alarums, and by casting vp of trenches get into the citie

Solyman, although he did now assure himselfe of the victorie, and was by nature cruell and desirous

A desirous of reuenge; yet persuaded by Achimetes and Cassius (two of his most valiant captains) that for the enlarging of his empire, nothing was better than the fame of clemencie: commaunded Pyrrhus the old Bassa to proue if the Rhodians might by parley be drawn to yeeld their citie vpon reasonable conditions. Whereupon the Bassa sent one Hieronimus Monilia a Genoway, vnto the wals, who craving of the defendants safe conduct, said he had something to say tending to the common good of the distressed citie. All mens minds were presently filled with expectation of some great matter, and he commaunded to speake. Who answered, That hee might not deliuer his message openly, but would either by speech in secret, or by letters deliuer the same vnto one Matthias de Via his countriman, one of the citizens of the RHODES. When Parley offered by the Turkes to the Rhodians.

B Fra. Fornouius one of the knights of the Order, a French man of a cholericke disposition, whose great courage was well seene in all that siege (hauing as is reported, with shot out of S. Georges tower himselfe slaine 500 Turkes during the time of that siege) being now present, and moued with indignation to heare a motion made of priuat conference with the enemie: bent his piece vpon the messenger, and caused him forthwith to depart without doing his message. Many who in time of the assault feared not any danger, but were become altogither desperat and careles of themselues, after that they vnderstood that the enemie had offered parley, and that they began to conceiue some hope of life: resorted vnto the Great master, requesting him, that hee would prouide for the safetie of his louing people; whose warlike forces was with many assaults sore weakened, the citie beaten downe about their eares, and most of them which were left, either

C wounded or sicke. They had (as they said) now sufficiently proued both their force and fortune: wherefore he should do well, to beware least while he were too long in consulting, the enemie should conceaue a further indignation in seeing his offers refused. With these and such speeches they enforced the great master to send embassadours to Solyman. The men that were sent, were Anthonius Groleus a French man, ensigne bearer for the Order, a man of great reputation for his wisedome and experience; and with him Robertus Barusius, a man of great grauitie and skilfull in the Greeke tongue: for whom were receiued as pledges, a kinsman of the great captaine Achimetes, and a certaine Epyrot which fled out of the citie vnto the Turks, because one of the Græcian captains had struck him with his open hand; a man of a sharp wit, and one that could perfectly speake the Greek, Turkish, and Italian tongues, as appeared to his great credit amongst

D the enemies, being had of them in great regard, although he was not knowne whileſt he dwelt in the citie, that he was any such man. After that came also Solymans interpreter, for he himselfe could speake no other language more than his owne, accounting it a great disgrace, and against the Othoman empire to vse any other language. The embassadours admitted vnto Solymans presence, told him, That they were sent to know, for what cause he had sent to require parley? Who in a flaming heat, as if he had knowne nothing thereof, said there was no such matter: and commanding them presently to void his campe, sent them away with letters to the great master and the citizens to this effect.

Solymans letters sent to the great master and the Rhodians by their embassadours.

E If I had not compassion of humane infirmitie, which oftentimes tumbleth headlong mens ambitious and hastie minds, into most dangerous and vnnecessarie mischiefes, truly I would not haue directed vnto you these letters at this time; but as you haue well deserued, persecute you with death and most miserable seruitude: which how easie a thing were it for me to doe, you your selues know. But hauing now sufficiently tried my force, if youe be wise make proofe of my clemencie. You haue alreadie satisfied your owne furie, your owne mad humour: and now aduise your selues, lay your hand vpon your heart, and without delay yeeld your selues as I commaund; your liues I giue, I giue you your wealth; and more than that, your choice to tarrie their still, or to depart: Refuse not the grace frankly offered, which was of you to haue been most heartily desired. It shall not alwaies be lawfull for you (as at this present) to make choice of both. From our campe.

F Vpon the returne of the embassadors, the poore of all sorts flocke togither to the Great master his house not farre from the breach: where after the multitude of the common people was dismissed, and the chiefe of the Burgers sent for, the imperious letter of the Turkish tyrant was openly read before the knights of the Order, and the better sort of the citizens. Whereunto the Great master accounting it both honour enough, and sufficient tearme of life honourably to die, answered in this sort.

The Great maſter his opinion concerning that Solyman demanded by his letters.

You heard (ſacred fellowes in armes, and valiant citizens of the RHODES*) theſe imperious and ſorrowfull letters: whereunto how we are to anſwere, requireth no great deliberation: we muſt as reſolute men either yeeld or die; all hope of the victorie is gone, except forraine aide come. Wherefore if you will follow my counſell, let vs with weapons in our hands, vntill the laſt gaſpe and the ſpending of the laſt drop of our bloud, like valiant men defend our faith and nobilitie receiued from our anceſtors, and the honour which we haue ſo long time gotten both at home and abroad: and let it neuer be ſaid, that our honour died but with our ſelues.* G

This ſpeech of the great maſter ſeemed vnto many, heauier than the imperious commandement of the Turkiſh tyrant: and a great while men ſtood ſilent, heauily looking one vpon another, many with changing of their countenance and outward geſture, more than by words expreſſing what they thought in heart. At length a certaine Greeke prieſt, with great compaſſion of mind (as it ſeemed) and teares trickling downe his cheekes, brake forth into theſe words: H

A notable ſpeech of a Greek prieſt, perſuading the Great Maſter to yeeld.

And I would alſo hold my peace, if I were a priuat man; and not firſt of all in ſo great and troubled aſſemblie, broach myne owne opinion. But for as much as the regard of our common preſeruation, can wring a word out of no mans mouth, and all men know, that now is the time to ſpeake and ſay what euery man thinketh beſt, which ſhall neither alwaies nor long bee graunted vnto vs, I will not let it now ouerpaſſe and ſlip away: Wherefore let vs ſuppoſe, that no commaund of a moſt mightie prince beſieging vs, were come vnto vs, but that I were reaſoning as a priuate man with his neighbour, or one friend with another by the fire ſide, or in our cups without care, without any great affection to either partie, as men indifferent, not liking or hating (as men oftentimes doe of princes affairs which I concerne them nothing) and then (as I hope) my ſpeech ſhall be vnto you neither vnpleaſant nor vnprofitable. Wee Greekes and Latines, with ioyned armes haue now this ſix moneths withſtood our deadly enemies, not onely abroad before our wals, but alſo in the verie bowels of our citie, without any forraine helpe: which as we haue of long time all vainely looked for, ſo are we now euery one of vs out of hope thereof. And yet our enemie either moued with the ſecret goodneſſe of God, or elſe ignorant of our ſtrength and forces, ſpent with wounds, ſlaughter, ſickeneſſe, and perpetuall labour, doth voluntarily offer that vnto vs, which was of vs to bee moſt of all deſired and earneſtly ſued for. Your publicke and priuate treaſures, the bodies of your ſelues, your wiues and children he keepeth vnuiolated; he taketh from vs onely the citie, which he hath for moſt part alreadie beaten downe and taken. Worthie Great Maſter, and you moſt valiant Knights, I haue knowne proweſſe and valour in many battells at ſea, K but eſpecially in this ſiege; whereof ſeeing there is no more vſe in this our deſperate eſtate, I doe appeale vnto your wiſedome and diſcretion. Sithence all is now the conquerours, in that he leaueth vnto vs our liues and goods, is to bee accounted gaines, and the yeelding vp of the citie and Iſland no loſſe, which the victorious enemie alreadie commaundeth: which although it bee a heauie matter and greeuous vnto the nobilitie, yet your fortune perſuadeth you thereunto. Wherefore if you bee to be moued with any compaſſion, I account it better to yeeld, than to be ſlaine our ſelues, or to ſee your wiues and children by law of armes to be led away before your faces into miſerable captiuitie and ſeruitude. If any Chriſtian compaſſion remaine in your warlike mindes, I beſeech you ſeeke not the vtter deſtruction of this innocent people, who (I may with modeſtie ſay) hath not euill deſerued of you, whom Chriſt Ieſus, L whom the enemie himſelfe would haue preſerued. That I ſay this which I ſpeake vnto you for Chriſtian charitie, and for no other cauſe, let this be a ſufficient teſtimonie, That ſo long as you were able to reſiſt by your owne power, or hoped for aid from forreine princes, I neuer ſpake word, or once thought of yeelding: but now ſeeing the fatall ruine of all things about vs, our common eſtate brought vnto the vttermoſt extremitie, our deadly enemie in the heart of our citie, no hope, and that the war cannot longer bee protracted; I wiſh you to yeeld, and for my part had rather make choice of peace than war, and to proue the enemies fauour than his furie.

Moſt of them there preſent, were of the ſame mind with the prieſt. But as nothing can bee ſo reaſonably ſpoken as to content all men, ſo this ſpeech was not of them all liked: ſome there M were (though not many) which conſidering the harmes they had done vnto the Turkes, and doubting with what ſafetie they might yeeld themſelues into the power of that faithleſſe people, had rather to haue fought it out to the laſt man, and ſo to haue left vnto them a bloudie victorie. Amongſt theſe, one bold ſpoken fellow ſtept forth, and in preſence of them all diſſuaded the yeelding vp of the citie in this ſort:

I haue

A I haue not beene with any thing more vnacquainted, than to deliuer my opinion before princes, or in such great and publick assemblies; being alwaies more desirous modestly to heare other mens opinions, than impudently to thrust forth mine owne. But now, seeing extreame necessitie will not longer suffer me to keepe my wonted course of silence, I will frankely speake my mind, and tell you what in my opinion is to be answered vnto the beastie message and impertous commaund of the most perfidious tyrant. This cruell enemie hath ouerthrowne our wall, and is entred three hundred foot and more within our citie, and as a most troublesome gueſt liueth and conuerseth with vs as it were vnder the same roofe. Such as list not longer to endure such an vnwelcome gueſt and troublesome neighbour, persuade you because he is troublesome, to giue him all: But (worthie and sacred knights) I am of farre dif-

B ferent opinion; neither doe I thinke a possession of 214 yeares is so lightly to be deliuered vp, and the ground forsaken: but rather that this troublesome intruder is in like manner to be himselfe troubled, and with deadly skirmishes continually vexed: whom after we had by force of armes and vndaunted courage, maugre his head, held out fiue moneths, at length he brake into our citie, not by any valour in himselfe, but holpen by time, which tameth all things: and since his first enterance it is now almost fortie daies, in which time for all his haſt, hee hath scarcely got forward 130 paces, hindered by the blockes we haue laied in his way, and will not cease continually to lay if we be wisemen, and mindfull of our former valour. Destroy me you heauenly powers, before I see with these eies these sacred knights to yeeld vp this famious citie of the Rhodes, the antient bulwarke of Christian religion, vnto our mercilesse enemies, polluted with the infamous superstition of Mahomet: who besides the insatiable thirst

C they haue of our blond, how faithlesse and mischeeuous they are by nature, if we know not, we need not make example of our selues, but wee may take example by the calamitie of Constantinople, the late miserie of Eubœa, and that which later was, of Methone; as also by the Mamalukes at Caire, miserably slaine contrarie to the league, contrarie to the faith and premise by the Turkish emperour himselfe before giuen. What? doe you not remember how the death of the most noble captaines at Belgrade was of late procured by the falshood, craft, and deceit of the same faithlesse miscreants? Let vs then, being men of wit and vnderstanding, trust these mad beasts, let vs giue our selues into their power, which haue no regard of right or reason, of religion, or any thing else; whose couetousnesse and crueltie it is hard to say which is greater; which for these many yeares haue plotted and laboured nothing more than how by policie or force they may vtterly root out the very name of the Rhodians, which they so

D deadly hate. They keepe vs shut vp and besieged now the sixt moneth, feeling together with vs extreame dangers and endlesse labours, slaine by heapes before our wals and fortresses, and cannot be remoued hence with thunder, lightening, stormes, tempestes, and all the calamities of Winter, a time which giueth intermission to all warres both by sea and land; so desirous they are of reuenge, and greedie of our bloud: and that not altogether without cause, for we haue also shed theirs, and gladly would still so doe, if it lay in our power. But seeing it seemeth good vnto God otherwise, and that we are surprised with ineuitable necessitie: yet let vs whilest we are at libertie, and haue power our selues, by honourable death amongst the Christian ensignes, eschew the torments and reproches which our cruell enemies hope to inflict vpon vs: so shall we enioy eternall fame and glorie, prepared both in heauen and earth for such as honorably die in de-

E fence of their prince and countrey: Which honour it becommeth not them to enuie vnto thy most noble name and vertue, worthie Grand Master, which hauing for many yeares enioyed the commoditie and profit of peace, and greatly enriched by bountie of this sacred militarie Order, refuse now to beare this last burden of warre.

A most resolute speech of a common soldior, dissuading the yelding vpp of the Rhodes.

At these words an antient Greeke, for his wisedome and discretion of great reputation both with the Greekes and Latines, perceiuing his countreymen wrongfully touched, and the desperat holding out of the citie vainely persuaded, tooke hold, and interrupting this yong gallant, in answere of that he had said, spake as followeth:

F That greefe of mind and desparation can make men rather eloquent than wise, as you haue many times heard before this, so you might this day perceiue also, most valiant gentlemen: for aduised modestie neuer falleth into obloquie, neither confoundeth falshood with truth; it desireth not the slaughter of the citizens, it persuadeth not furie, nor exhorteth men to madnesse: but it is by nature so engrafted in many, that when they cannot by their owne wisedome and policie deliuer themselues from their troubles, they yet seeke to draw others into the fellowship of the same danger: so greedie haue mallice and miserie alwaies been of companie. But if you (worthie Commaunder) will giue me also leaue to speake,

The former speech notably answered by a Greeke, and the yeelding of the Citie vrged.

a man amongst his countreymen not of meaneſt place or autheritie, which thing both the preſent calamitie and vrgent neceſſitie might of you eaſily obtaine; I would alledge ſuch reaſons, and lay downe ſuch matter, as ſhould not onely refell the copious and glorious words of this ſharpe witted Orator ſcraft together of purpoſe to flouriſh out the matter, but alſo ſuch as might ſtirre your mina to that which is honeſt, profitable, and neceſſarie; expulſing hatred, feare, trouble, or deſpaire. This gentleman, whom we all know, not onely to be a vehement Orator, but ſomtime a man moſt terrible, whereas for all his great words he is by nature mild, and ſo mild, that he neuer had the heart to kill, nay not ſo much as lightly to wound any one of them whom he calleth barbarous, mad, cruell, whoſe perfidious dealing he deteſteth, whoſe cruelty he accuſeth, whoſe maner of liuing he exclaimeth againſt, as altogether without law, without reaſon, without order, without regard: and now in time of truce, and whileſt the ſhowers of arrowes, yron bullets, fire and ſtones doth ceaſe, creeping out of his caue, maketh much adoe, and keepeth a great ſtirre; and not knowing in what danger he is, doth now with glorious words call vpon death, whereof he hath hetherto ſhewed himſelfe too much afraid, and all forſooth (as he ſaith) leaſt he ſhould be enforced to endure the mocking and ſcorning of the enemie. But this is meere pride, not Chriſtian fortitude or humilitie. But our enemie neither threateneth nor purpoſeth any ſuch matter, nothing ſo perfidious or cruell as he would make him, rubbing vp the ſlaughters at CAIRE, EVBŒA, METHONE, and CONSTANTINOPLE, cities taken either by force or warlike policie, and not yeelded vp by compoſition, vpon faith giuen betwixt the beſieger and the beſieged: who becauſe he would ſpare vs, will not ſuffer vs to doe that whereby we ſhould vndoubtedly periſh. But whereof proceedeth this new found clemencie? this vnwonted fauour towards the people of the RHODES? I am not of the tyrants priuie counſell, neither euer curiouſly ſought after the reaſon of another mans bountie, but am glad to receiue it when I need it. Yet for all that, I will not diſſemble what I thinke in a matter ſo doubtfull: He is willing (as I ſuppoſe) in this ſiege and conqueſt of the RHODES, to ſhew vnto other nations whom he purpoſeth to inuade, both his power and his patience: leaſt alwaies ſatisfying his cruell nature, hee ſhould make deſolation in places hee would raigne ouer, and ſo for euer alienating the minds of men, be enforced to fight with all men with fire and ſword, by which rigour he hath not ſo much hurt his enemie as himſelfe. For this cauſe (as I ſuppoſe) he leaueth vnto vs life and goods, leaſt whileſt he in going about to take them from vs by force, and we ſeeking to keep them by deſperatneſſe, we ſhould both fall into great deſtruction, no leſſe lamentable to the conquerour than to the vanquiſhed. Beſides that, if he ſhould kill all heere, truly he might then enter the breaches of the citie on the bodies of the dead, no man now left aliue to reſiſt him. But LERVS is ſhut vp, ARANGIA is ſtrongly fortified, LINDVS is by ſituation impregnable: heere he knoweth are weapons, armour, and men, heere he muſt begin a new war, except he will haue the remainder of your war, the fatall plague of his empire, to prey ſtill vpon his ſubiects: all which ſtrong places he ſhall haue without ſlaughter, without bloudſhed (as reaſon is) if he ſhall let you and vs poore wretches depart in ſafetie with a little traſh. Except theſe worldly conſiderations haue moued him to mercie and compaſſion: then out of doubt it is wrought by diuine power and the ſecret fauour of God towards vs, and of our Sauiour Chriſt Ieſus crucified. Whereunto if you be men well aduiſed, if religious, if mindfull of the dutie of Chriſtians, it becommeth you not to oppoſe any obſtacle, and with the ruine of your ſelues to deſtroy this miſerable people, which for this halfe yeares ſiege hath ſcarcely had ſo much reſt as might ſuffice the neceſſitie of nature, ſtanding for you in battell, enduring both wounds and death for your honour and victorie: by whoſe faithfull labour and diligence you haue beene alwaies holpen both at home and abroad; whether you inuaded the Turke by land in MYTILENE, NAVPACTVS, METHONE, PATRAS, or other parts of PELOPONESVS, or elſe by ſea thruſt him out of the poſſeſſion of the Ionian or Egeum: whereby it may appeare euen vnto a blind man, how iniurious it is and far from truth, to obiect vnto vs, That enioying the fruits of peace, we refuſe the charges of wars: nay we neuer refuſed wars. But now it is come to that point, that if we would neuer ſo faine make wars, we are not able ſo to doe, the flower of our youth being ſlaine: and the ſmall remainder that is left, not onely weakened in bodie with wounds, ſickneſſe, watching, and reſtleſſe labour; but alſo in mind diſcouraged, whileſt all things fall out proſperouſly to our enemies, and to vs aduerſe: the greateſt and beſt part of our great artillerie being broken with continuall vſe, which if it were whole, we could haue thereof ſmall vſe or profit, for want of pouder, which not only this citie now wanteth, but alſo your ſtrong holds, LERVS, LINDVS, HALICARNASVS, ARANGIA. I was neuer deſirous or curious to looke into other mens doings, much leſſe into your manner of wars: but yet (Great Maſter) you cannot denie but it is ſo, who haue cauſed ſoldiers to be brought from thence hither openly, and gunpouder ſecretly: by which prouident foreſight you haue withſtood your forraine enemie theſe ſix months, and deceiued the trecherie of one or two domeſticall traitors. But I gladly admit we haue all theſe things,

A things, I ſtand not vpon the truth, I ſay not what moſt men ſay, but I ſpeake to pleaſe a few: and ſuppoſe we wanted neither armour nor courage, I would then aske you this, whether they would aduiſe you to vſe them to your defence, or to your deſtruction? for vnto both it cannot be, no more than at once to be a freeman and a ſlaue. To vſe them to your deſtruction, that were madneſſe and ſenceleſſe pride, hatefull to God and man: you ſhould therefore vſe them to defence: But how ſhall we defend a citie (I doe not ſay, as the truth is) alreadie loſt and poſſeſſed by the enemie, wherein he raigneth, rangeth, and turneth all vpſide down? but hauing the wals battered downe, a great breach in the Spaniſh ſtation, and another not like but euen now as good as made in the Italian ſtation, how ſhall we be able to keepe this vnfortunate towne, battered and rent at the French, Engliſh, and Auergne ſtations, and the tower of

B S. Nicholas? Which if it were not ſo battered and bared of all warlike prouiſion, but ſound and thorowly furniſhed with munition and victuall, yet neceſſitie enforcing, and reaſon perſuading, you ought to forſake it, for ſo much as all power of further reſiſtance is taken from you. Doe you not ſee how eaſily and almoſt without any trouble the enemie (by means of the caſtle he hath new built vpon the mount PHILERMO, not paſt two miles diſtant) can take from you all manner of prouiſion both by ſea and land, and reſtraine you from going out or in? Truly notable gentlemen, honourable for your martiall proweſſe, you ſee and haue long agoe foreſeene theſe things better than I, altogether ignorant in martiall affaires, altogether buſied in the trade of merchandiſe, and caring for my familie: yet ſuffer me to ſay the truth, All the powers whereby this kingdome ſtood, are departed and gone; againſt the force of our enemies no policie or force of man remaineth; and to expect armies of angels or ſoldiours from

C heauen, and other ſuch like miracles, is in my iudgement more and more to prouoke God to anger, although in his anger he be vnto vs mercifull: Wherefore being deſtitute of all worldly helpe, let vs as we may, prouide for our ſafetie. I beſeech thee (worthie Great Maſter) by theſe my aged teares, by the naturall pietie ingrafted in thy noble nature, expoſe not this miſerable citie to the ſpoile of the enemie, our old and middle aged men to the ſword, our wiues and daughters to be rauiſhed, our boies and youths to the vnnaturall filthineſſe of our barbarous enemies, and to be corrupted with the mad and groſſe opinion of the vngodly Mahometane ſuperſtition. I would (noble knights) you had ſeene with what teares, with what mourning our beauie families and children crying about their mothers, ſent vs hither, and what prayers they made for vs at our departing: I would you knew with what mind and how great hope they expect their ſafetie from your clemencie and aduiſed reſolution.

D This ſpeech of the aged Greeke might haue moued a heart of flint: but the Great maſter, who in his coũtenance ſhewed a greater courage than his preſent ſtate required, comaunding euerie man to his charge: after the matter had beene thus moſt part of the night diſcourſed, gaue then no other anſwere, but, That he would be carfull of all their well doing. The next morning he ſent for Preianes, Martiningus, and a few other of the greateſt judgement and experience; by whom he was fully reſolued, that the citie in ſo many places by the enemie laid open and ſhaken, was not poſsible to be long defended; Whereupon he cauſed a common counſell to be called, of all the knights of the Order togither with the Burgeſſes of the citie: where after long debating, whether they ſhould fight it out to the laſt man, or yeeld vpon ſuch conditions as was

E to be obtained? it was by generall conſent concluded, that the city ſhould be yeelded, and thereupon a decree made, which was by the Great maſter pronounced. Whileſt theſe things were thus in doing, a truce was taken with the enemie for foure daies, but full of feare and danger. during which time, diuers of the turks preſuming vpon the truce, came by great companys to behold the wales and rampiers of the citie: wherewith Fornouius the Frenchman (of whom mention is before made) being ſore moued, in his choller without further commaund diſcharged a tire of great ordinance amongſt the thikeſt of them, contrarie to the truce taken. At which time alſo, the Rhodians receiued into the citie ſecretly by night a ſhip loaded with wines out of CRETE, and in her Alphonſus a Spaniard, chiefe pilot of the Rhodian gallies, and with him one hundred voluntarie ſouldiours all Latines, all which went out of CRETE without the know-

F ledge of the Venetian Senat: for at that time the Venetians were in league with Solyman. The Turkes iuſtly offended with the breach of the truce, and the taking in of new ſupplies, which they ſuppoſed to haue beene farre greater than in truth they were; without commaund of any captaine or enſigne diſplaid, in great numbers thruſt in thorow the ruines of the breaches into the city as farre as the rampiers and baricadoes new made, and furiouſly aſſailed the defendants: in which conflict many were ſlaine and wounded on both ſides. But after the Turkes had to their

The Great Maſter reſolued that the citie was not to bee defended, ſaith a common counſell of all his knights, and the burgeſſes of the citie.

A truce taken with the Turkes for foure daies, their coſt againe made proofe of the courage of their enemies, as without commandement they began that skirmiſh, ſo of themſelues they brake it off and retired. After the truce was thus broken, the captaine of the Turkes fencers, a bloudie cruell fellow hauing taken three Chriſtians priſoners, cut off their hands, eares, and noſes, and ſent them ſo diſmembred into the citie with letters to the Great maſter, charging him with the vniuſt breach of the truce, barbarouſly threatning within three or foure daies to make like example of him to all poſteritie. Amongſt other none was more troubled with this ſudden and vnexpected breach of the truce, than Robertus Peruſianus, Raymundus Marchet, and Raymundus Lupus, three knights of the Order, men of ſingular wiſedome and grauitie, embaſſadours at that time in the Turkes campe: whom the barbarous people in their furie had vndoubtedly ſlaine or put to torture, if they had not feared the like meaſure to haue beene ſhewed to their hoſtages in the citie. But after that Nicholaus Vergotus, and Georgius Sandriticus, two of the Burgeſſes of the citie, were come into the campe with articles containing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians were contented to deliuer vp the citie, all their furie and rage was quickly appeaſed. Solyman for his greater maieſtie and the more terror of theſe meſſengers, beſet round about with his great armie, & guarded about with his Ianizaries in their richeſt attire and gliſtering armour, gaue them audience: who admitted to his preſence, with great humilitie offered vnto him in writing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians would yeeld vp vnto him the citie. The chiefe points whereof were, That the churches ſhould remaine vnto the Chriſtians inuiolated: that no children ſhould be taken from their parents: that no Chriſtian ſhould be enforced to forſake his religion and turne Turke: that ſuch Chriſtians as would tarrie ſtill in the citie, might ſo do at libertie, without paying any tribute for the ſpace of fiue yeares: that all they which would depart might go with bag and baggage, furniſhed with conuenient ſhipping and prouiſion as farre as CRETE, & to carrie with them ſo much great ordinance as they pleaſed; and that the Chriſtians ſhould appoint a reaſonable day for the time of their departure. All which articles Solyman condeſcended vnto, and ſolemnly ſwore faithfully to performe the ſame. But how they were indeed performed, the writers of that age doe much varrie: it ſhould ſeeme they were neither altogither kept, nor broken, but ſo performed as pleaſed the conquerour: certaine it is, that many great outrages were through militarie inſolencie committed by the proud Turks vpon the poore Chriſtians, contrarie to the mind of Solyman. Iacobus Fontanus a Ciuilian, and at that time one of the iudges of the citie (out of whoſe writings this hiſtorie is for moſt part collected) reporteth, That the Turks not expecting the departure of the Chriſtians, brake into the citie vpon Chriſtenmas day, by the gate called COSQVINIVM, polluted the temples, ſhamefully abuſed the Chriſtians, and made hauocke of all things: and that he himſelfe falling into their hands, after he had with ſuch money as he had, redeemed himſelf, hauing not ſufficient to content all their greedie deſires, was by them hardly entreated and grieuouſly beaten. The Great maſter by the counſell of Achimetes, putting on ſuch ſimple attire as beſt beſeemed a vanquiſhed man that was to humble himſelfe before the conquerour, went out of the citie into the campe, attended vpon with a few knights of the Order: whereafter he had waited in the raine moſt part of the day, before Solymans tent, at laſt he had a rich gowne caſt vpon him, and ſo brought into the proud tyrants preſence. Where after they had a while at the firſt, with piercing eies one earneſtly beholden the other; the Great maſter humbling himſelfe before him, was in token of grace admited to kiſſe his hand, and welcomed by Solyman in this ſort.

A barbarous fact.

Solyman his ſpeech vnto the Great maſter.

Although (ſaid he) I might worthely and iuſtly infringe the articles I haue preſcribed concerning the yeelding of the citie, with thy moſt wicked croſſed compieres, the people of the RHODES, and thee eſpecially ſuch a capitall enemie, from whoſe deſerued puniſhment, neither faith nor oath ought to ſtay a moſt iuſt conquerour: yet I haue determined to be not onely gratious and mercifull vnto thee ſo great an offender, deſeruing exemplarie puniſhment, but alſo liberall and bountifull: who if thou wilt by well doing amend the grieuous tranſgreſſions of thy former life, I promiſe vnto thee moſt honourable entertainment, great preferment, and the higheſt places in my empire, in my armie in time of warre, and in counſell in time of peace. Not to refuſe this my offer, both thy preſent eſtate perſuadeth thee, and the Chriſtians (whoſe quarrell thou tookeſt vpon thee to defend againſt me, with better beginning than ſucceſſe) deſerue at thy hands no better: for what ſhould let thee forſaken of all thy friends, a man as it were betraied and vanquiſhed, to caſt thy ſelfe into the perpetuall faith

and

A and protection of a moſt mightie and mercifull conquerour, of himſelfe offering thee this vndeſerued grace and fauour.

Whereunto the Great maſter preſently anſwered:

Moſt mightie and gratious emperour, your offered fauours before your other worthie captaines, I deſerue not; neither is my preſent eſtate and deſert towards you ſuch, as that I dare or ought to refell the ſame: yet I will ſpeake freely in the middeſt of your victorious armie, a man vanquiſhed in preſence of the conquerour, whoſe great mercie I neuer diſpaired of, and whoſe faith I neuer doubted: The reſolute anſwere of the great Maſter vnto Solyman.

B I had rather now I haue loſt my ſoueraigntie, forthwith to loſe my priuat and vnfortunat life; or elſe for euer heereafter to liue in obſcuritie, than of my people to be accounted a fugitiue rather than a vanquiſhed man: For to be vanquiſhed is but chance of warre, and of ſo great a conquerour no ſhame to him that is conquered: but afterwards to forſake his owne people and to turne to the enemie, I account it ſhamefull cowardiſe and treacherie.

Solyman maruelling at the courage and maieſtie of the hoarie old prince, in his ſo great extremitie, diſmiſſed him, and ſent him againe into the citie, guarded with his owne guard, vntill he was come into his pallace: and vnto euery one of the knights attending vpon the Great Maſter, was giuen a rich garment, in token of Solymans fauour. Within a few daies after Solyman Solyman commeth into the citie vnto the Great maſter.

C comming into the citie, went to viſit the Great Maſter alſo: whom he found buſie in packing vp his things againſt his departure. Heere when the Great maſter falling downe vpon his knees would haue worſhipped him, he would in no caſe ſuffer him ſo to doe: but with his hand putting aſide his vaile of maieſtie (which manner of reuerence the Turkiſh emperours giue onely to God, and their great prophet Mahomet) tooke him vp, and ſaluted him by the name of Father. To whom the Great maſter for his wiſedome and diſcretion now to him no leſſe admirable, than he was before in time of warre for his valour and courage, ſpake in this ſort.

If my fortune and ſucceſſe had beene anſwerable to my heart and courage, I ſhould heere be in this citie, rather as a victorious conquerour than a man conquered. But ſithence the fatall deſtinies would The ſpeech of the Great maſter to Solyman.

D needs ouerthrow the Rhodian eſtate, I am glad that you are the man before all other by fortune aſſigned, of whom I ſhould receiue both force and grace. And vnto you, amongſt many other your rare and worthie praiſes, this ſhall not be the leaſt, That you vanquiſhed the RHODES, and ſhewed mercie. By this meanes you haue ioyned vnto your dreadfull power, the fame of clemencie and curteſie; an honour not of the higheſt to be deſpiſed, by which alone we come neereſt vnto God. Wherefore I doubt not but you will keepe the conuentions of the late peace inuiolate, which your owne clemencie perſuaded you to grant, and neceſſitie enforced vs to take. I ſhall now be an eternall example of the Turkiſh emperours clemencie and vertue, more then if I had by and by at the firſt yeelded my ſelfe: obſtinat wilfulneſſe hath made thy glorie and mercie now famous thorow the whole world, and vnto the worlds end.

Whereunto Solyman by his interpreter, anſwered:

It is to me a great pleaſure, that God at length hath put into thy mind to make choiſe of peace before The notable anſwere of Solyman to the great Maſter.

F warre, which I would thou couldeſt haue liked of from the beginning: then truely thou ſhouldeſt at this time haue receiued of my great and mightie maieſtie, more good than thou haſt endured harme. Which that I haue done vnto thee, not for any hatred, but onely for deſire of ſoueraigntie, thou maieſt gather by this, That I ſuffer thee and thine to depart hence at libertie with all your wealth and ſubſtance: For I make not warre, thereby to heape vp wealth and riches; but for honour, fame, immortalitie, and enlarging of mine empire. For it is the propertie of a king royally deſcended, by ſtrong hand to take from others, and to inuade others; not vpon a greedie and couetous mind, but for the honourable deſire of rule and ſoueraigntie: which whileſt my neighbour withſtandeth, I count it enough by force of armes to remoue him.

But the Tyrant (as many ſuppoſed) ſpake all this by way of diſſimulation, hauing as it was commonly bruted, giuen order for the rigging vp of a great ſhip and certaine gallies, for the ſud-

den transporting of the Great maſter and the knights of the Order to CONSTANTINOPLE; G which report ſeemeth to haue beene but faigned either of malice, or elſe by ſuch as leaſt knew Solymans mind: for if he had ſo purpoſed, who ſhould haue let him, hauing them all in his power. Iouius in his little treatiſe rerum Turcicarum dedicated to Charles the fift, reporteth that he himſelfe heard Lilladamus the Great maſter ſay, That when Solyman entered into the RHODES attended vpon with thirtie thouſand men, there was not any man heard to ſpeake a word, but that the ſouldiers went as if they had beene obſeruant friers: and that when he came to aske leaue of Solyman that he might depart, he was ſo courteouſly vſed of him, that turning himſelfe to Abraim the Baſſa, whom he aboue all men loued, ſaid, Truely I cannot but grieue to ſee this vnfortunat old man, driuen out of his owne dwelling, to depart hence ſo heauily.

The Great maſter embarking himſelfe with his knights and ſuch other as were willing to de- H part, in veſſels and gallies prepared for that purpoſe, departed out of the iſland on Newyeares day at night: and after long and dangerous trauell by ſea in that Winter weather, landed at laſt at MESSANA in SICILIA, from whence he afterwards ſailed into ITALIE, and ſo trauelled to ROME where he was honourably receiued by Adrian the ſixt of that name then biſhop there, a Hollander borne, ſometime ſchoolemaſter to Charles the fift, and his Vicegerent in Spain; who if he had been as forward in the ſhort time of his Papacie to haue relieued the RHODES, as he was to maintaine Charles his quarrell againſt the French king, it is not vnlike but that famous citie had beene relieued, and the iſland in poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians at this day. Thus Solyman, whileſt the Chriſtian princes were at diſcord amongſt themſelues, to his great glorie and no leſſe griefe of all good Chriſtians, entred the RHODES the fiue and twentith day of December, a day I dedicated vnto the natiuitie of our Sauiour Chriſt, in the yeare 1522, after it had beene by the knights of the Order valiantly kept and defended againſt the infidels by the ſpace of 214 years, ſince the time they by force tooke it from the infidels in the yeare 1308: and now being ſo long holden as was poſſible, againſt all the power of the Turkes, was yeelded vp when it had been ſix moneths beſieged. At this ſiege Solyman loſt a great part of his army; for beſides them that were ſlaine at the aſſaults, which were many, thirtie thouſand died of the flix.

Solyman entreth into the Rhodes on Chriſtenmas day, in the yeare 1522.

Whileſt Solyman thus lay at the ſiege of the RHODES, Ferhates Baſſa Gouernour of the Marches of the Turkiſh empire, alongſt the riuer of Euphrates, by the commandement of Solyman went with a great armie againſt Alis-beg, whom the Turkes called Schach, Suar-Ogli, that is to ſay, king Suar his ſonne: which P. Iouius corrupting, calleth him by the name of Saxouar-oglis. This Alis, after he had betraied his vncle Aladeules the mountaine king, vnto Sinan Baſſa, was by Selymus left chiefe gouernour of that large and wild countrey alongſt the borders of ARMENIA and CAPADOCIA, wanting nothing of the honour of a king but the name onely, as is before declared in the life of Selymus. Solyman iealous of his honor, and fearing leaſt he ſhould take vpon him the abſolute gouernment of that countrey (which indeed of right belonged vnto him, the children of Aladeules the late king being now all dead) and ſo to make himſelfe king, eſpecially if he ſhould ioyne in friendſhip with the Perſian king: after the manner of ambitious men, purpoſed by any meanes to haue him taken out of the way: and had therefore ſent Ferhates to eaſe him of that care. The Baſſa without making any ſhew of hoſtilitie, marching with L his armie along the confines of his countrey, as if it had been but to looke to his charge, when he was come as neere as he could to Alis, without miſtruſt, thought good to aſſay if he could by pollicie bring that to paſſe which hee was otherwiſe with great danger to attempt by force. Wherefore faining himſelfe to be extreame ſicke, he ſent embaſſadours to Alis, requeſting him as a friend to vouchſafe to come vnto him being at the point of death, vnto whom he had many things of importance from the great emperour to impart, and would if he ſhould die, leaue with him all his charge vntill Solyman ſhould otherwiſe diſpoſe thereof.

Solyman ſendeth Ferhates Baſſa againſt Alis-beg the mountaine prince.

Alis and his foure ſonnes treacherouſly ſlaine.

Alis, who from his youth had alwaies honoured the Turkiſh emperours and faithfully ſerued them, miſtruſting no harme came to the Baſſa, accompanied with his foure ſonnes; whom the faithleſſe Baſſa without regard of infamie, cauſed preſently to be put to death with their father: M and ſo reducing all that country into the manner of a prouince vnder Solymans obeiſance, came to him with twentie thouſand men, about the time that the citie of the RHODES was yeelded vp. This is the faithleſſe dealing of the Turks, not with the Chriſtians onely, but with them of their owne ſuperſtition alſo: vſing it as no ſmall pollicie, vtterly to extinguiſh the nobilitie in all countries ſubiect to their ſeruile tyrannie.

Solyman

A Solyman after he had thus ſubdued the RHODES, and diſpoſed of the Iſland as he liked beſt, returning to CONSTANTINOPLE, brake vp his armie, and for the ſpace of three yeares after followed his pleaſure, not doing any thing worthie of remembrance. During which time and many yeares after, the rich and flouriſhing countrie of ITALIE, ſometime miſtreſſe of the world, was miſerably afflicted and rent in pieces by Charles the fift (then emperour) and Francis the French king, the one enuying vnto the other the glorie of the empire: and he not content therwith, ſeeking with immoderate ambition to make himſelfe lord of all ITALIE: moſt of the other Chriſtian princes and ſtates being at the ſame time either by the one or by the other, drawn into the fellowſhip of that war, to the great trouble and ſore weakening of the Chriſtian common-
B weale. Whereupon Solyman waiting all occaſions that might ſerue for the inlarging of his empire, and annoying of the Chriſtians, thought it now a fit time for him to ſet his foot into HVNGARIE, whereinto he had alreadie laied open a way by the taking of BELGRADE. He knew right well that Lewes then king of HVNGARIE was but young, altogether vnacquainted with the warres, commaunding ouer his headſtrong ſubiects (eſpecially his rich prelates and nobilitie) no otherwiſe than pleaſed themſelues, being himſelfe rather by them altogether ouerruled: Beſides that, he was in good hope, that the other Chriſtian princes neere vnto him, either caried away with regard of their owne eſtate, would not, or elſe before vnto himſelfe by league faſt bound, could not affoord vnto him any great aid or ſuccour: The Germanes he knew would make ſmall haſt vnto ſuch warres as ſhould yeeld them much danger, and but ſmall pay: As for
C the princes of the houſe of AVSTRIA, Charles the emperour, and Ferdinand his brother, although they were ioyned vnto the young king with the neereſt bonds of alliance (Lewes hauing married Marie their youngeſt ſiſter, and Ferdinand, Anne, king Lewis his ſiſter) yet was there as he thought ſmall helpe to be expected from them; Charles hauing his hands full in ITALIE, and Ferdinand altogether carefull of himſelfe: And that Sigiſmund king of POLONIA would for the young kings ſake breake the ancient league he had with the Turkiſh emperors, he could hardly be perſuaded: As for other Chriſtian princes farther off, he ſtood not in any great doubt. Thus hauing with himſelfe ſingled out this young prince the Hungarian king, whom he had in his greedie mind alreadie deuoured, he ſet forward from CONSTANTINOPLE, and was come on his way as far as SOPHIA in SERVIA with a mightie armie of two hundred thouſand men before
D that the Hungarians had any knowledge of his comming (ſo blind and ſenceleſſe was that ſtate, which now ſleeping in ſecuritie, had long before loſt thoſe eyes which euer watcht, and neuer ſpared coſt or paines to keepe the ſame in ſafetie) in ſteed of whom were others come in place, ſharpe of ſight, and too too prouident for that concerned their owne aduancement; but blind as beetles in foreſeeing this great and common danger (wherwith they were ſhortly after all quite ouerwhelmed) vntil it was now brought home vnto their owne dores. The young king of himſelfe but weake, by reaſon of his youthfull yeares, and nothing ſtrengthened by them for whom he had moſt done, and ſhould haue beene his greateſt ſtay; was wonderfully diſmaied with the fame of the approch of ſo mightie an enemie: yet the better to withſtand him, he ſent embaſſadors with all ſpeed vnto the Chriſtian princes his neighbors, requeſting their aid againſt
E the common enemie: but all in vaine. In the meane time, after the ancient manner of his countrie, he gaue out generall ſummons for the aſſemblie of his counſell for the warres: whether his great ſtipendarie prelates (of duetie bound to appeare) came with their troupes of euill appointed horſemen, and not halfe full; who alſo deliuered in leſſe ſummes of money by farre, than of right they ſhould haue done, towards the maintenance of the charge of that common war. And the temperall nobilitie, forgetting the warlike diſcipline of their famous anceſtors, as freſh water ſoldiors which had neuer ſeene the Turkiſh emperour in his ſtrength, and but little acquainted with ſome light skirmiſhes or ſmall inuaſions, in their vaine brauerie made light account of the Turkes, proudly vaunting, That although they were in number but few, yet they would eaſily ouerthrow the great numbers of them, if euer they came to handie ſtroks. But aboue all the reſt
F one Paulus Tomoreus, archbiſhop of COLOSSA, ſometimes a Minorite, who had before been in diuers light skirmiſhes againſt the Turkes, with great inſolencie did ſo confidently brag & boaſt of the victorie he vainly dreamed of, that in his ſermons vnto the ſouldiours, and in open talke with the nobilitie (if he could haue done ſo much as he vaunted of) it ſhould ſeeme that he himſelfe had been ynough to haue ouerthrowne the Turks whole armie.

But when all the kings armie was aſſembled, and a generall moſter taken, there was hardly found fiue and twentie thousand men in all, horse and foot. So that the foolish hardnesse of Tomoreus, and others so forwards to giue the Turks battel, was of most wise men disliked. The old souldiors and men of great experience said plainely, That it was meere follie and madnes with such a handfull of men to giue battell vnto the enemie, who would bring eight times so many moe into the field as they were. Wherefore some wished, that the young king should be withdrawne from the imminent danger: amongst whom Stephanus Verbetius, a noble captaine, of all the rest best acquainted with the Turkish wars, gaue counsell, that the person of the young king should for the safetie of the common state, whatsoeuer should happen, be kept out of danger in the strong castle of BVDA. But the vnruly soldiors with open mouth impugned his wholesome counsell, and said plainely, That except the king himselfe did lead them, they would not at all fight. Of which opinion was also the rash prelate Tomoreus, persuading them with all speed to giue the enemie battell, and that the noble young king vnder the protection of Almightie God, should in person himselfe go and giue the signall of battell against his enemies. The king ouerruled by this vnluckie counsell, vpon a brauerie without reason set forward with his armie, and came to a place called MOHATCHZ or MVGACE, which is a little countrey village not farre from Danubius, almost in the middle betweene BVDA and BELGRADE. And now Balybeus with twentie thousand horsemen (the forerunners of the Turkish armie) was at hand, at which time the commanders and captaines of the kings armie, entred into counsell, Whether it were better to incampe their armie within their wagons alongst the riuer of Danubius, and so to expect the comming of Ioannes Sepusius, countie of CILIA, and Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA; (who was then said to be comming towards the king with his Transiluanian horsemen, of all other fittest to haue incountred the Turkes) or else to march on forward, and presently to giue them battell? But Tomoreus, who now commmanded all, knowing that vpon the comming of the Vayuod, he was to giue place, and himselfe to be commaunded (which vnto so proud a man was no smal griefe) for the maintenance of his credit and reputation, and to carie away the glorie of the victorie he so vainely hoped for, could not abide to heare of any delay; but hasting headlong to his owne destruction, did with such vehemencie impugne the wholesome counsell of others, who would haue expected the comming of the Vayuod, that he by his franticke persuasions drew on the vnaduised young king into most apparant and manifest danger. For Balybeus diuided his horsemen into foure battels, which by turnes skirmished with the kings armie without intermission, and gaue the Hungarians no leisure to rest either day or night, but continually wheeling about, kept them in so straight, that no man could without great danger go to water his horse at the side of Danubius, which was fast by, or once to stirre out of the campe, but were enforced to dig pits for water in places where they lay: with which necessitie Tomoreus was enforced to put the armie in order of battell, and there was now no remedie, but he must of necessitie fight for the honour of his prince and countrie. His battell was raunged all in length, and his horsemen not altogether (as it was thought) vnfitly placed here and there by troupes amongst his footmen; least the Turks (being in number eight to one) should with their multitude compasse them round, and so inforce them to fight as it were in a ring: for now was Solyman come also with all his huge armie. The Hungarian tents defended with a small garrison, were left a little from the armie on the right hand, inclosed round about with waggons, one chained to another: neere vnto the which, Tomoreus Generall of this vnluckie battell, had not altogether vndiscreetly placed a troupe of chosen horsemen for defence of the kings person against all vncertaine euents of the battell. But this day (vnluckie to the Hungarian name, but vnto the king himselfe most fatal and vnfortunat) ouerthrew that his purpose, deuised too late for the safetie of the kings person: for at the first incounter the Hungarians, although they had receiued no harme by the Turkish artillerie (being mounted too high, of purpose as it was thought, the gunners being for most part Christians) were easily beaten downe and ouerthrowne, oppressed by the multitude of their enemies, especially Tomoreus with the rest of the prelates and nobilitie being almost all slaine together, and the Hungarian horsemen also either slaine or put to flight. All things going thus to wracke, a companie of Turks assailed the campe, which was hardy defended by the weake garrison. Which thing the troupe of the chosen horsemen appointed for defence of the kings person, beholding, could not be staied, but that they would needs helpe them which defended the campe. The young king seeing all his armie discomfited, and himselfe forsaken of the horsemen which he was in hope should haue garded him, betooke himselfe to flight.

A But as he was making ſhift for himſelfe, thinking to haue paſſed ouer a fennie ditch, his horſe in plunging out, fel backwards vpon him into the ditch; where being heauie loaded with armour not able to helpe himſelfe, he was in the middeſt of the filthie ditch in the mud moſt miſerably drowned. Some few horſemen eſcaped out of the battell, the reſt were either ſlaine or taken priſoners. This wofull battel neuer ſufficiently to be lamented, as the ground of the miſeries of that worthie kingdome, was fought the 29 day of October in the yeare 1526. King Lewis drowned in a ditch.

Solyman hauing obtained this victorie, marched on directly to BVDA the regall ſeat of the Hungarian kings, which was deliuered vnto him with the caſtle; vpon condition, that he ſhould not violate any man either in perſon or goods, and at his departure to leaue the ſame againe vnto the Hungarians: all which things he (according vnto their requeſt) faithfully performed. Be-
B ing entred into the caſtle, he wonderfully commended the ſame, but lodged not therein, becauſe it is by their auncient law forbidden the Turkiſh emperour to lodge within any walled place which is not his own. Wherefore he returned and lodged in his campe alongſt the riuer of Danubius.

Whileſt Solyman lay thus at BVDA, ſeuen bloudie heads of the biſhops and greateſt of the nobilitie (ſlaine in the late battell at MOHATCHZ) were preſented to him, all ſet in order vpon a wodden ſtep: whereat he ſmiled, to ſee his courtiers laying their right hands vpon their breſts, and bending their bodies as if they had done them great obeiſance, to ſalute them by name, and in deriſion to welcome them by the names of valiant popes. But afterwards, when he had more particularly enquired what euerie one of them was, it is reported that he moſt of all deteſted La-
C diſlaus Salcanius the great biſhop of STRIGONIVM, for his miſerable couetouſnes, that being a man of infinit wealth, refuſed to ſpare part thereof vnto his ſoueraigne, requeſting the ſame at his great need: Tomoreus he blamed of inconſiderat raſhneſſe, for that he being a cleargie man, would buſie himſelfe ſo farre in matters not belonging to his vocation: On the contrary part, he commended Franſcicus Perenus biſhop of VERADIVM, a man honourably deſcended, for his wiſe counſell (though it was not followed) for that he had heard it reported, that he as a true prophet foretelling the common ſlaughter enſuing, had ſharply ſaid in the councel at ſuch time as Tomoreus would needs fight with the Turkes, & was not by any meanes to be remoued from that his fatall opinion, That he did foreſee what that their frierlike Generall would the next day doe; and that he would with ſo great an enterpriſe effect no more, but to make one holiday the D more in the Chriſtian kalenders, in remembrance of thirtie thouſand Hungarian martyrs, moſt miſerably ſlaine of the Turks in vnequall battell, for defence of the Chriſtian faith and religion (for at that time, they which willingly expoſed themſelues to death in defence of the Chriſtian faith, were all accounted for Martyrs:) Georgius Sepuſius and the others he called raſh fooles, that would aduenture with ſo ſmall ſtrength to incounter ſo ſtrong an enemie. At ſuch time as the counterfeits of king Lewis and Marie his wife were ſhewed vnto him, he honourably ſaid, That he was ſorie for the young king, that it was his euill happe to haue ſo vnaduiſed counſellors in a matter of ſo great importance, as to perſuade him againſt all reaſon to fight at ſo great diſaduantage: And that he came not into HVNGARIE to take his kingdome from him, but only to re-
E uenge the wrongs done vnto him by the Hungarians: And that if he had eſcaped the danger of the battell, he would aſſuredly haue againe reſtored vnto him the kingdome of HVNGARIE, contenting himſelfe with ſome ſmall tribute: And that it ſhould haue beene vnto him honour enough to haue ſaued the nephew of Sigiſmund king of POLONIA his confederat, ſo ſtrongly allied with the honourable houſe of Auſtria. All which he commaunded to be told to Marie the queene, who was for feare fled from BVDA to POSSONIVM. Which might perhaps all ſeeme to haue beene either diſſemblingly ſpoken, or falſly reported of the equitie and courteſie of the barbarous king, if he had not ſhortly afterwards to the ample declaration of his bountie and liberalitie, without any deſert, giuen the ſame kingdome of HVNGARIE to Ioannes Sepuſius, not borne of any roiall bloud, and then retaining the mind of a verie enemie. After that, he tooke away three goodly images of braſſe of ancient workmanſhip, which were placed in the entrance F into the kings pallace, by that renowned king Mathias Coruinus the great fauourer of rare qualities and vertues: theſe images repreſented the formes of Hercules with his club, of Apollo with his harpe, and Diana with her bow and quiuer: all which he placed in the tiltyard at CONSTANTINOPLE, as a trophie of the Hungarian victorie. Howbeit theſe images vvere ſince taken down by the perſuaſion of the Mufti, & molten (as contrarie to their ſuperſtition) and great ordinance made of them. He caried also away with him three pieces of artillerie of most excellent G and curious workmanship; and certaine brasen pillars of chamfred worke, which supported the Chapiters of the gates. He tarried at BVDA about twentie daies: In which time to satisfie the cruell nature and greedie desires of his souldiours, he sent out diuers troups of horsemen into the countrie thereabout, by whom all the countrie betwixt RAB and the riuer of Tibyscus was by that sudden and vnexpected incursion so destroyed, that it is reported that aboue an hundred and fiftie thousand people of all sorts were either slaine or led away into most miserable captiuitie. All which done, he returned againe by the same way he came to CONSTAN-

Ioannes Sepusius, Vaiuod of Transiluania, aspireth to the kingdome of Hungarie.

About the same time Ioannes Sepusius Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA, with a great power came now too late into HVNGARIE to haue aided the king: but glad, as was thought, of his H death, as tending to his owne aduancement; for as much as he was now (the king being dead without issue) a man of greatest account amongst the nobilitie of HVNGARIE. Wherefore as one of a deepe and reaching wit, and in great hope to obtaine the kingdome, hee began cunningly to labour diuers of the noble men one by one, and instantly to request them, that at the next parliament they would not betray the honour of their countrie, in suffering the royal dignitie of that auntient kingdome to be transferred vnto a stranger, of such a nation as happily loued them not: for why, the Hungarians ought well to remember what great calamities they had receiued in former times, in chusing forreine kings and strangers to rule ouer them, and in following their vnfortunate ensignes against the Turkes; which thing the wofull miseries of times past might notably proue: which either Sigismundus of BOHEMIA, or Ladislaus the first of I POLONIA, by their vnfortunate battels, once at NICOPOLIS, againe at CVLVMBARIVM, and last of all at VARNA, had brought vnto the Hungarians. But to speake, nay once to remember the harmes receiued by the long cowardise of Ladislaus, or this late rashnesse of his sonne king Lewis, would make any noble minde to blush and be ashamed: vnder whose gouernment all militarie discipline, and the glory of HVNGARIE might well be thought to be vtterly lost.
And hee said there remained of the nobility of HVNGARY, men honourably descended of most auncient houses, worthy of the kingdome, which bare noble minds, and were of sufficient courage, discretion, and power, in this time of common heauinesse to restore the honour of the estate, and worthily to defend the kingdome: Amongst whom (said he) I would not bee accounted so base minded, or heauy headed (although there be many which for the honour of K their houses and wealth may seeme to goe before me) that I will therefore confesse, that any of them is for valour, prowesse, or fortune better than my selfe, either for conducting of an army, or gouernment of a kingdome: for I shall be a king of courage and valour sufficient, if by your fauourable good will I shall be thought worthy of your consent and suffrages. The Vayuod taking this course, by his earnest sute and labor had woon the good wils of many; and so much the easier, for that Stephanus Bator (a man of greatest nobilitie among the Hungarians) was a little before gone into BOHEMIA vnto king Ferdinand, who was then greatly busied (by reason of a parliament there summoned) in procuring the fauour of the nobility and commons of that realme against the time of the parliament, wherein he was in good hope to be chosen king; L as he was in short time after.

King Lewis buried.

At that same time the Hungarians were with great solemnity celebrating the funerall of their late king: whose dead body after the departure of Solyman from BVDA, was found whole, by the demonstration of one Cotriscus one of the squires of his body, who was present when he was drowned; and so was brought out of the fens of MOHATCHZ to ALBA REGALIS, where it was with great pompe buried amongst the sepulchres of the other kings of HVNGARIE his pre-decessours. Which solemne funerall once ended, the generall military parliament (by the au-thoritie and voice whereof the kings of HVNGARIE were by their auntient lawes and customes to be chosen) was called: in the shutting vp whereof, Iohn the Vayuod hauing in that common heauinesse no competitour, nor any of the greatest nobility which durst stand against him, was with the great applause and consent of all there present chosen King. To whom forthwith Pe- M trus Perennus came and presented the ancient crowne of the kingdome of HVNGARY, which was in his keeping, made after an homely fashion of pure gold; with which the lawfull kings of HVNGARY vsed alwaies to bee solemnely crowned. It is reported, that it was the crowne of Stephanus first king of HVNGARY, and was by an auncient custome alwaies kept in the castle

A of VICEGREDE. And ſo Iohn the Vayuod was orderly crowned, and conſecrated by the hands of Paulus biſhop of STRIGONIVM, lately choſen in ſteed of Ladiſlaus Salcanius, ſlaine in the battell at MVGACE, and by the hands of Stephanus Brodaricus biſhop of VACIA, whom he choſe for his ſecretarie. And vnto Americus Cibachus he gaue the honour of the Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA, being but a little before choſen biſhop of VERADIVM. In his preferment, he was greatly holpen vnto the kingdome by the nobilitie which followed him out of TRANSILVANIA, men of great account both in peace and warre; amongſt whom deſcended of the Hungarian bloud, were chiefe, Stephanus Verbetius, Paulus Antandrus, Gregorius Peſchenius, Nicholaus Gleſſa, and Ianus Docia. But whileſt this new king is in this ſort buſied in rewarding his friends, and
B ſtrengthening himſelfe in his kingdome, he was aduertiſed, that Ferdinand his competitor of the Hungarian kingdome was choſen king of BOHEMIA: who out of the old controuerſie betwixt Mathias Coruinus and Fredericus the emperours great grandfather, alleadged great claime vnto that kingdome, deriued from the time of Ladiſlaus, who was reported to haue been poiſoned at the time of the ſolemnization of his mariage, through the ambition and malice of Georgius Pogibracius; who affecting the kingdome of BOHEMIA, ſhortly after obtained the ſame. And now it ſeemed that the time was come, wherein Ferdinand made greater with the kingdome of BOHEMIA, and ſtrengthened with the power of his brother Charles the emperour, not forgetting his right, might vpon good ground lay claime vnto the kingdome of HVNGARIE, vnto him (as he pretended) of right belonging euer ſince the time of Albertus the emperour.

Iohn Sepuſius the Vayuod choſen & crowned king of Hungarie.

Ferdinand king of Boheme his claime to the kingdome of Hungarie.

C Neither did Ferdinand beſide the ſtrength of AVSTRIA and BOHEMIA, want the furtherance of diuers of the princes of HVNGARIE; hauing in his court many of vnquiet ſpirit, halfe fugitiues, deſirous of change, which enuied at the Vayuods royall preferment (as if it had beene taken from themſelues, more worthie thereof than he) by the raſh and tumultuous fauour of the vulgar people. For beſides Bator, who in moſt mens iudgement might moſt worthily haue required and obtained the kingdome, there were others alſo almoſt of like nobilitie and valour, as Valentinus Turaccus, Stephanus Maylatus, Ianus Scala, Gaſper Scredius, Baltaſar Pamphilus, and Ferentius Gnarius; to whom alſo was ioyned Paulus Bachitius borne in SERVIA, a valiant gentleman, who being entered into the Mahometane religion, to auoid the Turkiſh ſlauerie got away vnto the Chriſtians, and hardly eſcaped from the battell of MOHATCH.

D By the perſuaſion of theſe noble men, Ferdinand of his owne diſpoſition readie enough to claime his right, eſpecially a kingdome, and truſting vnto his ſtrength in AVSTRIA, BOHEMIA, RHETIA, STIRIA, and CARYNTHIA, marched directly towards BVDA. With whoſe comming, Iohn the new king being wonderfully troubled, as a man beſet with want of all things, hauing neither ſufficient ſtrength wherupon to reſt in his new got kingdome, neither any great aſſurance of the fidelitie of his ſubiects, like ynough either for feare, or of their naturall inconſtancie to fall from him, determined not to abide the comming of his enemie to BVDA: but exhorting his captaines to follow him, although he were glad to depart and giue place to his euill fortune for a time, with ſuch power as he had brought with him out of TRANSILVANIA, & ſuch other as he could otherwiſe leuie, he paſſed ouer the riuer to PESTVM: and not daring any E where thereabouts to reſt, by long marches paſſed ouer the riuer Tibiſcus, and there incamped at TOCAI, which was a ſtrong caſtle vpon the further ſide of the riuer. His departure being knowne, Ferdinand marching on, obtained BVDA without reſiſtance: where he ſtaied a while, and conſulted with his captains, Whether he ſhould purſue his flying enemie, or not? But it was quickly reſolued, That the diſcouraged enemie was to be ſpeedily purſued, before he ſhould gather greater ſtrength, or enter into greater policies. Wherfore Ferdinand committed all his armie vnto the nobilitie of HVNGARIE, his friends, whom we haue before named; who marching with all ſpeed poſſible, came to the riuer Tibiſcus: where paſſing ouer vpon a bridge made of boats, which they brought with them in waggons for that purpoſe, they came with enſignes diſplayed vnto the caſtle of TOCAI, where the king lay with his armie in order of battell. But F terrified with the ſuddaine comming of his enemies, and debating with his captaines of the greatnes of the danger, tooke a courſe vnto himſelfe rather ſafe than honorable: for his captains deſiring nothing more than to ioine battell, and in manner contemning their enemies, perſuaded him to withdraw himſelfe a little out of the battell, and to keepe him out of danger; and if things fell out otherwiſe than wel, to reſerue himſelfe vnto his better fortunes: as for themſelues they would moſt reſolutely fight againſt thoſe traiterous fugitiues, for as much as it were great diſhonour for them, being Hungarians, a warlike people by nature, to refuſe battel being offered G by the enemie. Amongſt the cheefetaines in the kings armie, Ferentius Bodo, an old captaine of great experience and courage was cheefe, to whom the king deliuered his enſigne with his own hands, and he with great skill ordered his battell, for the number of his ſouldiours: he himſelfe ſtood in the maine battell with the Hungarians, placing the Tranſiluanians in the wings. In Ferdinands armie, Valentinus Turaccus led the maine battell with the Hungarians vnder Ferdinands enſigne, ſtrengthened on the one ſide with troupes of horſemen out of STIRIA, and on the other with the horſemen of AVSTRIA. But Paulus Bachitius according to the manner of the Turkiſh warres (wherewith he was well acquainted) with a companie of light horſemen lay cloſe in ambuſh in a conuenient place for that purpoſe, a good diſtance off, againſt the left wing of the enemies armie, readie as occaſion ſhould ſerue to take his moſt aduantage. It was not H greatly needfull for the captaines to vſe any perſuaſions to encourage their ſouldiours, readie ynough of themſelues to fight. The great ordinance once diſcharged, the armies came faſt on & ioyned battell, where the wings of both battels fought with diuers fortune. The Stirian horſemen were not able to endure the force of the Tranſiluanians, but were put to the worſe: and on the other ſide, the left wing of Bodo his armie, conſiſting for moſt part of raw and vnexpert ſouldiors, was by the horſemen of AVSTRIA ouerthrowne. At the ſame time both the maine battels (being almoſt all Hungarians) fought with equall courage, and that ſo eagerly, as ſeldome had been ſeene a more fierce or cruell battell. But by a freſh charge giuen by Ferdinands horſemen, who had now put to flight the right wing of Bodo his battell, all Bodo his armie fighting moſt valiantly, was diſordered and put to flight: Bodo the Generall labouring to reſtore the battell, and to ſaue the enſigne to him before by the king deliuered, was by the comming in of Paulus Bachitius with his light horſemen, taken. The other captaines ſeeing all loſt, and paſt hope of recouerie, betooke themſelues to flight: all the kings artillerie and enſignes were taken by the enemie. The king ſeeing the ouerthrow of his armie, for ſafegard of his life fled into POLONIA. Ferdinand his captaines following the courſe of the victorie, entered into TRANSILVANIA, where the people yeelding themſelues at the firſt, all the whole prouince ſubmitted it ſelfe vnto the authoritie of Ferdinand. Bodo and the reſt of the noble men that were taken priſoners, with the enſignes taken from the enemies, were ſent to Ferdinand. But when Bodo hauing his libertie promiſed, could not be perſuaded to renounce his oath giuen to king Iohn, and to beare armes againſt him, he was by Ferdinand his commaundement caſt into a darke dungeon, where ſhortly K after, conſumed with ſorrow and greefe, he miſerably ended his life.

King Iohn flieth into Polonia.

Shortly after Ferdinand (the Hungarians generally ſubmitting themſelues vnto him) was by their common conſent ſaluted king, and crowned with the ſame old crown wherwith king Iohn had been crowned, which the ſame Perenus (a man of little conſtancie) brought vnto him; and with him was alſo crowned Anne his wife, the only ſiſter of the late king Lewes: all which ſolemne ceremonies were celebrated at ALBA REGALIS, the vſuall place for the coronation of the Hungarian kings. Ferdinand by rare felicitie thus poſſeſſed of two kingdomes, whereunto he was not borne, returned into BOHEMIA, and left his deputies for the gouernment of the kingdome of HVNGARIE. Theſe were Stephanus Bator, whom hee appointed viceroy, with L whom he ioyned Paulus biſhop of STRIGONIVM, who had alſo reuolted from king Iohn: and made Berethſaxius ſecretarie, and Alexius Turſonus a Morauian, treaſurer.

Ferdinãd crowned king of Hũgarie at Alba Regalis.

King Iohn thus miſerably diſtreſſed, and thruſt out of his kingdome by Ferdinand, fled to Hieronimus Laſcus, a man for his honourable diſcent and learned vertue, of great fame and reputation amongſt the Polonians: who glad of ſo honourable a gueſt, was more carefull of nothing, than with all poſſible kindneſſe and courteſie how to comfort him, wrapt vp in ſo many calamities with the loſſe of his kingdome: he frankely promiſed vnto him all his owne wealth (which was not ſmall) for the recouerie of his former eſtate: and that which more was, for the reuiuing of his former felicitie, the vttermoſt of his wit and deuiſe, which in the compaſſing of all great matters was accounted wonderfull. That bountifull entertainment of this poore king M by Laſcus, who not altogether vnpleaſant to Sigiſmund king of POLONIA, although becauſe he would not offend Ferdinand, with whom he was ioyned in frendſhip and alience, he ſeemed to moſt men plainly to forget himſelfe in ſhewing ſo ſmall kindneſſe vnto king Iohn, whoſe ſiſter Barbara he had ſometime married: which was the cauſe that Laſcus forgot no point of courteſie in entertaining his gueſt, and yet the credit of Sigiſmund with king Ferdinand not toucht. But when

A when they had ſpent almoſt a month in conſultation and debating of matters too and fro, Laſcus accuſtomed with his deep wit ſharply to reaſon, and aduiſedly to determine of moſt weightie cauſes, at laſt reſted vpon this one point, That ready helpe in ſo hard and deſperat a caſe was onely to be hoped for of the Turkiſh emperour Solyman: being of opinion, that he being a moſt mighty prince, and of an honourable diſpoſition, anſwerable to his greateneſſe, would not reject the humble prayers of an oppreſſed and exiled king; eſpecially, if that being by his mercie and power reſtored, he could be content for ſo great a benefit to hold his kingdome, as of the bountie of the Othoman kings. For Laſcus ſaw that Solyman (ſo great and proud an Emperour) was not ſo deſirous of kingdomes (whereof hee had ſo many as could not eaſily be reckoned, B then commanding ouer a great part of the world) as of glory and renowne, wherewith hee vnderſtood him to be wonderfully delighted aboue all other Kings of the Eaſt, naturally carried away with that windy vanitie. This counſell (as in effect it proued) was vnto king Iohn wholeſome and reaſonable, if a man doe but reſpect the poore eſtate of a king, ſo greatly wronged, liuing in exile; but reſpecting the Chriſtian commonweale, it was vndoubtedly moſt dangerous and lamentable for one mans particular profit to bring the whole ſtate into moſt dreadfull and horrible danger: but the ſicke minds of worldly men, liuing in ſmall hope of doing well, and at the point of deſperation, refuſe no worldly remedies, be they neuer ſo doubtfull or dangerous. And not long after, vpon this reſolution with the king, Laſcus deſirous by noble actions to encreaſe the honour of his name, tooke the matter vpon him, and went as embaſſadour from the C exiled king to Solyman to CONSTANTINOPLE. The report was, that Sigiſmund did not only not ſtay him, but ſecretly gaue him his ſafe conduct with letters of credence, wherein he commended him vnto the Baſſaes & other great men in Solymans court, deſcended of the Polonian bloud, as his faithfull and louing ſubject ſent thither vpon an extraordinary and ſpeciall embaſſage. Laſcus as ſoone as he was come to CONSTANTINOPLE, with wonderfull dexterity had in ſhort time woon the fauour, not of the Baſſaes only, but of the other courtiers alſo; preſenting them with ſuch gifts as might for the fineneſſe and rareneſſe thereof, rather then for the value (as he thought) be moſt acceptable and pleaſing to their wiues: for amongſt that barbarous and corrupted people nothing is better welcome than gifts, whether they proceed of ſimple good will, or other reſpect, is no great difference. Amongſt the great Baſſaes at that time of greateſt D power and authoritie, was Luſtebeius, or rather Lutzis, who had married Solymans ſiſter; and Abraham borne at PARGA, a baſe village in ACARNANIA, brought vp in the court from his childhood with Solyman: he was then viſier or cheefe of the Baſſaes, and keeper of the emperors ſeale, and was by his office to ſubſcribe all ſuch graunts or letters as paſſed from the emperour: by which his great place, and the ſpeciall fauour he had with Solyman, he in magnificence, power and authority farre exceeded all the reſt of the Baſſaes, doing whatſoeuer pleaſed himſelfe; and that with ſuch ſoueraignty and the good liking of Solyman, that it was commonly ſaid, hee was the commander of his thoughts. Laſcus thus inſinuated into the court, and oftentimes talking with the Baſſaes without an interpretour, for that he could well ſpeake the Sclauonian tongue, (the familiar ſpeech of the Turkiſh courtiers) earneſtly ſolicited the kings cauſe, wonderfully E commending him for at his firſt comming after he had ſaluted Solyman, and was about to haue declared the cauſe of his comming, he was after the maner of the Turkiſh court turned ouer to the Baſſaes: for Solyman vſed not to admit any Chriſtian to talke with him in his court. Laſcus requeſted of Solyman, by the Baſſaes, That king Iohn wrongfully thruſt out of his kingdome by Ferdinand duke of AVSTRIA, and the treaſon of certaine of the Hungarians, might by the Turkiſh power be againe reſtored vnto the kingdome of HVNGARIE, which hee would hold by homage of the Turkiſh emperour, as of right belonging vnto him, ſince the time that Solyman with victorious hand reuenging his wrongs and ſubduing his enemies, had by law of armes (fortune ſo judging) gained the ſame. Promiſing that king Iohn, who for his worthineſſe was by the generall good liking of the Hungarians lawfully choſen to be their king, and ſo after the auncient F manner of that kingdome crowned; if hee were now receiued into Solymans protection and by him reſtored, ſhould neuer forget ſo great a benefit, but alwaies moſt faithfully and thankfully to honour the majeſtie of Solyman, paying him ſuch yeerly tribute as it ſhould pleaſe him to impoſe, and to make it knowne to all men that hee was his vaſſaile. Which thing if it would pleaſe him to grant, it ſhould be no leſſe honour and glory to Solyman himſelfe, than profitable and comfortable vnto the diſtreſſed king. For beſide that heroicall kings are compared vnto gods, rather rather for giuing than receiuing: it was easie to be seen, how greatly it did concerne the profit of G the Othoman kings to be neighboured with a weake and tributarie king, rather than with Ferdinand, a prince of great power, lately chosen king of BOHEMIA, supported by the strength of his brother Charles the emperour, commaunding ouer the warlike nation of the Germanes; which was as much difference as was betwixt the maintenance of a continuall heauie warre vpon his borders, and the safe enioying of a most assured peace. Beside that, it concerned the Turks to beware, that such things as they had got by the sword, they should also by the sword defend; and not to suffer any one to grow greater than the rest in riches and power. For it might so fall out, that Charles, growne to be a prince of mightie power, might draw the rest of the Christian princes to ioyne with him in the common cause of the Christian religion, and in that quarrell, as the Christian kings of EVROPE had in former time done, with vnited forces to seeke to recouer a- H gaine what they had before lost: whose force it would be hard to withstand. These things being sharpely deliuered, and by the Bassaes againe reported to Solyman, who standing at a secret window, had before heard them as they were by Lascus vnto the Bassaes declared; it was no great labour to persuade the Turkish emperour, of himselfe desirous of glorie and soueraignetie, againe Solyman granteth Lascus his request. to vndertake the Hungarian warre, and to graunt king Iohn his request, promising according to the successe of the victorie, to giue him that he desired, so that he would faithfully performe what he had promised, and not shew himselfe therefore vnthankfull.

In the meane time, Ferdinand vpon great reason thinking it necessarie by all meanes possible to confirme himselfe in possession of the kingdome of HVNGARIE: and fearing no force but the Turks, determined to proue Solymans disposition, and to seeke for his friendship; hoping by I reasonable means to compasse it, by shewing vnto the barbarous prince (not altogether abhorring from the commendation of iustice) his antient title and claime, and that he was by the anti-

His desire was, to be receiued into his friendship, and to ioine with him in league vpon the same conditions which Ladislaus & his son Lewes had for certaine yeares before obtained of the Othoman kings, and Sigismund king of POLONIA then also with like quietnesse enioyed. Wherefore hauing found out a fit man, whom he might send vpon this embassage to CONSTANTINOPLE, one Ioannes Oberdanscus, a Hungarian, he furnished him accordingly, and gaue him gifts, such as hee thought good to bestow vpon the K great Bassaes. But when Oberdanscus was come vnto CONSTANTINOPLE, he found Solyman harder to be entreated than he had before hoped, and the Bassaes altogether vnwilling to heare of any league: for although he was courteously receiued of Solyman, and most patiently heard, whilest he both eloquently and discreetly before the great Bassaes, deliuered his embassage; yet in the shutting vp of all, he receiued no more but a proud and insolent answere: for Solyman said, it was farre from the manner of his aunce stors, to receiue them into grace and fauour which had Solymans answeer to Ferdinands embassadour. done iniurie vnto the Othoman name: wherefore that Ferdinand had done impudently to inuade another mans kingdome, and to thinke to hold it to himselfe: for as much as his old title and claime which he stood so much vpon, was altogether extinguished and lost by law of arms, L by his late victorie against king Lewes: for which causes hee adiudged him vnworthy of his friendship and fauour, purposing sharpely to reuenge the wrong he had receiued, and proclaiming warre to come againe into HVNGARIE with such a power as should be sufficient to inuade Ferdinand either in AVSTRIA or GERMANIE. Wherefore in stead of friendship and league, he denounced vnto him all the calamities of warre: and so commaunded the embassadour with speed to depart from CONSTANTINOPLE. But Oberdanscus when hee was come backe againe as farre as VIENNA, and had there told the kings lieutenants, of the threatning words of Solyman, and that he would shortly come thither with his armie, he was not of any of them beleeued, but reputed for a vaine man. Wherefore to shun the hatred of them which mistooke truth for falshood, he made hast to come vnto Ferdinand, who was then at SPIRES, la- M bouring for voices to further his sute, for that at the next assemblie of the states of the empire, which was then at hand for the coronation of his brother Charles, he himselfe as he well hoped was to be chosen king of the Romanes. The newes brought by Oberdanscus, did not a little trouble king Ferdinand, foreseeing as it were what would happen: for that the Turkish tyrant vsed not lightly to breake such promises, but to performe them to the vttermost: and that more

A increaſed his care, he knew he ſhould come in euill time to craue help of the Germaines, for the defence of his kingdome in HVNGARIE againſt ſo mightie an enemie, eſpecially his brother Charles the emperour being buſied in his warres in ITALIE, and he himſelfe wanting money, the only means to raiſe an armie to withſtand the Turke. accompanied with Laſcus and ſuch of the Hungarian nobilitie as tooke his part came vnto him, of purpoſe to make himſelfe knowne vnto him which was to protect him; and doing him all the honour he poſſibly could, to requeſt him to proceed to reuenge his quarrell. Solyman with graue & yet friendly countenance, raiſing himſelfe a little from the cuſhion wheron he ſat, gaue him his right hand, proteſting, That nothing could happen vnto him better, or that he more deſired of God, than to be able to relieue diſtreſſed princes, eſpecially ſuch as were wrongfully oppreſſed by his enemies: wherefore he willed him to be of good comfort, promiſing of his bountie frankly to beſtow vpon him whatſoeuer he ſhould in that warre win with the ſword from the enemie. King Iohn obtained this rare fauour of Solyman by the earneſt mediation of
C Abraham the commaunding Baſſa; whom he had before at CONSTANTINOPLE by his embaſſadour Laſcus ſo woon with gifts and requeſts, that he thorowly tooke vpon him the defence of the kings cauſe: wherein Laſcus was eſpecially holpen by Aloyſius Grittus the Duke of VENICE his ſonne, who then followed the Turkes camp, and was for his fathers ſake and the great ſuffiiciencie he held himſelfe, had in great reputation amongſt the Turks; and in ſuch fauor with Abraham who did all in all with Solyman, that he could perſuade him to any thing he would. For this Aloyſius Grittus, born and brought vp in CONSTANTINOPLE, and wonderfull eloquent in the Turkiſh tongue, had by the honourable carriage of himſelfe, and the great port he kept in his houſe, ſo thorowly poſſeſſed Abraham (that all commanded) that he would manie times bring Solyman himſelfe ouer the hauen to PERA, to ſolace himſelfe in Grittus his
D pleaſant gardens and banquetting houſes, which he had there moſt ſumptuouſly made after the Italian manner: whereby to his great profit he obtained to be the chiefeſt man in receiuing of the Turkes cuſtomes.

The fame of Solymans comming directly from BELGRADE to BVDA, ſo terrified the citiſens of BVDA, that they almoſt all forſooke the citie and fled vnto other places further off, ſome to STRIGONIVM, ſome to ALBA REGALIS, ſome to POSSONIVM: ſo that at his firſt com- Solyman entreth Buda without reſiſtance, and beſiegeth the caſtle.
ming he entered the citie (almoſt deſolate) without any reſiſtance: the caſtle holden by a garriſon of Germans, he commaunded to be beſieged. The captaine of the caſtle was one Thomas Nadaſtus, a man of great account among the Huugarians, both for the honour of his houſe and his qualities anſwerable to the ſame, graced with ſingular learning: He perceiued his ſouldiors diſ-
E maied with the ſight of ſo great an armie and willing to ſurrender vp the caſtle, as (beſeemed a valiant captaine) forbad his ſouldiours to haue any talke with the enemie, commanded the great artillerie to be bent and diſcharged vpon the Turkes: and ſeeing his ſouldiours ſlack and timorous, reproued them of cowardiſe and treaſon, threatning them with ſhamefull death if they did not hold out the ſiege to the vttermoſt, and ſhew themſelues valiant men, both for the honour of their countrey, and of king Ferdinand whoſe pay they receiued, and of whoſe bountie they were to expect rewards and preferments anſwerable to their deſerts. But they miſdoubting by the running too and fro of the Turks, that the caſtle was vndermined; and ſmelling, or at leaſtwiſe imagining themſelues to ſmell the ſent of the gunpouder, which they ſuppoſed to be in the mine, and doubting to be preſently blowne vp; were ſtruck with ſuch a ſudden feare, that neither the feare of future puniſhment, neither the ſhame of ſo foule a fact, nor the reuerence of ſo worthie a captain could ſtay them, but that they would needs without further delay deliuer vp the caſtle: which when they could by no means perſuade the reſolute captaine to conſent vnto, but that he ſtill with ſterne countenance exclaimed againſt their cowardiſe and treaſon, they laid hands vpon him, and bound him hand and foot, & ſo preſently concluded with the enemie to yeeld vnto him the caſtle, ſo that they might in ſafetie depart thence with bag and baggage: which their in puniſhing the periurie of another, ran into wilfull periurie himſelfe; peruerting the commen-

BVDA the chiefe citie of HVNGARIE thus taken by Solyman, he reſolued forthwith to beſiege VIENNA the chiefe citie of AVSTRIA: in good hope, that by the carriage away of that, the other cities of leſſe ſtrength both of HVNGRIE and AVSTRIA would without any reſi- I burning and deſtroying the countrie before him as farre as LYNTZ. The poore people not knowing where to hide themſelues from the furie of their enemies, nor of whom to craue helpe, fled as men and women diſmaied, carrying with them their beloued children, the vnfortunat pledges of their loue, and what elſe they could, as things ſaued out of the middeſt of the fire.

For whatſoeuer fell into the enemies hand, was loſt without recure: the old men were ſlain, the young men led away into captiuitie, women rauiſhed before their huſbands faces, & afterwards ſlaine with their children, young infants were ript out of their mothers wombs, and others ta- K
ken from their breaſts were cut in pieces, or elſe thruſt vpon ſharpe ſtakes, yeelding vp againe that breath which they had but a little before receiued; with many other incredible cruelties, which were then by the mercileſſe enemie committed. Solyman himſelfe ſhortly after followed of the garriſon ſouldiors there placed by king Ferdinand, he reſerued three hundred Bohemians, ſeuen times in one day, and was as often repulſed: but being loath to ſpend any longer time about a towne of ſo ſmall importance, he forſooke that, and held on his way to VIENNA, whither he came about the ſix and twentieth day of September, and incamped in fiue places round L about the citie, with ſuch a world of people, that vnto them which viewed his campe from the higheſt tower in VIENNA, it ſeemed that the ground vvas for the ſpace of eight miles all couered with the multitude of his tents and people. King Ferdinand, who from the time that he had by his embaſſador Oberdanſcus receiued the hard anſwere from Solyman, alwaies ſtood in doubt of his comming; had beſide his own forces (which were not great to oppoſe againſt ſo mightie an enemie) craued aid of the Chriſtian princes his neighbours, eſpecially of the princes of the empire: who graunting him aid againſt the common enemie, appointed Fredericke countie Palatine of RHENE and duke of BAVARIA, Generall of their forces. But whileſt the Germans after their manner, ſlowly ſet forward, and made leſſe haſt than the greatneſſe of the preſent danger required; Solyman comming in the meane time, had ſo belaied the citie, that it was not poſ- M ſible for the duke Frederick by any meanes to get into it, but was glad to ſtay with his armie at CHREMSE about twelue miles from VIENNA. A few daies before by good hap, vpon the report of the loſſe of BVDA, twentie thouſand ſouldiers horſemen and foot out of diuers countries, were in good time come to VIENNA: amongſt theſe, the cheefe commaunders was Phi- lip the Paulſgraue, duke Fredericks nephew (a young gentleman of great courage and hope,

A sent thither but a little before with a few companies of horsemen and footmen by Fredericke his vncle, who was comming after with a greater power himselfe, but was now shut out of the citie by Solyman) Nicholaus countie of SALMA, the L. William Rogendorff, steward of the kings houshold, Ioannes Cazzianer, a noble man of CROATIA, and afterwards gouernour of VIENNA: and next vnto them Nicholaus Turrianus, Ioannes Hardecius, Leonardus Velsius, Hector Ramsack, men both for their birth and valour of great account amongst the Germanes. The citie of VIENNA as it was of some good strength toward the North, by reason of Danubius, so in other places it was at that time neither by art nor nature strong. The ditches, such as they were, were altogether drie, and easie to be passed ouer: the wals of bricke, built round without any flankers, and neither high nor thicke, but after the antient simple manner of fortification of ci-

Vienna badly fortified.

B ties: for before that time neither had king Ferdinand, fearing no enemie, neither they of VIENNA who had not of many yeares seene an enemie, had any care to fortifie the citie: but as men altogether buried in securitie, and nothing fearing the comming of so mightie an enemie (although they were thereof before admonished by Oberdanscus) had not so much as cast vp any rampire or bulwarke, more than at the gate of CARINTHIA, whereon they might conueniently place their great Ordinance: so that of a hundred great pieces, and three hundred others of lesse charge, which might haue wonderfully annoyed the enemie, a great part serued to no vse, for want of conuenient place to mount them vpon. Yet as the sudden comming of the enemie and the shortnesse of the time gaue leaue, such bulwarkes as they could vpon the suddaine, they cast

C vp, and planted their ordinance theron. The citie was diuided into diuers quarters, and to euery part a strong garrison appointed for defence thereof, all the gates of the citie were mured vp, except such as were of purpose reserued to sallie out at. Now had Abraham the great Bassa encamped himselfe vpon a high hill, where stood a ruinous castle, from whence he might ouerlooke all the citie, yet so, as that he lay out of the danger of gunshot. Becrambeius, Solymans great commaunder in ASIA, lay at the gate called PVRGATORIA, neere the church of S. Viderich. In the third campe towards the rising of the hills, lay Michael Ogli, towards the Church of S. Vitus. At the Scottish gate towards Danubius, lay the Asapi, with diuers companies of the Ianizaries: which with shot out of their trenches, suffered no man to appeare vpon the wals in that quarter without most manifest danger, and powred such showers of arrowes ouer the wals into the citie, as if they had fallen out of the cloudes; that hardly could any man stirre in the ci-

D tie vnarmed, but he was forthwith wounded. Solyman himselfe lay neere vnto S. Markes church, compassed about with the Ianizaries and other souldiors of the court, defended also with the bricke wals of the gardens thereabouts. Whilest the Turkes were thus incamping themselues, the Christian defendants oftentimes fortunatly sallied out vpon them, and slew many of them. In one of which sallies Wolfgangus Hagen a valiant captaine, with certaine old souldiours of the Spaniards was slaine, fighting most valiantly at the gates of the castle: and in another skirmish Christophorus Zetlitz a man of great courage, sallying out of the citie with fiue hundred horsemen, euen vnto the enemies trenches, was intercepted and taken with six others of his compa-

nie; who were all compelled by the Turks to carrie so many heads of their slain fellowes vpon poles, and so presented vnto Solyman: of whom he enquired many things as well concerning

E Ferdinand himselfe, and where he was, as concerning the princes which had the charge of the citie, whether they were in hope to defend the same against his mightie power or not. Whereunto Christopherus aptly and wisely answered, although not altogether so truly, That king Ferdinand lay not farre off at the citie of LINTZ, expecting the assembly of a great armie: and that the princes of GERMANIE, BOHEMIA, MORAVIA, and of diuers other places were comming vnto him, with great aid; so that if he would but stay a little vntill his forces were come together, he should then see whether of them were of greater strength and power: for as much as it would not be long before the king would come and giue him battell: As for the princes in the citie, he said he knew no more of their minds, but that both they and all the souldiours from the

F highest to the lowest, had solemnely sworne to defend the citie, and not to giue it ouer vnto the last man, reposing their hope not in the wals and fortresses thereof, but in their weapons and valour, being men of great resolution, and not easily to be vanquished or discouraged. With which answere although Solyman was a little moued, yet dissembling his present heat, said, he had hetherto made war against diuers nations, and alwaies had the victorie, whereof he doubted not now also: But as for him, and the others taken with him, they knew they were in his power to

ſaue or kill at his pleaſure: Yet to make them know that he could ſhew mercie vnto his vanquiſhed enemies, he frankely graunted them their liues and libertie: charging them, that after they were again returned into the citie, they ſhould in his name wiſh the defendants of themſelues to yeeld vp the citie, which it was impoſſible for them long to defend againſt his mightie power, which neither the ſtrong citie of BELGRADE, nor the famous citie of the RHODES were able to withſtand; and to accept of ſuch reaſonable conditions as he ſhould graunt vnto them, promiſing, that amongſt other things proceeding of his infinit bountie, hee would take order, that they ſhould in ſafetie depart thence with bag and baggage: in which doing they ſhould well prouide for the ſafetie of themſelues and of their goods by flying vnto his mercie in time, before the furie of the warre was growne to further extremitie: all which it would be too late to expect after the victorie, when nothing was to be hoped for but cruell death, murder, and miſerable deſtruction. Wherefore it were good for them well to conſider of the matter, and not fooliſhly to refuſe that was now frankely offered them of mercie, which they ſhould not afterwards obtaine with any prayers or teares: for why, he was reſolutely ſet downe (as he ſaid) not to depart thence before he had taken the citie. When he had thus ſchooled them, he gaue vnto euery one of them three Hungarian duckats, & ſo ſent them away. They being receiued into the citie with great ioy, made relation vnto the princes and great captaines of all the threatning and proud ſpeeches of the Turkiſh tyrant: which they tooke in ſuch diſdain, that they would not vouchſafe to returne him any anſwere. Solyman not a little diſpleaſed, that his great words were ſo lightly regarded, by way of deriſion ſent word vnto the citie, That if they wanted helpe, he would ſend them the three hundred Bohemians, whom he tooke in the caſtle of ALTENBVRGE: to whom anſwere was returned by them of the citie, That they needed no helpe from him, wherefore he might diſpoſe of his priſoners as he thought good. By this, Solyman perceiued, that VIENNA was not to be woon with words, nor the defendants to be diſcouraged with great lookes: wherfore he begun to vſe his focre, & with ſuch ordinance as he had brought with him, to batter the wals: which becauſe it was not great, but fitter for ſeruice in field than for batterie, did not much more harme than to beat downe the battlements and ſuch little ſtandings, made of timber and bourds in manner of galleries, hanging here & there ouer the wall, for the ſmall ſhot to play out of, a ſimple deuiſe in ſtead of flankers. His great artillerie prouided for batterie was comming vp the riuer of Danubius, which he daily looked for: but by good hap, Wolfgangus Hoder, a forward captaine, hearing of the Turkes comming vp the riuer, went out of POSSONIVM with certaine ſmall veſſels well appointed: and meeting with the Turks, ſet vpon them with ſuch courage and reſolution that he ſlew many of them, and ſuncke diuers of their boats and pinnaces, amongſt whom were they which were bringing vp Solymans great peeces for batterie to VIENNA: which was there all ſuncke in the riuer, with the boats that brought it. By this good ſeruice, Solyman was diſappointed of his great artillerie, and the citie deliuered of a great danger. So Wolfgangus hauing made great ſpoile amongſt the Turkss, and loſt ſome few men, returned with victorie to POSSONIVM. Yet another part of the Turkes fleet comming vp to VIENNA, at the firſt comming brake downe all the bridges: for a little aboue the citie, the riuer of Danubius deuiding his channell, maketh diuers Iſlands, which by ſundrie bridges are ioyned together, ouer which lieth the way from AVSTRIA vnto the citie. This fleet ſo kept the paſſage, that no man could without danger either by water or by land goe in or out of the citie. Solyman hauing loſt all his peeces for batterie, & ſeeing how little he preuailed with his field peeces, fell to vndermining of the citie, hoping by that meanes to ouerthrow the wals, and to make a way for his men to enter. This worke, as the Turkes cheefe hope, was with wonderfull labour and diligence attempted in fifteene ſundrie places: which was not ſo ſecretly done, but that it was by drums laied vpon the ground, by baſons filled with water, and ſounds made into the earth, perceiued by the defendants; and ſo with countermines met withall, that moſt part of thoſe works were vtterly fruſtrated, and in them eight thouſand of his Turkes either ſlaine or buried quicke.

Eight thouſand Turkes loſt in the mines.

Solyman to buſie the defendants that they ſhould not ſo perfectly diſcouer his mines, diuided his armie into foure parts, appointing thē orderly to ſucceed one after another in giuing alaroms to the towne, that filling their eares with continuall noiſe, he might keepe them alwaies occupied. In the middeſt of which hurly burly his workes in the mines went forward with all ſpeed poſſible, neither was he in that his expectation deceiued: for one of the mines brought to perfection vnperceiued by the defendants, and ſuddenly blowne vp, ſhooke and ouerthrew a great

A part of the wall neere vnto the gate which leadeth towards CARINTHIA; whereat the Turkes gaue a great ſhout as if the citie had now been taken, and withall couragiouſly ſtepping forward preſſed in on all ſides, by the ruines of the wall to haue entered the breach, charging the defendants with their ſmall ſhot and Turkie arrowes as thicke as haile. Who on the contrarie part like reſolute men ſtood in the face of the breach, with more aſſurance than the wall it ſelfe, receiuing them with deadly ſhot and puſh of pike, in ſuch furious manner, that the Turks for all their multitude, vnable longer to maintaine the aſſault, began to retire. Which thing Solyman perceiuing, ſent in new ſupplies, and ſo renewed the aſſault before giuen ouer, but with no better ſucceſſe than before: for hauing receiued a great ouerthrow, as men forgetting both duetie and
B martiall diſcipline, they retired, not expecting any ſigne of retrait. At this aſſault ſo many of the Turkes were ſlaine, that the ground neere vnto the towne lay couered, and the ditches filled with their dead bodies. Not long after, the wall was blowne vp in two places more ouer against S. Clares church; by which breach being not verie great, the Turks ſeeking to haue entred, made a bloudie fight with the Germains which defended that place, which they ſought ſo deſperatly to haue entred, that without regard they thruſt one another vpon the points of their enemies weapons: who gliſtering in good armor, readily receiued them being for moſt part naked men, and ſlew them without number, and ſo enforced them againe diſorderly to retire, hauing before filled both the breaches with their dead carkaſes. Three daies after enſued a moſt cruell fight, when as another part of the wall (neere vnto the gate of CARINTHIA, and not farre from the C firſt breach) was ſo ſuddenly ouerthrowne, that the Turkes thorow the new made breach ſeeing the Chriſtians as they ſtood readie to come to the defence thereof; and likewiſe the Chriſtians them, now approching; for eagerneſſe and haſt on both ſides, threw away their pieces and bowes, and came to handie blowes in the middle of the breach; the Turkes with their ſcimiters, and the Germaines with their long ſwords. At which times, as the Chriſtian captaines encouraged their ſouldiers with cheerfull perſuaſions: ſo the Turkiſh Commaunders enforced forward their Turkes both with words and wounds. The aſſault began ſo terrible, that it was thought a more fierce and deadly fight was neuer ſeene from the beginning of the world: which was with greater reſolution maintained by the Turkes, for that many of their moſt valiant horſemen forſaking their horſes, thruſt in with their targets and ſcimiters, or elſe with their launces amongſt
D the Ianizaries and other footmen, and there fought moſt deſperatly. At laſt, after this furious fight had endured by the ſpace of three houres, and many of the Turkes beſt captaines and ſouldiers lay dead vpon the ground by heapes; the Turks ſeeing no hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the aſſault, and retired to their campe.

The Turkes repulſed from the breach.

A moſt terrible aſſault.

The Turkes the third time repulſed.

Long and tedious it were to recount euerie aſſault giuen during the time of that dreadfull ſiege, with euerie particuler accident not vnworthie the remembrance, which for breuitie I wittingly paſſe ouer. Yet amongſt the reſt (the moſt valiant leader, though afterwards vnfortunat) the Lo. William Rogendorffe is not to be forgotten, who oftentimes perceiuing many of the Turkes ſtragling diſorderly abroad in the countrey, one day vpon the ſudden ſallied out vpon them with certaine troupes of horſemen, with ſuch violence, that at the firſt onſet he ouerthrew
E them; and hauing them in chaſe, did ſuch ſpeedie execution, that of 5300, ſcarcely 140 eſcaped his hands: after which time his name became terrible vnto the Turks. Solyman was exceedingly grieued with the often and bloudy aſſaults by him in vaine giuen to the citie, but purpoſing now to proue the laſt and vttermoſt of all his forces, he called vnto him the chiefe commaunders of his armie, whom at the firſt he ſharply reproued as men of no courage, which being many times as good as in poſſeſſion of the victorie, had moſt cowardly contrarie to the manner of that victorious nation, turned their backes vpon their enemies, in the breaches alreadie halfe woon: Wherefore he willed them to plucke vp their hearts, and to make all things readie for a new aſſault, wherein hee expected that they ſhould with couragious forwardneſſe and reſolution, recompence their late cowardiſe: for why he accounted it a great diſhonour to forſake the ſiege
F begun; wherefore they ſhould reſolue the next day as victorious conquerors to take the citie, or elſe there as faint-hearted cowards to end their daies. The next day after this heauie charge giuen, which was the fifteenth of October, the great Commaunders of the Turkes armie with all their forces aſſailed the citie, thruſting their men into the breaches by heapes, as if they would, if no way elſe, yet with verie multitude (if it had beene poſſible) haue diſcouraged or ouerborne the Chriſtians: they were come to handie blowes, and the fight was in euery place moſt terrible, the Christian defendants stil repulsing them with greater courage than they were able to assaile them. Besides that, to the great aduantage of the defendants, many pieces of their great ordinance skilfully mounted in places most conuenient, and continually discharged amongst the thickest of their enemies as they pressed on, made such slaughter amongst them, and so cut them off, that being thorowly discouraged, they shrunke backe, and could not by any threats or commaund of their captaines be thrust forward, chusing rather to be slaine of their owne captaines (as some of them were) than to be rent in sunder with the murthering shot of the Christians. So that the captaines seeing now no other remedie, gaue ouer the assault and retired, leauing behind them many thousands of their dead Turkes in the towne ditches. G

The Turkes repulsed.

The next day after this assault, Solyman despairing to win the citie, and fearing the comming of king Ferdinand and the countie Palatine with a strong armie, as it had been to him reported, H considering also that Winter was now comming fast on, determined to raise his siege: and to colour the dishonour thereof, he sent certaine of the chiefe prisoners which he had taken, richly apparelled with their purses full of money into the citie, to tell the captaines that he came not with purpose either to besiege or take the citie, but to reuenge the wrongs done vnto him by his enemie king Ferdinand, and to haue fought a battell with him for the kingdome of HVNGARIE: whom for as much as he could not draw vnto VIENNA, he would remoue thence to seeke for him, as his capitall enemie: Wherefore they should do well to yeeld themselues, which if they would, he promised not to enter their citie, but to receiue both the citizens and souldiours into his protection, reseruing vnto them their liues and goods with perpetuall freedome. Which his offer the defendants scornfully refused, as proceeding of meere desperation. The next night fol- I lowing Solyman with more than barbarous crueltie, caused all the prisoners in his armie to be slaine, which pitifull outcries was of the souldiors heard into the citie, not knowing what the matter should be, vntill that the next day after the departure of the enemie they found the dead bodies of men, women, and children in all places of the campe wallowed in their owne bloud, a most lamentable spectacle to behold. Solyman purposing to forsake the siege, caused Abraham the great Bassa to shew himselfe in order of battell, as if he would haue giuen a fresh assault: in the meane time he himselfe rose vpon the suddaine with the rest of his armie, and returned towards BVDA in such hast, that he neither put any garrison into such places as he had taken, neither demanded of them any tribute. After whom the Bassa followed, keeping himselfe a daies iourney behind him: and so in fiue daies he arriued with all his armie at BVDA, 32 Germaine K miles from VIENNA.

Solyman raiseth his siege.

This siege was giuen ouer by Solyman about the sixteenth of October, wherein he is reported to haue lost eightie thousand men, amongst whom was his great lieutenant of ASIA, with many other of his forward captains aud best souldiors. Of the defendants few or none of name were lost, but of the countrie people it is supposed that there was aboue sixtie thousand slaine, and caried away into captiuitie: all the countrie about VIENNA was miserably spoiled, all their trees and vines being by the Turks cut down to the ground. Solyman according to his promise, restored BVDA vnto king Iohn, who by solemne writing acknowledged himselfe his vassaile, and to hold the kingdome of HVNGARIE of him as his lord and soueraigne. Vnto him Solyman ioy- L ned Aloysius Grittus as his legat, to help him to prouide such things as should be needful for the defence of that kingdome.

Solyman restoreth the kingdome of Hungarie to king Iohn.

It happened one day whilest Solyman lay at BVDA, and had giuen king Iohn with diuers of the nobilitie of HVNGARIE accesse into his pauillion, that he fell earnestly in hand with king Iohn to pardon Paulus bishop of STRIGONIVM, and Petrus Perenus, who had taken part with king Ferdinand, and to receiue them into his former fauour: which men king Iohn could in no case like of, because that they as traitors vnto their prince and countrie, forgetting their faith and oath, had performed the like duetie vnto Ferdinand, as they had but a little before done vnto him at the time of his coronation: wherein he shewing himselfe vnwilling to be intreated, said, That their mutable minds fraught with infidelity, would neuer contain themselues within the bounds M of loyaltie, but find occasion to commit some fowler treason than they had before: whereunto Solyman straining his voice a little as one somewhat moued, most honourably replied: Can any thing (said he) happen vnto thee in this life better or more honourable, than if by thy kindnesse thine enemies shall bee of all men accounted ingratfull, that is to say, men noted with eternall infamie: when as in thy selfe the commendation of a good and courteous prince shall for euer remaine? And so not long

A long after fearing the cold of Winter then approching, dangerous for his beasts for cariage, especially his camels bred & brought vp in the hot countries of Asia, he set forward to Belgrade, and so trauelling through Thracia returned to Constantinople.

All this while that Solyman thus raged in Hvngarie and Avstria, Charles the emperour lately reconciled to Clement the seuenth of that name, then bishop of Rome, with a strong armie besieged Florence, by his lieutenant Daualus (who might haue done much against the Turks, if he had been so well imployed) labouring by all meanes to represse the libertie of the citizens, wherunto they had but a little before aspired, and to bring them againe vnder the subiection of the familie of Medices, wherof Clement was the chiefe. Which thing with much adoe he
B brought to passe, inuesting Alexander the bishops nephew in the dukedome of Florence, and afterward giuing him his base daughter in marriage; forgetting his brother Ferdinand in the meane time, thrust out of the kingdome of Hvngarie by Solyman, and the dukedome of Avstria wasted by the Turkes, with the citie of Vienna in danger to haue been lost. Which common calamities might well haue moued both the emperour and the bishop, to haue had more regard of, than by oppressing the libertie of one free citie to seeke how to serue their owne priuat respects.

The yeare following, which was 1530, Solyman with great solemnitie and triumph, after the Turkish maner, circumcised three of his sonnes, Mustapha, Muhamet, and Selymus, at Constantinople. Solyman circumciseth his three sonnes.

C Solyman hardly digesting the dishonour he had before receiued at Vienna, and oftentimes solicited by king Iohn for aid against Ferdinand, who with greater stomacke than power ceased not continually to molest him: but most of all prickt forward with the insatiable desire of inlarging his empire, after the manner of the Othoman kings, accounting his neighbour princes alwaies his enemies, and their dominions the obiects of his victories, and spoile for his souldiors; raised such an armie as for the greatnesse thereof might worthily haue beene a terrour vnto the world: Not so much purposing the protection of king Iohn, which he in shew most pretended; neither the siege of Vienna, as was commonly bruted; as the conquering of Avstria, Carinthia, Croatia, Stiria, and the rest of king Ferdinands dominions, and so afterwards of all Germanie. For the accomplishment whereof, he had in his immoderat desired prefined
D vnto himselfe the space of three yeres, which the great monarchs of Rome could not performe in more than so many hundreds. It was commonly reported that the proud tyrant would many times say, That whatsoeuer belonged vnto the empire of Rome, was of right his, for as much as he was rightfully possessed both of the imperiall seat and scepter of Constantine the great Commaunder of the world, which his great grandfather Mahomet had by law of armes woon from Constantine the late Christian emperour, whom he slew at Constantinople. And therfore both in his common talke and writings, as oft as he had occasion to make any mention of Charles the emperor, he would proudly and as it were in disdaine terme him by the name of the king of Spaine, but neuer by the name of emperour.

The discord of the Christian princes, and the great troubles euen then arising in Germanie
E about matters of religion, did not a little incourage the barbarous tyrant to take in hand this great expedition. King Ferdinand certainly aduertised that Solyman was in person himselfe setting forward with his huge armie, sent vnto him three embassadors; whereof Leonardus Negarola a noble gentleman, well learned, and skilfull in diuers languages, was chiefe, with rich presents and reasonable offers to intreat with him for peace. Who meeting him vpon the borders of Servia, were by him courteously receiued, and patiently heard: yet obtained of him no other answere, but that they should follow his campe, and attend his further pleasure. The report whereof, brought a generall feare vpon all Germanie, but especially them of Avstria, in whose fresh remembrance as yet remained the bleeding wounds of their countrie, their brethren and friends slaine, their wiues and children led away into captiuitie, their goods and cattel
F lost, their houses and fields burnt, and thousands of other grieuous calamities which they had endured in the late inuasion of the Turkes. Charles the emperour had in verie good time (a little before) for a while well appeased the discention then arising in Germanie about matters of religion, putting them in hope of a free and generall Counsell to be holden for the deciding of all such matters: & in a great assemblie of the states of the empire holden at Ratisbone, shewing the greatnesse of the imminent danger, so puissant an enemie threatning vnto them all the ſent at a prefixed day to ſend vnto VIENNA ſuch warlike forces as they had in any time before ſet forth, for the defence of the Chriſtian religion, and the maieſtie of the empire. Whereupon he wrot vnto Alphonſius Vaſtius (his Lieutenant Generall in ITALIE, and one of the greateſt captaines of that age) that he ſhould without delay call together the old captaines, and to leuie ſo many companies of harquebuſiers as they poſſibly could; and with them and the Spaniſh horſemen out of BVRGVNDIE and the low countries, and many noble gentlemen and old ſoul-diours out of SPAINE: for the guard of his owne perſon he entertained twelue thouſand Ger-manes, ſuch as had longeſt ſerued in his wars in ITALIE, ouer whom commaunded *Maximili-uenth then biſhop of ROME, although his cofers were greatly emptied by the late Florentine warres, which had coſt him ten hundred thouſand duckats; yet to make ſome ſhew of his diuo-tion in ſo dangerous a time, with the great good will he bare vnto the emperor, after he had with grieuous exaction extorted from the clergie a great maſſe of money (whereunto his rich cardi- I nals contributed nothing, as if it had bin a thing vtterly vnlawfull for them in ſo good a cauſe to haue abated any iot of their pontificall ſhew in the court of ROME,) ſent the young cardinall Hyppolitus Medices his nephew, being then about twentie yeares of age, a man indeed fitter for the wars than for the church, as his legate vnto the emperour, accompanied with mo good captaines than clergie men, and his cofers well ſtuffed with treaſure: whoſe comming to RATIS-BONE was vnto the emperor and the Germanes verie welcome, for beſides that he was a young gentleman of verie comely perſonage and exceeding bountifull, he entertained for thoſe wars (beſides the companie he brought with him) eight thouſand Hungarian horſemen, of all others beſt acquainted with the Turkiſh wars.

Strigonium be-ſieged by king Iohn. King Iohn vnderſtanding, that the formoſt of Solymans great armie were come as far as SA- K MANDRIA in SERVIA, thought it now a fit time to wring from king Ferdinand ſuch townes as he yet held in HVNGARIE, wherefore he ſent Aloiſius Grittus (whom Solyman had left as a helper for his eſtate) to beſiege STRIGONIVM; which is a citie of HVNGARIE, ſituat vpon the ſide of Danubius, about thirtie miles from BVDA, the caſtle thereof was at that time holden with a ſtrong garriſon of king Ferdinands: whereunto for all that Grittus laied ſuch hard ſiege both by the riuer and by land, that the defendants doubting how they ſhould bee able to hold out, eſpecially if Solyman ſhould take that in his way, as it was moſt like he would; ſent for reliefe to Cazzianer, a warlike captaine, then gouernour of VIENNA, and generall of all king Ferdinand his forces: by whoſe appointment certain ſmall frigots, were ſent downe the riuer of Danubius L from POSSONIVM, well manned: who ſuddainely ſetting vpon the Turkes fleet (which ſo kept the riuer that nothing could that way be poſſibly conueyed either in or out of the caſtle) ſhould by their vnexpected comming open that way: but Grittus hauing intelligence thereof by certaine Hungarians, which though they ſerued king Ferdinand, made no great account to flie ſometime to the one part, ſometime to the other, as beſt fitted their purpoſe; preſently reſolued to ſend his fleet vp the riuer, and by his ſuddaine comming to oppreſſe his enemies, in like ſort as they had thought to haue done him. And the more to encourage his ſouldiours, hee promiſed great rewards to all ſuch as ſhould performe any extraordinarie peece of ſeruice in that action:
and ſo hauing thorowly furniſhed all his fleet with good ſouldiors, but eſpecially with Turkiſh archers, ſent them vp the riuer to ſeeke their enemies: who fearing no ſuch matter, as men ſur- M priſed with the ſame miſchiefe they had prepared for others, were at the firſt exceedingly diſmayed, yet conſidering that they were reaſonably well prouided for their comming (although they yet wanted ſuch helpe as Cazzianer had appointed to ſend them) they thought it a great ſhame to flie, and therefore putting themſelues in order of battell, came downe the riuer, & with great courage encountred their enemies. There began a ſharpe and cruel fight, many being ſlain

A and wounded on both ſides: but at laſt they of POSSONIVM not able longer to endure the deadly ſhot of their enemies, and eſpecially of the Turkiſh archers, who with their arrows ſore gauled both the ſouldiours and the mariners, they turned their backes and fled: in which fight of ſixtie frigots which came from POSSONIVM, only thirteene eſcaped, with Corporanus the Generall, all the reſt being either ſunke in the fight, or els taken by the enemie, being run aſhore and forſaken by the Poſſonians, truſting more vnto their legs by land than their oares by water. Beſides this loſſe of the frigots, there was ſlaine of the Poſſonians almoſt fiue hundred. After this victorie, Grittus hoping that they in the caſtle of STRIGONIVM, deſpairing now of reliefe, and fearing the comming of Solyman, would not long hold out; left off to batter or vndermine the caſtle, wherewith he perceiued he little preuailed, purpoſing by lying ſtill and keeping them in
B the caſtle from all reliefe, to inforce them in time to forſake the place. Thus whilſt the deuided Hungarians with their owne hands inconſideratly ſought one anothers deſtruction, with the ruine of their countrie; Solyman the great enemie of all Chriſtians was readie at their backs to deuour both the one and the other, as in few yeares after he did.

Much about this time the old Spaniſh ſouldiors in ITALIE, drawne together by Vaſtius, as the emperour had before commaunded, were come to the Alpes. In this campe, of one ſort of men and other, was aboue twentie thouſand, whereof almoſt the third part was not ſeruiceable: for the old ſouldiors, enriched with the long warres in ITALIE, and the ſpoile of the rich countrie of LVMBARDIE, wherein they had of late bin billited, brought with them all their old gotten ſpoiles and ſubſtance, not forgetting ſo much as their women, and whatſoeuer els ſerued
C their pleaſure: for cariage whereof they drew after them a great multitude of carriages and vnneceſſarie people, all which ſerued for no other vſe but for the ſoldiors pleaſure, and to conſume victuals. Which their licentious wantonneſſe Vaſtius deſiring to reforme, gaue ſtraight commandement thorow all the campe, That they ſhould leaue behind them all ſuch vnneceſſarie baggage, and appointed what carriages ſhould ſuffice for euerie companie: whereat the ſoldiors began at the firſt to murmure, and preſently after to ariſe vp in mutinie: for many of the captaines being rich, and diſliking of that long and dangerous expedition, couertly incited the common ſouldiors to crie out vpon Vaſtius the Generall for their pay, alreadie due. Which thing once put into their heads, and the matter ſet on foot, quickely grew to that heat, that they all with one voice ſaid flatly, That they would go no foot further, before they had receiued their pay. Vaſtius
D although he well perceiued that tumult to be raiſed by ſome of his enemies, which ſought therby to lighten his credit, was glad for al that for the preſent to diſſemble the matter, and yeelding to the neceſſitie of the time, to content the mutinous ſouldiors with one months pay, promiſing them their full contentment, at ſuch time as they ſhould come vnto the emperor: and ſo when he had with much adoe appeaſed that tumult, he ſet forward into GERMANIE.

Mutinie amongſt the Spaniſh ſouldiers.

Immediatly after the Spaniards followed the Italians, who with ſuch cheerefulneſſe offered themſelues to that ſeruice, that euerie captaine brought with him twice ſo many in his companie as was expected: ſo that Vaſtius (who before doubtfull of their forwardneſſe in ſo dangerous a warre, eſpecially in the aid of the Germanes, of whom they had in the late wars receiued great harmes, had by great and earneſt perſuaſions induced diuers of the nobilitie, and others of the E better ſort, to enter into that honourable action, in hope that they would draw after them great numbers of their friends and tenants, as indeed they did) was now glad to ſend back again many of the common ſoldiors, by reaſon of the multitude; and alſo to his great diſcredit, and the offence of many, full ſore againſt his will to diſplace moſt part of thoſe forward gentlemen whom he had but a little before made captaines, who to their no ſmall charge had gallantly furniſhed themſelues, according to their degrees and places: for the emperour had then appointed what number of Italians he ſhould bring, and alſo giuen commaundement, That reiecting the reſt, he ſhould commit the leading of them only to thoſe old expert captaines of whoſe valour and diſcretion he had before had good experience. There were Martius Columna, Petrus Maria, Rubeus, Phillippus Torniellus, Ioannes Baptiſta Caſtalius, Fabritius Maramaldus, Pyrrhus
F Stipicianus, and Camillus Columna, being all men of great worth and approoued faith towards the emperour.

In theſe Italian companies were fourteene thouſand ſelect footmen, beſide many other braue men who voluntarily reſorted from diuers places to VIENNA. After theſe footmen followed Ferdinand Gonzaga with two thouſand horſemen, and certaine troupes of Grecians and Spaniards, ards,and with them came many noble gentelmen out of all parts of ITALIE, who had before beene great commaunders, but now ſerued as priuat gentlemen voluntarily without charge or pay; accounting it a great ſhame to tarrie at home as cowards,and not to be preſent in that religious war. G

The emperour alſo about the ſame time, hauing taken view of his horſemen come out of the low countries moſt excellently appointed, and ſhipping his great ordinance whereof he had bought great ſtore at NVRVMBERGE, departed downe the riuer from RATISBONE to LINTZ. The riuer of Danubius neuer carried ſo many veſſels and ſouldiors ſince the time of the great Romane emperours,as it did at that preſent. And yet beſides them which went down the riuer by ſhipping, the pleaſant bankes on both ſides were filled with great companies of horſemen and footmen, paſſing all alongſt the riuer vnder their colours, with their drums and trumpets ſounding, which altogether made the moſt glorious ſhew that a man could well behold vpon earth. H

1532 Solyman commeth into Hungarie.

In the meane while Solyman in ſix and fiftie daies march come to BELGRADE, thruſt ouer the great riuer Sauus by bridges made in diuers places,an infinit number of his horſmen into HVNGARIE: and leauing Danubius on the right hand,turning a little vpon the left,marched directly towards the rich countrie of STIRIA(called in auncient time VALERIA, and now STIERMARKE.) By the way as he went,he came to the little towne of GVNZA, which one Nicholas Iureſchitz (a man of an inuincible courage) kept with a ſmall garriſon of his own. This town ſtandeth in a plaine,not far from the citie of SABARIA, built ſquare,and but of a ſmall compaſſe, not verie ſtrongly walled, a poore obſcure thing, neuer famous till now by the great diſhonour that the great Turkiſh emperour Solyman there receiued. Abraham the chiefe Baſſa (who ſo abſolutly commaunded amongſt the Turks, as if Solyman had receiued him into the fellowſhip of the empire with himſelfe) was verie deſirous to ſaue this captaine Nicholas, for that he knew him to be a man of great courage,and was familiarly acquainted with him at ſuch time as he lay embaſſador at CONSTANTINOPLE: wherefore he attempted firſt by gentle perſuaſions and large offers,and afterwards by moſt terrible threats,to induce him to yeeld the towne vnto Solyman. But finding him ſo reſolutly ſet downe,that he was neither by faire nor foule meanes,but only by force to be remoued out of his towne; he incloſed the ſame round about with the hugie armie of the Turks,and by mines ouerthrew the wals in three places. Which ſoden breach, whileſt the garriſon ſouldiors moſt valiantly defended againſt the furious aſſault of the Ianizaries,on the South ſide of the town; the Baſſa planting his field pieces vpon the hils on the North ſide,did from thence grieuouſly annoy the defendants: who fiercely aſſailed by their enemies before, and beaten with the great ordinance behind, were grieuouſly diſtreſſed. Wherewith the worthie Gouernour ſomewhat troubled,though not much diſcouraged,ſuddenly of timber and boords raiſed vp a curtaine twelue foot high,at the backes of his ſouldiours: wherwith they were ſo couered from the ſight of their enemies, that they could not make any certaine ſhot at them,but only ſhot at that curtaine at all aduentures,not doing any thing ſo great harme as before: and with deſperat and reſtleſſe labour (in deſpight of all the Turks great power) repaired the breaches,in as ſtrong maner as at the firſt. In the meane time two hundred of the Turks horſemen,ſtragling from the campe,and ſeeking after bootie into the countrie as far as NEOSTAT, were by the Hungarian horſemen intercepted and all ſlaine or taken, whoſe heads the Hungarians brought to VIENNA; and the more to encourage the ſouldiors which daily repaired thither,in token of good lucke ſet them vp vpon ſtakes vpon the wals of the citie. Then was it certainly known of the priſoners,that Solyman had in his campe fiue hundred thouſand men, and three hundred field pieces, which were not of greater bigneſſe but that a camell might well carrie one of them, being taken from the carriage; for why, Solyman purpoſing by deſtroying the countrie before him,to draw the emperour vnto battell; had(as they ſaid)brought no greater pieces of batterie with him. Which report of the priſoners was alſo confirmed by the embaſſadours of king Ferdinand, whom Solyman gaue leaue to depart at GVNZA, giuing to euerie one of them a gowne of veluet and a piece of plate,with letters vnto the emperor and king Ferdinand his brother; wherein proudly vſurping the titles of many kingdomes,he moſt inſolently writ himſelfe lord and ſoueraigne of almoſt all countries and nations. But the effect therof was, That he was come into HVNGARIE,to reuenge the wrongs which they had done vnto king Iohn his friend and vaſſall; and would with fire and ſword enter their countries,and by the power of God I K L M

The huge armie of Solyman.

Solymans proud letters to Charles the emperor and king Ferdinand.

A God and his great prophet Mahomet, the fauourers of iuſt quarrels, giue them battell, if they durſt meet him: Wherefore if they would as valiant and couragious princes meet him in the field, he would in one battell end that quarrell with them, and in reward of the victorie either win or loſe the empire of the world. When Solyman had thus a great while laine at the ſiege of GVNZA, and thereto giuen diuers ſharpe aſſaults, being ſtill with great loſſe and diſhonour repulſed, he in the ſpace of foure daies caſt vp neere vnto the towne ditch two great mounts of faggots and earth, as if they had beene two great mountaines, of ſuch height, that they ouertopped not the wals onely, but euen the higheſt towers in the towne (by which wonderfull worke the great-neſſe of the Turkes armie might eaſily be coniectured:) one of theſe great mounts he caſt vp directly againſt the face of the towne, and the other at a corner of the ſame, to flanker alongſt the B wall; from whence he did with his ſhot not onely beat them which appeared vpon the wals for the defence thereof, but them alſo which vpon occaſion went too and fro in the ſtreets. Theſe mounts being with incredible celeritie brought to perfection, the towne ditch filled vp, and many of the defendants either ſlaine or wounded vpon the wals, the Turkes gaue a moſt furious aſſault at that place which was before ſhaken with the mine: againſt whom the valiant captaine as need was in that extreame danger, oppoſed al the ſtrength he had left. But the Turks ſtill preſſing on with their infinit multitude, were got vp to the top of the wals with eight enſignes, from whence they had repulſed the defendants: which being al either wounded or wearied, ſhrowded themſelues vnder the defence of their penthouſes, being neither able nor of courage to make further reſiſtance, ſo that the wals were now abandoned, and the towne there left without de-C fendants: when ſuddenly ſuch a great clamour was made by the loud outcries and lamentation of the women and children and other fearefull people, that the Turks which had recouered the top of the wals, ſtrucken with a ſudden feare, thinking the towne to haue been full of ſouldiers, ſtood as men aſtonied and diſmayed, whereupon the defendants began againe to take courage, and to ſhew themſelues: at whoſe ſight the Turkes poſſeſſed with a needleſſe feare, forſooke the wal, and could not by any perſuaſions or threats of their captaines be brought on againe to the aſſault. The towne was that day in al mens iudgements defended by the mightie power of God and not by the ſtrength of man. It greeued the proud tyrant aboue meaſure, that ſo baſe a town ſhould ſo long hold out againſt all his power, ſo that oftentimes in his rage he would threaten to raſe it down to the ground, and not to leaue any ſigne therof remaining: which he would vn-D doubtedly haue in time performed, had not Abraham the great Baſſa (by whoſe counſell he was altogether directed) otherwiſe perſuaded him: who waiting a fit time, when his choller was paſt, told him that it was not worth his name and greatneſſe, to ſpend his time and forces vpon ſo ſmall a towne of no importance, by raiſing whereof he ſhould neither get honour nor profit: for why, no man would meruaile, if he with ſo puiſſant an armie ſhould take ſo ſmall a thing, eſpecially by long ſiege, whereby the ſtrongeſt places are enforced to yeeld; and when he had ſo taken it, yet it would bee accounted a greater honour for ſo little a towne to haue holden out ſo long, than for him to haue with ſo great forces in long time conſtrained it: but if it ſhould otherwiſe fall out, as the chances of war are vncertain, that he ſhould by any occaſion bee conſtrai-ned to leaue it, hee ſhould thereby get no ſmall diſhonour: wherefore it were more wiſedome to E ſpare his ſouldiers labour in ſo ſmall a matter, whereof he was not to expect either honour or profit, and for to reſerue them for his greater deſignes, & not vainely to ſpend his forces & time in the beſieging of ſo baſe a village, from whence he might now depart with leſſe diſhonor than hee could afterwards, when he had proued the vttermoſt of his forces, and yet in the end glad peraduenture to forſake it: wherefore it were more for his honour to raiſe his ſiege, and calling the Gouernour of the towne vnto him, to giue him the towne as it were of bountie, than to ſpend ſo many good men as he muſt needs caſt away in the winning of it by force: With theſe and like reaſons the Baſſa preuailed ſo much with Solyman, that Nicholas the worthie gouernor of the town was by a herault at armes ſent for to come vnto the great Baſſa, Solyman diſdaining (as it ſhould ſeeme) to ſpeak with him himſelfe. The Gouernour being ſent for, although he was F greeuouſly wounded, and in ſmall hope of life, yet ſtoutly refuſed to come to any parley, except he were firſt well aſſured both by ſafe conduct and good hoſtages for the ſafetie of his perſon, and that nothing ſhould be exacted of him, not beſeeming his religion and honor. Which ſtout anſwere cauſed Solyman and the Baſſa to thinke, that his ſtrength was not yet ſo weakened but that he was ſtill able to hold out the ſiege: and thereupon, that he required for his ſafetie was

The Gouernour commeth to the Baſſa. Solymans ſafe conduct. Which being receiued, the Gouernour went forth, and was by Abraham the great Baſſa honourably receiued into the campe, and commanded to ſit downe by him in his tent: where he was by him firſt by the way of courteſie demaunded, whether hee had recouered his old infirmitie wherewith he was troubled at ſuch time as he was ſent embaſſadour vnto Solyman at CONSTANTINOPLE? After that, whether the wounds he had receiued in the laſt aſſault, were dangerous or not? but laſt of all, & that which moſt concerned the matter, vpon what hope he alone had ſo long and ſo obſtinately withſtood the mightie Sultan Solyman; when as all his neighbours round about him had ſo willingly ſubmitted themſelues? ſaying further, That he maruelled much why he repoſed any confidence in the lingering king Ferdinand. H
His anſwere to the Baſſa. Whereunto the Gouernor modeſtly anſwered, That he was (thanks be to God) well deliuered of his old diſeaſe: and that his wounds were without danger: but as concerning his holding out, he ſaid, that he for his great wiſedome knew, that it was the dutie of a good ſouldior valiantly to withſtand his enemies, & not to be troubled with any euill hap, or diſcouraged with any chance of war: as for himſelfe, he ſaid, when mans helpe failed, he had repoſed his full truſt in God, by whoſe power he had beene hetherto preſerued, which as he well hoped ſhould neuer faile him at his need: and that king Ferdinand was not ſo farre off, but that he would before it were long be there preſent with a great armie: wherefore hee did not greatly maruell, that he was not releeued before that time, for as much as many lets and occaſions might chance which might hinder the kings purpoſe, conſidering that fortune alwaies by nature vnconſtant, was in nothing more like I vnto her ſelfe in her vnconſtancie than in martiall affaires. The Baſſa wondering at the inuincible courage of the Gouernour, ſaid, That although the great emperour Solyman might now at his pleaſure vtterly deſtroy the towne, with all that therein was; yet being by nature of a moſt honourable and mild diſpoſition, and a great louer of valiant and courageous men, had commaunded him in his name to giue him that towne, and the liues of all them that were in it, as a reward of his valour ſhewed in the defence thereof: yet ſo, that he ſhould ſweare obedience vnto him, and receiue ſome few Turkes into the towne, in token that he had yeelded the ſame. The politicke Gouernour knowing that of eight hundred valiant ſouldiours he had ſcarcely a third part left, and them alſo ſore weakened with wounds and want of reſt, thought it neceſſarie to make his peace in beſt ſort he could: For what could haue happened vnto him more wiſhedly, K than with his great honour to keepe the towne ſtill, and with the loſſe of a few pleaſing words to deliuer himſelfe, with ſo many of his friends, from extreame feare and perill? and ſo in all his talke ſhewing no ſigne of feare, and with great words ſetting forth the ſtrength of his garriſon (which was indeed brought to an extreame weakneſſe) ſaid he was ready at the firſt to haue yeelded vp the towne, for the old acquaintance he had with him at CONSTANTINOPLE, but was alwayes letted by the Germanes and Spaniards which were there in garriſon, fierce and cruell ſouldiors, whoſe hard hearts were (as he ſaid) hardly entreated to ſuffer him at that time to come out of the citie into the campe: Wherefore he could promiſe to be a friend to all ſuch Turkes as ſhould paſſe that way, and to releeue them with ſuch things as his waſted country could affoord; and further, in token of his ſubmiſſion, to ſet vp one of Solymans enſignes in the cheefe tower of L
the citie: but as for receiuing any Turkes into garriſon, in token that hee had yeelded vp the towne, he was willing ſo to doe, but that he was greatly afraid they ſhould be euill entreated by the Germanes and Spaniards, who deadlly hated the Turks: whereof it was to be thought, that new warres would eftſoones ariſe. In concluſion, he ſo cunningly vſed the matter, that the great Baſſa was contented with this ſmall token of ſubmiſſion, That he ſhould receiue in at one of the gates of the citie, one of Solymans captaines with ten Ianizaries: which being done accordingly, and they courteouſly for a while entertained and againe diſmiſſed, the great Baſſa held himſelfe with that ſimple ſubmiſſion well contented: when as the Gouernour had neither Germane Solyman departeth from the ſiege of Gunza. nor Spaniard as then in garriſon. So when Solyman had with his great armie lien at the ſiege of GVNZA by the ſpace of eight and twentie dayes, and in that time to his great loſſe aſſaulted the M ſame thirteene times, he riſe with his armie, glad of a little fained ſubmiſſion for the ſafegard of his honour: and leauing VIENNA on the right hand, whither moſt part of the Chriſtian armie was aſſembled, tooke the way on the left into CARINTHIA, and ſo came to the riuer Mura, and from thence to the citie GRATIA. This turning of Solymans out of the way from VIENNA, where he knew his enemies lay, put all feare out of the minds of the Chriſtians, which they had before

A before not without cauſe conceaued, in ſo much, that he but a little before feared as a prince of great pride and power, ſhamefully repulſed at the little towne of GVNZA, and now ſhunning his enemies at VIENNA, began to grow into contempt as if he had been running away for feare. Which diſgrace the Turkes ſought by diuers excuſes to couer, as that the ſtrong citie of NEOSTAT lay betwixt him and VIENNA, which could neither without much difficultie be taken, nor danger left enemie behind him: Beſides that, Winter began to approch, which cauſed him (as the Turks gaue it out) to content himſelfe with the ſpoile of the rich countries betwixt the riuers Sauus and Dranus, and ſo in good time to returne againe to BELGRADE. But they which ſeemed to ſee farther into the matter, were of opinion, That Solyman vnderſtanding by his eſpi-
B als, and ſecret aduertiſement from his friends, that the princes of GERMANIE had with one conſent ioyned their forces with the emperours, brought out of ITALIE, SPAINE, and the low countries, which at his ſetting foorth he leaſt feared; and that the Chriſtian armie in number great, conſiſted not of raw ſouldiers, but for the moſt part of ſuch as had beene trained vp in warres, men both for courage and skill nothing inferiour to his Ianizaries and beſt men of warre; choſe rather to take the ſpoile of the countrey, as he might with ſafetie, than to aduenture his perſon and ſtate to the hazard of a moſt doubtfull and dangerous battell.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Michael-ogli by the commaundement of Solyman ſent Caſon with fifteene thouſand of his voluntarie horſemen (who in Solymans expedition againſt VIENNA, had run thorow the countrey of AVSTRIA as farre as LINTZ) charging him with-
C out ſtay to ſpoile all the countrey farre and neere which lieth between Danubius and the Alpes, thereby to learne what he could of the ſtate and ſtrength of the emperours camp; and by doing all the harmes he could poſſibly, to leaue a moſt lamentable remembrance of the Turkes being in AVSTRIA. Caſon was of himſelfe forward enough, and deſirous of the ſpoile; but ſo much the more, for that he was by the former road into that countrey become both famous and rich: Wherefore diuiding his horſemen into three companies not farre diſtant one from another, he ſuddenly oppreſſed an infinit multitude of all ſorts of people in the fields and countrey villages as he went; all which hee either ſlew without mercie, or carried away as miſerable priſoners. Thouſands of men and women tied togither in chaines and roapes, were by the cruell Turkes enforced to run as faſt as their horſes, the countrey villages were burnt down to the ground and
D in them the poore children of the Chriſtians, whoſe parents were either ſlaine or carried away captiues: ſo that all the countrey euery way for the ſpace almoſt of an hundred and fiftie miles, was couered with ſmoke and fire, within three miles of LINTZ; where king Ferdinand then lying, was glad to get himſelfe farther off to STRABINGA, where his brother Charles the emperour lay. This cruell Turke, according to his charge hauing with fire and ſword without compaſſion wrought all the wo he could poſſible vpon the poore Chriſtians, and now loded with the ſpoile of the countrey and multitude of priſoners, began to returne the ſame way he came, thinking to find Solyman either at the ſiege of GVNZA where he left him, or neerer hand at NEOSTAT comming towards VIENNA. But he as is before ſaid, riſing with ſmall honour from GVNZA, and fearing the power of the Chriſtians, was gone quite another way as farre as GRATIA, the metro-
E politicall citie of STIRIA, ſtanding vpon the riuer of Mura; which turned to the vtter deſtruction of Caſon and all his followers. For as ſoone as it was perceiued by the burning of the countrey all about, that the Turkes were come neere vnto LINTZ, the Chriſtian captaines with their companies went out of the campe, ſome one way, ſome another, as was thought moſt conuenient for the meeting with of theſe miſchieuous Turks, which neuer reſted in one place: wherin they vſed ſuch diligence in taking the paſſages, that it was not poſſible they ſhould eſcape vnfought withall. Foure companies of Spaniſh and Italian horſemen vnder the leading of Lewes Coue a valiant captaine, firſt lighting vpon them in a valley neere vnto NEOSTAT, and deſperatly charging them, were by the Turkes for moſt part ſlaine: But Caſon perceiuing how he was on euerie ſide laid by the Chriſtians in the vallies betwixt NEOSTAT, SABARIA, and VESPRI-
F NIVM, the night following with more than barbarous crueltie ſlew foure thowſand of the Chriſtians he had before taken priſoners, becauſe he ſhould not be hindred by them in his flight; and diuiding his armie into two parts, about midnight began to ſet forward, vſing the benefit of the night to haue eſcaped from his enemies out of theſe vallies wherein he was encloſed. One part of this armie led by Feriſes taking the way Southward, did with incredible labour cut a way thorow the thicke and ouergrowen woods (a thing thought altogither impoſſible) and ſo with little or no losse came to Solyman into STIRIA. Cason with the other part of the armie breaking out of the valley of STORAMBERG, chanced vpon the Palatine (Generall of the forces sent from the Germain princes) who with ten thousand footmen and two thousand horsmen, and certain field pieces brake the battell of the Turkes, and slew of them a great number: in which conflict Cason his chiefe ensigne was taken. He fighting most valiantly in the rereward to giue others time to escape, was himselfe there slaine; whose gallant headpiece presented afterwards to the emperour, confirmed the report of his death. They which escaped from the Palatine, in their flight fell into the hands of Lewes and the Marquesse of BRANDENBVRG, by whom they were slaine like beasts. The Hungarian horsmen led by Valentinus Turacus, lighting vpon them which fled from Lewes and the Marquesse, had the killing of them for the space of seauen miles; and of all others did vpon them the cruellest execution, following them hard at the heeles with their fresh horses, and fiercely insulting vpon them in their owne language. Those few dispersed Turkes which escaped the furie of the Hungarians, fell into the hands of the countrey people about VESPRINIVM and the lake of Balaton, which came out on euerie side in hope of spoile, who shewed them small fauour: so that of 8000 Turks which were with Cason, it was thought not one returned to Solyman.

Cason discomfited by the Palatine and slaine.

The slaughter of the Turkes.

The emperour vnderstanding that Solyman was gone as farre as GRATIA in STIRIA, called his chiefe captaines togither into the castle of LINTZ, to know their opinions, whether it were best to follow the enemie into STIRIA or not. The cities of LINTZ, GRATIA, and VIENNA are scituat almost in forme of a triangle: but from LINTZ to GRATIA is three good daies iourney of bad rough way by horse. Some said it was best to fight with the Turkes in that vneuen mountaine countrey, where the Turkes chiefe strength consisting in the multitude of his horsemen, should stand him in small steed, but should be enforced to trie the battell with his footmen, wherein he was inferiour to the Christians. This counsell although it had in it many difficulties, yet for that it proceeded from the most approued captaines, so moued the emperour, that he presently sent Apontins a Spaniard (the most famous captaine Antonius Leua his lieutenant) to take view of that passage: who shortly after returned againe to LINTZ, bringing word that all the countrey as he went was desolat and for feare forsaken of the inhabitants: but concerning the place of the enemies abode, he could learne no certaintie. Whereupon it was by generall consent concluded, that they should all goe to VIENNA, whither all the strength of the Germains was alreadie assembled, there to take a generall view of the armie, and to giue the enemie battell if he should againe returne. Some there were of great courage which openly disliked of that going to VIENNA, saying, that the emperour should rather in that distresse of the prouinces of STIRIA and CARINTHIA pursue his enemie, than turne out of the way to VIENNA. But others of greater iudgement, whose opinion preuailed, said, It was one thing to inuade, and another thing to defend: so that the emperour might with honour enough encampe himselfe in the fields of VIENNA, and from thence to expect & deride the base expedition and vaine brags of his proud enemie, who a farre off chalenged him into the field, and then like a coward durst not come neere him.

Charles the emperour his power at Vienna.

The emperour comming to VIENNA, and taking a generall view of the armie, found therein two hundred and sixtie thousand men, whereof nintie thousand footmen, and thirtie thousand horsemen were accounted old expert soldiers, & of them many whole companies and bands, of such as had before ben generals, captains, lieutenants, antients, or other officers & men of marke in other armies, and now were content to serue as priuat men. It was thought that so many worthie captaines and valiant souldiers, were neuer before in the memorie of man assembled togither into one campe: for the princes and free cities had not sent thither common souldiers, but their chosen and approued men; striuing as it were amongst themselues, who should send the best. All the flowre and strength of GERMANIE from the riuer of Vistula to the Rhene, and from the Ocean to the Alpes, was by the princes of the empire and free cities either sent thither, or of themselues voluntarily came thither. A thing neuer before heard of, that all GERMANIE should as it were with one consent, be glad to take vp armes for their common safetie, in defence of their honour and libertie; especially against people brought out of the furthest parts of ASIA, SYRIA, and ÆGYPT. Beside the great number of Spaniards, Italians, and Burgundians; the Bohemian campe lay not farre off, strengthened with them of SILESIA and MORAVIA. There were also some troupes of Polonian horsemen, not sent thither by publike authoritie, but seruing

A as voluntarie men: king Sigiſmund winking thereat, who as he was carefull not raſhly to break the league he had made with Solyman; ſo leaſt he ſhould ſeeme careleſſe of the Chriſtian common cauſe, by notable diſſimulation left place for ſuch of his ſubiects as would (as if it had been without his knowledge) to ſhew their valour in the moſt honourable warre.

The Chriſtian armie readie to receiue the enemie, lay in a great field neere vnto VIENNA in this order: Three great ſquadrons of pikemen, ſtanding one ſquadron a great way diſtant from another, were ſo placed againſt the enemie with like and equall front, that all the horſemen diuided into two parts, might well be receiued into the great ſpaces betwixt the three ſquadrons: for it was not thought conuenient to oppoſe ſo ſmall a number of horſemen in open field with-
B out the footmen, againſt almoſt three hundred thouſand of the Turks horſemen. The right wing of the horſemen was led by the emperour himſelfe, and the left by king Ferdinand. Before and behind, and on euerie ſide of the three ſquadrons of pikes, ſauing in thoſe places which were left open for the horſemen, about thirtie paces off, were placed twentie thouſand nimble harquebuſiers ranged in length, and but fiue in a ranke; ſo that whileſt the firſt diſcharged, the ſecond, and after them the third, and ſo the reſt readily and orderly comming on, might without let deliuer their bullets vpon their enemies: neither was it thought any diſauantage to place them ſo thin, for that if they found themſelues by the enemies oppreſſed, they might eaſily retire amongſt the pikes, ſtanding faſt at hand. Before the harquebuſiers was planted the great ordinance, whereof the emperor had ſuch ſtore and ſo well placed, that he could therewith (as with a
C moſt ſure trench) haue compaſſed in his whole armie. Only the Hungarians, men well acquainted with the manner of the Turks fight, choſe to lie in the open field in two great wings, vnder the leading of their two valiant captaines Valentinus and Paulus. Many noble gentlemen beholding this goodly armie, wept for ioy, conceiuing a moſt aſſured hope of victorie, if the proud enemie durſt with all his forces ioyne in battell. But Solyman, who by all meanes ſought with his great number of horſemen to keep the wide and open fields, certainly aduertiſed both of the emperors ſtrength and the manner of his lying, got him ouer the riuer of Mura, and at MARPVRGE by bridges which he made on the ſudden, paſſed ouer the great riuer Dranus. And ſo he which that Sommer held almoſt all the world in ſuſpence, with the doubtfull expectation of the ſucceſſe of that war; hauing with all that his huge power wherwith he threatned the world,
D done nothing at all worth the remembrance, but was in euerie place either ouercome or elſe ſhamefully repulſed; left STIRIA and returned the ſame way he came, directly betwixt the riuers of Sauus and Dranus to BELGRADE, and ſo to CONSTANTINOPLE, leauing heere and there ſome remembrance of his barbarous crueltie, and ſtill looking behind him if the emperour were not at his heeles: at ſuch time as a few Dalmatian and Croatian horſemen did ſtill purſue the taile of his armie. It is reported that he carried away with him thirtie thouſand Chriſtians into captiuitie, beſides many thouſands of poore countrey people ſlaine by the mercileſſe Turkes; but eſpecially by Caſon and his followers: and ſo to his eternall infamie was twiſe in the ſpace of a few years driuen out of GERMANIE. The emperour vnderſtanding of Solymans departure, determined with all ſpeed to returne into ITALIE, although king Ferdinand his bro-
E ther moſt earneſtly entreated him before his departure, in ſo fit a time to employ thoſe great forces againſt king Iohn, who now as it were forſaken of Solyman, might eaſily with ſo puiſſant an armie haue beene thruſt not onely out of BVDA, but alſo quite out of the kingdome of HVNGARIE, wherein he was by Solyman as his vaſſal placed. But the emperour, for that Winter began now to approach, and the plague was got into the campe, yea euen into his court, continued in his former purpoſe of departing into ITALIE: yet yeelding ſo farre vnto his brothers requeſt, as to leaue behind him all the Italians, who ioyned with king Ferdinands owne forces were thought ſufficient for the accompliſhment of the Hungarian warre.

The order of the Chriſtianitie.

Ouer theſe Italians, one Fabritius Maramaldus was by the meanes of Alphonſus Victius appointed Generall: but no order taken for the paiment of their wages, whereby the ſouldiours
F might be the more encouraged to take in hand that warre, and alſo kept in obedience. Which thing at the firſt much offended the minds of the other captaines, thinking themſelues diſgraced by the preferment of Marmaldus, a man of no greater account than themſelues: but as ſoone as it was knowne abroad, the vnder captaines and officers of the bands, led with the credit and fauour of their old captaines, ſaid plainly, That they would not go into HVNGARIE, except either king Ferdinad would in perſon himſelfe go, or elſe one of the great Commanders, Vaſtius or or Leua were appointed for their Generall: and the common ſouldiers ſaid flatly, that they G would aske leaue to depart, except they had three moneths pay, which they knew well they ſhould neuer get of that poore king, alreadie brought vnto great wants. Vaſtius to appeaſe this mutinie, trauelled greatly with his ſouldiers, perſuading them to remember the faith of ſouldiers, and by their conſtant perſeuerance to maintaine the honour they had got by their cheerefull comming: telling them, That valiant ſouldiers neuer wanted pay, furniſhing themſelues by their victories with all things neceſſary from the enemie. And as for Maramaldus their Generall, they had no iuſt cauſe to miſlike him being an old captaine of great experience, for courage and pollicie not inferiour to any of the greateſt Commanders, and placed by the emperor his owne appointment as a man moſt ſufficient, whoſe iudgement they ought not in any caſe to diſlike. When Vaſtius had with theſe and ſuch like reaſons well appeaſed the tumultuous ſoul- H diers, and was gone out of the campe into VIENNA to take further order for the remedying of all difficulties; night, the nurſe of ſedition came on, whoſe darkeneſſe excluding all modeſtie & feare, gaue further ſcope and place vnto the mutinous ſouldiers inſolencie. By chance there was at that time brought out of the citie into the campe verie courſe, hoarie, moulded bread, which ſome of the ſouldiers hauing brought, and thruſting it vpon the points of their ſpeares, ſhewed it vnto their fellowes in great choller, railing againſt king Ferdinand, which in his own kingdome in the beginning of the warre had made no better prouiſion, but with ſuch corrupt and peſtilent bread to feed them being ſtrangers, which were onely for his defence and quarrell to aduenture their liues. And but a little before, a certaine Spaniard being but a common ſouldier comming into the Generals tent, and caſting the like bread down at the feet of Vaſtius, bitterly curſing the I emperour and king Ferdinand, had raiſed a wonderfull tumult: wherefore the Italian ſouldiers flocking togither out of their tents, gaue many hard ſpeeches concerning their pay, their victuals, and the difficulties of the Hungarian warre. There one Titus Marconius of VOLATERRA a man of a troubleſome ſpirit, but reaſonably well ſpoken, was by the other ſouldiers ſet vp vpon a great heape of ſaddles, that he might be the better heard, and by diuers ſeditious captaines requeſted frankly to ſpeak his mind, ſo farre as he thought concerned the ſafetie and welfare of them all. Where it is reported that he ſpake vnto them in this ſeditious manner as followeth:

The ſeditious oration of Titus Marconius, to the mutinous Italians.

And ſhall the Spaniards (ſaid he) beloued companions and fellowes in armes, as you haue heard, K goe into ITALIE? and to our great hurt againe returne into their old Wintering places? and that which I am aſhamed to ſay, as notable gueſts lie with our wiues? and we Italians as baniſhed men fight this Winter with ice and ſnow in HVNGARIE? and that forſooth for a moſt beggarly king, and him alſo to the Hungarians a forener and meere ſtranger, againſt a naturall borne prince, of his ſubiects well beloued and ſtrongly backt with the power and wealth of the Turkiſh emperour? And that which might iuſtly grieue any couragious mind, vnder the conduct of Maramaldus, who oftentimes blinded with anger and haſtie crueltie, hath ſo furiouſly thruſt vs thorow with his ſword, that he ſeemeth not more to deſire the name of a captaine for any thing, than for the killing and murthering of vs now his ſouldiers. Neither can I beleeue that you, who haue oftentimes beene captaines and aun- L cients your ſelues, will be ſo mad, as to ſerue vnder a common captaine, without hope of any pay, of any prouiſion, of victorie or returne. Truely it delighteth me not ſo much to haue come hither for the honour of the Italian name (no more reckoned of than a ruſh) although I haue eleuen times ſerued; as it doth this day aſhame me to ſee this ſhamefull end of the warre, ended before it was well begun. But in Regall dignitie is no ſhame, nor equitie in rewarding the ſouldiour: for kings now adaies make account of ſouldiers onely according to their neceſſitie; this is it alone that giueth vs pay, this is that getteth vs loue, this is it maintaineth our reputation; all which, peace once by victorie obtained, leeſe their grace. So fareth it with vs at this preſent (fellow ſouldiers) the emperour and his brother king Ferdinand, deliuered from the feare of a moſt dangerous warre, to eaſe themſelues of this multitude of vs, ſeeke to thruſt vs into HVNGARIE as beaſts to the ſlaughter, by the ſpending of our bloud hoping to purchaſe vnto themſelues victorie; and by the loſſe of vs to take no harme themſelues, though M the Turkes and Hungarians ſhould with ſword and famine vtterly deſtroy vs, ſhut vp with the ice of Danubius and the ſnow of the Alpes. But peraduenture you vnderſtand not theſe deuiſes, no more than you vnderſtand what this terrible and bloudie * comet, ſhooting his beames towards ITALIE, pretendeth. Verily it is not fatall either to Solyman or Cæſar, but rather threatneth vnto vs death and deſtru-

* At this verie time a great blazing ſtar was ſeene in the firmament at Vienna.

A deſtruction, for they with like counſell, full of ſafetie and diſcretion, would not open any way vnto their owne deſtinies, but warily withdrew themſelues one from the other, and ſhunned all the dangers of the field. Wherefore if it were lawfull for them without any blemiſh of their Maieſties, ſo notably to prouide to keepe themſelues out of danger, when as on each ſide halfe the world lay as a reward of the victorie; ſhall not wee looke to our ſelues that wee be not thruſt thither from whence appeareth no hope of returne, but with vtter deſtruction? when as we may doe it without offence and by good right, eſpecially ſeeing no pay is offered vs. Thus you ſee what a goodly end is made of this notable warre, wherein onely wee the Italians in ſteed of commendation and reward reape iniurie and diſgrace: and are peraduenture of purpoſe exiled into HVNGARIE, that this floure of chiualrie being drawne out of ITALIE, and ſent farre out of the way, colonies of Spaniards and Germanes may be placed in
B our ſteads. Truely it ſeemeth hard dealing to bee ſent out of the way into a barbarous countrie, where wee ſhall find all hoſtilitie, and no place of refuge to receiue vs, being diſtreſſed. Beſide this, we ſhall alſo whether wee will or no feele how heauie and intollerable it will bee both to our bodies and mindes to endure the miſeries of this Winter and daungerous warre: and in the meane time with no ſmall heart-griefe imagine what things our children, our brethren, our kinſmen, yea our wiues, ſuffer at home of the Spaniards and Germanes. Wherefore worthie companions, it concerneth vs more at this time to haue a good foreſight, than valiantly to fight. The occaſion preſented vnto vs for our ſafetie and welfare, ſtandeth vpon a tickle point, it muſt bee done without delay, and wee muſt hie vs hence before that the Spaniards truſſe vp their baggage; and ſo preuenting the emperours formoſt companies, come firſt our ſelues into ITALIE: for if wee ſhall ſtay but a little to conſult vpon the matter, Vaſtius
C and our other proud commanders will preſently be heere, the verie betrayers of the Italian bloud, who for their owne gaine and our miſchiefe haue brought vs into theſe ſtraits; who I know will moſt earneſtly intreat vs, and with many ſubtilties ſeeke to ſeduce vs, by offering vs great pay and whatſoeuer elſe we ſhall require: which will all proue but words. But you, if you be men, refuſe to talke with them as with your common enemies, or rather in reuenge of their old iniuries kill them. Here wanteth not in this aſſemblie valiant men, for courage and integritie of life their betters far, which can leade you forth, order your battell, and fortunately vſe this your courage and forwardneſſe. Wherefore if you bee wiſe, ſet forward reſolutely, and good fortune no doubt will attend you in your haſt, for the full accompliſhment of your deſire conſiſteth in your haſt onely.

D Marconius had no ſooner made an end of this mutinous ſpeech, but the tumultuous ſouldiors in euerie band began highly to commend and approue the ſame, and by and by ſuch a confuſed noiſe was heard through all the aſſemblie, as vſeth to riſe amongſt the diſcontented vulgar people, readie to riſe in armes: but the drums preſently ſtriking vp a march, they made no longer ſtay, but without delay pluckt vp their enſignes, and forward they go directly towards NEOSTAT. In this tumult, in ſtead of their old captaines which either were not then preſent, or refuſed to goe with them, they choſe others to bee their leaders: who once named by the ſeditious multitude, might in no caſe without danger refuſe to take the charge vpon them, were they neuer ſo vnwilling. Theſe were Montebellius, Nerius, Melcarius, Sanctius, and the two twins of MILLANE, called Gluſſani: who drew after them eight thouſand ſouldiours, the reſt partly for E ſhame, and partly for feare, ſtaied ſtill with Maramaldus their new appointed Generall. When they were thus gone, Vaſtius and diuers other great companies hearing therof in the citie, poſted after them ſix miles, and at length ouertaking them, requeſted them to ſtay, and not to diſhonor themſelues with ſo foule a fact, telling them, that their pay was readie for them, and omitting nothing wherwith they might haue bin moued to ſtay, mingled their praiers with grieuous threats: but they reſolutely ſet downe, would neither heare, nor ſtay; but as men inraged with furie, and their own guiltie conſcience, with ſtern lookes diſcharged ſome ſmall ſhot vpon them. Whileſt Vaſtius would there haue ſtaied the companie, and did what hee poſſibly could by threatening and otherwiſe to haue terrified their leaders, and to haue brought them backe, he was oftentimes in danger to haue been ſlaine. In the end he was glad to forſake them, and to returne as he came.
F King Ferdinand by this ſudden departure of the Italians, for that time diſappointed of all his hope of recouering the kingdome of HVNGARIE from king Iohn, in great choller writ vnto his ſubiects of STYRIA and CARYNTHIA, whereby the Italians were to paſſe, that they ſhould ſhew them no manner of courteſie in their paſſage: wherupon inſued great hurt on both ſides. Yet for all that theſe Italians in deſpight of what could be done, at length recouered TRIA-

This was the end of those wonderful preparations made by the two great monarchs Solyman and Charles the fift, in the yeare 1532, which held the world in great suspence with the fearefull expectation of some maruellous alteration, and so much the more, for that at the same time ap- H peared a great blasing star by the space of fifteene daies. All which for all that, God so appointing, sorted to far lesse harme than was of most men feared.

Auria goeth against the Turks. Now whilest Charles the emperour was thus in armes against Solyman in AVSTRIA, Andreas Auria by his appointment with a fleet of 35 tall ships and 48 gallies, wherin he had embarked 25000 good souldiours well appointed, did in the meane time wonderfully annoy the Turkes in PELOPONESVS. With this fleet Auria departing from MESSANA in SICILIA: and passing alongst the coast of ITALIE into the Ionian, neere vnto the Isle of ZACYNTHVS, met with Vincentius Capellius the Venetian admirall with a fleet of sixtie gallies, set forth by the Venetians for defence of their territories; who offered vnto Auria all possible kindnes, but excused himselfe, that he could not ioine with him in that warre against the common enemie, by I reason of an old league betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians, which Solyman had but a little before renewed. So that at that time the Venetians stood as men indifferent betwixt Charles the emperour and Solyman, offering like kindnesse to both, but taking part with neither, yet in readinesse to fall out with either, if they should by sea or land offer any iniurie to their state: wherein they bare themselues so indifferent, that it was thought, that they at one and the selfesame instant aduertised Auria, That Hymerales the Turkes admirall lay with his fleet of sixtie gallies, euill appointed in the bay of AMBRACIA, where he might easily be surprised: and gaue likewise warning to him of the comming of Auria with a strong fleet, wishing him in time to prouide for his better safetie, by retiring his fleet into some other place of more assurance, which he presently did: for knowing himselfe too weak, he departed from AMBRACIA to the strong hauen of CALCIDE. Which thing with other like well considered, might giue iust cause to any Christian heart K to bewaile the state of that time, wherein the Christian princes being either in mortall warres among themselues, or entangled by Solyman with leagues of no assurance, omitted the fairest oportunitie that could haue beene wished for the abating of the Turkes greatnesse: for if the Venetians ioyning their forces with Auria, had in time pursued the Turkish admiral, it was like, that not onely all Solymans power at sea had beene vtterly discomfited; but also most part of GRÆCIA, mindfull of their ancient empire and libertie, and then readie to haue rebelled, & ioyned hands with the Christians, might haue bin recouered out of the Turkish thraldome; yea and the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE greatly indangered, few or none being left for the defence therof, beside young Ianizaries, and effeminat eunuchs, the heartlesse keepers of the Turks L concubines, Solyman himselfe being then far off in HVNGARIE, and hauing drawn with him the greatest strength of his empire.

Auria taking his leaue of the Venetian admirall, with much honour done at sea on both sides, was shortly after aduertised, that the Turkes admirall was fled to CALCIDE. Wherefore now out of hope to do any good against him, he directed his course to CORONE, which is a Auria besiegeth Corone in Peloponesus. strong citie vpon the coast of PELOPONESVS, about twelue miles distant from MODON, with purpose to besiege it: which when he had well viewed, and considered of the strength therof, he laid siege thereto both by sea and land, battering it most terribly, at one time with fourteene great pieces of artillerie by land, and a hundred and fiftie by sea, so that a more terrible batterie had not bin lightly heard of: for all that, the Turks valiantly stood vpon their defence, and manful- M ly repulsed the Italians, which vnder the leading of the countie of SARNE assaulted the citie by land. The Turkish garrisons lying about in the countrie of PELOPONESVS, did what they might to haue relieued the citie, who by the valour of the said countie were discomfited, and Zadares their chiefe leader slaine, whose head with others of the slaine Turkes was set vpon stakes to the terrour of the defendants.

At

A At length the Turkes wearied with aſſaults, and terrified with the thundering ſhot which neuer ceaſed, and driuen alſo from their greateſt ſtrength towards ſea by the deſperate aſſault of certaine reſolute Chriſtians, whom they had now full ſore againſt their wils receiued as it were into their boſomes, fearing alſo to want victuall and pouder, if they ſhould longer hold out without any hope of releefe; yeelded the citie & caſtle to Auria, vpon condition, that they might in ſafetie depart thence with bag and baggage. CORONE thus taken, and a ſtrong garriſon of Spaniards there placed, and the Chriſtian Greekes which dwelt in the citie ſworne vnto them, Auria put to ſea with his fleet, and ſayling againe by ZAZINTHVS, came to PATRAS, another ancient citie of PELOPONESVS, which he eaſily tooke and ranſacked: for the Turks diſtruſting
B the ſtrength of the citie had ſtrongly entrenched themſelues neere vnto the caſtle, which place alſo together with the caſtle they in ſhort time yeelded to Auria; couenanting, that they and eſpecially their wiues might with their garments onely depart in ſafetie into ÆTOLIA: which was by Auria ſo preciſely performed, that when three thouſand of them paſſed along thorow the armie of the Chriſtians raunged on both ſides, and ſome of the ſouldiers began rudely to handle ſome of the women, and to take from them ſome of their iewels, he cauſed them preſently to the terrour of others to be hanged. Auria leauing his armie at PATRAS, with commaundement to follow him by land, ſailed alongſt the coaſt of PELOPONESVS, vntill he came to the ſtrait of NAVPACTVM, now called LEPANTO, which is the entrance into the gulfe of CORINTH, parting PELOPONESVS from ÆTOLIA with a ſtrait ſomewhat narrower than the ſtrait of
C HELESPONT: Vpon this ſtrait ſtood two caſtles, the one called RHIVM vpon the coaſt of PELOPONESVS, and the other MOLYCREVM in ÆTOLIA, which Baiazet had wonderfully fortified and ſtored with ordinance for the keeping of that ſtrait. Auria threatening all extremitie vnto the captaine of the caſtle on PELOPONESVS ſide, if he did enforce him to plant his batterie, ſo terrified him, that he without delay yeelded to him the caſtle, couenanting only, That he and his ſouldiours might in ſafetie depart thence: which graunted, and the Turkes departed, Auria gaue the ſpoile of the caſtle vnto his ſouldiors which came with him by ſea; whereby he ſo offended the minds of the other ſouldiors which came by land from PATRAS, that they were about to haue forſaken him. The other caſtle vpon ÆTOLIA ſide was not ſo eaſily taken, being valiantly defended by a garriſon of old Ianizaries, appointed for the keeping thereof. Yet
D in the end by furie of the ordinance a breach was made, wherby the Chriſtians forcibly entring, ſlew three hundred of the old garriſon ſouldiours, not taking any to mercie: the reſt fled into a ſtrong tower in the middeſt of the caſtle, where ſeeing no remedie but that they muſt needes fall into the hands of their enemies, they deſperatly blew vp themſelues and the tower with a great part of the caſtle with gunpouder, in ſuch ſort, that it ſeemed all the ſea coaſt to haue been ſhaken with an earthquake, and the gallies which lay a bow ſhoot off were almoſt ouerwhelmed with ſtones blowne out ſo farre off. The great Ordinance taken in this caſtle, was valued at ſeauentie thouſand duckats; whereof certaine peeces of a wonderfull greatneſſe, with Arabian letters written vpon them, were afterwards by Auria brought to GENVA, and in remembrance of the victorie mounted vpon the bulwarke at the mouth of the hauen. All theſe things thus happely
E atchieued, Auria ſtrongly fortified the citie of CORONE, ſtoring it both with munition and plentie of victuall, committing the defence therof to Mendoza, a valiant Spaniard, with a ſtrong garriſon of Spaniards, promiſing of his owne charge to relieue him when ſoeuer he ſhould need, if the emperour ſhould deferre to doe it. The ſtrait of NAVPACTVM laid open, Saluiatus with the gallies of MALTA, ſcoured all alongſt the gulfe of CORINTH, doing great harme vnto the Turks which dwelt on both ſides of the gulfe, ſpoyling and terrifying them euen as farre as CORINTH. Not long after Winter now approching, Auria receiuing letters from the emperour, of Solymans departure out of HVNGARIE, returned with his fleete loaded with the ſpoyle of the Turkes to NAPLES, and ſo from thence home to GENVA.

In the beginning of the Spring following (which was in the yeare 1533) it was rifely reported, that the Turks were cõming with a great fleet towards PELOPONESVS: and not long after, Mendoza Gouernour of CORONE by letters aduertiſed Peter of TOLEDO viceroy of NA-
F PLES, that he was both by ſea and land hardly beſieged by the Turks; and that he would to the vttermoſt of his power valiantly defend the citie, ſo long as hee had any prouiſion of victuall: Wherefore he moſt earneſtly requeſted, that if the emperour would haue the towne kept, hee ſhould in time ſend him reliefe, wherupon the oppreſſed Grecians taking heart were like enough to rebell, and to helpe to expulſe the Turkes quite out of PELOPONESVS. But aboue all things he forgot not to craue ſpeedie helpe of Auria, and to put him in mind of the faithful promiſe he had made to relieue him at his need. Vpon this newes, Charles the emperour commaunded Auria his Admirall to rig vp a conuenient fleet for that ſeruice, promiſing forthwith to ſend vnto him twelue gallies, which hee had new built in SPAINE. He alſo requeſted the knights of MALTA to aid him with their gallies againſt that common enemie. Wherefore Auria hauing with wonderfull celeritie rigged vp thirtie tall ſhips, and as many gallies, came to NAPLES to take in his ſouldiours: there the old garriſons of the Spaniards which for want of pay were riſen in mutinie againſt the great Commaunder Vaſtius and the viceroy, and had rifeled the citie of AVERSA, and do no little harme all about in the countrie of CAMPANIA, were againe pacified by a pay giuen vnto them, and preſently embarked for CORONE, vnder the commaund of Rodericus Macicaus their Generall; at which time alſo Frederick of TOLEDO the viceroy his ſonne, with a companie of braue gentlemen went aboord, vowing vnto the ſacred warre that their firſt ſeruice. The knights of MALTA came thither alſo with their gallies. But whileſt theſe things were a doing, Auria to incourage them of CORONE, for feare leaſt they diſpairing of helpe ſhould fall to ſome hard compoſition with the Turkes, ſent Chriſtopher Palauicine a reſolute young gentleman of an inuincible courage, with a moſt ſwift gallie to CORONE; who by day-light paſſing thorow the middeſt of the Turks fleet, ſafely recouered the hauen, to the great ioy of the beſieged Chriſtians: and ſhortly after, when he had well viewed all things he was ſent for, with the ſtrength and manner of the enemies lying, and filled the minds of the defendants with aſſured hope of ſpeedie reſcue: aboute noon time of the day he ſuddenly brake out againe thorow the middeſt of his enemis, and as it were miraculouſly eſcaped in ſafetie for all that they could doe, although they ceaſed not to giue him chaſe ſo long as they were in any hope to haue ouertaken him. Auria departing from NAPLES came to MESSANA, where he certainly enformed of the enemies force both by ſea and land, with the number of their gallies, and ſeeing that the chiefe hope of relieuing of the city conſiſted in celerity, ſtaied not for the gallies hee expected out of SPAINE, but held on his courſe towards GRÆCIA: for it was told him that the enemies fleet daily encreaſed by the cõming in of the Turkiſh pirats; and that Aſſem-beg otherwiſe called the Moore of ALEXANDRIA (an arch pirat) was ſtill looked for, in whoſe good directions the Turkiſh captaines repoſed the greateſt hope of their victory. When he was come as farre as ZACYNTHAS, he was enformed by the Venetians, That Luſtibeius Baſſa (or rather Lutzis Baſſa, the Turks great Admirall and Solyman his brother in law) with Solyman of ACARNANIA, and the Moore (men for their skill at ſea of great fame and reputation) lay before CORONE with eightie gallies, manned with diuers companies of the old Ianizaries; ſo that it was thought a matter of exceeding perill for him to aduenture to relieue the town, except he took the aduantage of ſome proſperous gale of winde. Wherefore Auria to haue yet more certaine knowledge of the enemies fleet, ſent before him Chriſtopher Palauicine with one gallie, againe to view the manner of the enemies lying: who paſſing the promontorie of ACRITES, ſaw all the Turkes great fleet lying in very good order before the citie: and ſo returned to Auria, confirming that the Venetians had before reported, and that the Turks fleet was greatly encreaſed, and lay readie as it ſhould ſeeme to giue him battell as ſoone as hee ſhould approach the citie. For all that, Auria nothing diſmaied with the greatneſſe of the Turkes fleet, made no ſtay but ſtill kept on his courſe, and with a faire gale of winde paſſing the promontorie of ACRITES, came directly towards CORONE. Two great Gallions, of all the fleet the moſt warlike ſhips, came formoſt; whereof the one was Auria his owne which hee had built with a wonderfull charge, and the other was of SICILIA: Theſe two great ſhippes were appointed by Auria to turne a little vpon the left hand, and at ſuch time as the enemy ſhould ſet forward from the ſhoare to caſt anchor betwixt both the fleets; that as occaſiõ ſhould ſerue, they might as out of two ſtrong caſtles beat the Turkes gallies with their great ordinance, wherewith they were for that purpoſe wonderfully ſtored. Next vnto theſe great Gallions followed the other warlike ſhips with full ſailes: after whom came the gallies in three ſquadrons, whereof Saluiatus had the leading of the right wing, which conſiſted of the biſhop of ROMES gallies, and them of MALTA: in the left wing and neere vnto the enemie commaunded Antonius Auria: and in the middle was Auria himſelfe. At the firſt ſight of the Chriſtian fleet the Turkes moued not from the ſhoare, but diſcharged their ordinance at them a farre off, and then begun to ſet forward and to draw neerer; eſpecially

A the Moore, who with greater courage than the reſt, aſſailed the ſide and reareward of the fleet: for the Chriſtians keeping on their courſe right forth to CORONE, and turning nothing to the left hand as was before appointed, ſeemed as if they had fled; and ſo much the more, for that the gallies in the right wing, for feare of the Turks great ordinance did ſet a great compaſſe farther off into the ſea, and many of the middle ſquadron and of the left wing alſo, had diſorderly thruſt themſelues in amongſt the ſhips, although they had receiued little or no harme of the enemies great ſhot. The Chriſtian fleet diſorded.

In this confuſion of the Chriſtian Nauie, the Moore requeſted Lutzis the Admirall not to let ſlip ſo faire an occaſion, wherein the Chriſtian fleet might eaſily haue beene ouerthrowne:
B but whileſt Lutzis doth ſlowly and conſiderately ſet forward, Auria in the meane time had put his fleet againe in order, and with a faire winde was come to CORONE. Two of the ſhips by the way falling foule one on another, ſtaied behinde, being not able to keep way with the reſt: about which all the Turks gallies preſently flockt, and tooke the leſſer of them, killing all the Spaniards they found therein. Out of this they boorded the greater, and with a bloudy fight had woon the forecaſtle and waſte of the ſhip: when Auria accounting it no ſmall diſhonor to haue his ſhips ſo ſurpriſed at his heeles, cauſed all his gallies to turne again vpon the enemy to reſcue thoſe ſhips. The Turks ſeeing that, and with the Weſternly wind by little and little fallen down ſo farre with the ſhips, that they were come within the danger of the ſhot of the towne, began with great ſtir to forſake the ſhips, and to betake themſelues to their oares, and ſo in manner of
C flight withdrew themſelues. Whom Auria purſued a good way to MODON, thundering in their poupes with his great ſhot, which hee liberally beſtowed amongſt them: whileſt in the meane time Antonius Auria came to reſcue the two diſtreſſed ſhips. There the Spaniards which but a little before had hardly maintained their cloſe fights, began now as men reuiued to ſhew themſelues, and couragiouſly to make reſiſtance: and they which came with Antonius Auria to their reſcue, entring with wonderfull celerity on euery ſide, ſlew and took three hundred Ianizaries, which with great courage had entred thoſe ſhips, and were there left by the ſudden departure of their fellowes. Amongſt whom was taken one Ioſuphus an olde captaine of a thouſand Ianizaries, to whom Auria after he was come to CORONE, gaue a faire ſute of apparell and a chaine of gold, and ſo ſet him at liberty without any raunſome, thereby to prouoke the D Turkes to the like kinde of courteous dealing with the Chriſtians. Aſſam-beg the pirat, and the other captaines of the Turkes fleet wonderfully blamed Lutzis the Admirall, for that he would not then fight with the Chriſtians, when as he was thereto moſt earneſtly requeſted both by the captaines and ſouldiers in generall, and had a faire opportunity of victory offered at ſuch time as the Chriſtians fleet was diſordered: but he excuſed himſelfe, ſaying, That it was giuen him in ſpeciall charge from Solyman the emperour, that he ſhould in any caſe reſpect the ſafety of his nauie, and not to come to the hazard of a battell. The Turkes which beſieged the city by land, vpon the approach of the Chriſtian fleet, forſooke their trenches & fled: at which time Mendoza the Gouernour ſallying out, tooke great ſtore of victuall and warlike prouiſion which the Turks had for haſt left behinde them. So Auria to his great honour, hauing driuen the Turkes from E CORONE both by ſea and land, furniſhed the citie with ſtore of corne, wine, victuall, pouder, and ſhot: and committed the defence thereof to Macicaus, and the companies of the mutinous Spaniards which he had brought from NAPLES: comforting the Greekes, and exhorting them patiently for a while to endure thoſe calamities of warre, telling them that the emperour would the next Spring make warre againſt the Turkes both by ſea and land in PELOPONESVS, and free them from the Turkiſh bondage. And ſo embarking the old garriſon of Spaniards, departed from CORONE and came before METHON, where he lay as it were brauing the Turks Admirall, hoping thereby to draw him out of that ſtrong harbor to battell. But when hee ſaw that the enemy could by no meanes be allured out of his ſtrength, or aſſailed as he lay, he departed thence to CORCYRA, and ſo backe againe to MESSANA in SICILIA.

Within a few daies after, Aſſam-beg the Moore of ALEXANDRIA and moſt famous pyrat, lying in wait for the marchants ſhips of VENICE comming out of SIRIA with marchandiſe, by chance met with Hieronimus Canalis vpon the coaſt of CRETE: where in the night time was fought betwixt them a fierce and cruell battell, wherein of the Moores thirteene gallies foure were ſunke, three taken, and the reſt hauing loſt moſt part of their rowers, fled to ALEXANDRIA. In this fight was ſlaine three hundred Ianizaries which were going to CAIRE, and a thousand other Turks: of all them that was taken there was scarcely one saued, but the Moore himselfe, who grieuously wounded in the face, for safegard of his life was glad to discouer himselfe: for the Venetians maintaining their state by trade and trafficke, do of all other shew least fauour vnto pyrats. When the Moore had made himselfe knowne vnto Canalis, there was great care taken for the curing of his wounds, and either of them began with notable dissimulation to excuse the matter to other, saying, that they were both deceiued by the likenesse of the gallies, and mistaking of their friends for enemies: when as for all that they knew one another right well. For the Moore said, that he tooke those Venetian gallies for to haue bin part of Auria his fleet: and Canalis excused himselfe, by saying, that he mistooke him for Barbarussa, who a few yeares before had surprised three of the Venetian gallies. Yet the Venetians doubting how Solyman would take the matter, by their embassadour sought to excuse that was done, as a thing happening by errour and mischance: of which excuse Solyman accepted, and said moreouer, that Canalis had done well & souldior like, to repulse by force the wrong that was offered him. Three of the emperours gallies staying behind the rest of the fleet, were neere vnto the promontorie PALINVRVS, vpon the coast of APVLIA, intercepted and carried away by Sinam, surnamed the Iew, a notable pyrat of that time also.

The Winter following, the Spaniards and Greekes in CORONE began to want victuals, especially wine and flesh: for the Turkes had so blocked vp the citie, that nothing was to be had out of the countrie; wherefore the souldiours requested Macicaus their Gouernour and Generall to lead them forth to some piece of seruice against the enemie, for so much as they were not to hope for any relefe elsewhere before Aprill, wishing rather valiantly to die like men in fight against the Turkes, than to languish within those dead wals for want of victuall. But Macicaus mindful of his charge, sought by many reasons to dissuade them from such purpose, shewing them what an offence it were rashly to depart out of the citie committed to their custodie, which might be vnto them dangerous, although they should speed neuer so wel; and that those wants which they rather feared than felt, would well enough be ouercome by sparing and patience: and therefore told them plainely, that he was resolutely set downe to keepe the citie for the emperor, and to indure all hardnes, rather than to incurre the infamie, That he had forsaken the citie, and betraied his garrison. Yet for all this, the matter was so vrged by Didacus Touarres and Hermosilla, both great captaines, and by the generall importunitie of the souldiours, that Macicaus was inforced to yeeld to their desire, and to promise them to goe: yet earnestly protesting, that he did it altogether against his will, rather enforced than perswaded vnto that, whereof he had no great hope of successe. Amongst other that were so forward in this action, was one Barbatius, a most valiant Greeke, who could perfectly speake the Turkes language, and of all others best knew the bywaies and secret passages of the countrie: he vndertooke to bee their guide, and by vnknowne waies to bring them vnto the enemies vndiscouered in the dead time of the night, when as the feared no such matter. So Macicaus commending the custodie of the citie to Liscanius and Mendesius, with charge that they should suffer no man to go out of the citie after his departure, for feare of giuing any knowledge vnto the enemie, set forward about ten a clocke in the night towards ANDRVSSA, Barbatius being his guide, who shunning the common beaten waies, brought them by secret and vncouth paths that night halfe the way to ANDRVSSA: but vpon the rising of the Sunne he brought them into a secret woodie valley, where they rested and refreshed themselues all that day, and setting forward againe at night, came to ANDRVSSA before day. In this towne, which was of no great strength, lay one Caranus, a warlike captaine, with three thousand footmen, whereof the one halfe was of the Ianizaries, and in the suburbes lay Acomates with a thousand chosen horsemen, with which garrison the Turkes kept all that side of PELOPONESVS in awe. Macicaus brought by his guide vnto the place where his enemies lay, went directly to the towne to haue surprised it: Hermosilla in the meane time standing still with certaine companies of Spaniards ouer against the place where the horsemen lay. But this could not be done with so great silence, but that some of the horse boies being awake, discouered them by the fire in their matches; who first awaked the negligent watchmen, and afterwards raised an alarum in the suburbes: whereupon Hermosilla couragiously set vpon the horsemen, being altogether vnreadie, and slew many of them before they could arme themselues, and set fire also vpon the stables wherein the Turkes horses stood, with the rage whereof many of the Turkes perished, with their horses and armour. Great and terrible was the noise

The Turkes perceiuing the ſmall number of their enemies, ſallied out vpon them, and enforced them to retire to Hermoſilla, who had alreadie made great ſpoile amongſt the horſemen, by whoſe skilfull direction the Spaniards retired in ſo good order, making many ſtands, with their harquebuſiers all drawn into the rereward, that ſuch of the Turks as were moſt forward to purſue them, did by their death cauſe the reſt to make leſſe haſt. Acomates with ſuch
B of his horſemen as had eſcaped the fire, haſted thither alſo, bringing with him two hundred harquebuſiers, which he had cauſed his horſemen for haſt to take vp behind them vpon their horſes: but whileſt he ſought eagerly to be reuenged vpon his enemies, and with too much heat preſſed on with the formoſt, he was ſhot into the bodie with a bullet and ſlaine. So the horſemen which had before receiued a great loſſe as they lay in their lodgings, accounting it in their good haps that they were not there all ſlaine, and hauing now loſt their captaine, ceaſed any further to purſue their enemies, but returned. The Spaniards and Greekes, although they were wearied both with their long march and euill ſucceſſe, retired ſtill as reſolute men readie to fight, and ſo returned to CORONE. Preſently after, the Turkiſh garriſon remoued from ANDRVSSA to MEGALOPOLIS, now called LONDARIVM: after whoſe departure the Chriſtian ſouldiours of CORONE
C came thither, and buried the dead bodies of their ſlaine followes (which till then lay vnburied) and brought backe with them the head of Macicaus their late Generall, which the Turkes had there ſet vp vpon a long pole, which they honourably buried at CORONE. Not long after the plague began to grow hot in CORONE, ſo much the more grieuous, for that it came accompanied with many other hard difficulties. For which cauſes, the Spaniards as men at once enforced with many extremities, embarked themſelues with all the great ordinance and ſuch Greekes as would go with them, in certaine ſhips which came with corne out of SICILIA, and ſo departed, leauing the towne emptie for the Turkes to come vnto.

Macicaus ſlaine.

Corone forſaken by the Spaniards.

It was commonly reported, that the Spaniards left CORONE not without the ſecret conſent of the emperour, which was the rather thought to be ſo, becauſe that they which forſooke the
D place, receiued thereby no diſgrace, and the emperour himſelfe had offered to giue the towne to Clement biſhop of ROME: the Venetians and the knights of MALTA, who all refuſed to receiue it, as loath to be at ſo great a charge in keeping a place ſeruing for no greater purpoſe; the verie cauſe why the emperour was ſo willing to depart with it. Now Clement the great biſhop had by meanes of Aloyſius Grittus made a motion of a peace, to haue been concluded for ten yeares betwixt Solyman and the Chriſtian princes, and therupon the towne to haue been againe deliuered vnto the Turkes: which peace Solyman was not altogither vnwilling to grant, being then wholy bent to inuade the Perſian king. Ferdinand was alſo in good hope that his brother Charles the emperor, would for the yeelding vp of that towne haue couenanted with the Turke ſome great matter for his benefit in HVNGARIE, which as was thought would alſo haue been
E eaſily obtained. But whileſt the emperour drawne diuerſly with the conſideration of his honour in keeping it, and of his profit in giuing it vp, ſtood too long in reſoluing; the towne in the meane time was by the Spaniards (their neceſſitie daily increaſing) abandoned, and ſo left to the Turkes for nothing.

Solyman now purpoſing to turne his forces againſt the Perſians, of whom hee had in the frontiers of his dominions receiued great hurt, eſpecially in COMAGENE; renewed the league he had with the Venetians, and ſome other Chriſtian princes: but of all other his affaires with the Chriſtians, he was moſt carefull of the intereſt he had alreadie gotten in HVNGARIE. For it was reported, that king Iohn his vaſſale induced by the continuall ſolicitations of his ſubiects, was deſirous of peace with king Ferdinand, vpon condition that hee might quietly enioy the F kingdome during his life: and after his deceaſe it to remaine to king Ferdinand and his heires. Wherefore Solyman, that nothing ſhould bee there done in his abſence without his knowledge, ſent Aloyſius Grittus the duke of VENICE his ſonne (of whom we haue before ſpoken) a man both for the honour of his houſe, the good cariage of himſelfe, and the ſpeciall commendation of Abraham the chiefe Baſſa, in great credit with him: with commiſſion as his Lieutenant to be assistant vnto king Iohn, in such magnificall sort, as that without him the king might conclude G nothing in matters of state, concerning either peace or warres, with any other the Christian princes. With this proud commission from the Graund seignior, Grittus entred into TRANSILVANIA, then a part of the kingdome of HVNGARIE (much about the same time that Solyman set forward from CONSTANTINOPLE against the Persian) attended vpon with seauen thousand persons of one sort and other, amongst whom were Vrbanus Batianus, and Ianus Docia, two famous Hungarian captaines with their companies, and many of the Turkes Ianizaries also. At his first comming, to make his authoritie the more knowne, he sent out his proud commaund vnto the great men and gouernours of the cities of that warlike prouince, charging them forthwith to repaire vnto him as great Solymans deputie, authorised by him to heare and determine all the controuersies and matters of state concerning the kingdome of HVNGARIE. At that H time Americus Cibachus bishop of VERADIVM, a man of great nobilitie and power, withall singularly well qualitied, was Vayuod or gouernour of TRANSILVANIA, an honour next vnto the king: he vnderstanding that Grittus was come into his prouince, and making small hast to welcome him, as one not greatly moued with his comming, or much regarding the commandement of Solyman; wonderfully offended Grittus, who desired nothing more than at his first entrance to haue confirmed the opinion of his authoritie in the minds of the vulgar people by the prest and readie attendance of the Vayuod. But it was commonly bruted, that the stout bishop vpon a Christian zeale detested the friendship of the Turkes, and could not well brooke that they should be too much acquainted in his prouince, for feare least that fruitfull countrey abounding with men and horses, should by one meanes or other fall into their hands. Grittus I was come to BAXOVIA when he vnderstood by many messengers, that the Vayuod was comming with a great traine, and lay about ten miles off, encamped with diuers gallant troupes of horsemen in warlike manner appointed: for the bishops of HVNGARIE being wonderfull rich, were by old custome bound to keep great nũbers of horsmẽ, which as occasion serued they vsed to bring into the fields against the Turke; accounting it great honour with their religious hands to defend the cause of religion. But then especially the nobilitie of the countrey well appointed, resorted on euerie side, of courtesie to honour and countenance their great bishop and Gouernour, at whose commaundement they were: in so much as the bishops retinue made shew of a good armie. Which thing moued Grittus exceedingly, that he should be enforced contrarie to his expectation to parley with the bishop in the open fields, as with an enemie in sight of all K their followers. Hereof rise enuie, a deadly mischiefe alwaies repining at another mans honor; when as the one swelling with Turkish pride could not then abide any equall, & the other iealous of his honour could by no meanes endure any superiour, in such place as he had the soueraignetie of. When these two great men had met togither in the open fields, and there dined more like enemies than friends, without any shew of friendship or good will: Grittus inwardly chafed at his bare entertainment, couertly threatened to be reuenged vpon all such as should make so light account of his authoritie: and immediatly as he departed from the banket, taking his cap from his head (which was after the Turkish manner made of a high fashiõ, of rich sables) and opening it with both his hands, said, This cap will not hold two heads, and therefore it must L be fitted to one, and so put it on againe. Ianus Docia one of the Hungarian captains, his followers, who deadly hated the Vayuod (for that he had long time before, for his malapert speech in a great assembly, giuen him a blow with his fist) tooke hold of that speech of Grittus, as a fit occasion for him to worke his reuenge: and said, Your honour maketh a fit comparison, neither can this prouince containe two equall gouernours or commaunders, nor you euer enioy your power and authoritie, except you doe this day with speedie and manly resolution defend both Solymans credit and your owne. You know not this proud beast Americus, whose pride and insolencie if you but say the word, I will quickly put downe: for he hateth Solyman, he regardeth not the king, and of you he maketh no account at all, for why he aspireth vnto the maiestie of a king, and saith that the Vayuodship of TRANSILVANIA well beseemeth a king; for that in this countrey Decebaldus the Dacian sometime raigned, whom the warlike emperour Traian with all the force of the Roman empire hardly subdued. No M man can more proudly or arrogantly set himselfe forth than he, neither more craftely or cunningly dissemble to serue his turne. Indeed he hath for fashion sake presented your honour with a few simple presents, and giuen you his hand also, better knowne for his falshood than his faith; to the intent that when you are once past his countrey, he may scoffe and ieast at your decrees: verely he deadly enuieth at Americus bishop of Veradium and Vayuod of Transiluania, contemneth Grittus.

Ianus Docia inciteth Grittus against the Vayuod.

A your honour and felicitie, and grudgeth in his heart, that you ſhould ſet downe the lawes of peace and warre in HVNGARIE : and whereas he doth manifeſtly aſpire vnto a kingdome, he feareth you aboue all others, leaſt you ſhould trouble his deſignes, abate his credit, and chaſtiſe his inſolencie. Verely, hee that thus maligneth your happineſſe, and contemneth your authoritie, is not to be ſuffered, but by good reaſon to be taken away : thereby at this your firſt entrance to defend the credit of your commiſsion and honour of your name. For nothing is more dangerous than a faithleſſe companion and a ſecret enemy, eſpecially when you ſhall leaue him at your backe behind you : for when he ſhall as occaſion ſerues ſhew forth his hidden malice, he ſhall ſo much the more ſtily and deſperatly indanger your perſon. Grittus enraged with his ſpeech more than before, thought it beſt to make haſt, & to vſe his authoritie to the full; he commended Docia, and promiſed him in ſhort time to requite his good will towards
B him, eſpecially if he would by ſome notable attempt abate the biſhops pride. It is reported, that Grittus gaue him no other charge but to take the biſhop, that ſo he might after the Turkiſh maner haue ſent him in chains to CONSTANTINOPLE, & beſtowed the honor of the Vayuod vpon Hieronimus Laſcus the Polonian, who in hope of that honourable preferment vnto him promiſed by king Iohn, had done him great and faithfull ſeruice, as his embaſſador both vnto Solyman and alſo to the French king. But when king Iohn perceiued that he could not conueniently with- The cauſe why Laſcus the Polonian fell from king Iohn.
out manifeſt danger place him, being a Polonian (who could ſcarcely ſpeak the Hungarian language) gouernour ouer ſuch a warlike people; he as it were enforced by neceſſitie, preferred this Americus the biſhop of VERADIVM, a man of them both reuerenced and feared: Which ſo
C grieued Laſcus, a man of great ſtomacke and experience, and thereunto excellently learned, that he would neuer admit any excuſe of the kings, but alwaies after complained that he was by the king deluded. Yet for all that, he kept himſelfe within the bounds of loyaltie, and enioyed certaine lands and townes which the king had giuen him in the borders of POLONIA; and eſtranged neuertheleſſe from him in mind, was now become one of Grittus his followers, hoping of his better preferment by his meanes vnto Solyman; and for that cauſe was not ſo forward to doe the king ſuch ſeruice as he had in times paſt. Now by the commandement of Grittus, a ſtrong companie of Turkiſh horſemen, and certaine troupes of Hungarians, were deliuered to Docia; who ſecretly departing that night from BAXOVIA, came ſuddenly to the Vayuods campe, hauing a little before by his Hungarian ſpies learned that he lay in the open fields in his tent, by D reaſon of the great heat, without any watch or guard, attended on only with his pages and houſhold ſeruants, as a man without feare; & that all the reſt of his retinue lay diſperſed in the countrey villages round about. All which ſerued ſo well for Docia his purpoſe, that the Vayuod ignorant of his death ſo nigh at hand, who rather contemned than feared his enemies, was ſuddenly oppreſſed by Docia his ſouldiours: ſo that whileſt he was yet lying in his bed, and ſcarcely The Vayuod murdred in his tent by Docia, and his head preſented to Grittus.
well awaked by his chamberlaines and the noiſe of the enemie; Docia breaking into his tent, cut off his head as he lay. All they which lay neere, amazed with the ſuddennеſſe of the matter, fled away for feare, and left their horſes and other things for a prey to the Turkes, and other of Docia his followers. Docia hauing done ſo great an outrage, returned to Grittus preſenting vnto him the Vayuods head, which he brought in his hand by the eare. Laſcus was then preſent, but altogether ignorant of the murther, who as a man moued with a naturall compaſſion in ſo ſudden
E and horrible a fact, & forgetting all former grudge (as in like caſe it oftentimes chanceth) ſtood as one diſmaied, nothing reioycing at the vnworthie death of his enemie. To whom Grittus turning himſelfe ſaid, Laſcus, Doeſt thou not know this ſhauen pate, truely it is a great mans head, but of ſuch a one as was verie ambitious, rebellious, and proud. To whom Laſcus replied, Truely though I loued him not, yet I thought it not ſo whileſt it ſtood vpon his ſhoulders : diſallowing therein the crueltie of the fact. Which thing Grittus perceiuing, began to repent him of that was done, and ſaid openly, That although he was worthily ſlain, yet he could haue wiſhed rather to haue had him taken priſoner. The report of this horrible murther once The Tranſiluanians riſe vp in armes againſt Grittus, to reuenge the death of the Vayuod.
bruted abroad, the biſhops kinſmen & friends, yea almoſt all the people of that prouince riſe vp F in armes againſt Grittus, to reuenge the death of the reuerend biſhop, whom liuing they had both loued and feared. Neuer did any people in reuenge of a common wrong, enter into armes with greater deſire, more heat, or quicker ſpeed : ſo that in a few daies there were aſſembled together fortie thouſand horſe and foot, vnder the leading of Stephanus Maylat a noble gentleman, who of all other moſt honored the biſhop, and in that common griefe took vpon him as chiefe, the perſecuting of the authors of ſuch inhumane crueltie. Grittus perceiuing how grieuouſly the matter

mãtter was taken, with the danger he was in, began to doubt with himſelfe what courſe were G beſt for him to take. To go forward, & to fall into the hands of the furious people, the ſame was preſent death; and to returne and leaue the honorable deputation he had with ſo great expectation of all men taken vpon him, was vnto his aſpiring mind no leſſe torment than death it ſelfe.
Thus perplexed, he with all ſpeed got himſelfe with his followers to the ſtrong towne of MEGE, in hope to ſhroud himſelfe vntill ſuch time as the rage of the countrie people were either of it ſelf appeaſed (as it oftentimes falleth out in ſuch ſudden tumults) or els he ſhould be relieued by king Iohn, or the Turks Sanzacks which had the charge of the frontiers of the Turkiſh empire.
The townſmẽ of MEGE ſeeing Grittus accompanied with ſo many Turks, ſhut the gates againſt him: yet at length by the perſuaſion of the two Hungarian captaines Docia and Batianus, they gaue him leaue to enter into the baſe towne, hauing before retired themſelues with all their ſub- H ſtance vnto the higher towne, which in manner of a ſtrong caſtle commaunded the lower. Here whileſt Grittus with all carefulneſſe fortifieth the place, and diſpatcheth the meſſengers vnto his friends abroad for aid; his enemies with hideous noiſe & outcries approching the town, at their firſt comming attempted to haue ſcaled the wals and rampiers therof: which thing whileſt they diſorderly did, with greater furie than diſcretion, they were eaſily repulſed and many of them their Generall, they withdrew themſelues out of the danger of the ſhot, and encamped on eue-ry ſide of the town, hoping as the truth was, that their enemies vnprouided of victual could not long hold the place, but muſt of neceſſitie either ſtarue with famine or yeeld it vp. In the meane time Grittus reſolutly enduring all the calamities of a man beſieged, fell ſicke, and ſo much the I more for that he could heare nothing of any aide which hee expected from his friends: For king Iohn glad in his mind of the diſtreſſe of the ouerſeer, or rather competitor of his kingdome; and alſo knowing that he could not without great diſcontentment of his ſubiects oppoſe him-ſelfe againſt ſuch a multitude riſen vpon ſo iuſt a cauſe, yet for faſhion ſake ſent certain troups of horſemen to his reliefe: who not altogether ignorant of the kings mind, made ſuch haſt, as men that purpoſed not to come in time to do him good. As for the Turkes Sanzacks of BELGRADE and SAMANDRIA, they enuying at his honour, flatly refuſed to depart from their charge to re-lieue him, without expreſſe commaund from Solyman himſelfe: and Laſcus (before one of Grittus his chiefe followers, but now a beholder of his diſtreſſe) when he had a little before departed from him to procure him ſome reliefe as he promiſed, did now in this extremitie forſake K him alſo. The citizens in the vpper towne, who a great while had ſtood looking on from aboue as men indifferent; perceiuing the full reſolution of their countrie men to be reuenged, and the difficulties wherewith the Turks were incloſed, aſſailed them alſo from the high towne. Grittus

thus beſet on euerie ſide, offered vnto the Tranſiluanians a great maſſe of money, to ſuffer him to paſſe forward into HVNGARIE: but their furious minds more deſirous of reuenge than money, were not to bee moued with any gold. In fine he ſent rich iewels vnto the Gouernour of MOLDAVIA his friend, to be readie at a certaine houre when he would ſallie out of the towne, to receiue him with certaine troupes of horſemen; ſo if it were poſſible to ſaue himſelfe and his children. Grittus (whether it were vpon a doubtfull hope, or vrged by ineuitable deſtinie) ſally-ing out of the towne at the appointed time, with Solymans commiſſion in his hand, and miſſing L Grittus taken and brought to Maylat. of the Moldauian, fell vpon Francis Schenden the late biſhops nigh kinſman, and Maylat his familiar friend; who furiouſly running in vpon him with tumultuous ſpeech, violently raught from his head his rich cap of Sables, and with his horſemen tooke him, being weake with ſick-neſſe and making no reſiſtance. His followers, eſpecially the Turkes, encloſed on euery ſide, were either ſlaine or taken. But Grittus himſelfe being brought to the Generals tent, beſet round with his armed enemies, and there examined, Why he had commaunded the Vayuod to bee ſlaine? earneſtly proteſted, That he neuer commaunded any ſuch thing, and that it was done without his knowledge. Which his aunſwere ſerued not his turne, all the people crying out againſt him with one voice, that he ſhould as a ſacrifice bee offered vnto the Vayuods ghoſt.
Grittus beheaded. Whereupon he was by Maylat deliuered againe to Francis Schenden to be executed, who with- M out delay cauſed his head to be ſtrucke off. The nobilitie and the Vayuods kinſmen (after the manner of that people) dipped ſome part of their garments in his bloud, the longer to keepe in mind the remembrance of the reuenge. This was the ſhamefull end of Aloyſius Grittus the duke of VENICE his ſonne, Solymans deputie in HVNGARIE, with whom he was in ſuch credit as ne-

A uer was any Christian abounding in wealth and worldly felicity: but climing too fast vp the euill staued ladder of ambition, suddenly fell and neuer rise more. The executioner stripping his dead body, found about him so many precious stones and jewels as were valued at forty millions of duckats. And not long after, Lascus sent for by the king to BVDA, was straightly examined vpon torture concerning Grittus his commission and purposes, and was in great danger of his life: but at last by the intercession of Sigismund king of POLONIA, he was set at liberty, & so fled out of HVNGARIE vnto Sigismund his court in POLONIA: after hee had long time wearied himselfe, and aduentured his life in the Hungarian state. Docia the author of this Tragedie, was by the furious people afterwards rent in peeces, and so perished.

The riches found about Grittus.

The same time that Grittus went from CONSTANTINOPLE into HVNGARIE, Solyman the Turkish emperour dreading no danger out of EVROPE, tooke in hand two great expeditions both at one time, the one by land into ASIA against the Persians, and the other by sea into AFFRICKE against the Moores: promising vnto himselfe in his inordinate desires the monarchie of the whole world in short time, if he might subdue these two great nations whom hee had already in hope deuoured. But for as much as all cannot be told at once, which was at one time in diuers places so farre distant done; omitting for a while the expedition made in person himselfe against the Persians, we will first declare what he did by his lieutenants against the Moores. Hariadenus surnamed of the Christians Barbarussa, who succeeding his elder brother Horruccius in the kingdome of ALGIERS in AFFRICKE, had by many victories so enlarged the kindome before gotten by his brother, that his name and power was now become terrible both to the C Christians and wilde Moores, and his fame growne great in the Turkish court, was the cheefe author and perswader of Solyman to inuade AFFRICKE. But it shall not (as I thinke) be far from our purpose heere breefely to rehearse by what meanes those two MYTILENE brethren, basely borne, crept out of a small galliot vnto the majestie of great kings, that herein they which come afterwards may also admire the wonderfull changes and chances of these worldly things, now vp, now downe, as if the life of man were not of much more certaintie then a stage play.

Solyman at one time purposeth to inuade Persia and Affricke.

These two brethren, Horruccius and Hariadenus, borne at MYTILENE in the Island of LESBO, weary of the poore and base estate they led at home with their father, a renegate Grecian; stealing a little galliot, committed themselues and all the hope of their good fortune to sea, where by chance they consorted themselues with Camales, a most famous pyrat of that time, vn-
D der whom Horuccius the elder brother for his forwardnesse became a captain: and growing rich by many purchases, and also strong with gallies and slaues which he had at sundry times taken, and at last consorting himselfe with Haidin, Sinam the Iew, Salec, and other lesse pyrates, which afterwards became men of great fame and account, ouer whom hee commanded as an arch pyrat, came seeking after purchase as farre as MAVRITANIA. At which time Selymes king of IVLIA CÆSARIA, which now we call ALGIERS, was in armes against his brother Mechemetes, competitour of the kingdome: who aided by the Numidians, now commonly called Arabians, put his brother in great doubt of his estate. Selymes glad of the comming of Horruccius & the other pyrats his followers, with a great masse of money paid before hand, induced Horruccius and the rest to take vpon them the defence of him and his kingdome against his brother: Which thing
E Horuccius so happily performed, especially by the meanes of his harquebusiers, as then no small terrour to the wild Moores and Numidians, that in short time he repulsed that sauage people, and set Selymes at peace in his kingdom. Horruccius being a man of a sharpe wit, and by nature ambitious, noting in the time of his seruice the kings mild and simple disposition, void of all distrust; and that the naked Moores were no souldiers, but a light and vnconstant people, alwaies at variance among themselues; and that the wandering Numidians liuing barely, diuided into many factions, were easily by reward to be woon, or by force constrained: suddenly falsified his faith, and villanously slew Selymes the king, as he was bathing himselfe, mistrusting nothing lesse than the falshood of the pyrat; and in the same hurle murthering such as he thought would with-
F stand his desire, and with bounty and cruelty ouercomming the rest, so wrought the matter, that he was by generall consent chosen king of ALGIERS. Thus of a pyrat become a king, hee shortly after by policie surprised CIRCELLO, a famous citie (about sixty mile distant from ALGIERS) by his souldiors sent thither in the habite of marchants. After that, he by his brother Hariadenus (no lesse valiant then himselfe) troubled all the Mediterranian sea from ALGIERS with his gallies, & all his neighbors: himselfe by land with daily incursions, leauing nothing vntoucht which might by force or policie be had: ſo that his power dayly encreaſed, men of ſeruice continually reſorting vnto him, as the cheef man in all thoſe parts. Not thus contented, he to enlarge his kingdome, draue the Spaniards out of BVGEA, a citie famous both for the great trade thither, and for the Mahometane ſchoole ſometime there kept: at the taking whereof he loſt his right hand with a ſhot, and in ſtead thereof euer after vſed a hand of yron, wherewith hee obtained many worthie victories againſt his enemies: for neere to ALGIERS he ouerthrew an armie of the Spaniards, with Diego de Vara their generall. And ſhortly after, at ſuch time as Hugo Moncada returning out of ITALIE with the old Spaniſh ſouldiers, landed in his countrey, he enforced him againe to ſea; where he with all his expert ſouldiers either periſhed by ſhipwracke, or driuen on ſhore, were ſlaine or taken priſoners by Horruccius, and thruſt into his gallies. At laſt hauing in ſundrie battels ouercome the king of TREMISSA, Charles the emperour his confederat, and thruſt him out of his kingdome, he ſtirred vp both the Chriſtians and Numidians againſt him: ſo that comming to take ORA and PORTVS, two ſtrong holds kept by garriſons of Spaniards ſent thither to aid the king of TREMISSA, he was by them and the Moores at the firſt repulſed, and afterwards quite ouerthrowne: where moſt part of his armie being ſlaine or taken priſoners, he with a few of his friends ſought to ſaue themſelues by flight ouer the deſart ſands; and ſeeing himſelfe hardly purſued by his enemies, ſcattered may peeces of gold vpon the ſands as he fled, thereby to haue ſtaied their haſtie purſute: but they more deſirous of him than of his gold, followed ſo faſt, that at the laſt they ouertooke him, and without further delay ſtrucke off his head, which was afterwards ſent into SPAINE, and carried vpon a launce thorow all the townes and cities alongſt the ſea coaſt, to the wonderfull reioycing of the people, vnto whom he had in former time done great harme.

Horruccius ſlain and his head caried about in Spaine.

After the death of Horruccius, Hariadenus inferiour to his brother neither in courage nor martiall proweſſe, by the generall conſent of the ſouldiours tooke vpon him the kingdome of ALGIERS. He, made heire not onely of his brothers kingdome, but of his vertues and hautie thoughts, and of the ſurname alſo of Barbaruſſa, began forthwith to aſpire vnto the empire of all that part of AFFRICKE, accounting what he had alreadie gotten, too little and too baſe to anſwere his deſires. Wherefore he entred into armes, and became a terrour both to the Moores and Numidians, holding peace with ſome, and wars with others, as beſt ſerued his purpoſe: and with his gallies robbed and ſpoiled the coaſts of SPAINE, SARDINIA, and the Iſlands BALEARES; fortune ſo fauouring him in all his enterpriſes, that he became both famous and feareful vnto his enemies. He ſlew Hamet, a great commander among the Numidians, & chaſed Benchades and Amida, two of their greateſt princes, out of the country: and with like fortune at ſea ouercame Hugo Moncada, a famous Spaniard, who ſore wounded, had much adoe to ſaue himſelfe by flight, when he had loſt diuers of his gallies. He alſo in battell at ſea ouerthrew Rodericus Portundus, admirall of SPAINE: in which fight the admirall with his ſonne were both ſlaine, and ſeuen of his gallies taken: In token of which victorie, he ſent part of the rich ſpoile there taken with the admirals enſigne, as a preſent vnto Solyman, whereby he became famous in the Turks court; but much more after he had repulſed Auria from CERCENNA, and taken two great Genoway ſhips which were comming to Auria loaded with men and munition, the loſſe whereof filled the citie of GENVA with much ſorrow. All things ſorting thus according to his deſire, and his name become no leſſe terrible in SPAINE, ITALIE, SICILIE, and the Iſlands of the Mediterranean, than it was in the greateſt part of AFFRICKE; Solyman grieued with the loſſe of CORONE, PATRAS, and the caſtles vpon the ſtraits of LEPANTO, taken from him by Auria, Himerales his admirall being ſhamefully put to flight: by the counſell of his Baſſaes, but eſpecially of Abraham the cheefe Baſſa, ſent embaſſadours vnto him to ALGIERS, offering him the greateſt honours of his court, and to make him admirall of all his fleet, if hee would forthwith repaire vnto CONSTANTINOPLE: for why he was the onely man in all mens iudgements, who for his yeares and great experience at ſea, as well as for his inuincible courage and glorie of his late atchieued kingdome, was to be compared with Auria, and to bee oppoſed againſt the Chriſtian fleet. Sinas a great man in Solymans court, was with this embaſſage ſent, and ſpeedily tranſported to ALGIERS by Mangalis, a famous pyrat, then gouernour of the RHODES: who at his landing was honourably receiued by Barbaruſſa, and audience giuen him. Barbaruſſa vnderſtanding the cauſe of his comming, was exceeding glad therof, preſently conceiuing no ſmall hope of obtaining the Monarchie of AFFRICK, if he might once come to Solymans preſence,

A and at large ſhew vnto him the ſtate of AFFRICKE, and power of the Chriſtians, with their continuall diſcord amongſt themſelues. Wherefore without further delay committing the protection of his ſonne Aſanes (then about eighteene yeares old) and the gouernment of his new gotten kingdome to Ramada and Agis, two of his nigh kinſmen and aſſured friends, of whoſe fidelitie he doubted not: he with ſortie of his owne gallies, in moſt warlike manner appointed, ſet forward with Solymans embaſſador towards CONSTANTINOPLE; where by the way he met with a fleet of Genoway ſhips bound for SICILE for corne, which after a ſharpe and cruell fight he tooke and burnt. After that, landing by night in the Iſland of ELBA, not farre from NAPLES, he ſuddenly ſurpriſed RHIVM, a rich citie; where loading his gallies with the wealth
B therof, and carying away with him all the inhabitants into captiuitie, he arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE in the yere 1533, where he was by the great courtiers brought to Solyman, of whom he was ioifully receiued, if it were but for the preſents which he gaue him: which were fair boies and young maidens ſumptuouſly apparrelled, eunuchs, and wild beaſts of LYBIA, as Lyons, Leopards, and ſuch like. But after he had certaine daies diſcourſed at large with the great Baſſaes of the ſtate of AFFRICKE, the ſtrength of the Chriſtians, and how the warres were to be managed, he was afterwards by them ſeldomer ſent for, & offering himſelfe into their companie, was hardly admitted: for enuie (the inſeperable companion of growing honour) had quickly ouertaken him in the court, ſo that many men letted not openly to ſay, That it had not beene the faſhion of the Othoman kings to preferre pyrats (the worſt kind of theeues) to the honour of their
C great Admiral; and that there wanted not, neither euer would want men both vertuous and valiant in the Turks court, which could with great honour maintaine and augment the glorie of the Turkiſh empire both by ſea and land, whereas he had againſt all right and conſcience, by ſhamefull treacherie intruded himſelfe into another mans kingdome in AFFRICKE, and there perſecuted the Mahometane princes and people, being of no religion himſelfe, as one that was borne of a renegat Greeke, and had from his youth liued as a mercileſſe pyrat, and common enemie of mankind. By which ſpeeches, Barbaruſſa well perceiued in how euill time Abraham Baſſa his beſt friend, and by whoſe means he was ſent for, was abſent from the court: who at that time was gone into COMAGENA; and wintered at ALEPPO, with purpoſe (as Solymans forerunner) with the firſt of the Spring to paſſe ouer Euphrates againſt the Perſian. After long ſute
D and much expectation, Solyman anſwered Barbaruſſa by Aiax and Caſſimes, two of the great Baſſaes, That all the matter concerning him ſhould be referred to the diſcretion of Abraham the chiefe Baſſa, for that he was by his counſell eſpecially ſent for into AFFRICKE: wherefore if he did expect any thing, hee ſhould repaire vnto him in SYRIA, that according to his graue iudgement all things might be ordered. Barbaruſſa thus reiected into SYRIA, although he well perceiued that it tended to his no ſmall diſgrace; yet in hope by ſufferance to obtaine another kingdome, ſeemed contented with the anſwere, and reſolued forthwith to take vpon him that long and painful iourney, which the old king luſtily performed: and ſo poſting by land thorow ASIA the leſſe, and trauelling ouer the mountaine AMANVS, then couered with deepe ſnowe, came in the dead time of Winter to ALEPPO in SYRIA, where hee was honourably receiued
E of the great Baſſa, and heard at large, to his ſo good contentation and liking, that he deemed him of all others the fitteſt to commaund the Turks power at ſea, and to that purpoſe writ commendatorie letters in his behalf to Solyman; wiſhing him for his ſufficiencie to place him as the fourth with the other three Baſſaes of his counſel. After Barbaruſſa was againe arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE with theſe letters, and that it was once knowne how effectually the chiefe Baſſa had commended him to Solyman, it was a world to ſee, how vpon the ſudden the face of the court was changed vpon him, euerie man either for friendſhip or flatterie begun now to ſpeake of his praiſes, and to extoll his worthineſſe: who was now in all mens mouths but Barbaruſſa? ſo great was the power and authoritie of the chief Baſſa, that being abſent, yet was his approbation of all men accounted ſufficient to prefer whom he pleaſed; and his letters laws to the reſt of the court.
F Barbaruſſa had brought with him from ALGIERS one Roſcetes, the elder brother of Muleaſſes, king of TVNES, who wrongfully driuen into exile by his younger brother, had liued certaine yeares at ALGIERS, but now by the perſuaſion of Barbaruſſa was come with him to CONSTANTINOPLE, to craue aid of Solyman againſt the oppreſſion of his brother. Him Barbaruſſa oftentimes ſhewed vnto the great Baſſaes, and in his diſcourſes with them concerning the conqueſt of AFFRICKE, ſet him out as a moſt fit inſtrument for ſubduing of the kingdom of TVNES,

What thing the priests with lowd voice vse to pray for, at such time as the Othoman emperours enter into the temple to pray, the same thing doe I also wish vnto thee most mightie Solyman, which is, That thou shouldest remember, thy progenitors by iustice and religion to haue got for thee this empire, than which, more magnificent or richer the gods haue not giuen to any: fortune hath neuer deceiued them that tread that way, and thou hetherto hast so traced their steps, that thou hast easily surmounted their fame and glorie, administring iustice to thy subiects; and inflamed with the hope H

By this meanes is BELGRADE taken, RHODES woon, the king of HVNGARIE slaine in battell, GERMANIE twice harried and burnt: so that Charles, whom the Christians would make equall to thy selfe in power and valour, with the great aid almost of all the Christian nations, terrified with the noise of thy armie, shunned battell. But for as much as empires be they neuer so large, or victories be they neuer so glorious, can either satisfie the greatnesse of an heroicall mind, or glut the same with glorie: thou hast therefore sent before thee thy victorious ensignes against the Persians and Parthians, that those nations who haue wickedly fallen from our rites, purified as it were by thy sacred armes, may be againe reclaimed to the auntient rites of our religion. But be this vnto thy greatnesse most honourable to attempt, and glorious to performe: let it only be lawfull for me now growne an old I man in the middest of armes and dangers, to declare what is expedient, and briefly to open such things as I haue by long experience learned to concerne the augmenting of thy fame and empire elsewhere. Neither would I haue you to take this as presumptuously spoken of me: for fortune hath enough, yea and more than enough fauoured my designes, whom from a poore cottage and bare hope, she hath promoted to glorious victories, great riches, yea vnto the title and maiestie of a king. But vnto these things the gods could giue me nothing better than to be called for of thee, and sent for, in counsell to discourse of matters of greatest importance: wherefore my aduise shall bee vnto thee faithfull, and with experience confirmed; which although it be all that it seemeth old men can doe, yet in my sound bodie remaineth such strength, that I dare both promise and performe vnto thee my good seruice at all assaies both by sea and land. For vnto this onely course haue I bent my selfe day and night from my K
youth (following the purpose and counsell of my valiant brother Horruccius, who to extend the bounds of our religion, persecuted the Christians both by sea and land) desiring nothing more, than that thy fleet and power might once be ioined with my forces and direction, and so vnder thy good hap to be either a commaunder, or else commaunded: for as much as it grieueth me not to be commaunded by my betters: of which my desires if the gods shall make me partaker, the Spaniards shall shortly be driuen quite out of AFFRICKE, thou shalt heare that the Moores are gone ouer into SPAINE to repossesse the kingdome of GRANADO, that TVNES and NVMIDIA are at thy commaund, and not to speake of SARDINIA and CORSICA, that SICILIA is ours: which once taken, we shall starue vp ITALIE, and on euery side distresse it with our fleet, being now weake and brought low by the discord of the L princes, and that part thereof both towards SICILIA and MACEDONIA readie to submit it selfe vpon any condition, so it might cast off the Spanish yoke. Thinke not that either that strength or vnitie is now in ITALIE, which was when thy great grandfather Mahomet hauing taken HYDRVNTVM, brought a great feare not vpon ITALIE onely, but vpon other the Christian nations also: For by the good successe of that warre, which all the Christian princes could hardly withstand, he had vndoubtedly taken the citie of ROME, and so according to right and reason againe vnited the empire of the East and of the West, as they were before in their auntient glorie: But hee suddainely left the world, rapt to heauen, that he might leaue to thee (according to the appointment of the fatall destinies and reuolutions of the heauens) this worke of absolute perfection. And yet my purpose is not by put- ting thee in hope of so great and rare a triumph, to interrupt or hinder thee for turning thy power M into the East against thy old and irreligious enemies, deseruing all extremities: for thy naue shall be sufficient for me, whereof thou shalt haue no need in thy warres so farre within land, that whilest thou art conquering ASIA, AFRICA the third part of the world may in the meane time be brought vnder thy subiection also. Where before all other things, Muleasses is to be driuen out of TVNES, a man of insatiable couetousnesse, vnstayed lust, horrible cruelties, hated both of God and man: who hauing

A by trecherie ſlaine eightéene of his brethren, or that which worſe is, cruelly burnt out their eyes, doth ſo raigne alone, that he hath left him neither kinſman nor friend: For being as vnthankfull as perfidious he hath murthered all his fathers friends, who with great trauell had preferred him to the kingdome, ſo to make ſhort payment for ſo great deſert. With this beaſt we muſt haue to do, whom whileſt no man loueth, all men eaſily wiſh to periſh. The Numidians trouble him with daily inuaſions, whoſe iniuries the infamous coward endureth with ſuch ſhame and reproach, that it ſhould ſeeme hee had rather to ſuffer them than reuenge them. And yet this effeminat daſtard holdeth in chaines many valiant Turks, and acknowledgeth not your imperiall name, whereunto all men on euerie ſide ſue for grace: and which is not to be ſuffered, exceedingly fauoureth the Spaniards at TRIPOLIS, to the intent that Agis and Moſes, two valiant Tur-
B kiſh captaines, may be driuen out of the citie. This wild beaſt diſarmed of his clawes and teeth, we ſhall eaſily deſtroy, if it be but for that we haue with vs Roſcetes his brother, whom the Numidians wiſh and long for: him muſt we vſe, if it be but for a ſhew, ſo ſhall the thing we deſire be without bloud effected, as ſoone as we ſhall but preſent our ſelues before the gates of TVNES. Then ſhall it be at your pleaſure to appoint whom you will haue to gouerne the Numidian kingdome: it ſhall be vnto me glorie enough, when the greateſt part of AFFRICKE conquered, ſhall be peaceably deliuered into your hands at your returne with the triumphs of PERSIA. But by the way as I returne, I aſſure you vpon mine owne priuat ſo to vſe the matter, that the Chriſtians ſhall alſo haue good cauſe to bewaile their calamities: and if I hap to meet with Auria, he ſhall haue ſmall cauſe to reioice of the miſchiefe he hath done: for him alone I challenge to perſecute as my proper and peculiar enemie, both for the remembrance of the harmes we haue receiued at
C his hands, and for the deſpight I haue at his fame; who once taken out of the way, the ſeas ſhall be open only to you and your fleets. And beleeue me, he that ſhall be able to commaund the ſeas, ſhall eaſily alſo ſubdue the kingdomes by land.

But Solyman, who after the manner of wiſe princes vſed well to conſider, and afterward with ripe iudgement to reſolue of ſuch matters as he had with attentiue eare harkened vnto; commending Barbaruſſa for his forwarneſſe in his ſeruice, for that time brake vp the counſell. Not long after a decree was made, according to Abraham the great Baſſa his aduiſe, That Barbaruſſa ſhould be ioined as fourth with the other three chiefe Baſſaes of Solymans counſel, and be made great Admirall: ſo that all the Iſlands, ports, and people all alongſt the ſea coaſt thorow out So-
D lymans empire, ſhould be at his commaund, and that it ſhould be lawfull for him to take vp ſuch marriners and ſouldiours for ſeruice at ſea, as pleaſed him in what place ſoeuer. This being ſolemnly proclaimed, Solyman with his owne hand deliuered him a ſcepter and a ſword, willing him by worthie deeds to performe what he had promiſed. After which Aiax and Caſſimes the two great Baſſaes, with the captaine of the Ianizaries, brought him with exceeding pompe from the court to the Nauie: at which time was carried before him all the tokens of his new obtained honour. And toward the maintenance of that warre at ſea, he had deliuered vnto him out of Solymans treaſures eight hundred thouſand duckets, and eight hundred Ianizaries.

Barbaruſſa ſped of that he deſired, ſtaied not long after at CONSTANTINOPLE, but departing out of HELLESPONTVS with eightie gallies and certaine galliots, ſhaped his courſe towards ITALIE, leauing Amurathes (a ſea captaine) with twelue gallies to tranſport Solyman and his armie, readie to ſet forward againſt the Perſian, ouer that narrow ſea into ASIA. Maior

A Maior of the towne to keepe the people from flying away, had lockt vp the gates on the other ſide of the citie from the enemie. From thence he with rich ſpoile and many priſoners went to CITRARIVM, where hee had learned of his priſoners, a fleet of gallies was in building. This towne forſaken of the inhabitants for feare, he tooke without reſiſtance, ranſaked and burnt it, where he alſo fired ſeuen gallies not yet altogither finiſhed. But after he was come with his fleet as farre as the Iſland CAPRI within the ſight of NAPLES, ſuch a terrour was ſtrucke into the minds of all that dwelt alongſt that coaſt, that it was thought if he had landed and gone directly to NAPLES, the Neopolitans would for feare haue abandoned the citie. But holding on his courſe, he came to PROCHITA, which he tooke and rifled: ſo paſſing by the port of CAIETA, which he might eaſily haue taken, he came to SPELVNCA, a towne in the hithermoſt part of
B the kingdome of NAPLES. They of the towne diſmaied with the ſudden arriuall of ſo great a fleet, yeelded the ſame without reſiſtance. The enemie entring the towne, tooke twelue hundred priſoners. Pelegrinus a chiefe man amongſt them of SPELVNCA was fled into the caſtle; him Barbaruſſa commaunded to yeeld, which if he would preſently do, he promiſed to let him go free; but if he ſhould ſtand vpon his defence, he threatned in ſhort time to make him repent his fooliſh hardineſſe with the vtter deſtruction both of himſelfe and the towne. The fearefull gentleman without delay, came out of the caſtle, and fell downe at his feet; who according to his promiſe gaue him his libertie, and with rare curteſie reſtored to him his wife, his ſonne, and niece, whom he had taken priſoners, who receiued them with many teares falling from their eies for ioie.

C The ſame night alſo two thouſand Turkes came from the fleet thorow the rough and buſhie mountaines to the citie FVNDI, ten miles diſtant from SPELVNCA, in the vttermoſt borders of the kindome of NAPLES, conducted as was thought by certaine Italians of that countrey; who a few yeares before taken at ſea, and ouerwearied with the heauy burthen of the Turkiſh ſlauerie, had reuolted to the Mahometane religion. But ſuch was the ſuddenneſſe of their comming, and their celerity in entring the city, that Iulia Gonzaga the paragon of ITALIE, and the chiefe priſe which they ſought after, had ſcarce time to get to horſe halfe naked, & ſo with much difficulty to eſcape into the mountaines. It is reported, that Barbaruſſa (which thing he himſelfe afterwards ſeemed not to denie) moued with the fame of her incomparable beautie and wonderfull perfection, deſired exceedingly to haue taken her as a preſent for Solyman. The citizens
D were for moſt part either ſlaine or taken priſoners by the Turkes; who loded with the ſpoile of the citie, returned againe to the fleet. Another part of Barbaruſſa his fleete came to TARRACINA, which the Turks took forſaken of the inhabitants, who for feare were all fled into the mountaines, except ſome which for age or ſickeneſſe could not ſhift for themſelues, whom the Turkes ſlew and ſpoiled the churches. Barbaruſſa thus ſcouring alongſt the coaſt of ITALIE, and newes thereof daily brought to the citie of ROME, ſtrucke ſuch an exceeding terrour into the mindes of the citiſens, that it was verily thought if he had come but a little farther to OSTIA, they would generally haue forſaken the citie. But hee hauing well performed his promiſe made to Solyman for vexing the Chriſtians, and before reſolued of a greater matter he had to doe; when he had watered at PONTIA, paſſed ouer into AFFRICK with ſuch celeritie, that he was arriued there
E before it was thought that he was departed from the coaſt of ITALY. For Barbaruſſa to deceiue Muleaſſes king of TVNES, and to take him vnprouided, had giuen it out that hee would burne and ſpoile the coaſts of the Chriſtian countries, eſpecially of ITALY, LIGVRIA, and SPAINE, in reuenge of the harme done by Auria at CORONE and PATRAS. Which thing Muleaſſes the rather beleeued, vnderſtanding his proceedings vpon the coaſt of ITALY. The Venetians hauing alſo at the ſame time at great charges prepared a great fleet, did in ſome part leſſen Muleaſſes feare, that Barbaruſſa would employ his forces for AFFRICK: for then what ſhould the Venetians haue needed to haue made ſo great and chargeable a preparation. But that which aboue all other things brought him into ſecurity, was for that he had by ſecret eſpials certainly learned, that his brother Roſcetes was kept at CONSTANTINOPLE, as a priſoner at large, vnder
F ſafe keeping: which made him to thinke that Barbaruſſa his forces were not prepared againſt him, for hee knew that he could not be impugned, or his ſtate more endangered by any other meanes than by producing the competitour of his kingdome, to whom his guilty conſcience doubted, that both the citiſens of TVNES and the Numidians were for moſt part well affected.

A ches and large promiſes of recompenſing euery man to the ful, for all ſuch harm as they ſhould ſuſtaine by his brothers furie in the countrey: and beſide that had the city in ſuch ſtrong poſſeſſion by reaſon of his ſouldiors, that the citiſens either would not or could not reuolt to Roſcetes. The Numidian princes wearie of that long and vaine expectation, according to the leuitie of that nation, accounting it no ſhame after victorie once gotten to depart, began one after another to ſhrinke away to their owne dwellings, perſuading Roſcetes alſo to prouide for himſelfe whileſt he had time, and to attend his better fortune. Wherefore he fearing to be betrayed by the Numidians, or circumuented by his cruell brother, fled to Barbaruſſa, then raigning at ALGIERS in great glorie, where he was honourably entertained; and there remained vntill ſuch time as by
B his perſuaſion he went with him as is aforeſaid to CONSTANTINOPLE, to craue help of Solyman, by whom he was detained in ſafe cuſtodie: although it was in policie giuen out by Barbaruſſa, that he was in the fleet, and that he ſhould by Solymans power be reſtored to his fathers kingdome at TVNES.

Forſaken of the Numidians princes, he flieth to Barbaruſſa.

This was the ſtate of the kingdome of TVNES, at ſuch time as Barbaruſſa with Solymans great fleet, contrarie to all mens expectation, ſuddenly departing from the coſt of ITALIE, landed in AFFRICKE at BISERTA, a famous port of the kingdome of TVNES. They of BISERTA wearie of the gouernment of Muleaſſes, and of themſelues deſirous of change, as ſoone as they heard the name of Roſcetes, forthwith draue out their Gouernour, and receiued the Turkes into the towne. For Barbaruſſa had before ſent certaine of Roſcetes his familiar friends aſhore,
C which bare the people in hand, that he was in the fleet, but not able yet to come on ſhore, for that he was (as they ſaid) ſeaſicke and troubled with an ague. BISERTA thus poſſeſſed by Barbaruſſa, he preſently departed thence: and ſayling by VTICA, thirtie miles diſtant from BISERTA, and ſo keeping alongſt the coaſt, and paſſing the promontorie of CARTHAGE, came before GVLETTA, a ſtrong caſtle within the bay of TVNES, ſo placed vpon a ſtrait, that it commaundeth all the paſſage by ſea vnto the citie of TVNES. Before this caſtle, Barbaruſſa in token of friendſhip, diſcharged all his great ordinance, which they of the caſtle anſwered with like: but being required to deliuer it vp to Roſcetes, they ſaid it ſhould be alwaies at his commaund that ruled in the citie of TVNES. The newes of Roſcetes his ſuppoſed comming, flying ſwiftly by land from BISERTA to TVNES, and the great fleet once diſcouered, ſet all the citie on an vprore: for
D the citiſens were in great expectation of their new king, both for the loue of Roſcetes, who had alwaies ſhewed himſelfe to be of a mild and bountifull nature; and alſo for the hatred of Muleaſſes, whoſe tyrannous and couetous gouernment they thought they had too long endured. Neither was he ignorant what report ran of himſelfe, and how he had loſt the hearts of his ſubiects, which was euidently to be ſeene in the eyes and countenances of the cheefe men of the citie. And that which more encreaſed their hatred, was for that he had not according to his promiſe to them in time of his diſtreſſe, made them any recompence for their goodly houſes and oliue gardens, deſtroyed in the countrey by Roſcetes in the former warres: wherefore at ſuch time as he came now out of the caſtle, and in the greateſt aſſemblie of his people, began to perſuade them to play the men, and to continue conſtant in their obedience, promiſing vnto them
E ſuch reward as they knew he was neuer able to performe, they all departed, and left him alone: yea ſome of them vnder the colour of friendſhip, and amongſt them Abdahar, then Meſuar, (which was cheefe officer next vnto the king) perſuaded him to giue place to his hard fortune, & forthwith to flie, for by chance at the ſame inſtant it was in euery mans mouth, that the Turks were euen at hand: which thing cauſed Muleaſſes, forſaken of his ſubiects, of himſelfe fearefull, and worthily doubting to be betrayed, to flie in ſuch haſt out of the citie, that he left behind him both his treaſure and iewels, which afterwards came into the hands of his enemies. The firſt that reuolted was Abezes, a man of great authoritie; and Fetuches, captaine of the caſtle; both renegate Spaniards. Fetuches preſently after the flight of Muleaſſes, brought out Roſcetes wife and children, whom Muleaſſes had long time kept in priſon, & to welcome their father, placed them
F in the kings royall ſeat. Abezes alſo forthwith aduertiſed Barbaruſſa of the departure of Muleaſſes, and with what longing the people expected their deſired king, wiſhing him without delay to repaire vnto the citie: and for a preſent ſent him a goodly Barbarian horſe, richly furniſhed, and diuers others for his other cheefe captaines. Hereupon Barbarnſſa without longer ſtay ſet forward with fiue thouſand Turks, which he had alreadie landed, and comming to the citie, was of the citiſens ioyfully receiued. grew moſt plentifully and pleaſantly all alongſt the country, from the ruines of old CARTHAGE

heauy and lamentable ſpectacle. But Muleaſſes had ſo attempered their minds with faire ſpee-

A ches and large promiſes of recompenſing euery man to the ful, for all ſuch harm as they ſhould ſuſtaine by his brothers furie in the countrey: and beſide that had the city in ſuch ſtrong poſſeſſion by reaſon of his ſouldiors, that the citiſens either would not or could not reuolt to Roſcetes. The Numidian princes wearie of that long and vaine expectation, according to the leuitie of that nation, accounting it no ſhame after victorie once gotten to depart, began one after another to ſhrinke away to their owne dwellings, perſuading Roſcetes alſo to prouide for himſelfe whileſt he had time, and to attend his better fortune. Wherefore he fearing to be betrayed by the Numidians, or circumuented by his cruell brother, fled to Barbaruſſa, then raigning at ALGIERS in great glorie, where he was honourably entertained; and there remained vntill ſuch time as by
B his perſuaſion he went with him as is aforeſaid to CONSTANTINOPLE, to craue help of Solyman, by whom he was detained in ſafe cuſtodie: although it was in policie giuen out by Barbaruſſa, that he was in the fleet, and that he ſhould by Solymans power be reſtored to his fathers kingdome at TVNES.

Forſaken of the Numidian princes, he flieth to Barbaruſſa.

This was the ſtate of the kingdome of TVNES, at ſuch time as Barbaruſſa with Solymans great fleet, contrarie to all mens expectation, ſuddenly departing from the coſt of ITALIE, landed in AFFRICKE at BISERTA, a famous port of the kingdome of TVNES. They of BISERTA wearie of the gouernment of Muleaſſes, and of themſelues deſirous of change, as ſoone as they heard the name of Roſcetes, forthwith draue out their Gouernour, and receiued the Turkes into the towne. For Barbaruſſa had before ſent certaine of Roſcetes his familiar friends aſhore,
C which bare the people in hand, that he was in the fleet, but not able yet to come on ſhore, for that he was (as they ſaid) ſeaſicke and troubled with an ague. BISERTA thus poſſeſſed by Barbaruſſa, he preſently departed thence: and ſayling by VTICA, thirtie miles diſtant from BISERTA, and ſo keeping alongſt the coaſt, and paſſing the promontorie of CARTHAGE, came before GVLETTA, a ſtrong caſtle within the bay of TVNES, ſo placed vpon a ſtrait, that it commaundeth all the paſſage by ſea vnto the citie of TVNES. Before this caſtle, Barbaruſſa in token of friendſhip, diſcharged all his great ordinance, which they of the caſtle anſwered with like: but being required to deliuer it vp to Roſcetes, they ſaid it ſhould be alwaies at his commaund that ruled in the citie of TVNES. The newes of Roſcetes his ſuppoſed comming, flying ſwiftly by land from BISERTA to TVNES, and the great fleet once diſcouered, ſet all the citie on an vprore: for
D the citiſens were in great expectation of their new king, both for the loue of Roſcetes, who had alwaies ſhewed himſelfe to be of a mild and bountifull nature; and alſo for the hatred of Muleaſſes, whoſe tyrannous and couetous gouernment they thought they had too long endured. Neither was he ignorant what report ran of himſelfe, and how he had loſt the hearts of his ſubiects, which was euidently to be ſeene in the eyes and countenances of the cheefe men of the citie. And that which more encreaſed their hatred, was for that he had not according to his promiſe to them in time of his diſtreſſe, made them any recompence for their goodly houſes and oliue gardens, deſtroyed in the countrey by Roſcetes in the former warres: wherefore at ſuch time as he came now out of the caſtle, and in the greateſt aſſemblie of his people, began to perſuade them to play the men, and to continue conſtant in their obedience, promiſing vnto them
E ſuch reward as they knew he was neuer able to performe, they all departed, and left him alone: yea ſome of them vnder the colour of friendſhip, and amongſt them Abdahar, then Meſuar, (which was cheefe officer next vnto the king) perſuaded him to giue place to his hard fortune, & forthwith to flie, for by chance at the ſame inſtant it was in euery mans mouth, that the Turks were euen at hand: which thing cauſed Muleaſſes, forſaken of his ſubiects, of himſelfe fearefull, and worthily doubting to be betrayed, to flie in ſuch haſt out of the citie, that he left behind him both his treaſure and iewels, which afterwards came into the hands of his enemies. The firſt that reuolted was Abezes, a man of great authoritie; and Fetuches, captaine of the caſtle; both renegate Spaniards. Fetuches preſently after the flight of Muleaſſes, brought out Roſcetes wife and children, whom Muleaſſes had long time kept in priſon, & to welcome their father, placed them
F in the kings royall ſeat. Abezes alſo forthwith aduertiſed Barbaruſſa of the departure of Muleaſſes, and with what longing the people expected their deſired king, wiſhing him without delay to repaire vnto the citie: and for a preſent ſent him a goodly Barbarian horſe, richly furniſhed, and diuers others for his other cheefe captaines. Hereupon Barbaruſſa without longer ſtay ſet forward with fiue thouſand Turks, which he had alreadie landed, and comming to the citie, was of the citiſens ioyfully receiued. But after long looking, when they could no where deſcrie Roſcetes and redoubled by the Turkes in their militarie acclamations, as they marched thorow the citie towards the caſtle; they began to diſtruſt, as the truth was, that in ſtead of their new king whom they ſo much deſired, they had receiued the Turkiſh gouernment, which they vtterly deteſted. Which ſuſpition once confirmed by certaine of Roſetes friends (whom Barbaruſſa had brought with him of purpoſe to delude the people) who grieued to ſee the ruine of their natiue countrey, ſpared not for feare of the preſent danger to tell their friends and acquaintance as they went, That they did in vaine looke for Roſcetes, whom they had left in bonds at CONSTANTINOPLE: it was a wonder to ſee, how ſuddainly the minds of the people were now fearing no ſuch matter, and were not as yet all got into the caſtle. The cheefe leader of the citiſens in this tumult, was Abdahar the Meſuar, who but a little before vpon the comming of the Turkes, by augmenting the danger, and the vnfaithfulneſſe of his ſubiects, had perſuaded Muleaſſes to flie; but now perceiuing himſelfe deceiued of his expectation for the comming of Roſcetes, and repenting of that he had done, ſought by all meanes to driue out the Turkes, and to recall Muleaſſes. And the more to animate the people, as he ſtood on high, from whence he might beſt be heard, he cried vnto them with a loud voice:

Wee are moſt villanouſly betrayed (worthy citizens) for Roſcetes, whom we expected for our lawfull king, lamenteth his miſery in chaines, in priſon at CONSTANTINOPLE: and wee, except wee preſently play the men, and valiantly fight for our liberty, ſhall for euer ſerue as ſlaues to theſe forain and I mercileſſe pyrats. The preſent danger of our eſtate telleth vs, that wee muſt preſently and without delay take the occaſion offered. Wherefore let all men that meane not to ſerue as ſlaues, and to bee bought and ſold as beaſts, take vp armes againſt the faithleſſe Turkes. I my ſelfe will be your leader: let vs therefore all with one conſent, with heart and hand reuenge this ſhamefull trechery, defend our countrey and liberty with the ancient honour and liberty of the Numidians.

There was now no time to ſtay, euery man had betaken himſelfe to his weapons; Muleaſſes was againe ſent for, who yet ſtaied in the ſuburbs, expecting what ſhould happen; many of the Turkes were ſlaine before they were aware, or feared any thing; all the citie was filled with outcries and clattering of weapons: the number of the citiſens was ſuch, as might eaſily haue expulſed the Turkes, had they beene but reaſonably armed or well conducted, which in a mat- K ter ſo ſudden, and with men altogether ignorant of ſeruice, was not poſſible. Yet they armed with furie, and encouraged with the multitude of themſelues, ſwarmed vp as thick as was poſſible one of the bulwarkes of the caſtle, which they knew was eaſieſt to bee gained, where the Turkes had ſet vp one of their enſignes; and with the multitude of their darts and arrowes ſo ouerwhelmed the Turkes, that they were glad to forſake the place, and to retire farther into the caſtle to a place of more ſtrength: from whence and all alongſt the curtaine of the wall, they without intermiſſion diſcharged their great artillerie and ſmall ſhot amongſt the thickeſt of the naked Moores making of them a wonderfull ſlaughter. Barbaruſſa although he was a man of an inuincible courage & great experience, al his life time well acquainted with deſperat dangers (the dreadfull ſteps of aſpiring minds) yet ſurpriſed with the ſuddenneſſe of the aſſault, ſhut vp L in a place whereof he yet knew not the ſtrength, and not prouided of victuall for three dayes, was with the due conſideration of theſe difficulties, not a little troubled: which his care was by the diſordered furie of his enemies, and knowne valour of his owne ſouldiers greatly deminiſhed; eſpecially when he ſaw his owne men ſtill fighting, as men full of hope and courage, and the Moores as men halfe diſmayed with the wonnds and ſlaughter of their friends, ready to retire. Howbeit, by the comming in of Muleaſſes & Dorax, the aſſault twice before giuen ouer, was Muleaſſes returned into the citie. againe at both times renewed, with no leſſe deſperate furie than at the firſt, and the Turks hardly charged. In this dangerous aſſault Halis of MALIGA, a renegate Spaniard, but a moſt expert ſouldior, turning himſelfe to to Barbaruſſa, ſaid:

If thou wilt ſaue thine honour, and hold this fort, we muſt ſallie out vpon this enemy, which hauing M neuer ſeene a ſet battell, but onely acqnainted with light skirmiſhes, will not be able to endure our charge at hand, but ſhall in a moment know the price of their fooliſh hardineſſe: who as braineſicke men could neither endure the gouernment of their cruell king, ne yet thankefully receiue the authors of their deliuerance and liberty.

This motion of the Spaniard, confirmed by the generall approbation of the chiefeſt captaines,

A taines, Barbaruſſa commanded Halis the author of that counſell, with certaine other captaines and their companions, at one inſtant to ſallie out at two ports of the caſtle: which they ſo reſolutely performed, that in ſhort time a wonderfull number of the naked Moores lay dead vpon the ground.

Abdahar the Meſuar himſelfe, was there ſhot thorow with a bullet and ſlaine: whereupon the aſſault was quite giuen ouer, the Moores retyring by companies backe into the citie, and the Turkes ſtill purſuing them: where, in the ſtreets for certaine houres, was fought a moſt cruell and bloudie battell. At laſt the citiſens ouercome, forſooke the open ſtreets, and betooke them to the refuge of their houſes; not ſo carefull of their king, as of themſelues, their wiues and children. And Halis with the reſt, wearied with the ſlaughter of his enemies, and ouercome with
B labour, heat, and thirſt, returned with victorie vnto the caſtle. It is reported that there was aboue three thouſand of the citiſens ſlain that day, and thriſe as many hurt. Muleaſſes thus diſcouraged, and vtterly deſpairing to recouer the citie; hardly eſcaped his enemies hands, by the good help of his vncle Dorax, with whom he fled ouer the riuer Bagrada, and came in ſafetie to CONSTANTINA (called of old time CYRTHA) the ancient ſeat of the Numidian kings, but then a part of Dorax his dominion; where he was honourably maintained and protected vntill the comming of Charles the emperour into AFFRICKE. The night enſuing this battell, and the flight of the king, was reſtleſſe both to the citiſens and the Turkes, each of them for feare of other ſtanding vpon their ſtrongeſt guard.

Muleaſſes flieth

The next day the citiſens diſcouraged with the loſſe of ſo many of their kinſmen and friends,
C and hauing no king now for whom they ſhould fight, craued pardon of Barbaruſſa for their raſh attempt, excuſing it by the name of loyaltie to their ancient kings; offering to ſubmit themſelues vnto him with all faithfulneſſe. Which their offer he willingly accepted, knowing that he was not able to keepe that place with his ſouldiers three daies, for lack of victuall: ſo that all his hope and victorie gotten, might eaſily be ouerthrowne and brought to nought, if the citiſens moued either with deſperation or deſire of reuenge, ſhould ioyne with the other Numidian princes, and beſiege him in the caſtle. Whereupon a generall peace was granted, and by ſolemne oath on both ſides confirmed, whereby the citiſens expreſly bound themſelues to the obedience of Solyman, and to Barbaruſſa as his lieutenant. All things thus ſet in order in the citie of TVNAS, & new magiſtrates and officers by him made, he laboured by all meanes to win vnto him the Numidi-
D an princes: which when he had eaſily brought to paſſe by gifts and rewards with thoſe needie princes, of themſelues prone enough vpon light occaſions to make or break the bonds of friendſhip, he ſent Aſan-aga an eunuch, and Halis the Spaniard with the Ianizaries, & certaine pieces of great ordinance, to take in the other cities of the kingdome of TVNES: which they in ſhort time performed, being in all places peaceably receiued, onely the citie of CARVENNA held out a while, yet afterwards for feare of further harme receiued the Turkes garriſon. But to leaue Barbaruſſa king of ALGIERS and Solymans great Admirall, thus poſſeſſed of the kingdome of TVNES; and Muleaſſes in exile at CONSTANTINA, vntill he be againe reſtored to vnto his kingdome by Charles the emperour, as ſhall be hereafter declared: let vs againe returne to the wars at the ſelfeſame time vndertaken by Solyman in perſon himſelfe in PERSIA, perſuaded thereunto

Of whom a few words, that they which ſhall hereafter liue, may in him as in others, ſee in what ſlipperie place they ſtand, and what ſmall aſſurance they haue, which forſaking God, run headlong after theſe worldly vanities, and ſwelling with the fauours of great princes, are in a moment when they leaſt feare any ſuch fall, ſuddenly ouerthrowne, and become the miſerable ſpectacles of mans fragilitie in the height of their ſuppoſed bliſſe.

F take vp the tribute children of the Chriſtians for the Turkiſh emperour. A tribute of all tributes moſt grieuous. He was of countenance amiable, of feature comely, actiue of bodie, well ſpoken, pleaſantly conceited, and ſharpe of wit: ſo that he in ſhorter time than was thought poſſible, to the admiration of many, learned both to ſpeake and write the Arabian tongue, and other languages vſed in the Turkes court, and could skilfully play vpon ſundrie kinds of inſtruments. And being yet a boy, ſerued Scanderbaſſa, a man of great authoritie and power, in the time time of Selymus the emperour, in whose seruice he was instructed in the Mahometane religion; but giuing himselfe to all manner of curiositie and neatnesse, he was wonderfully fauoured by the great ladie his mistresse, and by her commended to her husband Scanderbassa, as a fit page to attemper his melancholly and wayward disposition, with his pleasant conceits and deuises. Wherein the Tetricall Bassa finding him to excell, gaue him as a rare gift to Solyman the sonne of Selymus, his grandfather Baiazet yet liuing: who tooke in him such pleasure, that the old emperour caused him to be brought vp in the court, in all princely qualities with Solyman (who was of like yeares vnto him) as his companion and playfellow. Where he so framed himselfe vnto the yong prince his disposition in all points, that he was of him alwaies exceedingly beloued, and afterwards promoted to all the honours of the court, and made one of the Bassaes; giuing vnto him in marriage the onely daughter and heire of Scanderbassa, his master then dead, with an exceeding great dowrie. And after that, made him Gouernour of CAIRE: where hee had not long remained, but he was againe sent for to the court, as the man which gaue thereunto life, without whose companie Solyman was as one halfe dead. At length he made him Vesier, which is the chiefe of all the Bassaes, and president of his counsell, the greatest honour in the Turkish empire next vnto the emperour himselfe. And to honour him yet more, he deliuered him his priuat signet, wherwith the Turkish emperours neuer vsed to trust any but themselues: he might at his pleasure, grace, and disgrace whom he would, in court or elsewhere. What he commaunded, was done: and whatsoeuer he did, was taken for well done. He might without the emperours knowledge giue any office, yea the gouernment of whole countries and prouinces, vnto his fauourites: his credit with the emperour was so great, that hee did what he list, and no man durst presume to aske any reason why. And to say all at once, he wanted nothing of the maiestie of an emperour, but the name onely; in steed whereof he was commonly called the Great Commander of all the emperours forces. His house in CONSTANTINOPLE was of all other most stately, wherein was daily to be seene such a multitude of his gallant followers, and such a world of wealth and royall furniture, as that it might be worthely compared with the pallace of a great prince. Neither was he partaker of Solymans connsailes in his waightie matters of state onely, but of his secret delights and pleasures also; if he were present all was well, if he were away nothing pleased: to be short, he so possessed this great emperour, that men commonly said, The soule of Solyman liued in Abraham. Whereat many of the great men of the court secretly repined; but especially Solymans mother, and Roxulana his faire concubine, whom of all women hee held dearest. His liuely and maiesticall countenance thou maiest here behold.

Beware that by their wily drifts thou periſh not therefore.

Abraham Baſſa perſuadeth Soly man to make war vpon the Perſians.

This great Commaunder, which might at all times be bold to ſpeake what he thought vnto Solyman, ſought many times in his priuat diſcourſes betwixt them two, to perſuade him to forbeare to vſe his forces any farther againſt the Chriſtians, ouer whom he had ſufficiently alreadie triumphed, and to turne them vpon the Perſians by whom he was daily iniured. Alleadging
F vnto him, that the Germans were a ſtrong and warlike people; who as they both in language and manners differed from the Hungarians, ſo were they alwaies at variance with them, and therefore much cared not though they were by him ſubdued: but if he ſhould begin to inuade any part of their countrey, he ſhould then ſoone ſee that inuincible nation with their vnited forces, vp in armes readie to make ſtrong reſiſtance. And to prouoke Charles the emperour (of all the Chriſtian princes the mightieſt) were not good, who of himſelfe was able to bring into the field field moſt puiſſant armies of valiant ſouldiours out of his owne dominions: beſide the wonder- G

full concourſe of moſt reſolute men out of all parts of Chriſtendome, which would not ſpare to lay downe their liues at his feet in that warre, which was of them accounted moſt religious. Yea what ſtrength both of horſe and foote might bee raiſed and brought to the battell by the two brethren Charles and Ferdinand, onely might (as he ſaid) euen then be plainely perceiued, when as they valiantly defended VIENNA, beſieged by vs with great power. Neither did Charles afterward, as it ſeemed, and as the Chriſtians commonly vaunt, feare to haue aduentured the fortune of a maine battell with you: who although I doubt not but hee ſhould haue beene ouercome by you ſo great a monarch with ſo puiſſant an army, a thing peculiar to your good fortune; yet I cannot deny, but that victorie againſt ſuch expert and reſolute ſouldiers, ſo ſtrongly armed as their manner is, muſt haue beene bought with a great deale of our bloud. Theſe things in my opinion may reaſonably perſuade you H to let the Chriſtians alone, by ciuile warres to weaken one another, that ſo afterwards they may become a prey vnto vs without any danger of ours. So that in my iudgement the Perſian warre is to bee taken in hand, rather then the warres in GERMANIE, and eſpecially for that you haue ſufficiently enlarged the bounds of your Empire VVeſtward: which you haue extended euen vnto nations very farre diſtant. So that it is now a great matter to defend ſo much as you haue already gotten, and therefore partly for the difficulty of the defending thereof, and partly vpon an honourable contempt, according to the infinite bounty of your heroycall inclination, haue thought good to beſtow whole kingdomes vpon ſtrangers, yea halfe your enemies. Wherefore how much more glorious ſhall it be now vpon iuſt occaſion to ſeeke for that which ioyneth vnto your owne confines; and may therefore eaſily bee vnited vnto your owne empire: if you according to the example of your grandfather and father ſhall force your ſelfe to I driue that accurſed and abominable race of Iſmaell out of ASIA. For it ſhall bee a great glorie vnto the name of the Othoman Kings for euer, if you ſhall after your wonted manner zealouſly reſpect the cauſe of religion: a worke of incomparable fame, if the authors of a moſt deteſtable ſuperſtition ſhall by you bee chaſed quite out ASIA. For what more iuſt or honourable cauſe can there bee to make warre, than to profeſſe your ſelfe the defender of the diuine precepts of our great Prophet Mahomet, againſt the wicked and irreligious impugners thereof? And by the way to reuenge and vtterly to deſtroy the capitall enemies of your Auncеſtours; which was the laſt prayer of your Father Selymus. Can you endure them which rule ſo inſolently, that they account euery one that is neere them their enemies and prey, and dare alſo with their pilfering inuaſions prouoke your ſelfe, liuing contented within the bounds of your owne Empire in Peace both in EVROPE and ASIA? and they (forſooth) ſuch as haue by moſt horrible wrong crept into the royall ſeat of the moſt lawfull and noble Kings deſcended of the bloud of Vſun-Caſſanes? who after their wonted manner ſtill liue by raipne and robbberie? Beleeue me noble emperour, if you ſhall vpon a zeale to your religion with your victorius hand take away this ſtaine and plague of ASIA, there ſhall vndoubtedly be erected vnto you ſo glorious and magnificent a trophie in the middeſt of PERSIA, as may be compared, yea preferred before the triumphs of your victorious father Selymus. For it is not ſo much to haue deſtroyed the Mamalukes (by condition ſlaues) and the proud Sultans of ÆGYPT and SIRIA, as to haue ſubdued the Perſians, famous in antient time for their martiall proweſſe, who ſo oftentimes vanquiſhed by Alexander of MACEDOM gaue vnto him the name of Great. Solyman prickt forward with many ſuch K diſcourſes, dayly ſounded in his eares by the Baſſa, began to yeeld to his perſuaſion. Whereof L Abraham in himſelfe greatly reioiced: for it was thought of many, that he did neuer in heart renounce the Chriſtian religion, but was only in outward ſhew a Turke, and in heart a Chriſtian. Which was the rather coniectured, for that he maruellouſly fauoured and protected the Chriſtian marchants, furthered by all meanes the leagues of the Chriſtian princes with Solyman, and laboured alwaies to turne his forces from them vpon the Perſians. And the more to whet him forward, the Baſſa had cunningly inſinuated into his acquaintance one Mulearabe of DAMASCO, a man at that time famous in CONSTANTINOPLE, for the opinion the people had generally conceiued of his holineſſe and profound knowledge in the ſecret cauſes of things, and the art of Magicke; vſing him as a prophet to fill the ambitious mind of Solyman, with aſſured hope M of proſperous ſucceſſe: which thing the hypocriticall wiſard, after the manner of ſuch deceiuers, ſlily performed, propheſying vnto him all happineſſe in ſo religious a warre, and ſo much (as he ſaid) pleaſing God. This the Baſſaes purpoſe was much furthered alſo by Vlemas, a noble and valiant Perſian, who hauing married the great Perſian king Tamas his ſiſter, was reuolted from him to Solyman, fearing to be called to account for the extorſion wherewith he had greeuouſly

oppreſſed

A oppreſſed the countries whereof hee had the gouernment: and being wonderfully countenanced in Solymans court by the great Baſſa, did after the maner of diſloyall fugitiues perſwade Solyman by all meanes he could to take that war in hand, diſcouering vnto him the power, ſtrength and ſtate of the Perſian kingdome (which he could well doe) and plotting vnto him the eaſieſt way for the conquering thereof, offering alſo vnto him the vttermoſt of his deuoire. So Solyman filled with the vaine hope of the conqueſt of PERSIA, yeelded fully vnto the perſwaſions of the great Baſſa, and gaue out his commiſſions into all parts of his empire for the raiſing of a mighty army for the performance of ſo great an enterpriſe, commanding all his captaines and men of warre to be ready at the citie of NICE in BYTHINIA at a certaine day appointed. Which his purpoſe, although it was mightily impugned by his mother, and faire Roxalana his beſt beloued, as Solyman reſolueth to goe againſt the Perſians.

B that which altogether proceeded from the Baſſa: the one alleadging with what euill ſucceſſe his grandfather and father had before him attempted that ſame war; the other aſſailing him with her paſſionate affections: but both of them indeed repining at the credit of the Baſſa, & in their harts diſdaining that ſo great a monarch ſhould at the pleaſure of his ſeruant be led vp and down the world ſo farre from their company: for which cauſe they did what in them lay to haue ouerthrowne the purpoſe of Abraham, and to haue altered Solymans former determination. But ſo ſtrong was the Baſſaes credit with his great lord and maſter, that all theſe great ladies deuiſes and prayers were as womens affectionate paſſions reiected, and the Baſſaes counſell (to their no ſmall greefe) in all things regarded.

Abrahams credit maligned by Solymans mother and Roxalana.

The time appointed being come, and all things in readineſſe, Solyman ſent Abraham the

C Baſſa, and Vlemas the Perſian before him into SYRIA with a ſtrong armie, to bee readie with the firſt of the Spring to inuade the Perſian king. Which thing the Baſſa gladly tooke vpon him, and comming into SYRIA, wintered with his armie at ALEPPO: whither Barbaruſſa came vnto him for his letters of credence to Solyman, as is before declared. The Spring now approching, Abraham ſent Vlemas the fugitiue Perſian prince before him with the light horſemen, the fore-runners of his army, into MESOPOTAMIA as his guide, becauſe the countrey was vnto him beſt knowne; following not farre after himſelfe with all his armie. And marching ſtill forward in that manner, came at length without reſiſtance vnto the famous citie of TAVRIS in ARMENIA the greater, called in auncient time ECBATHANA, as is probably by ſome coniectured: a great and rich citie, but vnwalled and of no ſtrength; where the Perſian kings (for the pleaſant-

From whence Tamas the Perſian king was as then abſent, buſied in warres with Kezzel-baſſa, a prince of the Coraſine Hircanians: ſo that the citizens of TAVRIS, deſtitute of all helpe, yeelded themſelues and the citie vnto the Baſſa at his firſt comming. Tamas the Perſian king vnderſtanding what was happened at TAVRIS, drew neere with his power, warily expecting to haue taken the Turkes at ſome aduantage, and ſo by pollicie to haue defeated his enemies, whom hee was too weake to meete with in plaine battell. Which thing the warie Baſſa well perceiuing, for more aſſurance, by ſpeedy courrors aduertiſed Solyman of the taking of TAVRIS, and of the enemies purpoſe, requeſting him with all ſpeed to repaire with his army to TAVRIS. Solyman was then come farre on his way with a ſtrong army, not by the way of ANCYRA, SEBASTIA,

The city of Tauris yeelded to the Baſſa.

But hearing ſuch newes as is aforeſaid from the Baſſa, hee doubled his march, and ſo in ſhort time after came and joyned his forces with the Baſſa at TAVRIS. Tamas who yet daily expected the comming of the Georgian light horſemen, vnderſtanding that Solyman was comming againſt him with a world of men, thought it not good to abide the comming of ſo puiſſant an enemy, but with delay to weary him out that drew ſuch a multitude of people after him; and by taking of him at all aduantages, to cut off his people

Wherefore Tamas to ſhun the comming of Solyman, retired further off into SVLTANIA, about ſix daies iourney from TAVRIS. Whereof Solyman hauing knowledge, departed from that rich citie without doing any harme therein, following after Tamas into SVLTANIA to ioine battell with him if he could poſſible: leauing behind him for haſt, a great part of his carriages and baggage, with fiue hundred Ianizaries, and three of his Sanzacks with their companies. The citie of SVLTANIA was in ancient time one of the royall ſeats of the Perſian kings, but ruinated by the Scythian Tamerlane, retained no ſhew of the ancient maieſtie, but only in the churches by him ſpared. Neere vnto this citie Solyman lay encamped many daies, expecting that the Perſian king (in reuenge of the iniurie to him done, and for the ſafegard of his honour) ſhould at length come out of the mountains, and ſhew himſelfe in plaine field, and giue him battel: Which was a thing ſo farre from Tamas his reſolution, vpon the due comparing of his owne ſtrength with his enemies, that he retired in ſuch ſort, that Solyman could by no means learn what was become of him, or which way to follow him.

The countrie neere vnto the citie of SVLTANIA wherein Solyman lay encamped at large, is on euerie ſide enuironed with hugie mountaines, whoſe tops are to be ſeene a far off, alwaies couered with deepe ſnow: theſe mountaines were in auncient time called NYPHATES, CASPIVS, COATHRAS, and ZAGRVS, taking their beginning no doubt of CAVCASVS the father of mountaines; and ioining one to another, ſome one way, ſome another, doe diuide moſt large and wide countries. Whileſt Solyman in thoſe plaine fields moſt fit to fight a battell in, expected the comming of Tamas, ſuch a horrible and cruell tempeſt (as the like wherof the Perſians had neuer before ſeene at that time of the yeare) fell downe from thoſe mountaines; which was ſo much the more ſtrange, for that it fell in the beginning of September: with ſuch aboundance of raine, which froſe ſo eagerly as it fell, that it ſeemed the depth of Winter had euen then of a ſudden been come in: for ſuch was the rage of the bluſtring winds, ſtriuing with themſelues as if it had beene for victorie, that they ſwept the ſnow from off the tops of thoſe high mountaines, and caſt it downe into the plaines in ſuch aboundance, that the Turks lay as men buried aliue in the deepe ſnow, moſt part of their tents being ouerthrowne and beaten downe to the ground with the violence of the tempeſt and waight of the ſnow, wherein a wonderfull number of ſicke ſouldiors and others of the baſer ſort which followed the campe periſhed, and many others were ſo benummed, ſome their hands, ſome their feet, that they loſt the vſe of them for euer: moſt part of their beaſts which they vſed for carriage, but eſpecially their camels, were frozen to death. Yea Solyman himſelfe was in great danger to haue beene ouerwhelmed in his tent, all the tents round about him being ouerthrowne with the violence of the tempeſt. Neither was there any remedie to be found for ſo great miſchiefes, by reaſon of the helliſh darkneſſe of that tempeſtuous night, moſt of their fires being put out by the extremitie of the ſtorm: which did not a little terrifie the ſuperſtitious Turks as a thing accounted of them ominous. And that which troubled them no leſſe than the miſeries of the tempeſt, was the fear of the enemie, whoſe ſudden comming they deadly feared: vntil that after ſo tedious a night, the Sunne breaking out the next morning, with his cheerfull beames reuiued many before readie to giue vp the ghoſt for cold, and gaue comfort to them all in generall, by diſcouering the open fields cleere of their feared enemies. It was a dreadfull thing to haue ſeene what miſerie that one night had brought into the Turks campe: the ground lay almoſt couered with bodies of the dead; and many liued, but ſo, as that they accounted the dead more happie than themſelues. Many of the Turkes vainly thought, that horrible tempeſt was brought vpon them by the charmes and inchantments of the Perſian Magicians; whereas it was vndoubtedly, by the hand of him which bringeth the proud deuiſes of princes to naught.

Solymans armie diſtreſſed with tempeſt.

Solyman troubled as well with the ſtrangenes of the accident, as the loſſe he had receiued, after he had a little refreſhed his diſcouraged ſoldiors, riſe with his armie & tooke his way on the left hand into ASSYRIA: Vlemas the Perſian perſuading him thereunto for many cauſes, but eſpecially by putting him in hope of the taking of BABYLON; for that Mahometes a friend of his, was gouernour thereof. But he when the matter came to proofe, was not to be woon either by promiſe or reward to betray the citie. Wherefore Solyman reſolued to take it by force, neither did his his fortune faile him therein: for as ſoone as Mahometes vnderſtood that Vlemas was at hand with the forerunners of the Turks army, and that Solyman with all his power was comming after, who as he thought would neuer haue come ſo farre (he not prouided to withſtand ſo mightie an enemy, and not beloued of the citiſens) fledde out of the citie. Solyman comming, in ſhort time after was of the Babylonians receiued without reſiſtance. The citie of BABYLON commonly called BAGDAT, riſe out of the ruines of the old citie of BABYLON, ſo much ſpoken of in holy writ: from whence it is not farre diſtant, ſtanding vpon the riuer Tygris, which not far beneath falleth into the riuer Euphrates. In this famous city is the ſeat of the great Caliph, the chief Mahometane prieſt, whom all the Mahometane princes haue in great reuerence, & hath an olde prerogatiue in the choiſe and confirmation of the kings of ASSIRIA, and the Sultans of ÆGYPT: of which Caliph, Solyman according to the olde ſuperſtitious manner, receiued at his hands the enſignes and ornaments of the Aſſyrian kings, and with great bounty woon the hearts of the people: and thereupon reſolued to ſpend that Winter there, billiting his army in diuers places of that fertill countrey. The other cities of ASSIRIA and MESOPOTAMIA alſo, namely CARALMIDA, MEREDINVM, ORSA, and ASANCESA, hearing that Solyman had without reſiſtance taken BABYLON, yeelded themſelues and receiued his garriſons. Yea the fame thereof was ſo great, that embaſſadors came vnto him as farre as ORMVS, a citie in the mouth of Euphrates, where it falleth into the Perſian gulfe, famous for the great traffique out of INDIA thither ſuing vnto him for peace. Thus the ancient citie of BABYLON with the great Countries of ASSIRIA and MESOPOTAMIA, ſometimes famous kingdomes of themſelues, and lately part of the Perſian kingdome, fell into the hands of the Turkes, and became Prouinces of the Turkiſh empire in the yeare 1534. Where Solyman after he had ſpent that Winter in great joy and triumph, according to the manner of the Turkiſh gouernment, placed a great Commander, which they by a proud name call the Beglerbeg (which is as much as to ſay, the lord of lords) & vnder him diuers others for the gouernment of theſe countries, by parts, which they call Sanzacks, who are euer at the commaund of the Beglerbeg. the beſt citizens and beautifull perſonages of all ſort and condition, at his departure thence carried away captiues. Solyman contenting himſelfe to haue done the Perſian king this diſgrace in ſpoiling this his rich and roiall citie, returned againe towards MESOPOTAMIA, deſtroying the countries all the way as he went, killing the verie beaſts and cattell, thereby the more to impouerish the Perſians, wiſhing to leaue nothing vnto them but penurie & miſerie. He was ſcarcely paſt COIM and the Calderan fields, famous for his fathers victorie againſt Hyſmaell, but that certaine troups of the Perſian horſmen were in the taile of his armie, and had taken away ſome of his baggage, and ſlaine diuers of the ſicke and ſtragling ſouldiors; and with their often skirmiſhes did not a little trouble his whole armie. Beſides that, it was noiſed thorow all his camp, That Tamas himſelfe was comming after him with a great power of horſemen, taken vp in HIBERIA, ALBANIA, PARTHIA, MEDIA, and ARMENIA, and would beat their backes before they could get out of ARMENIA: for which cauſe, he appointed the two great Baſſaes of CAIRE and SYRIA (for ſo they were called) and Vlemas the Perſian with eighteene thouſand good ſouldiors to follow him in the rearward of his armie, to receiue and repreſſe the ſuddaine aſſaults of the Perſians, if need ſhould require: and ſo ſtill kept on his march, vntill he was come to AMIDA, now called CARAEMIDA, an ancient citie of MESOPOTAMIA. In the meane time, Tamas the Perſian king was returned to TAVRIS with a mightie armie, in hope there to haue ſuddenly ſurpriſed his enemie, ſurcharged with the pleaſures of ſo rich a citie: but finding him gone, and beholding the miſerable ſpoile and deſolation he had made in the citie; moued with indignation, he reſolued to purſue him whether ſoeuer he were gone, and was now on his way as farre as COIM. Where vnderſtanding that Solyman was gone ſo farre before, that he was hardly to be ouertaken; and finding the noble gentlemen in his armie, vnwilling in their heauie armour to vndertake ſuch a purſuit, as could not be performed without the wonderfull toile of themſelues, and moſt aſſured loſſe of their goodly horſes, alleaging that they were prouided to fight a battell, and not to trauell ſo long a iourney (all which Tamas now that his choller was ouer, knew to ſtand with good reaſon) he changed his former determination, thinking it beſt there to ſtay, and not to follow the purſuit of his enemies any further: vntill that Delimenthes one of his noble men, alwaies more forward than the reſt, offered with fiue thouſand choſen horſemen to ouertake ſome part of the Turkes armie, and to do on them ſome good ſeruice. Which his offer Tamas gladly accepted, commending him greatly for the ſame, promiſing him moſt honourable reward: and ſo in haſt ſent him away.

Delimenthes with 5000 Perſians purſueth the Turkes.

He forthwith taking the well knowne and neereſt way, vſed ſuch expedition, that he was in hope to ouertake the rearward of the Turks armie (marching not farre now before him) about the foot of the mountaine TAVRVS, as in deed it fell out, at a place called BETHLIS. This BETHLIS is a famous towne in the confines of the Perſian kingdome, where it bordereth vpon MESOPOTAMIA, ſtanding in a pleaſant valley, by which runneth a little riuer falling out of the mountaine ANTITAVRVS; and had a caſtle kept with a garriſon of Perſians, In this valley, the two Baſſaes of CAIRE and SYRYA conducted by Vlemas, thinking they had now beene paſt all danger of the enemies purſuit, ſtayed with the rereward of his armie to refreſh their wearied ſouldiours, vpon certaine knowledge, that Solyman with the reſt of his armie was alreadie come in ſafetie to AMIDA in MESOPOTAMIA; and therefore lay as men ſecure without any ſuſpition of the comming of the Perſians, whom they had not ſo much as heard any thing of in long time before. But Delimenthes vſing moſt faithfull and diligent eſpials of that countrie people, by that time he was come within one daies iourney of BETHLIS, vnderſtood certainely where the Turkes lay, wearie of their long trauell, as men without feare, keeping little or no watch in their campe: Whereupon he determined in the dead time of the night following, to aſſaile them in their camp: and by ſecret meſſengers gaue knowledge both of his comming, and of this his purpoſe to the captaine of the caſtle of BETHLIS, requeſting him at an appointed houre vpon ſigne giuen, to be readie to ſallie out with his garriſon vpon that ſide of the Turkes campe which was towards the caſtle. Which his venturous deſignment was ſo furthered both by the darkneſſe of the night, and the aboundance of raine which fel at the ſame time, as if it had beene wiſhed for; that he was got with all his reſolute followers within the Turkes campe, before they were aware of his comming: where the Perſian ſouldiours, as wolues amongſt ſheepe, did ſuch ſpeedie execution amongſt the ſleepie Turkes, that the two great Baſſaes and Vlemas, had much adoe to get to horſe and ſaue themſelues by flight. And ſuch was the furie of the Perſians, Delimethes aſſaileth the Turks campe by night, and maketh a great ſlaughter.

A ſians, and the greatneſſe of the ſudden feare encreaſed by the darkeneſſe of the night, that the Turkes not knowing which way to turne themſelues, or what to doe, were ſlaine by thouſands, ſome ſleeping, ſome halfe waking, ſome making themſelues ready to fight, and ſome to flie, few of all that great armie eſcaped the ſword of the Perſians. Of the fiue great Sanzackes which were in the armie, three were ſlaine, and one taken. Eight hundred Ianizaries ſeeing themſelues forſaken of their cheefetaines, laid downe their harquebuſiers and other weapons, and yeelded themſelues vpon Delimenthes his word. The fierce mountaine people alſo, who in former time had ſuffered great iniuries of the Turkes, after the death of Aladeules their king, had now ioyned themſelues to the Perſians, and notably reuenged their wrongs; to whoſe ſhare all the bag-
B gage of the Turks campe fell for a prey. It might then well haue bin ſaid of the Turks which the Poet ſpeaketh of the night wherein TROY was ſackt:

Quis cladem illius noctis qui funera fando explicet?——

The ſlaughter of that night was ſuch, as that it is of the Turkes vntill this day accounted amongſt their greateſt loſſes; and the victorie ſo welcome to the Perſians, that in memoriall thereof they kept that day (which was the thirteenth of October) as one of their ſolemne holidaies for many yeares after. Delymenthes returning all bloudie with the ſlaughter of the Turkes, and loaded with their ſpoiles, was of Tamas ioyfully receiued and honourably rewarded.

This ouerthrow reported to Solyman by the two great Baſſaes and Vlemas, as men that had Solyman diſcouraged.
C hardly eſcaped ſhipwrecke, ſo daunted his proud conceits, that he reſolued in himſelfe to return home, and no farther to proſecute that vnfortunate war: the euill euent whereof his mother (as he ſaid) had more truely preſaged, than had the cold prophet Mulearabe; but ſecretly in mind diſpleaſed with Abraham the great Baſſa, by whoſe perſuaſion he had taken in hand that dangerous expedition. By the way as hee went he was met at ICONIVM by Barbaruſſa and Sinan Baſſa, ſurnamed the Iew, a man for his skill at ſea in reputation next vnto Barbaruſſa. Theſe two great perſonages lately come from ALGIERS to CONSTANTINOPLE with the remainder of his fleet, met him ſo farre by land, to ſhew their ioyfulneſſe for the conqueſt hee had made of D MESOPOTAMIA and ASSIRIA, and to excuſe themſelues for the loſſe of the kingdome of TVNES; which woon by Barbaruſſa in the beginning of the Perſian warre, was before the ending thereof againe wrung out of his hands by Charles the emperour, and reſtored to Muleaſſes, as ſhal be hereafter declared. They with great humilitie declared vnto him the whole proceſſe of that warre, and with what ſucceſſe they had endured the force of Charles the emperour himſelfe in perſon: ſhewing plainely vnto him, that there wanted neither valour in the ſouldiors, nor direction in them the commanders, but only fortune, which as it mightily raigneth in all mens actions, ſo eſpecially in matters of war. Solyman gratiouſly accepted of their excuſe, & courteouſly tooke them vp, proſtrate at his feet, commending them for their valour in their euill haps, in a plot ſo well by them laid, more than he did the victorie of others, got by good fortune, not grounded vpon any good reaſon: willing them to be of good cheere, ſaying, That he would in ſhort time find occaſion for them to recompence that diſgrace, & againe to ſhew their approued valour. After long trauell he came to the ſtrait of Boſphorus, where Abraham the Baſſa go-
E ing before him, had in ſigne of triumph cauſed the ſhore all alongſt the place where he ſhould go abourd the gally prouided for his tranſportatiõ, to be couered with Perſian ſilk for him to tread vpon: from whence he paſſed with much triumph ouer to his pallace to CONSTANTINOPLE.

Enuie, the fatall and cruell companion of princes immoderat fauours, had with her prying eies quickly diſcouered in court Solymans changed countenance vpon the great Baſſa, & began now to ſhew her gaſtly face. They which before were moſt readie to do him all the honour poſſible, yea to haue laied their hands vnder his feet, ſought now by all ſecret meanes to worke his diſgrace and confuſion. But of all others, the two great ladies, Solymans mother, and the faire Roxolana ceaſed not by dayly complaints to incenſe Solyman againſt him: the mother, for that
F he had by his perſuaſion, contrarie to her mind and her ſuperſtitious obſeruations drawne her ſonne into the dangers of the Perſian war: and Roxolana, for that he moſt honoured and ſought the perferment of Muſtapha, Solymans eldeſt ſonne by another woman; whereas ſhee aboue all things laboured by all ſubtill meanes to preferre Baiazet her owne ſonne to the empire, after the death of Solyman his father: Which her deſignement ſhe perceiued to be much croſſed by the credit which the Baſſa had with her Solyman, and therefore did what ſhe might both to bring him out of fauour, and to worke his deſtruction. But that which moſt empaired his credit with Solyman, was the common report raiſed of him by his enemies, That he being in heart a Chriſtian, did in all things fauour the Chriſtians (a thing moſt odious among the Turks) and had for that cauſe craftily perſwaded Solyman to take in hand the vnfortunat Perſian war. And that which more encreaſed the ſuſpition, was, That he about that time had cauſed one Marke Nicholas, a Venetian marchant (who had not without the ſuſpition of ſome oftentimes come vnto him with letters and ſecret meſſages whileſt he lay at BABYLON) to be taken in the night, and murdered at CONSTANTINOPLE, and caſt into the ſea, becauſe he ſhould not diſcouer any thing that might be hurtfull vnto him. Abraham thus brought in diſgrace with Solyman, was (after the manner of the Turkiſh tyrannie) bid to a ſolemne ſupper in the court about the fourteenth of March, after which time he was neuer more ſeene. It is reported, that after ſupper Solyman fell into a great rage with him, charging him bitterly, That he had miſgouerned the ſtate, inuerted his treaſures to his own priuat, and as a traitor, had ſecret intelligence with the Chriſtian princes his enemies: for proofe wherof, Solyman with ſterne countenance ſhewed him his owne letters, which had by chance been intercepted, oftentimes asking him in furious maner, If he knew not that hand, if he knew not that ſeale. All which the Baſſa lying proſtrate at his feet, humbly confeſſed, and with many teares craued of him pardon. But his hard heart was not by any prayers to be mooued: for the ſame night as he was ſlumbring vpon a pallat in the court, ouercome with heauineſſe, an eunuch cut his throat with a crooked knife, which Solyman for that purpoſe had deliuered vnto him with his owne hand. He was murthered ſleeping, becauſe Solyman had in former time of his fauour ſolemnly ſworne vnto him, That he would neuer kill him whileſt he liued. By which oath the great Mahometane prieſt ſaid, he was not ſo bound, but that he might kill him ſleeping, for as much as men by ſleepe depriued of ſence, are for that time not to be accounted as liuing but as dead, mans life conſiſting altogether (as he ſaid) in liuely actions. It is reported, that after Solyman had looked vpon the dead body, & bitterly curſed the ſame, he cauſed a great weight to be tied vnto it, and ſo caſt into the ſea. His treaſure and goods, which were almoſt infinit, were the next day all ſeiſed vpon for the emperour, and a ſmall portion thereof appointed for his poore wife to liue vpon. His death was no ſooner known, but that the vulgar people deuiſed of him infamous ſongs and ſlaunderous reports, as of a traitor moſt iuſtly condemned: and in further deſpight, with ſtones and mire defaced the trophies of the Hungarian victorie, which he had in moſt ſtately manner erected before his ſumptuous houſe in CONSTANTINOPLE. This was the wofull end of Abraham the great Baſſa, who whileſt he ſtood in fauour with his prince, was of all others accounted moſt fortunat, wanting nothing but the name of the great Sultan: but after falling into diſgrace, became the ſcorne of fortune, and the lamentable ſpectacle of mans fragilitie. He was murthered the 15 day of March in the yeare 1536.

Abraham Baſſa murdered in the court by the cõmandement of Solyman.

How the kingdome of TVNES was by Barbaruſſa (the Turkes great admirall) taken from Muleaſſes, we haue alreadie told: but how the ſame was againe taken from him by Charles the emperour a little before the returne of Solyman out of PERSIA, remaineth now to be declared. It was commonly reported, and not without iuſt cauſe feared, that Barbaruſſa, poſſeſſed of the kingdome of TVNES, and ſupported by the power of Solyman, would the next Summer, not content himſelfe with the ſpoile of the coaſts of SPAINE, SARDINIA, and ITATIE, as he had in former time, but with all his forces inuade SICILIA, the garnerie and ſtorehouſe of ITALIE: and from thence attempt the conqueſt of the kingdome of NAPLES, which it was thought he in his immoderat deſires had longed much after. To repreſſe this his barbarous inſolencie, and to worke the ſafetie of the frontiers of the Chriſtian kingdomes (much ſubiect to the rapines of the Turkiſh pyrats) Charles the emperour reſolued in perſon himſelfe with a puiſſant armie to paſſe ouer into AFFRICKE, whileſt Solyman was yet buried in the Perſian wars, and by force of armes to diſpoſſeſſe the pyrat of his new gotten kingdome in TVNES. For the accompliſhment whereof, he cauſed ſouldiours to be leuied in all parts of SPAINE, and came downe to BARCELONA with eight thouſand footmen and ſeuen hundred horſemen, farre ſooner than was by any man expected: amongſt whom were many of the nobilitie of SPAINE, with their followers moſt gallantly appointed: but eſpecially Ferdinand of TOLEDO, duke of ALBA, whoſe forwardneſſe in that honourable action, with the deſire he had to reuenge the death of his father Garzias, ſlain before b ythe Moores at GIRAPOLIS, gaue great hope euen them vnto his countriemen, That he would

The cauſes which moued Charles the emperor to inuade Tunes.

The emperours great preparations for the inuaſion of Tunes.

A would in time prooue a worthie chiefetaine, as indeed he afterward did.

In the meane time Andrew Auria the great Admirall, vnto whom onely for his approoued fidelitie and long experience the emperour had fully communicated what he had with himselfe before purposed, had with wonderfull diligence and celeritie rigged vp a great fleet of ships and gallies, so furnished with all manner of warlike prouision, as might well haue suffised a great armie: whereunto he ioyned also his owne fleet of seuenteen gallies and three galeasses, wherein he had embarked the flower of GENVA and LIGVRIA, who with exceeding cheerfulnesse had voluntarily offered themselues to follow him their old Generall in that sacred expedition. With this great preparation Auria came to the emperour at BARCELONA: Thether came also Lewes the king of Portingals brother (whose sister Isabell, Charles the emperour had married) with
B fiue and twentie Carauels, ships which the Portingals vsed in their Indian voyages, amongst whom was also one huge Galeon; all ships well appointed and fit for seruice, wherein were embarked two thousand Portingals, beside marriners: there also arriued sixtie saile of tall ships sent out of FLANDERS and the low countries, wherein were a great number of condemned persons, whose liues was spared that they might serue in the gallies: Vnto this warre Paulus the third of that name, then bishop of ROME, sent ten gallies vnder the conduct of Virginius Vrsinus: the Great Master of MALTA sent thither his fleet also. At the same time that all this preparation was in making in other places, that worthie chiefetaine Alphonsus Danalus Vastius, whom the emperour had appointed Generall of all his forces at land, had by the emperours commaundement taken vp fiue thousand new souldiors in ITALIE, which were led by Hieronymus Tutauilla, countie of SARNE, Federicke, Caracte, and Augustina Spinula, all famous captaines. The old Spanish garrisons which lay in LOMBARDIE, the emperour commaunded to be straightly looked vnto, that none of them should leaue their places to go into this new expedition, but to remaine there still vnder their Generall Antonius Leua: which worthy captaine although hee would faine haue had him with him, as of all his greatest commanders the best; yet he thought it good to spare him, both for that he was much troubled with the gout, and also for that it was necessary, as he thought, to leaue such a valiant captaine with his garrisons in that countrey, so neere vnto the French and Swissers, whom he durst not so well trust as to disfurnish that countrey either of so great a commander, or of the wonted garrisons. At the same time Maximilian Eberstein, and old commander, came to Vastius with eight thousand Germans, D ouer the Tridentine Alpes to MILLAINE, and so to GENVA; amongst whom were diuers noble gentlemen, who then as voluntary men serued of their owne charges. With these Germanes and the fiue thousand Italians, Vastius embarked himselfe at the port called PORTVS VENERIS, in LIGVRIA: hauing before perswaded them with patience to endure the tediousnesse of the sea, and to comfort themselues with the hope of the victorie in AFFRICKE; where they should fight in the quarrel of God, and for the emperour, who did neuer forget his religious and valiant souldiors. So sailing alongst the coast of ITALLIE, hee came to NAPLES, where the viceroy and diuers other of the nobilitie had of their owne charges, euery man according to his deuotion or abilitie, built or furnished some one gallie, some moe, for that seruice. It was a wonder to see with what cheerefulnesse the gallants and lusty youths of NAPLES, and all that part of
E ITALIE, came and offered themselues vnto Vastius, so that it seemed there was none left behinde in NAPLES: for he had with singular courtesie so woon the hearts of the old soldiors and lustie youths of that kingdome, that both the one and the other thought it a most honourable thing to adorne, the one their before deserued pensions, and the other their first entrance into martiall affaires, with the participation of so notable a victory. But whilest euery man was thus busied in setting forward, certaine mutinous souldiours (weary of the sea, and fearing the dangers of so long a voyage) began to cast many perils, to find fault with their small wages, and to discourage the multitude, perswading them with seditious speeches to forsake their colours, & to run away: for redresse whereof, Vastius caused the authors of that mutiny to be taken and thrust into sacks, F and in the sight of the whole fleet to be cast into the sea. So Vastius departing with his fleet from NAPLES, came in few daies to PALERMO in SICILIE. The emperor also loosing from BARCELONA, came to the port of MAGO in the Island of MINORICA, and from thence to CARALIS in SARDINIA, whether Alphonsus Vastius was a little before come with all his fleet out of SICILIE. Not long after the emperour, now that all his forces were come together, passed ouer from SARDINIA into AFFRICKE, and with a faire Westerly wind put into the port of

of VTICA, which is of the ſeafaring men called FARINA. In the entring whereof the admirall gallie, wherein the emperour himſelfe was, by great miſchance ſtrake vpon a ſand, and there ſtucke faſt: which ſo much more troubled the emperour, for that his father Philip had by like miſhap beene like to haue beene caſt away vpon the coaſt of ENGLAND, as he was ſayling out of the low countries into SPAINE: howbeit by the good direction of Auria ſhe was quickly got off the ſand againe, and entred with the reſt, to the great reioycing of the whole fleet. So preſently departing againe from VTICA, and ſayling alongſt the coaſt, he doubled the promontorie of CARTHAGE, yet famous for the ruines of that proud citie, and came to anker before a caſtle, which of a well beneath it, is called by the name of AQVARIA, or the Water caſtle. The Moores, who from the hils of VTICA and their watch towers had taken view of the Chriſtian fleet and of the courſe it held, adnertiſed Barbaruſſa, That the Chriſtians were comming againſt him with an innumerable fleet: for there was of one ſort and other almoſt ſeuen hundred ſaile, whereof 82 were great gallies, which gallantly garniſhed with flags and ſtreamers, made a ſhew of moe than indeed they were, and wonderfully terrified the enemie. But that troubled Barbaruſſa moſt, that he was by meſſenger vpon meſſenger certainely enformed, that the moſt mightie Chriſtian emperour Charles was in perſon himſelfe in the fleet, with ſuch a world of people that it ſhould ſeeme he had left none in SPAINE and ITALIE that were able to beare armes. Which newes was brought by certaine Mahometane ſlaues, who getting looſe in the gallies, had in the night ſwum aſhore, and reported the certaintie of the emperours comming: for the proud Turke, a great contemner of the Chriſtian forces, neuer thought that the emperor would haue aduentured his perſon vnto the dangers of the ſea, and chaunces of warre, eſpecially in an vnknowne barren and ſcorching countrey, but would rather haue attempted to doe ſomething by his lieutenants; or elſe by Auria his admirall ſeeke to ſurpriſe ſome baſe places alongſt the ſea coaſt, but not to come directly for the regall citie of TVNES: in which opinion he was chiefly confirmed by Aloyſius Præſenda, a gentleman of GENVA, who taken at ſea, was kept as priſoner at large in TVNES: of whom Barbaruſſa had learned many things concerning the ſtate of ITALIE, the manner of the Chriſtians, and ſtrength of the emperour; craftily feeding him with the hope of libertie, if he would truly declare vnto him ſuch things as he deſired to know. Wherefore now in his rage he cauſed him to be brought before him, charging him bitterly, that he had craftily and perfidiouſly told him lies for truth, concerning the emperour, and therefore commaunded him to be forthwith executed. When he had thus with the vnworthie death of a guiltleſſe Chriſtian, ſomewhat mitigated the griefe of his light beliefe, he forthwith began to caſt with himſelfe how he might beſt withſtand his puiſſant enemie. And firſt of all calling to counſell his ſea captaines, in whom for their approued valour he repoſed moſt confidence, he ſhewed vnto them, that they as valiant men, acquainted with the dangers attending vpon honorable actions, were not to doubt of the victorie, for ſo much as he ſaw it as good as alreadie gained; for the ſame reaſons for which he had before perſuaded himſelfe, that the emperour (if he had not bin halfe mad) would not haue vndertaken ſo deſperat and doubtfull a warre.

Barbaruſſa aduertiſed the coming of the emperour is much diſcouraged.

For who is there (ſaid hee) that knoweth this countrie (not to ſpeake of our owne forces) which would not reaſonably thinke our enemies ſhould in ſhort time know the price of their ambitious deſire and raſh attempt? which in a moſt vnſeaſonable time of the yeare, the daies being now at the longeſt, and the Sunne in his greateſt ſtrength, are come to fight in a countrey ſcorched with heat, and altogether without water; where the verie ſand which riſeth with euerie blaſt of wind, flying into their eyes and faces, ſhall no leſſe trouble them than their enemies? Shall wee thinke that they, which as I heare for moſt part are freſh water ſouldiours, and ſurcharged with heauie armour, can eaſily march forward, or retire, or yet keepe their ground, as the diuers occaſions of battell ſhall require: when as the deepe and hollow burning ſand vp to the middle leg, will not ſuffer them to keepe any order of array? How ſhall they bee able by any meanes to abide the force of our Turkiſh footmen, or the often charging of the nimble Numidian horſemen? And if they bee ſo many of them as they ſay there is, where can they get victuall to feed ſuch a multitude, if wee doe but protract the warre? Aſſuredly (moſt valiant and courragious chiefetaines) wee ſhall erect a moſt rare and incomparable trophie in this countrie of AFFRICKE: when as Charles the rich and great emperour of the Chriſtians ſhall either here be ſlaine in battell, or elſe fall into our hands as a moſt rich prey. For myne owne part, I will notably prouide, that you ſhall want neither weapons, victuall, nor aide, during the time of this warre: I will open the

A the old armories, broach my ſtore, and bring foorth my treaſures. The Numidian princes now our friends, I will without delay entertaine with great pay, and ſuch preſents as ſhall be to them moſt welcome. As for the citiſens of Tvnes, you know how eaſily they are to be kept in obedience, and brought on againſt the enemie for a ſmall pay, and hope of reward. But this one thing is it that I moſt earneſtly require of your approued valour, That you moſt valiantly defend the ſtrong Caſtle of Gvletta, as the moſt aſſured defence, not of this citie onely, but of the whole kingdome; and eſpecially of our Nauie which there lieth in ſafe harbour: for that piece will our enemies with all their forces firſt aſſaile. Wherefore, as worthie
B men neuer be vanquiſhed, keepe that for Solyman and mee: ſo that it being vainely attempted by our enemies, and reſolutely defended by you, the Chriſtian Emperor there failing of his purpoſe, and ſhamefully foyled, ſhall now begin to deſpaire, not of the taking of the citie of Tvnes, but of his owne returne and ſafetie.

When he had thus ſaid, the ſea captaines anſwered with one conſent, That they would moſt willingly and cheerefully performe whatſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe him to commaund: and in confirmation thereof, promiſed him not to doe any thing which beſeemed not moſt valiant and reſolute men. Amongſt theſe ſea captaines, Sinan of Smirna, a Iew, who had loſt his right eie, was both for his age and long experience in militarie affaires, of greateſt account: next vnto him was Haidinus of Cilicia, for his furiouſneſſe in fight ſurnamed of the Italians Cacciadiabolo, and Salec of Ionia; which two had before in a great battell at ſea, ſlaine Rodericus Portendus
C great Admirall of Spaine, and taken his ſonne Iohn priſoner, and ſeuen great gallies: after theſe was Tabacches of Laodicea, and Giffer a valiant captaine of the Ianizaries: all which were notable pirats and then men of great fame. The ſtrong caſtle of Gvletta ſtandeth in the bottome of the bay of Carthage, vpon a point of the land, where the ſea by a narrow ſtrait runneth on the Eaſt ſide of the caſtle into the lake of Tvnes, which being in a manner round, is about twelue Italian miles ouer. But now that caſtle is parted from the maine on the Weſt ſide alſo, by the ſea that way let in; which chargeable worke was by Barbaruſſa begun, but giuen ouer again by him; perſwaded by ſome, That the ſea comming in that way, would in ſhort time fill vp the lake with ſand: but was afterwards for all that, perfected by others. So that now it
D ſtandeth in the manner of an Iſland, in the mouth of the lake, deuided from the firm land by two narrow ſtraight paſſages, the one on the Eaſt, and the other on the Weſt, yet ſo, that it commaundeth both. This caſtle Barbaruſſa had before ſtrongly fortified both with men and munition, as the key of that kingdome: but now vpon the comming of the Emperour, he put into it his moſt expert and reſolute captaines before named: well foreſeeing that in the defence therof, reſted the ſafetie of his nauie which then lay within the lake, as in a moſt ſure harbour; and alſo the greateſt hope he had for the holding of the citie of Tvnes, whereon depended the whole ſtate of that kingdome. The emperour lying at anchor with all his fleet neere vnto the ſhoare, gaue generall commaundement, that his ſouldiers ſhould with as much ſpeed as was poſſible be landed with the long boats: which was ſo orderly done, that the Moores terrified with the hi-
E deous crie of the ſouldiours, making toward land, and not able to abide the ſhowres of ſmall ſhot, were eaſily beaten from the ſhoare, whether they were come downe in great multitudes, and ſo ſuffered the Chriſtian ſouldiers to land quietly. The firſt that landed were the Spaniſh companies, after them the Italians, and laſt of all the Germans, whom Vaſtius Generall of the armie cauſed preſently to encampe themſelues; ſtraightly commaunding, that no man ſhould ſtraggle from the campe farther into the land, vntill the horſemen and great artillery were all landed. The emperour himſelfe bearing victory in the cheerfulnes of his countenance, landed alſo. In the meane time certaine companies were ſent out by the Generall, to view the places nigh hand, and to ſeeke out the ceſterns and fountaines of freſh waters thereabout, which ſometime ſerued the famous citie of Carthage; with whom the Moores, but eſpecially the Numidian horſemen, a ſwift, ſubtle, and painfull kind of ſouldiers, oftentimes and in many places ſuddenly skirmiſhed: and though they were but naked men, yet taking all the aduantages they F could of the places to them well knowne, with their arrowes and darts furiouſly aſſailed them vnawares, and ouerloaded with armour; ſparing no mans life that fell into their hands. Amongſt whom was Hieronimus Spinnula a Ligurian captaine, who ouerthrowne by a Numidian horſeman, had his head cut off, and carried away by the ſame nimble horſeman, before he could be reſcued. The like miſhap befell Fredericus Carectus a noble gentleman, who going with Vaſtius,

to view the places thereabouts, was fast by his side suddenly slaine with a small shot. All which nimblenesse and fiercenesse of the enemy, could not for all that stay the Emperour: but that he would needs with a small troupe of horsemen, in person himselfe take view of the places thereabouts, euen in the sight of the Numidian horsemen, which were in euery place to bee seene pricking vp and downe the country in troupes; although hee was many times requested by his graue counsellors, to leaue that seruice for his inferior captaines, and not to expose himselfe to so great danger both of his person and of the common safetie. Vastius had now brought on the armie neere vnto the castle of GVLETTA, still casting vp a rolling trench as hee came neerer thereunto, thereby to keepe his men out of the danger of the enemies shot: which worke was not done only by the pioners and gally slaues, but by souldiers of all sorts; yea many of the captaines themselues laid their hands to the spade and mattocke: for why, the emperour was there a continuall beholder, and cheerefull commender of euery mans labour and forwardnesse, and the busie enemy was euer ready to take the aduantage, if any thing were by negligence omitted, oftentimes sallying out euen vnto the very trenches of the Christians, there giuing vnto them proud words of defiance. When the armie was to be martialled, and euery commander to bee appointed to the place of his charge in this siege of GVLETTA: the countie of SARNE, a man famous both for the honour of his house, and for the good seruice he had lately done against the Turkes at CORONE, requested of Vastius the Generall, to haue the charge of the mount neerest vnto the castle; which as it was a place of most danger, so was it also of greatest honour. Whereat the old Spaniards (after the manner of their proud nature) much repined. Vpon the top of this mount, the countie set vp his rich tent in the eye of the enemy, and there lay with the Italian companies ouer whom he commaunded. Hee had not lien there long, but Salec one of the Turks famous pirats, with certaine companies of the garrison souldiers, sallied out of the castle directly vpon the mount whereon the countie lay; and by making shew as if he would desperatly haue assailed the same, raising a great alarum against the Italians: yet so, as after certaine vollies of shot discharged on both sides, he began to retire as if he had been thereto constrained. Which thing the countie perceiuing, being a man of greater courage then direction, in great rage with bitter words reproued certaine of the captains, whom he perceiued not so forward in, pursuit of the enemy as hee would haue had them: and in his furie ran downe from the mount the rest for shame following him, and ouertaking the enemies slew diuers of them. The crafty pirat now seeing the countie drawne out of his strength into the plaine ground, and perceiuing himselfe strong enough to encounter him, suddenly turning himselfe about, said vnto his souldiors: The aduantage you wished to haue of your enemies is now offered, they are now in your danger; wherefore now shew your selues valiant men, and suffer not one of these proud fresh-water souldiers to escape aliue or vnwounded. Which he had no sooner said, but they presently made a stand, & so hardly charged them from whom they but euen now seemed to flie, that the Italians not able longer to endure the fight, betooke themselues to flight. The countie himselfe with Belingerius his kinsman, fighting valiantly in the formost of his companies, was slaine: many others endured the same fortune: others flying backe againe to the mount, were slaine there by the Turkes, who resolutely entred into the trenches with them so farre, that they carried away with them the plate and riches of the counties tent. Neither was there any of the Spaniards which lay neerest vnto them, and might easily haue rescued them, that would once stir out of their places to helpe them: for it is reported, that they were nothing sorie for the ouerthrow of the Italians, for as much as the county had so arrogantly craued of the Generall the most honourable place, which he so euill held. His head & right hand were cut off, and sent by Salec to Barbarussa. This ouerthrow much greeued the Italians whom Vastius comforted with cheerefull speeches, imputing all that losse, neither to the valour of the enemy, or cowardise of the Italians; but only to the rashnesse of the countie, whom he said worthily to haue paid the price of his inconsiderate forwardnes. But the Spaniards he sharply reproued as mercilesse men, which vpon so light an occasion had giuen cause for the Italians to haue them in distrust. The Turkes in the mean time by the often shooting off of their great ordinance, shewed the ioy they conceiued of this victory.

Salec sallieth out vpon the countie and the Italians.

The countie slain, and his head and right hand sent to Barbarussa.

The Spaniards reioycing at the ouerthrow of the Italians, are themselues foiled by Tabaccbes.

It oftentimes so falleth out, that whilest men laugh at their neighbours harmes, their owne is not farre off; and so it chanced with the Spaniards: for Tabaccbes another of the piraticall captaines, shortly after sallying suddenly out of the castle in the dawning of the day, was got vp to the

A the top of the trenches wherein the Spaniards lay, before they were aware of his comming, and there ſlew ſome as they were a ſleepe, ſome idlie ſitting fearing no harme, others as they were arming themſelues; and with their ſudden crie, cauſed the reſt which lay neere vnto that place ſhamefully for feare to flie out of their trenches: where the Turks taking ſuch traſh as they there found, and hauing ſlaine and wounded many, amongſt whom was one Mendoſa a captaine, and carrying away with them the enſigne of Sarmentus which ſtood vpon the top of the trench, returned with victorie. The alarum raiſed in the armie was ſuch, as that the emperour himſelfe came running to the place in his armour, ſeuerely reprouing them of cowardiſe which had forſaken the place, and grieuouſly offended with them which had kept ſuch negligent watch, againſt
B ſuch an enemie, as was not for wilineſſe agilitie and courage, to be ſlightly regarded of the beſt and moſt expert ſouldiours. This diſgrace of the Spaniards well comforted the Italians, to ſee the old ſouldiours no leſſe ouertaken in their negligence, than they had been in their vnaduiſed forwardneſſe.

This tumult appeaſed, Vaſtius called into his tent the Colonels and chiefe captaines of the Spaniards, and ſpake vnto them in this manner:

Vaſtius his ſpeech to the Spaniſh captaines.

Friends (ſaid he) elſewhere alwaies valiant, who togither with me, haue by your inuincible proweſſe gained vnto our emperour many moſt glorious victories. You ſeeme vnto me at this time to haue need to be called vpon, and to be put in remembrance of your wonted and approued valour: for as farre as I
C can ſee, the remembrance of your auntient fame, is in you growne altogither cold; your hands are become faint for feare; and that which I am ſorie and aſhamed to ſay, you are growne I know not how, altogither out of order and heartleſſe, ſhewing no courage for the ſubduing of theſe naked pirats. Yeſterday (as many ſay) you ſmiled at the vnskilfull and vnfortunate forwardneſſe of your friends, which they bought deere; but to day they worthely laugh at your degenerat careleſſe negligence: ſo that it concerneth you in honour, to blot out this ſo foule and puplike a diſgrace, by ſome notable and worthie exploit. Wherefore I exhort you, and I ſtraightly charge and commaund you, that with all ſpeed you prepare both your minds and weapons for the atchieuement of ſome new honour: ſo that if the proud enemie ſhall againe preſume to come foorth and aſſaile your trenches, you ſhall forthwith breake out vpon him, and beat him backe againe euen to the gates of Gvletta. Perhaps good for-
D tune will ſo attend your valiant and reſolute purſuit, that you may togither with their diſordered men, enter ſome of their rampiers, wherein we ſee their whole hope conſiſteth: which if it ſhall otherwiſe fall out than is to be hoped for, yet ſhall you by this your notable deuoire wonderfully content the emperour your ſoueraigne, and me your Generall, and withall couer your late diſhonour.

Whereunto they all anſwered, That they would ſo beare themſelues againſt the enemie, as that he ſhould not deſire greater courage or contempt of danger in men deſirous of honour and commendation.

The Turks ſally againe out of Gulatta.

It was not long, but that the Turkes encouraged with their former ſucceſſe, after their wonted manner ſallied out againe, conducted by Giaffer captaine of the Ianizaries, a man of exceeE ding courage and ſtrength of bodie: who with the Ianizaries and certain companies of Mooriſh archers, about the noone time of the day iſſuing out of the caſtle, aſſailed the vttermoſt trenches, hoping in that broiling heat to find the Chriſtians in their ſtations negligent and vnprepared. Wherein he was nothing deceiued, for the Spaniards that burning hoat time of the day, kept ſuch negligent watch, that Giaffer with his Ianizaries and archers, was got vp to the top of the rampiers, and there diſcharged their ſhot and arrowes vpon the Chriſtians in their trenches, before they were well aware of his comming. But vpon the ſtriking vp of the drum, certaine companies of harquebuſiers brake out vpon them in two places at one inſtant, as Vaſtius had before commaunded, whom he ſeconded with a companie of halbardiers, keeping in readineſſe his ſquadrons to reſcue his harquebuſiers, if they ſhould be enforced by the enemie to retire: and in F that order expected the euent of the skirmiſh, which was moſt valiantly maintained on both ſides. For the Ianizaries, although they were enforced to giue ground, yet (as men not vſed to flie, and ſtanding vpon the honour of their order) withſtood the Chriſtians with no leſſe reſolution than they were by them charged; vntill that Giaffer their leader deſperatly fighting amongſt the formoſt of the Ianizaries, was at once ſhot in with two bullets, and ſlaine: whoſe dead bodie the Ianizaries labouring to carie away, endured a moſt cruell fight, many being on both

both ſides ſlaine vpon his dead carkaſſe: yet at length they were enforced to flie, and ſo fiercely G followed by the Spaniards, that they of GVLETTA, when they had receiued in the formoſt, ſhut out almoſt a fourth part of their owne men, for feare the Chriſtians ſhould together with them haue entred the caſtle. Didacus Abila, one of the Spaniſh enſigne bearers, aduanced his enſigne vnto the top of one of the enemies rampiers, and was there ſlaine, but his enſigne ſaued by one of the ſouldiors of the ſame band. The Chriſtians receiued more loſſe in their retreat than they had in all the fight, for the Turks from their rampiers then diſcharged their ſhot as faſt as they could vpon them, which they could not before doe, without the like danger to their owne men mingled amongſt them. This dayes worke well abated the pride of the Turks, and gaue good hope to the Chriſtians, that the caſtle would without any great loſſe be gained: for being neere vn- H to it, they perceiued it not to be ſo ſtrong as they had ſuppoſed.

The emperour hauing ſpent a few dayes in conſultation about his farther proceeding, and preparing of things for the ſiege, reſolued without further delay with all his forces to aſſault the caſtle, perſuaded thereunto by many reaſons: firſt by the cheerefulneſſe of his owne ſouldiers, and the courage of his enemies ſore daunted in the laſt skirmiſh, which he was loth they ſhould againe recouer by the comming of new ſupplies; beſides that, he was informed, that diuers companies of the Numidians were comming to TVNES, entertained by Barbaruſſa, whoſe ſtrength was like dayly to encreaſe: but that which mooued him moſt to haſten the matter, was, for that his men began to grow ſickly in his campe, being all the day time ſcorched as it were with the feruent heat of the Sunne, and well neere ſtarued in the night with cold and exceeding dewes I wherewith they were commonly wet to the skin; neither was there either good water or freſh victuall by any meanes to be had in that ſandie and barren ſoile for the releefe of the ſicke, other than that was brought out of the fleet: for all the water thereabout was moſt vnpleaſant and exceeding brackiſh, ſo that both ſicke and whole were glad when they could get a crab to quench the extremitie of their thirſt: although the emperour did what he might to remedie theſe extremities, and much releefe was in good time ſent both from SICILIA and NAPLES: the bisket alſo in the ſhips, eſpecially in the Spaniſh gallies, was growne hoarie and vnwholeſome. Wherfore he began to place his battery about the fifteenth of Iuly, which was defended all alongſt with Gabions, and caske filled with ſand, for that the countrey ſoile in that place yeelded neither earth nor turfe to doe it. Auria appointed to batter the caſtle by ſea, deuided his gallies into K three ſquadrons, which orderly ſucceeding one another, ſhould by turns beat the ſame: his great ſhips rid at anker, and out of their forecaſtles thundered with their great ordinance. And Vaſtius at land had deuided the armie into three battels, Spaniards, Italians, and Germans, euery nation by themſelues, in ſuch ſort, as that they might indifferently be partakers both of the danger of Guletta furiouſly battered. the aſſault, and of the glorie of the victorie. There was neuer ſtrong place in the memorie of man, ſince guns, that fatal engine were firſt inuented for the deſtruction of mankind, aſſailed with greater force, greater preparation, or greater induſtrie. The great ordinance in manner of a great earthquake ſo terribly roared and thundered, that the earth ſeemed not onely to tremble and quake vnder mens feet, but euen by and by to rent in ſunder and ſwallow them vp: and the ſea which was euen now quiet and calme, began to riſe aloft, and to rage and fome as if it had been L in a great ſtorme: at which time the aire became thicke, and the skie darkened with the ſmoak of Guletta aſſaulted by the Chriſtians. the great artillerie: from the break of the day vntill noone the roaring cannon and culuering neuer ceaſed: ſo that the Vamures were beaten downe, the caſtle made ſaultable, and the wals ſo ſhaken, that in many places the Turkes cannoniers, together with their cannons, lay buried in the ruines thereof. Which thing perceiued, they which were before appointed to giue the firſt aſſault, vpon ſignall giuen by the emperor, preſently vpon the ceaſing of the great artillerie aſſailed the breach, and others with their ſcaling ladders ſcaled the wals: which was done with ſuch courage and reſolution, that the Turkes when they had done what they poſſibly could for the defence of the place, by caſting downe darts, wild fire, and ſuch like things vpon the Chriſtians as they were climing vp: at length as men deſpairing longer to hold the place, and ouercome M with a greater fortune, turned their backs and fled. Sinan and the reſt of the captaines by a woodden bridge, fled out at the farther ſide of the caſtle into the maine, and ſo alongſt the left ſide of the lake by land to TVNES, not looking behind them for haſt: which way moſt part of his men followed him alſo. The reſt were either ſlaine or driuen into the lake, where ſeeking to ſaue their liues by ſwimming, they were either ſlaine in comming to land by the Spaniſh horſemen,

A men,or elſe in their ſwimming ſhot at pleaſure by the harquebuſiers, ſo that all the lake was as it were couered with the dead bodies of the Turkes and Moores. The emperour with ſmall loſſe thus gained the caſtle of GVLETTA,with all the warlike prouiſion therein, and with it all Barbaruſſa his great fleet and ſtrength at ſea,which he for the more ſafetie had before put into the lake: which as it was vnto the emperour a thing moſt pleaſant,ſo was it vnto Barbaruſſa and his pyrats the greateſt griefe and loſſe poſſible, hauing at once loſt all their power at ſea,which but a little before was no ſmall terrour to all the frontiers of the Chriſtian countries and Iſlands in the Mediterranean.

Guletta woone, and Barbaruſſa his fleet taken.

Barbaruſſa troubled and terrified with ſo great a loſſe,with a ſterne and ſcornfull countenance receiued the Iew and the reſt of the captains fled from GVLETTA, reuiling them bitterly in his
B rage,and calling them faint hearted cowards,which had in ſo ſhort a time giuen ouer ſo ſtrong a place. Whereunto Sinan anſwered for them all in this ſort:

Barbaruſſa raileth.

Hairadin(ſaid he) ſo long as we were to fight with armed men, we did as thou well knoweſt, and our enemies cannot denie, what well beſeemed vs and thy magnificent fortune. But when wee are to withſtand the deuill and his infernall furies, which came againſt vs with flames of fire, and earthquakes, things of extreame terrour and danger: it ought not to ſeeme ſtrange vnto thee, if wee ſought to eſcape the vncouth furie of the immortall enemies of mankinde, to doe thee ſeruice in thy better fortune, in defence of this thy city and kingdome. Neither doe we account it any diſgrace to haue eſcaped that danger, as men that minde againe to fight: out of which thou, a moſt ancient and expert Commander (if I may frankelie
C ſpeake vnto thee the truth) if thou haddeſt beene there preſent, wouldſt haue accounted it no dishonour, but very good diſcretion to haue eſcaped in ſafety.

The ſhort anſwere of Sinath the Iew to Barbaruſſa.

Barbaruſſa repreſſing his furie,began in a more temperate manner to requeſt them euery one particularly, as valiant and couragious men to ſtand faſt vnto him in that warre againſt their enemies the Chriſtians: telling them,that he well hoped,that after the great ſupplie of the Mooriſh footmen and Numidian horſemen were once come, which were now at hand, the enemie ſhould not long reioice of the taking of GVLETTA. After that, he forthwith conuerted all his ſtudie and indeuour,to prepare ſuch things as were needfull for the war,bringing forth his treaſures,and bountifully beſtowing the ſame amongſt the Moores and Numidians,therby to con-
D firme the friendſhip of ſuch as well affected him,and with this new bountie to win the hearts of ſuch as yet ſtood doubtfull.

In the meane time Muleaſſes the exiled king, with a ſmall retinue of his friends and followers came from the farthеſt part of NVMIDIA into the emperors camp; the emperor ſitting in a roiall ſeat in the middeſt of his pauillion,whereinto Muleaſſes was admitted,with a myter vpon his head,in a garment of greene and blew changeable ſilke: he was of a tall and manly ſtature, of colour tawnie,but ſo ſquint-eyed that he ſeemed ſpitfully to looke vpon them whom he beheld: who after he had kiſſed the emperours right hand, and had ſet himſelfe downe,with his legs gathered cloſe vnder him,vpon a carpet ſpread vpon the bare ground,after the maner of his countrey,he by an interpreter ſpake vnto the emperour as followeth:

Muleaſſes commeth to the emperour.

Thou art come in armes into this countrie, and art now almoſt conquerour of the ſame (thrice mightie Emperour) prouoked thereunto not by any deſert of mine, for that our different religion ſo required, yet as I verily thinke, not without the appointment of the moſt high God, whom both thou and I doe with like deuotion worſhip, to take reuenge of the moſt perfidious and cruell tyrant and pyrat, the mortall enemie of mankind: whom I foreſee as good as alreadie vanquiſhed, now that GVLETTA is taken, and his naue ſurpriſed. So that I hope he ſhall in ſhort time by thy reuenging hand, at once receiue the iuſt guerdon of all his former villanies: which ſhall bee ſo much the more to my comfort, for that I hope the fruit of thy rare felicitie and glorious victorie will redound in great part to me, being reſtored by thee into my fathers kingdome: which I as a poore exiled prince moſt humbly requeſt
F of thy iuſtice and bountie. For it ſhall be vnto thee a thing moſt honourable and profitable, if thou ſhalt receiue into thy protection me, a king royally deſcended, of a moſt auncient progenie, ſtrengthened with the great alliance of the Numidians and Moores. Neither doe I refuſe either to pay thee tribute therefore, or to acknowledge my ſelfe vaſſale vnto thee the Chriſtian Emperour: Of which my fidelitie, there can bee no greater aſſurance than the thankefull remembrance of ſo great a benefit receiued,

The Oration of Muleaſſes to Charles the emperour.

which ſhall for euer remaine vnforgotten of me and my poſteritie, euen for that eſpecially, that I deeſt and abhor the name of an vnthankfull man, and do well by experience find, how much my ſtate may bee confirmed, and the minds of my people to me aſſured, by thy garriſons ſo neere at hand in SICILIA and SARDINIA. G

The emperours anſwere to Muleaſſes.

Whereunto the emperor anſwered, That he was come ouer into AFFRICKE to be reuenged of the iniuries which Barbaruſſa had many times done vpon the frontiers of his dominions, and to root out the pyrats, of all others moſt miſchieuous: which his good purpoſe had by the goodneſſe of Chriſt his Sauiour taken ſo good effect, that he doubted not in ſhort time by the taking of TVNES to obtain a perfect victorie; which once gained, he would then kindly graunt him all things which ſhould ſtand with the conuenience of his affaires, and the vſe of his victorie: ſo that H he would not falſifie his faith, which he might iuſtly ſuſpect, if he repoſed not a ſpeciall truſt, that the remembrance of ſuch a benefit would for euer remaine in his heroical mind; and was further aſſured, that the ſame power which ſhould reſtore to him his kingdome of courteſie, could alſo take it from him againe, if his vnthankfulneſſe ſhould ſo deſerue.

The behauiour of Muleaſſes.

Muleaſſes in preſence of the emperour vſed ſuch a grauity and grace in his ſpeech and geſture, as well declared, that hee had nothing forgotten his former eſtate: but towards the Generall and the other great captaines hee vſed all manner of courteſie, ſo that he rid vp and downe with them gallantly mounted, managing his horſe, and charging & diſcharging his lance with ſuch agilitie and skill, as ſhewed him to be a very good horſeman, and of great actiuity. At other vacant times he would ſubtilly reaſon with learned men, after the manner of Auerrois, of the I nature of things, of the motion of heauen, and power of the ſtars. By the emperors commaundement he had a tent appointed for him, and honourable allowance for his diet. Vaſtius and the reſt of the cheefe commaunders of the armie vſed him with all honor, and at ſuch time as he was deſirous to ſee the campe, courteouſly brought him into all places of it, that he might himſelfe ſee what mounts they had in ſhort time caſt, what abundance there was of great artillery, what ſtrong watch and ward was kept, what a number there was of braue and warlike ſouldiers of diuers nations, differing much one from another in language, countenance, and manner of furniture: and further demanded, Whether that puiſſant armie which the emperour had brought ouer to his great good, were in his iudgement ſufficient to ſubdue the enemie? Where aboue all things Muleaſſes wondered at the number and order of the great ordinance: and next vnto that K at the wonderfull plentie of things to be bought and ſold in the market place, and at the modeſt quietneſſe of the ſouldiors in buying the ſame. Not long after, the expert captaines by diligent inquirie learned of him many things well ſeruing for their better proceeding in that war, eſpecially of the diſpoſition and ſtrength of them of TVNES, of the ſituation of the citie, of the nature of the wals, and fortification of the caſtle, of the wels and ceſterens in the ſuburbes, and what ſtrength the Moores and Numidians were of, which Barbaruſſa had entertained. In concluſion he aſſured them (as afterwards it fell out) that Barbaruſſa would neuer truſt to the ſtrength of the wals, which would eaſily be ouerthrowne with the great artillerie, but would in a great brauerie with enſignes diſplayed bring all his forces into the field, of purpoſe to terrifie the Chriſtians L with the ſight of the multitude of his raſcal ſoldiors, and to breake their array with his Numidian horſmen; who with hideous and terrible cries, after the maner of that nation, would not faile to aſſaile them: and yet for all that would neuer bring into the battell his Turkiſh footmen, in whom he repoſed his greateſt confidence, and whom he deſired moſt to ſpare, but would as a craftie and ſubtill Turke, by oppoſing of the Moores, whom he held in ſmall regard, trie by their bloud what might be done without the danger of his owne men. But as he told them, nothing could be more ſtrange vnto the Moores his countriemen, or that they were more afraid of, than in a ſet battell to fight with that enemie whoſe ſquadrons comming orderly on in gliſtering armour with long pikes, might ſcorn and eaſily ouerthrow the naked archers of the Moores and the vnarmed Numidian horſmen: and that our men ſhould find nothing more grieuous or troubleſome than the ſcorching heat of the Sunne, and the thirſt riſing thereof; which might M eaſily be remedied by plentie of water, which by ſlaues and ſmall boats might eaſily be brought in caskes and bottles from the fleet alongſt the lake, and ſo diſtributed amongſt the armie: although not farre from the wals of the citie, were certaine old conduit heads, which would yeeld them great plentie of water, if the malicious enemie did not to his own hurt and others poyſon

A the ſame. Theſe things orderly reported to the emperour, confirmed the hope he had before conceiued of the deſired victorie: So that wholly bent thereupon, and carefully forecaſting all things, he reſolued forthwith to depart from GVLETTA, and with all his power to beſiege TVNES.

But whileſt he was preparing things neceſſarie, ordering his ſouldiours, and diſcouering the enemies purpoſes, his ſoldiors had daily diuers skirmiſhes with the Numidians; ſo that once the skirmiſh was like to haue come to a iuſt battell, which began in this ſort. The Moores had planted certaine field pieces amongſt the oliue gardens, wherewith they ſhot continually into the campe: for remouing whereof, the emperour leauing the Italians, with certaines companies of
B the old Germaine and Spaniſh ſouldiors, for the keeping of his campe and trenches, went forth with his horſemen and the reſt of his armie: ſending before him Montegius, Generall of the Spaniſh horſemen, who for moſt part were but raw ſouldiors, ſuch as were of the noblemens ordinarie ſeruants and followers, not before acquainted with the wars. Theſe light horſemen with diuers fortune skirmiſhed a while with the enemie, but when they ſaw themſelues to be hardly charged, and Montegius their Generall grieuouſly wounded, they turned their backes, and in the ſight of the emperour ſhamefully fled to the men at armes which were comming after them. The manner of the enemies fight was, to giue at the firſt a fierce and deſperat charge, and vpon the incounter giuen, of purpoſe to retire, auoiding therby the ſudden force of their enemies, and by and by to turne againe vpon them with a freſh charge. The emperour ſeeing the flight of his
C light horſemen, came on couragiouſly with his men at armes, by whoſe comming in and valiant incounter the Turkes and Moores were put to flight, and their fieldpieces wherewith they had before annoyed the campe, taken. In this skirmiſh the emperour in perſon as he ſtood formoſt in his armed troupes, gaue the ſignall of battell himſelfe by crying with a loud voice, Saint Iames, Saint Iames, whom the Spaniards take for their patron; and ſo charging the enemie, performed the part not only of a couragious chieftaine, but of a reſolute and valiant ſouldior alſo: reſcuing with his own hand Andreas Pontius, a noble gentleman of GRANADO, whom vnhorſed and ſore wounded, the enemie was readie preſently to haue ſlaine, had not the emperour by his comming in ſaued him; deſeruing thereby the Oken garland, which the Romans by the name
D of Ciuica Corona gaue as an honour to ſuch as had in battell ſaued a citizen.

The Spaniſh light horſemen put to flight.

The emperour reſloreth the battel, and with his owne hand reſcueth Andreas Pontius of Granado.

About the ſame time it fortuned, that thirtie thouſand Moores came vpon the ſuddain to haue ſurpriſed a little tower, ſtanding vpon a hill neere vnto the ruines of old CARTHAGE: wherein the emperour had placed certaine ſoldiors for the keeping thereof, becauſe it was neere vnto his campe. Before theſe Moores went a Numidian prieſt, who bellowing out certaine ſuperſtitious charms, caſt diuers ſcrols of paper on each ſide the way, wherein he curſed and banned the Chriſtians: and now they had with fire & ſmoake brought the Chriſtians in that tower to great extremitie, when the emperor himſelfe comming to their reſcue with certaine companies of horſemen and footmen, ſlew the coniuring prieſt, with others, and put the reſt to flight. The diſcomſiture of the Spaniſh horſemen cauſed many men to thinke, that if the emperour
E ſhould come to a ſet battell with the enemie, he ſhould find his horſmen too weak, both for that they were but few in number, and not to be compared with the Numidians. For which cauſe and diuers others, certaine of the emperours graue counſellors, but none of the beſt ſouldiours, wiſhed him not to proceed further in that dangerous war, but with ſpeed to returne out of AFRICKE, for as much as he had woon honour enough by the taking of GVLETTA, and the ſurpriſing of the enemies fleet: wherby he had to his immortal praiſe, and the common good of Chriſtendome, deliuered all the frontiers of the Chriſtian countries in the Mediterranean from the danger and feare of thoſe moſt cruell pyrats: beſides that, the flix began to rage in his campe, wherof many of his ſoldiors fell ſick, and dyed dayly: wheras on the contrarie part, the mightie Numidian princes, ſuch as were Muleaſſes old enemies, were reported to come in dayly to the aid of Barbaruſſa. Theſe vnſeaſonable ſpeeches the emperour thought good to repreſſe betime;
F reaſoning againſt the authors thereof with great grauitie, as againſt men, who with more feare doubted of the ſucceſſe of things, and the euent of the victorie, than beſeemed them, whom for their conſtant reſolution and good opinion conceiued of their diſcretion, he had choſen to be of his moſt ſecret counſell.

The emperour aduiſed by his counſellours to returne home.

Saying, that he deſired not of them, that their needleſſe and diſhonourable labour, wherein they The reſolute anſwere of the emperour.

ſhould ſhew themſelues more careſull of his perſon than of his honour : for as much as thoſe things which G they now alleadged, ſhould haue been ſaid before the warre was taken in hand, now by good hap halfe ended ; before he euer paſſed ouer into AFFRICKE. For he might (as he ſaid) haue reſted quietly in SPAINE, and haue eaſily neglected and reiected the iniuries done vpon the ſea coaſts, and the complaints of his ſubiects ; but he was (as they well knew) for moſt vrgent cauſes come thither : whereas he was reſolued to ſatisfie the expectation of the world with a notable victorie, or if God ſhould otherwiſe appoint, there to end his daies with honour. Wherefore he willed them to ceaſe farther to flatter him that was no way diſmaid, or to poſſeſſe the minds of his valiant ſouldiours with a vaine forboding feare ; and with reſolute minds, togither with him their chieftaine, againſt the next day, to expect what the fortune of the field ſhould appoint for the full accompliſhment of that warre. For he was (as he ſaid) ſet downe to H giue the enemie battell, or if he refuſed the ſame, to batter the wals of TVNES, not doubting but that God would ſtand on his ſide in ſo good and ſo godly a quarrell.

The emperour leauing a ſufficient garriſon in the caſtle of GVLETTA, commanded the breaches to be repaired, and the great ordinance there taken to be laid vpon carriages, which before, after the old rude ſea faſhion, lay bound in great vnweldie pieces of timber, with yron rings faſtned thereto, and could not handſomely be handled or remoued too or fro. After that, when he had cauſed the countrey to be well viewed all about, which betwixt the Oliue groues and the right ſide of the lake, giueth a direct paſſage vnto the citie of TVNES; he ſet forward with his armie in ſo good order, that he ſtill marched as readie to fight, for feare of the pollicies and ſudden aſſaults of the enemie. On the left hand marched the Italians next vnto the lake, on the I right hand the Spaniards neere vnto the Oliue groues, which in the manner of a great wood ran all alongſt the countrey, from the ruines of CARTHAGE almoſt to the wals of TVNES : in the middeſt betwixt both marched the Germans; next vnto them followed the great ordinance; and after it, the carriages of all the armie. In the vauntgard was Vaſtius, whom the emperour had made Generall of the armie, and eſpecially for that day : in the reareward was the duke of ALBA, with certaine troupes of choſen horſemen: in the middle of the maine battell was the emperour, and by his ſide Lewes his brother in law the king of PORTINGALES brother. The Italians were conducted by the prince of SALERN, the Spaniards by Alarco an auncient captaine, and the Germans by Maximilian Eberſtein. But the emperour in his armour ceaſed not to ride from ſquadron to ſquadron, with cheerfull countenance and full of hope, recounting vnto them the K former victories which they had gotten for him: and telling them, that he did that day expect of them a moſt honourable daies ſeruice, for as much as they were to fight againſt the naked enemies of the Chriſtian religion : wherefore they ſhould with reſolute minds, ſet downe themſelues to endure the waight of their armour, the painfulneſſe of the march, the heat of the Sunne and ſand, & the tediouſneſſe of the thirſt ariſing therof; vntill they might ioine battell with their enemies, where they ſhould vndoubtedly by the goodneſſe of God (in whoſe quarrell they fought) obtaine the victorie : in the meane time they ſhould with patience ouercome all difficulties, comforting themſelues with the vndoubted hope of a moſt rich prey, which they were to expect of the ſpoile of a rich citie. Whereunto euerie ſquadron anſwered with a great ſhout that he ſhould not trouble himſelfe with thoſe matters which he had before rehearſed, but to aſ- L ſure himſelfe that they his ſouldiours would moſt patiently endure all extremities, and not deceiue the expectation he had conceiued of their wonted valour, but by valiant fight to make him emperour, not of AFFRICKE, but of ASIA alſo.

The emperour marcheth toward Tunes.

Now Vaſtius had withdrawne two companies of harquebuſiers out of the Spaniſh ſquadron to skirmiſh with the Moores, who continually followed in the taile of the army; whom by thoſe harquebuſiers and certaine troupes of horſemen deputed to that purpoſe, the duke of ALBA notably repulſed in the rereward.

The armie was now come vnto the ceſternes of freſh water, which Muleaſſes and others which well knew the countrey had before told them of; which as ſoone as the ſoldiours almoſt fainting vnder the waight of their armour, with the ſcorching heat of the ſun and extremitie of M thirſt, deſcried a far off : they for deſire they had to quench their thirſt, forthwith forſooke their colours, and diſorderly ran as faſt as they could to thoſe ceſternes : Vaſtius the Generall, to the vttermoſt of his power labouring in vaine both by faire meanes and foule to haue ſtaied them; who ſaw by that diſorderedneſſe of the ſoldiors, a great aduantage offred vnto the enemie, which then

A then was not farre off. But when the generall could neither with words or blowes preuaile any thing with them, the emperour himſelfe was glad to haſt thither, with his preſence and authoritie to haue kept them in order: yet ſuch was the force of their intollerable thirſt, that neither the ſight of the emperour, nor all that he could doe, could remedie the diſorder; ſome fainting in the ſand for lacke of drinke, and ſome other for greedineſſe readie to burſt their bellies at the fountaines; ſo that the emperour was faine with his truncheon to beat them away. Amongſt the reſt one Sullius Cicero of ARPINAS a famous captaine, died at the ceſterne ſide with drinking too much. This extremitie for want of water ſeemed iuſtly to haue happened vnto them, for as much as Vaſtius the day before, had by generall proclamation thorow the campe, com-
B manded that euerie ſouldiour ſhould carrie with him a bottle of wine or water at his girdle: although he cauſed ſo much water as he conueniently could, to be carried in great caskes, for the common reliefe of the armie; whereof the Germans had the greateſt part. Some almoſt readie to giue ouer for thirſt, were glad to get a draught of cold water of their fellowes which had it, for two duckats.

A draught of water ſold for two duckats.

This diſorder being with as much ſpeed as was poſſible reformed, and the armie againe brought into order, the emperour held on his march toward the enemie: for Barbaruſſa with a wonderfull multitude of horſemen and footmen, and a number of enſignes (the inſtruments of vaine feare and fooliſh brauerie) gallantly diſplaied after the manner of the Moores, was come about three miles from the citie, and with certaine field pieces (as Muleaſſes had foretold) went
C about to haue broken the battel of the Chriſtians: which pieces although they were oftentimes diſcharged, yet did they little or no harme, by reaſon of the vnskilfulneſſe of the canoniers. Vaſtius in like manner and for like purpoſe, had commaunded the great ordinance to be brought into the front of the battell: but perceiuing what toile and time it required to haue it done, for that it was drawne but by ſtrength of men, and the wheeles of the carriages ſunke deepe in the deuouring ſand, and the ſhot and pouder which the mariners and gallie ſlaues carried altogither vpon their ſhoulders, came but ſoftly on; he ſuddenly changed his purpoſe, and told the emperour, That he thought it not beſt to ſtay for the great artillerie in that cheerefulneſſe of his armie, when euerie man deſired battel, but to commit all to the valour of his reſolute men and his own
D good fortune, which euer fauored his honourable attempts: leaſt whileſt we ſtay (ſaid he) too long vpon our great ordinance, which doth not alwaies ſerue to great purpoſe in ſuden battels, our enemies gather courage in the time of this our vnneceſſarie delay; and this exceeding cheerfulneſſe of our ſouldiours, the moſt ſure token of an vndoubted victorie, by deferring of time grow cold. Whereunto the emperour deſirous of battell, and filled with good hope, cheerefully anſwered: Vaſtius if thou ſo thinke it good, which I alſo like well of, in Gods name giue the ſignall. That ſhall I by and by do (ſaid he) but firſt it is reaſon, that you which ſway and commaund a great part of the world, learne at this time to obey him, whom to his great charge and ſhame, you laying aſide the imperiall maieſtie of your ſelfe, haue for this day made General and Commaunder of ſo mightie an armie: Wherefore ſaid Vaſtius, I will now vſe mine authoritie, E and commaund you (ſith I may not ſo requeſt you) to depart from this place, and to get you into the middle of the battel neere vnto the enſignes; leaſt by ſome vnluckie ſhot, the whole eſtate of the armie be brought into extreame perill by the danger of one mans life. Whereat the emperour ſmiling, willed him to feare no ſuch thing, ſaying moreouer, That neuer emperour was yet ſlaine with a gun. For all that he departed out of the place as he was commaunded, and went into the middle of the battell. Whereupon the ſignall of battell was by the ſounding of the trumpet, and ſtriking vp of the drum, preſently giuen, and the enemie (with more haſt than the extreme heat of the day required) furiouſly charged by the emperours horſemen, who to auoid the danger of the great artillerie, made all the haſt they could to come to handie blowes. In the formoſt of theſe horſemen was Ferdinand Gonzaga, a moſt valiant noble man, who then ſerued the emperour without charge: he being ſomewhat before the reſt at the firſt onſet, ſlew with his
F launce a notable Captaine of the Moores, and preſently with his ſword ſo troubled them that were next, that he opened a way for them that followed him, to breake into the enemies battell. The harquebuſiers alſo diſcharged ſo faſt vpon the enemy, that three hundred of them lay dead vpon the ground before the ioyning of the battell: which the reſt of the footmen ſeeing, forſook their great ordinance, and fled backe to Barbaruſſa. Who long endured not the force or ſight of the Chriſtians; but grinding his teeth for ſorrow and griefe of mind, turned his horſe, and with his Turkes retired into TVNES. For now that his deſignes had in the beginning taken ſo euill G ſucceſſe, he thought it not beſt to aduenture all in one battell; knowing right well that the emperours armie could not long endure the inconueniences of the intollerable heat, and want of manie things, eſpecially of freſh water: which fed him with hope, that hee ſhould out of theſe his enemies diſtreſſes picke ſome fit occaſion of aduantage, if he could but a while defend the citie of TVNES. The Numidians and Moores, who in great troupes and companies had alwaies houered about the emperours armie, without doing any thing worth reporting, retired themſelues alſo into the ſuburbs, gardens, and other places neere vnto the citie.

The emperour glad of the flight of his enemies which were thought to haue beene in number an hundred thouſand, encamped with his armie that night in the ſame place where they before lay; determining the next day to batter the wals of TVNES, In the meane time, Barbaruſſa ſur- H priſed with an exceeding feare, and diſtracted with many cares, and now become more cruell than himſelfe, had in his minde purpoſed a fact full of exceeding and inhumane cruelty; which was at once to haue killed all the Chriſtian captiues in the caſtle of TVNES: fully reſolued to haue put the ſame in execution, had not Sinan the Iew diſſuaded him from that moſt execrable fact, proteſting ſuch a practice to be vnſeemely for a man of his valor, famous for his many victories, and carrying with him the maieſty of a king: whereas hee would ſhortly after wonderfully repent him for doing ſo ſhamefull a fact: The doing whereof, what was it elſe (as the Iew ſaid) but a manifeſt demonſtration of his extreame feare, and deſperation? which two things were moſt dangerous to him, that was to maintaine ſo doubtfull a warre, and would much deface the glory of his former life; wherefore hee ſhould doe well to beware, that by the fame of I ſuch a moſt horrible fact, he did not prouoke Solymans heauy diſpleaſure againſt him: who deuoid of all humane cruelty, had vſed both to deteſt and reuenge ſuch outrages. Wherefore hee ſhould ſuffer the Chriſtian captiues to liue bound in their fatall chaines, ſo long as it were their fortunes; who being well kept and vnarmed, might ſhortly after ſerue him to good purpoſe, and could no way without moſt certaine danger moue themſelues, if they ſhould vnaduiſedly luſt after their vnlucky liberty: for by them, the expected victory could neither be giuen to the enemie, nor taken from him, or yet ſo much as hindred. At which ſpeech the tyrant was aſhamed, and ſo ſparing the liues of the poore wretches, went out of the caſtle into the greateſt church of TVNES, whither he had cauſed to be aſſembled all the chiefe men of the citie, to tell them what he would haue done for the defence of the citie, and now by perſuaſion to encourage them to K fight: from whom as men by him holden in diſtruſt, he had but a little before the comming of the Chriſtians, taken all manner of armour and weapon.

Whileſt Barbaruſſa was thus buſied, the moſt ioyfull and happie day appeared to thoſe miſerable captiues; by fortunes change no leſſe black and diſmal vnto the Turks and Moores. For that hainous purpoſe of the cruel tyrant, could not long be couered or kept ſecret: ſo that a conſtant report of a danger ſo imminent, was run thorow the whole caſtle, euen into deepe dungeons; by the compaſſion of certaine manumiſed ſlaues, who deteſting the ſauage crueltie of Barbaruſſa their maſter, and touched with deuotion, had in heart returned to their old and true Chriſtian religion; encouraging by ſecret ſpeeches the cheefe of the captiues with whom they were acquainted, to lay hand now vpon their libertie. Amongſt theſe well minded men was L one Francis a Spaniard, whom Barbaruſſa had from his youth brought vp as his minion, hauing him alwaies in great eſteeme by the name of Memis; and another called Vincentius Catereus of DALMATIA an eunuch: Theſe two aduenturing a moſt memorable and godly attempt, ſet open the priſon doores, and gaue inſtruments vnto the poore priſoners, readie to take the occaſion offered; who boldly ſtarting vp, brake off their chaines and giues, and ſo by the great goodneſſe and mercie of God, about ſix thouſand poore naked Chriſtians, armed with that came firſt in hand, but eſpecially with ſtones, brake forth ſuddenly vpon the Turkes that were in the caſtle. Ramadas a renegate Spaniard captaine of the caſtle, ſtirred vp with the vnexpected and terrible noiſe of ſo many priſoners breaking their yrons, with a few ſouldiours whom hee had ſuddenly called vnto him, ran to the caſtle gate, where one of the priſoners (a luſtie young man M of SICILIA) had with one of the bars of the gate ſtrucke downe one or two of the warders and hauing bolted the gate, was become maſter thereof: him Ramadas ſlew, and opening the gate, made way for himſelfe and his few followers, with whom hee went to Barbaruſſa to carry him newes of that his hard miſchance: But the Chriſtians now loſed from their bands, and hauing

ſuddenly

A ſuddenly ſlaine diuers of the Turks, poſſeſſed themſelues of all the caſtle, brake open the armorie, and ſo ſeizing vpon the kings treaſure, armour and prouiſion, from a high turret gaue ſignes of victory to the Chriſtian armie by ſmoke and falſe fires made with gunpowder; and laſtly by diſplaying of Sarmentus his enſigne, which (as wee haue before declared) was by Tabacches taken from the top of the trenches at the ſiege of GVLETTA. Theſe ſignes, although the Chriſtians in the armie could not well perceiue, as being too farre off: yet by the fugitiues which came oftentimes out of TVNES to the emperour and Muleaſſes, they were both perſwaded, that ſome great tumult was riſen amongſt the enemies. Wherefore the emperour ſent two of his captaines with their companies, who going as neere as they could to the citie and the caſtle, ſhould diſcouer what the matter was. In the meane time, Barbaruſſa almoſt mad for anger, in his furie blaſ-
B pheming his vaine gods, and bitterly curſing and banning the Iew, for diſſuading him from killing the captiues, came to the caſtle gate, and with teares ſtanding in his eyes pittifully requeſted the late Chriſtian captiues (which then ſtood vpon the top of the wals and the gate with weapons in their hands) That they would forthwith let him in, faithfully promiſing them their libertie, with a generall and free pardon for all that they had done. But they mindfull both of their former and preſent fortune, and mooued with iuſt hatred, caſt ſtones at him, and with many opprobrious words reiected his requeſt: ſo that hee enraged with ſorrow and madneſſe, ſhot at them with his owne hand, and ſeeing all paſt remedie, and the citie not poſſible now to be kept, ſhamefully betooke himſelfe to flight. After him followed the Turks, in number ſeuen thouſand,
C with purpoſe to flie to the citie HIPPONA, now called BONA, famous with the biſhopricke of that reuerend Father and great Diuine Auguſtine. For there (as in a moſt ſure harbour) had Barbaruſſa left foureteene gallies in the lake neere vnto the citie, to ſerue his turne whatſoeuer miſchance ſhould happen: but the tacklings, ſailes, oares, and ordinance, he had laid vp in the caſtle faſt by, which was kept with a garriſon of his owne.

Tunes yeelded to the emperour.

The emperour vnderſtanding that Barbaruſſa with his Turkes was fled, came with all his armie vnto the gates of TVNES, where the magiſtrates of the citie were readie to ſubmit themſelues vnto him, and to deliuer him the keyes of the citie, only requeſting of him that he would
D keep his ſouldiours encamped without the citie, and not to ſeeke the vtter ſpoile and ruine thereof, promiſing that the ſouldiours ſhould want nothing that was there to be had. Muleaſſes alſo carefull of the ſafetie thereof, earneſtly intreated the emperour in the citiſens behalfe. But he, although he was of his owne honourable diſpoſition readie ynough to haue graunted what they requeſted; Yet for that he did not without cauſe doubt of the Moores fidelitie, and that the paiment of the money which they of TVNES had by Muleaſſes promiſed for the payment of the ſoldiors wages, was by them craftily delayed, expecting ſtill the vttermoſt deuoire of Barbaruſſa, he could not by any means be perſuaded to promiſe them any certaintie of their ſafetie: moued alſo ſo to doe by the diſcontented ſpeeches of his ſoldiors, who ſpared not to ſay, That they ſhould be hardly and vnkindly dealt withall, if after ſo long trauell and ſo much paines taken both by ſea & land, they ſhould be defrauded of the reward of the victorie, ſith nothing but only the hope of the preſent ſpoile did relieue and feed them, being poore and miſerable, hauing
E ſcarce clothes to couer their nakednes, and their bodies ſpent with long labour and thirſt; ſo that the Moores of TVNES, enemies of the Chriſtian religion, and the perpetuall receiuers of of moſt horrible pyrats, might worthily reioice of the Chriſtian victorie, and the conquerours themſelues for euer bewaile their owne calamities and miſeries. Whileſt the emperour ſtood thus in doubt what to reſolue vpon, Vaſtius with a ſmall companie came to the caſtle gate, and was with wonderful ioy receiued in by the Chriſtian captiues. But as he was viewing the wealth and prouiſion laid vp in the caſtle, a Ligurian captiue diſcouered vnto him where certaine treaſure lay hidden: for Barbaruſſa had there caſt into a well thirtie thouſand duckats ſowed vp in bags, which Vaſtius getting eaſily out, obtained them of the emperour of gift, as he whoſe good ſeruice had wel deſerued them. The caſtle thus woon by a moſt rare chance, and the captiues ta-
F king the ſpoile thereof, the ſouldiors could no longer be ſtayed, but that they entred into the citie by heapes, running after the ſpoile into euery part therof, the citiſens fearing no ſuch matter, and calling in vaine vpon the faith of Muleaſſes. The ſouldiors at their firſt entrance ſlew many. The Spaniards and Italians ſought moſt after the ſpoile. But the Germanes deſiring more to glut themſelues with the Mahometane bloud, filled all places with dead bodies, without regard of ſex or age; ſo that the prophane temples of their vaine prophet, ſwam with the bloud of them that were fled into them. Which furious execution continued vntill ſuch time as the emperour G

moued with the pittifull requeſt of Muleaſſes, cauſed proclamation to bee made, That no man ſhould vpon paine of death hurt any citiſen, or take any priſoners: yet for all that, it could not otherwiſe be, but that many young men and women were by the marriners (which were come to the ſpoile of the citie) carried away to the fleet.

Muleaſſes for a little money redeemed diuers which hee knew, out of the hands of ſuch as had them priſoners: amongſt others, one of his wiues, whom hee ſometime held deareſt, was ranſomed for two duckats. The emperour entering into the caſtle, commended the captiues, who were the occaſion of that ſpeedy victorie: and giuing to euery one of them money, ſet them at liberty, promiſing vnto them ſhipping and prouiſion to bring them home euery man into his H owne countrey. Vnto the two manumiſed ſeruants of Barbaruſſa, which were the authours of breaking the priſon, he gaue money and apparell, and afterwards learned of them many things concerning Barbaruſſa his purpoſes and ſecret diſpoſition. In the ſpoile of the caſtle, Muleaſſes lamented the loſſe of three things eſpecially: firſt the antient Arabian bookes, containing the interpretation of the Mahometane law, and the acts of the kings his predeceſſors; the loſſe whereof Muleaſſes (in the hearing of P. Iouius, out of whom this hyſtorie is taken) ſaid (as hee reporteth) that he would moſt gladly, if it had been poſſible, haue redeemed with the price of a city: Then the precious oyntments and perfumes, with the wonderfull ſtore of ambergrize, muske, and ciuet, worth much gold: all which Barbaruſſa as a rude and rough man had made no reckoning of. And laſt of all, the rare and rich colours for painting, which lying by heaps, were by the I ignorant ſouldiers, ſeeking for that might yeeld them preſent money, fooliſhly neglected and troden vnderfoot, ſeruing no man to good. In this caſtle were found diuers head-pieces and other armor of the Chriſtians, namely of the French, who with Lewis their king had about three hundred yeares before beſieged that caſtle: which armour had beene vntill that time there kept by the Moores, in remembrance of that victory againſt the Chriſtians.

Three things eſpecially lamented by Muleaſſes in the ſpoile of the caſtle of Tunes.

Barbaruſſa in the meane time was come to the riuer of Bagrada, which the Moores call Maiordech, which he eaſily paſſed ouer, though he was purſued by certain Numidian horſmen, whom Muleaſſes had raiſed of his old friends, and of the followers of his vncle Dorax, and ſent them to purſue the Turks: but Barbaruſſa ſo marched with his harquebuſiers and archers placed in the rereward, that the Numidian horſemen durſt not come neere him, and ſo in ſafety came K to HIPPONA, as he had before purpoſed. Yet in paſſing the riuer Bagrada, he loſt Haydin of SMIRNA, that famous pyrat: who being a fat man, and wearied with the heate of the Sunne and painefulneſſe of the journey, dranke ſo much, that he preſently died vpon the banke of the riuer.

Barbaruſſa flieth to Hippona, and there comforteth his ſouldiors.

When Barbaruſſa was come to HIPPONA, he reſted his men two dayes: then calling them together againe, he comforted them with good words, perſwading them, that whatſoeuer miſchance had happened, they ſhould impute it not to the valour of the enemie, but to the trecherie of the ſlaues; exhorting them as valiant men patiently to endure that frowne of fortune, and by ſome notable exploit to win againe her fauour: for he was determined to put to ſea with the fleet he had, and to goe preſently from thence to ALGIERS, where after he had with new ſupplies increaſed his power, and augmented his fleet, and better aduiſed himſelfe, he would take an L attempt in hand anſwerable to their deſires, and not vnbeſeeming his owne credit and eſtimation. It is reported, that neuer vanquiſhed and beaten captaine was with a more cheerefull acclamation anſwered by his ſouldiors, than hee was at that preſent; they all with one conſent moſt willingly requeſting him to command whatſoeuer pleaſed him, which they would neuer refuſe to vndertake, were it neuer ſo heauie or dangerous, ſo that they might be brought to ſome notable exploit. Barbaruſſa vſing this exceeding cheerefulneſſe and forwardneſſe of his ſouldiors, did with wonderfull celeritie weigh vp the fourteene gallies which he had ſunke in the lake, and forthwith rigged them vp, and furniſhed them for all aſſayes: and vpon the very brinke of the lake caſt vp a mount of earth, whereon he placed certaine pieces of artillerie for defence of the harbour; not vainely coniecturing, that the Chriſtian fleet would in ſhort time come thither to M impeach his going out: pointing therein as it were at the purpoſe of the emperour and Auria his Admirall, who were of opinion, That by ſending part of the fleet thither, thoſe gallies might be drowned in the harbour with the great ordinance, before they could be rigged and made readie. Vnto this peece of ſeruice Auria appointed one Adam, a captaine of GENVA, a man of no great skill in matters at ſea, but yet of great wealth & credit, & the Admirals nigh kinsman: he Auria ſendeth certaine gallies to intercept Barbaruſſa.

A he with certaine galiots and fourteene gallies, ſet forward towards HIPPONA, promiſing vnto himſelfe a moſt certaine and eaſie victorie, hoping to purchaſe vnto himſelfe great honour of the vnprouided enemie: for that hee thought to haue taken Barbaruſſa buſie in ſetting forth of his fleet. But after he was paſt BISERTA and come neere to HIPPONA, he was certainely aduertiſed, that Barbaruſſa had with incredible celerity rigged vp his gallies, and fortified the harbour, by planting great ordinance vpon the mount he had there raiſed. With which newes he wonderfully troubled, changed his purpoſe, perſwaded by the other captaines of the gallies, in no caſe to aduenture to fight with him, becauſe the Spaniſh, Sicilian, and Neapolitan gallies were but weakly manned, many of the ſouldiers being for greedines of the ſpoyle gone aſhoare without leaue at TVNES: ſo that hee ſhould at great diſaduantage fight with the Turks, being
B mo in number and deſperatly bent. Wherefore he vpon good aduiſe preſently changed his former courſe, and returned to the fleet for more aid. Barbaruſſa (as it was afterwards known) ſtood a good while in doubt, whether he ſhould in hope of victory purſue thoſe gallies, for as much as they were in number no more than his owne; or elſe to perſiſt in his former purpoſe of going to ALGIERS. Vnto which opinion all the vnder captaines enclined, being altogether ignorant of the weakeneſſe of the Chriſtians: and ſo letting ſlip a faire occaſion, leauing a ſmall garriſon of Turkes in the caſtle, hee departed from HIPPONA and ſailed alongſt the coaſt to ALGIERS. When Adam was returned againe to the fleet, and had done nothing, many of the Chriſtian princes were wonderfully offended, that by the negligence of ſome who were hardly to be commaunded, and by the vnrulineſſe of others who without leaue were gone aſhoare, ſo faire an oc-
C caſion of the deſired victory, was neglected. For this thing onely wanted vnto the Emperours rare felicity in that war: for if thoſe few gallies had beene taken from the cruell enemy, or ſunke in the ſea, there had beene no meanes for him to haue eſcaped; being verily thought, that the Numidians in number infinit, and deadly enemies vnto the Turks, would with often skirmiſhes out of their knowne places of aduantage, haue ſo cut him off in his long and painfull trauell by land, that they would altogether haue made an end both of him and his followers before hee could haue come to ALGIERS. Auria angry both with himſelfe and thoſe whom he had put in truſt, and yet not out of hope to ouertake his enemy; with his own gallies and ſome other of the beſt ſhips went to HIPPONA: but finding Barbaruſſa gone, hee tooke the city and ouerthrew the wals thereof: but in the caſtle which he by force took from the Turks, he placed Aluarus Gome-
D tius with a ſufficient garriſon, and ſo returned vnto the emperour. This Gometius, although hee was a moſt valiant captaine, yet became ſo infamous for his auaritious dealing both with the enemy and his friends, that for feare how to anſwere ſuch things as he knew would be laid to his charge, he became the infamous executioner of himſelf. The caſtle was afterwards by the commaundement of the emperor, raſed downe to the ground, for that it was not without a maruelluellous charge to be kept. After that, a counſell was holden concerning Muleaſſes, whom the emperour placed againe in the kingdome of TVNES, there to raigne as his anceſtors had done before him; paying him yeerely by the name of a tribute, two faulcons & two Numidian courſers: With condition, that hee ſhould for euer honour the emperour, and be a friend vnto all
E Chriſtians, and an vtter enemy vnto the Turkes: Beſides that, that he ſhould from time to time defray the charges of a thouſand Spaniards and more, to be left in garriſon in the caſtle of GVLETTA; by holding whereof, the emperour kept as it were the keies of that kingdome at his girdle. The Emperour hauing thus honourably driuen Barbaruſſa and the Turkes, pirats, out of TVNES, taken from them their gallies, deliuered the Chriſtians countries all alongſt the ſea-coaſt into the Mediteranean of a great feare, and reſtored Muleaſſes againe to his kingdom: ſayled into SICILIA, where hee was in great triumph receiued at PANORMVS and MESSANA, from whence he paſſed ouer to RHEGIVM into ITALLIE, and from thence by land to NAPLES. Thus was the kingdome of TVNES taken by Barbaruſſa and the Turkes; and by Charles the emperor recouered againe out of their hands the ſelfe-ſame time that Solyman was in perſon himſelfe in F warres againſt the Perſian: whom Barbaruſſa accompanied with Sinan the Iew, after this ouerthrow met at ICONIVM in his returne out of PERSIA, well accepting of their excuſe, as is before declared.

The emperor returneth with victory into Italie.

Solyman as well of his owne ambitious diſpoſition, as following the manner of the Othoman kings, deſirous by all meanes to increaſe the glory of his name, and to enlarge his empire; determined with himſelf to take away from the Portingales all their traffique into the Eaſt Indies. 1537

It

It grieued him to heare, that the Christian religion should begin to take root amongst those Pagan kings, which had not long before receiued the Mahometane religion: Besides that, he was credibly informed, that the Portingales in these late wars he had against the Persians, had aided them with certain harquebusiers, and also had sent them workmen to shew them both the making and vse of great artillerie: But that which moued him most of all, was for that the Portingales by their traffique into the Indies, had cut off all the trade of merchandise into the gulfe of ARABIA, whereby the riches of the East were woont to be transported vnto CAIRE, and so to ALEXANDRIA, from whence they were afterwards by the Venetian merchants and others dispersed into all parts of EVROPE: but now were carried by the great Ocean into PORTINGALL, and from thence conuaied into all parts of Christendome, to the great hinderance of his tributes and customes of ÆGYPT. For these causes, and at the instance of Solyman Bassa an eunuch borne in EPYRVS, and then Gouernour of ÆGYPT, Solyman caused wonderfull preparation to be made, for the building of a great fleet in the red sea to go against the Portingals. All the timber whereof, was cut downe in the mountaines of CILICIA, and shipped in the bay of ATTALIA in the bottome of the Mediterranian, from whence it was by sea transported to PELVSIVM, and so vp the riuer of Nilus to CAIRE: where after it was framed and readie to be set togither, it was with infinit labour, and no lesse charge, carried by land with Camels thorow that hoat and sandie countrie, from CAIRE to SVETIA, a port of the Red sea, called in ancient time ARSINOE. From which place eightie miles distant from CAIRE, the auncient kings of ÆGYPT seeking by vaine and wonderfull workes to eternise the memorie of themselues, had with incredible charge cut thorow all that maine land, so that vessels of good burthen might come vp the same from ARSINOE to CAIRE: which great cut or ditch, Sesostris the rich king of ÆGYPT, and long after him Ptolomeus Philadelphus, purposed to haue made a great deale wider and deeper, and thereby to haue let the Red sea into the Mediterranean, for the readier transportation of the Indian merchandise to CAIRE and ALEXANDRIA. Which mad worke Sesostris preuented by death, could not perform: and Ptolomeus otherwise persuaded by skilful men, in time gaue ouer; for feare least by letting in the great South sea into the Mediterranean, he should thereby as it were with another generall deluge haue drowned the greatest part of GRÆCIA, and many other goodly countries in ASIA, and with exceeding charge, in steed of honor haue purchased himselfe eternall infamie. Yet by the singular industry of Solyman the eunuch, who with seuere commaundement enforced all the people of the countries thereabouts to the furtherance of the building of that fleet; hee had with wonderfull celerity in short time new built eighty tall ships and gallies at ARSINOE, and furnished them with men, and all things else needfull for so long a voyage. At which time, he vpon a quarrell pickt without cause, but not without the good liking of Solyman, most iniuriously confiscated the goods of the Venetian marchants at ALEXANDRIA and CAIRE, and thrust the marriners into his gallies as slaues. With which fleete in most warlike manner appointed, Solyman the Bassa accompanied with Assan-beg, commonly called the Moore of ALEXANDRIA, a most famous pyrat and an excellent seaman, set forward against the Portingals: and sayling thorow the Red sea, and so Eastward by the gulfe of PERSIA, came at length as farre as the great riuer Indus, where with all his power he assaulted DIVM a castle of the Portingals, scituate vpon the mouth of that great riuer: but in conclusion, after he had many daies besieged the castle both by sea & land, and tried the vttermost of his strength, he was so repulsed by the Portingals, that he was glad to forsake the siege, and leauing his great ordinance behind him for hast, returned backe againe to ADEN, a city of great trade in ARABIA FELIX: Where discouraged with the euill successe hee had against the Portingals, because hee would be thought to haue done something, hee allured the king of that rich city to come vnto him, vpon his false faith before giuen for his safe returne: but as soone as he had him aboord, he like a perjured wretch hanged him vp at the yards arme of his Admirall galley, and so surprising the citie, enriched himselfe with the spoile thereof. The like barbarous cruelty hee vsed at ZIBYTH, another famous port of ARABIA, where the pilgrims of the East doe commonly land when they after the manner of their superstition come to visit the temple of their false prophet at MECHA: The king of which place, together with all his nobility he cruelly murthered, contrary to his faith giuen: and so trauelling himselfe by land to MECHA, as if he had been some deuout pilgrim, sent backe his fleet by the Moore to SVETIA, hauing performed against the Portingals nothing at all.

At

A At the ſame time Solyman by the perſuaſion of Lutzis and Aiax (the Baſſaes of greateſt authoritie about him, now that Abraham was dead) turned all his forces from the Perſians, as men agreeing with him in the cheefe points of his Mahometane ſuperſtition, with purpoſe to conuert the ſame vpon ITALIE: wherunto he was earneſtly ſollicited by Iohn Forreſt the French kings embaſſadour, then lying at CONSTANTINOPLE, of purpoſe to incite Solyman againſt Charles the emperour, aſſuring him that he was not of ſuch power, as at one time to defend APVLIA againſt him, and the dukedome of MILLAINE againſt the French king: who (as hee ſaid) was determined that Summer to inuade that part of ITALIE. And to further the matter, about the ſame time one Troilus Pignatellus, a noble gentleman, ſometime commaunder in Charles the B emperours armie, but then exiled out of NAPLES, fled vnto Solyman (and for ſo much as he was a man of name, and like to doe him great ſeruice in the inuaſion of APVLIA, as one which knew the country well, and promiſed vnto him good ſucceſſe in that warres, was by Solyman honourably entertained amongſt his Mutfaracas: which is a certaine company of horſemen for their approued valour, choſen out of all nations, hauing the free exerciſe of their religion whatſoeuer without controulement, and are onely bound to attend vpon the perſon of the great Turke when he goeth to warres. The cauſe of his reuolt was, for that the viceroy of NAPLES had executed Andrew his brother, one of the knights of the RHODES. But being now growen into great fauour with Solyman and the Baſſaes, and oftentimes called to counſel in the preparation of that warre, caſting off all naturall loue of his countrey, ceaſed not by all meanes to per-
C ſwade Solyman to inuade the ſame, aſſuring him, that the people of APVLIA and SALERNE oppreſſed with grieuous tribute and exactions by the emperours officers, would at the firſt reuolt, eſpecially if they ſaw any of the French nation to cleaue vnto. And that which mooued him more then all the reſt, the auncient Turkes told him into what a feare all ITALIE was ſtrucken, at ſuch time as Achmetes the Baſſa hauing taken HYDRVNTVM, had vndoubtedly conquered not onely the kingdome of NAPLES, but the citie of ROME alſo, and all the reſt of ITALIE, had not the vntimely death of Mahomet his great grandfather interrupted the courſe of that victory. Which perſwaſions wrought ſuch effect in Solyman, that he once fully reſolued for the inuaſion of ITALLIE, made ſuch expedition both by ſea and land, that he himſelfe in perſon was come with two hundred thouſand men vnto AVLONA, the moſt conuenient port of MACE-
D DONIA for the tranſporting of his armie, before it was thought in ITALIE that hee was ſet forward from CONSTANTINOPLE: where hee had not long ſtayed, but Lutzis Baſſa his Admirall, accompanied with Barbaruſſa, ſayling alongſt the coaſt of PELOPONESVS and EPIRVS, and ſo paſſing by CORCYRA, where Hieronimus Piſaurius, Admirall of the Venetian fleet lay with his gallies (after mutuall ſalutation done after the manner of ſea, by ſhooting off their great pieces in token of friendſhip) put into the hauen of AVLONA alſo. Solyman not purpoſing to loſe any time, and hauing ITALIE now in his ſight, commanded Lutisz and Barbaruſſa to paſſe ouer with the fleet vnto OTRANTO, and to prooue the minds of the people; that if the firſt enterpriſe fell out well, hee might preſently follow after with all his armie. With them went alſo Troilus Pignatellus, as forward to the deſtruction of his country, as any of the reſt. Hee knowing
E that the great cities of HYDRVNTVM and BRVNDVSIVM were kept with ſtrong Garriſons of Charles the emperour, leauing HYDRVNTVM on the right hand, directed the Turkes to a towne vpon the ſea coaſt, eight miles off, called CASTRVM, neere vnto which ſtandeth a caſtle vpon a hill then belonging to Mercurinus Catinarius: who being a man vnacquainted with warres, and terrified with the ſudden comming of the Turks, and perſwaded by Troilus, yeelded vp his Caſtle, vpon condition that the Turks ſhould offer no violence or injurie vnto him or his, either in bodie or goods. Vpon which condition the towne of CASTRVM was alſo deliuered vnto them. But the Turkes, eſpecially the greedy marriners, being got into the caſtle and the town, moued neither with the intreaty of Troilus, nor the commandement of Lutzis and Barbaruſſa, rifled the towne and caſtle, and carried away with them Mercurinus himſelfe, with all the floure of F the people, to their gallies as priſoners. But Lutzis aſhamed of ſuch faithleſſe dealing, preſently ſet Mercurinus at liberty againe. At the ſame time alſo Solyman had by night ſent ouer certaine troupes of light horſemen, in great palendars: which running all alongſt the ſea coaſt from TARENTVM to BRVNDVSIVM, carried away with them both the people and cattell, and whatſoeuer els came in their way by the ſpace of forty miles. So that all that countrey of SALENTINVM, now called OTRANTO, was filled with feare and danger; and had not there ſtayed, but was like enough to haue ouerwhelmed all ITALIE, by the comming ouer of Solyman with his G whole armie, had not the raſhnes of one Venetian captaine by vnexpected chance turned that tempeſt from the Italians vpon the Venetians themſelues.

Alexander Contarenus, a valiant Captaine of the Venetians, meeting with certaine of the Turkes gallies, which would neither vaile their top ſailes, nor in token of reuerence and friendſhip, diſcharge any of their great Ordinance, as of dutie they ought to haue done in thoſe ſeas where the Venetians commanded; offended with their proud inſolency, fiercely aſſailed them, and in fight ſunke two of them: wherein Vſtamenes Gouernour of CALIPOLIS, a man of no ſmal reputation among the Turks, was reported to haue periſhed. Which outrage done by Contarenus in a moſt vnfit time (to the great hurt of the Venetian eſtate, as it appeared afterward) was imputed to his owne priuate grudge which he bare againſt the Turks, for that they intercepted H a ſhip of his as ſhe was comming out of the Eaſt countries laden with rich merchandiſe: ſo that it was thought, that he to pleaſe himſelfe in reuenging of his owne priuate injurie, regarded not what in that dangerous time might enſue thereof to the common ſtate.

A little before the comming ouer of the Turkes into ITALIE, Andreas Auria the Emperours Admirall lying at MESSANA in SICILIA, vnderſtanding that Solyman was come with his armie to AVLONA, and that his fleet was arriued there alſo, put to ſea, directing his courſe towards the Ilands of CAPHALENIA and ZACYNTHVS, hoping (as indeed it fell out) to meete with the taile of the Turkes fleet: for there according to his expectation hee chanced vpon diuers of the Turks victuallers, whom hee eaſily tooke. The marriners he chained in his owne gallies for ſlaues, and furniſhing his fleet with the victuall which was not for him prouided, fired the ſhips. I Iunusbeius with two gallies driuen by the Venetians vpon the Acroceraunian rocke.

Whileſt Auria was thus beating too & fro in the Ionian ſea, it fortuned that Solyman ſent Iunuſbeius his chiefe interpreter, a man whom hee made no ſmall account of, with two gallies on a meſſage to Lutzis his Admirall. This proud Turke comming neere CORCYRA, where the Venetian Admirall lay with his fleet, offered ſcornefully to paſſe, without vayling: which his pride tending to the diſgrace of the Venetians, certaine of the Venetian captains not enduring, ſet vpon him with ſuch furie, that the Turkes were enforced to runne both their gallies on ſhore vpon the coaſt of EPIRVS, neere vnto the mountaines called ACROCERAVNII, where hauing eſcaped the danger at ſea, they fell almoſt all into the hands of the cruell mountaine people, liuing for the moſt part by theft, and waiting for wrackes, as hawkes for their prey: by theſe ſhamers the Turkes were ſtript of all they had, and Iunusbeius with much adoe redeeming himſelfe K out of their hands, returned to Solyman. Auria ſayling alongſt the ſea coaſt, chanced vpon theſe gallies, and finding them ſore bruſed, ſet fire on them.

For theſe vnkind parts, the Turkes were wonderfully offended with the Venetians, & greeuouſly complained of them to Solyman: although the Venetian Admiral laboured by all means he could to appeaſe Iunusbeius, and to excuſe the matter, as a thing done by great ouerſight on both ſides. Vpon theſe ſmall occaſions, the Turkes ſought to breake off the league with the Venetians; which fell out ſo much the ſooner, for that about the ſame time Auria ſayling vp and downe the Ionian ſea, and diligently looking into euery harbour to intercept ſuch as ſtragled from the Turkes fleet, happened by night to light vpon twelue of Solymans great gallies neere vnto CORCYRA, all filled with his Ianizaries and choice horſemen of the court, the beſt ſouldi- L ors of the Turks, who had by land ſent their horſes to the campe by their lackies, and were comming themſelues with the Ianizaries by ſea. Auria falling vpon theſe gallies, had with them a cruell and deadly fight: For they as reſolute men, wiſhing rather to die than to yeeld vnto their enemies, with inuincible courage maintained a moſt bloudy fight againſt Auria with his thirtie gallies excellently appointed, vntill ſuch time as moſt part of them were ſlaine, and the reſt ſore wounded; who ſeeing no remedie, but that they muſt needs come into the hands of their enemies, threw their ſcimitars ouerbourd, becauſe thoſe choice weapons ſhould not come into the hands of the Chriſtians. In this conflict Auria loſt alſo many of his beſt ſouldiers: yet hauing got the victorie, and poſſeſſed of the gallies, hee ankered neere vnto CORCYRA, there to take view of his owne harmes and the enemies: but whileſt he rid there at anker, hee was aduertiſed, M that Barbaruſſa was comming againſt him with foureſcore gallies. Wherfore knowing himſelfe too weake to encounter ſo ſtrong an enemy, he departed thence, and returned againe to MESSANA to repaire his fleet. Solyman thorowly chafed with the loſſe of his gallies and beſt ſouldiors, and with the double iniury done vnto him by the Venetians, fell into ſuch a rage, that hee

A curſed Barbaruſſa, as one who in theſe warres had done him no good ſeruice; and thundered out greeuous threats againſt the Venetians, ſaying hee was vnder the colour of an antient league by them deceiued and greatly abuſed, & that they were ſecretly confederated with Charles his enemie, and had for that cauſe (as they had alwaies) holpen Auria with intelligence, and all things neceſſary, receiuing him into their harbours, and by their eſpials giuing him knowledge of the order of his fleet, that ſo hee might at his owne aduantage ſurpriſe his gallies, as he had alreadie done: vnto which fire, Iunusbeius his interpreter, Barbaruſſa and Aiax laid new coales, more and more incenſing the tyrant, who was of himſelfe ſufficiently inflamed, perſuading him by all meanes they could to breake the league with the Venetians. Wherein Iunusbeius ſought to re-

H after the ſpoile of the Iſlands neere hand, eſpecially of CORCYRA (now called CORFV) ZACYNTHVS, and CEPHALENIA, all ſubiect to the Venetian ſigniorie, finding the warres in ITALIE more dangerous and difficult than they had before imagined. For the French king came not then into ITALIE, as was by them expected: and it was commonly reported, That Petrus Toletanus, viceroy of NAPLES, hauing put ſtrong garriſons into the townes all alongſt the ſea coaſt, was comming himſelfe with a great armie: beſide that, the horſemen ſent ouer from AVLONA, raunging about in the countrey of SALENTVM for ſpoile, were many times cut off by Scipio Sommeius, a noble gentleman, there Gouernour for the Emperour. Wherefore Solyman chan-

Whereupon he forthwith ſent a great part of his armie vp into the Solyman inuadeth the Iſland of Corcyra.

When Solyman had thus fully reuenged himſelfe vpon this barbarous nation, he purpoſed to inuade the Iſland of CORCYRA, now called CORFV, part of the Venetian ſegniorie: ſending before Barbaruſſa with his great artillerie, whom he had but a little before called out of ITALIE with his forces. Biſaurius the Venetian Admirall in good time foreſeeing the tyrants purpoſe, ſtrengthened the garriſons in both the caſtles of CORFV, with new ſupplies of good ſouldiours ſent out of the gallies, and knowing himſelfe vnable to incounter with the Turks great fleet at ſea, withdrew himſelfe farther off from the Iſland into the gulfe of the Adriatique, to the intent

F to ioine his power with Ioannes Veturius, who kept that ſea with another fleet of the Venetian

M gallies, and ſo with ioined forces to defend the Venetian coaſts againſt the Turkes: whom hee thought himſelfe ſtrong ynough for, with the helpe of Veturius and of Auria, whoſe comming was dayly expected. Solyman ſending a great part of his armie out of the maine into the Iſland, burnt and deſtroyed the countrey villages, leading away a wonderfull number of poore countrey people into moſt miſerable captiuitie. Aiax the Baſſa, and Barbaruſſa in two ſmall pinnaces, came as neere vnto the citie of CORFV as they possibly could, to see which way they might G most conueniently lay siege vnto it: but perceiuing the great strength therof, being wonderfully fortified, and thorowly manned, they aduertised Solyman, that it was a place impregnable. Aloysius Ripa, and Symon Leonius, two Senators of VENICE were then gouernors of CORFV, who not without cause standing in doubt of the great strength of the Turks both by sea & land, caused the suburbs of the citie (which were verie great & sumptuously built) to be pluckt down, for feare that the Turks shrouding themselues in them, should with more ease besiege the town. This was a wofull and lamentable thing to behold, when as at the same time a man might haue seene the magnificent houses of the Venetian merchants, built in time of long peace, both for profit and for pleasure in euerie place of the Island, and set on fire by the Turkes: But the regard of the publike state in so great a danger, made all those goodly things which went so to H wracke, to be lightly accounted of in comparison of their liues and libertie; for as much as those lost things might with new charge be againe in short time recouered.

The two Venetian gouernours aforesaid, fearing a long siege, and not prouided of victuall to suffice such a multitude as were got into the citie, for any long time; vsed a heauie and sharp remedie, by turning a great number of weake people and children vnable for seruice, out of the citie; of whom many, especially children, died in the towne ditches in their mothers armes vnder the walls of the citie, not daring to go any further for feare of the enemie, who had fast by in places conuenient cast vp great mounts, and planted his ordinance against the citie: only the castle called S. Angelo standing in the middle of the Island, about fifteene miles from the citie of CORFV, being valiantly defended by the inhabitants against the assaults of the Turkes, happily I saued aboue three thousand poore people which fled thither from the furie of the Turkes, who in all other places of the Island had made all desolate. The Turkes the more to terrifie them of CORFV, taking a hill not farre from the citie, couered the same with their tents, and from the rocke called MARIPETRVS, shot with their great ordinance into the towne: some of them in the meane time standing close in the ruines of the suburbs, did with their harquibusiers kill or wound them which appeared vpon the wals. The gallies also did oftentimes out of their prows discharge their great pieces against the citie; to the greater terrour than hurt of the defendants. Solyman perceiuing that he did but lose his labour in besieging the citie, as he was told at the first by his great captaines, Lutzis, Aiax, and Barbarussa; determined now to raise his siege, and to returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, greatly ashamed that he had no better sped neither in K ITALLIE, nor at the siege of CORFV. But when he was about to haue departed, it was told him how vnfaithfully some of his soldiors had dealt with them of CASTRVM in ITALIE; who yeelding themselues vpon the Turks faith to them giuen for the safegard of their libertie and goods, were neuertheless most iniuriously spoiled of all that they had, and caried away into bondage. Which fact as tending to the dishonour of his name, and the deterring of others from yeelding, Solyman tooke in so euill part, that for amending thereof, he caused the authors of that fact to be put to death, and the captiues of CASTRVM to be diligently sought out, and sent home againe into their countrie: well deseruing therein the commendation of a most iust prince. The Turks left the siege of CORFV and departed out of the Island about the twelfth of September, in the L yeare 1537: carrying away with them aboue sixteen thousand of the Island people into perpetuall captiuitie. So Solyman rising with his armie, marching thorow ACARNANIA and ÆTOLIA, returned thorow MACEDONIA to CONSTANTINOPLE: hauing in this his expedition done great harme both in ITALIE and CORCYRA, but yet nothing increased his empire or honour.

Good iustice done by Solyman

The Turks depart from Corfu, and carie away with thē about sixteenthousand Christians into captiuitie.

Before his departure, calling vnto him Lutzis his Admirall, he commaunded him also to returne with his fleet to HELLESPONTVS: who passing by ZAZINTHVS, and landing some of his men in the night, tooke diuers of the countrie people prisoners. But vnderstanding that the citie it selfe was both strong and well manned, he departed thence to CYTHERA, where vnfortunately attempting to haue taken the castle, & disappointed of his purpose, he made what spoile he could vpon that Island, and with eight hundred prisoners returned into ÆGIVM to ÆGINA, M a rich and famous Island, and well peopled both with mariners and other inhabitants. Approching the Island, he by his messengers sent before vnto the Gouernor of the citie, attempted first by faire meanes, and afterwards by threats to haue had the citie yeelded vnto him: and not so preuailing, but perceiuing them to stand vpon their defence, he landed his men and gaue the signall

A nall of battell. Which they of the Iſland refuſed not, but manfully met him, and at the firſt encounter ſlew many of his men: wherewith the Admirall grieuouſly offended, and ſtill landing freſh men, euen with his multitude oppreſſed them of the Iſland, being but in number few, and wearie of long fight; and ſo inforced them to retire into the citie.

Aegina with other Iſlands of the Aegeum ſpoiled.

To be reuenged of this iniurie, the Baſſa cauſed certaine pieces of great ordinance to be landed, and a batterie planted againſt the citie: by force whereof, he had in ſhort time in diuers places opened the wals, and then with all his power aſſaulting the breaches, forthwith tooke the citie: which after he had rifled, he burnt it downe to the ground, raſed the wals, and put the men euery mothers ſonne to the ſword. As for the women, he gaue them without reſpect vnto the luſt of his ſouldiors and marriners, whom afterwards together with the boies and young chil-
B dren he ſhipped into the countrie neere vnto ATHENS, to be from thence conuaied to CONSTANTINOPLE into moſt miſerable ſeruitude.

ÆGINA thus vtterly raſed, he with much like force and crueltie raged vpon them of PAROS, and the other Iſlands thereabouts, killing the old men and ſuch as made reſiſtance, and thruſting the reſt into his gallies. Shortly after he came to the Iſland of NAXOS, where all the Iſland people were for feare of his comming, fled out of the countrie into the citie: there landing his men, he made hauocke of whatſoeuer came to his hand. And in the meane time ſent a meſſenger vnto the duke, to will him to yeeld himſelfe and his citie into the obedience of the Turkiſh emperour Solyman. Which meſſenger admitted into the citie, and brought before the duke, in blunt and plaine tearmes, without farther circumſtance, deliuered his meſſage as followeth:

The blunt ſpeech of a Turke ſent by Lutzis Baſſa vnto the duke of Naxos.

If thou wilt without more adoe, yeeld thy ſelfe, thy citie and territorie to the Conſtantinopolitane emperour, thou ſhalt deſerue his fauour, and ſo ſaue thy ſelfe with that thou haſt. But if thou otherwiſe aduiſed, ſhalt now refuſe this grace, thou ſhalt neuer hereafter haue the like offer: but for euer vndoe thy ſelf, thy wife and children, thy citizens and ſubiects in generall. Here is preſent a moſt mightie fleet with moſt valiant and victorious ſouldiors, furniſhed with all the habiliments of war requiſite for battell or ſiege. Be warned by them of ÆGINA, PAROS, and other thy neighbour princes of the Iſlands. Thy hap is good, if thou be not miſaduiſed; and warned by other mens harmes wilfully refuſe to remedie thine own; and when thou mighteſt be ſafe, wilfully caſt away thy ſelfe.

D This ſaid, hee was commaunded by the duke to ſtand aſide, and a while to expect his anſwere: who with the chiefe of his ſubiects there preſent, but much troubled, and all full of heauines and ſorrow, conſulted what anſwere to make. But after they had according to the waightineſſe of the cauſe and neceſſitie of the time fully debated the matter, it was with generall conſent agreed, That for as much as they were not themſelues of power to withſtand ſo furious an enemie, neither to expect for helpe from others, they ſhould therefore yeeld vnto the preſent neceſſitie, which otherwiſe threatned vnto them vtter deſtruction, and reſerue themſelues vnto better times. Whereupon anſwere was giuen vnto the meſſenger by the duke, That he was readie to yeeld himſelfe vnto Solyman as his vaſſaile, and of him as of his ſoueraigne to hold his ſeigniorie for the yearely tribute of fiue thouſand duckats. Of which offer the Baſſa accepted,
E receiuingin hand one yeares tribute. So was that notable Iſland yeelded vnto the Turkiſh obeiſance the 11 of Nouember this yeare 1537: from whence Lutzis the proud Baſſa laded with this rich ſpoile of the countries and Iſlands he had paſſed by, returned to CONSTANTINOPLE with his fleet. Not long after, this great Baſſa then in credit and authoritie next vnto Solyman himſelfe, fell at ods with his wife, Solymans ſiſter: for that he after the vnnaturall manner of thoſe barbarous people kept in his houſe a moſt delicat youth, in whom he tooke more pleaſure than in his wife. Which ſhe being a woman of great ſpirit not able to endure, and knowing her huſband by marrying of her to haue bin from baſe degree aduanced vnto the higheſt honours that the emperour her brother could heape vpon him, in great rage reproued him with moſt bitter words, ſaying, That ſhe had married him to be of him beloued, and vſed as his wife, and not
F contemptuouſly abuſed by his minions. Wherewith the Baſſa moued, gaue her a blow on the eare, and cauſed her as a fooliſh and vnquiet woman to be ſhut vp in her chamber. But ſhe not brooking ſuch abuſe, came weeping to Solyman her brother, and complaining of her huſband, requeſted to be diuorſed from him, who made no better reckoning of her: And with her complaint ſo incenſed Solyman, that he tooke from him his ſeale, and thruſt him out of all his honorable promotions,and had vndoubtedly put him to death,had not the remembrance of his old loue and friendship staied his furie:yet hauing vtterly disgraced him,he banished him the court into MACEDONIA,where he spent the remainder of his loathed life like as a poore priuat man:of whom Boisardus thus writeth. Whilest princely dame of royall bloud,doth in thy chamber lie?

And set thee vp with princes great,to worke thy greater fall.

Solyman thus fallen out with the Venetians,as is aforesaid,to intangle them at once with warr in diuers places,commanded his lieutenants in euery place bordering vpon any part of the Venetian seighiorie,to vex and molest them with all bostilitie,which they did accordingly: In PELOPONESVS,Cassimes besieged MAVPLIVM and EPIDAVRVS, two strong cities of the Venetians: Barbarussa landing his men in DALMATIA,surprised the auncient citie of BOTROTVS, belonging to the Venetians, caried away the citisens and raised the citie: OBROATIVM another citie of the Venetians in DALMATIA, called in auncient time ARGIRVTVM, with the castle of NADIN,were taken by Vstref,Solymans lieutenant in ILLYRYA. The Venetians thus inuaded on euery side, requited them againe with the like: Pisaurius and Veturius (the Venetian Admirals) landing their men, besieged SCARDONA,a citie of the Turkes in the borders of DALMATIA, which they tooke by force,put the Turkes to the sword,and ouerthrew the wals of the citie,because it should be no more a refuge vnto the Turks: They sent also one of their captains called Gabriel Ribeus to besiege OBROATIVM; who vpon the comming of Amurathes, one of Vstref his captaines,cowardly fled,and in flight lost most of his men; for which his cowardise, Pisaurius caused his head to be struck off aboord the Admirall gallie: And Camillus Vrsinus appointed by the Venetian state gouernor of IADERA, a strong towne vpon the frontiers of their territorie in DALMATIA, tooke from the Turkes the towne of OSTROVIZZA, which he burnt downe to the ground: He recouered also OBROATIVM, which was a little before lost; which by the commaundement of the Senat he vtterly rased, as place not well to be kept against the enemie, K

The Turks spoile the Venetians, and the Venetians them likewise.

The same Autumne that Solyman hauing wasted CORCYRA was returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, and the Venetians held warres with the Turkes for the towns and castles in DALMATIA: king Ferdinand receiued such an ouerthrow at EXER by the Turks, as a greater or more shamefull vnto the name of the Christians was hardly in that age seene; if the losse of the choise souldiors and captaines of foure great nations,with the shamefull flight of the generall be well considered. After the battell of MOHAHZ wherein king Lewis was lost, the Turkes hauing gotten the victorie,kept vnto themselues that part of HVNGARIE which is called POSSEGA, because thereby they had a fit passage from BELGRADE further into HVNGARIE. The two great riuers of Sauus and Dranus,running almost with equall distance from the West, taking with them diuers other smaller riuers,before they fal into the great riuer of Danubius Eastward, do on both sides inclose this countrie of POSSEGA, being a rich and plentifull countrie,and wonderfull well peopled: It bordereth vpon the prouinces of CROATIA and CORBANIA, which in times past were at continuall warres with the Turks garrisons thereby in ILLYRYA and BOSNA. L

Mahometes Gouernour of Belgrade.

At that time one Mahometes a most valiant captaine of the Turkes was Gouernour of BELGRADE, to whom for his approued valour and wisedome Solyman had committed the keeping of those frontiers,and the protection of the kingdome of HVNGARIE in the behalfe of king Iohn. He the yere before had so vsed the matter,that what by force,what by pollicie,he had taken from the Christians aboue thirtie small castles in the countrie (which was sometime part of the patrimonie of the Despot of RASCIA) and had ioined them to the regiment of BOSNA. A One of theſe caſtles amonſt the reſt called E-ᴇ ʀ ᴋ, for the commodious ſituation thereof hee ſtrongly fortified, as that which might giue him paſſage ouer the riuer Dranus into Hvngarie: from whence he fet infinit preyes out of king Ferdinands countrey neere vnto him. Yet was there at that time a certain league betwixt Solyman and Ferdinand, which notwithſtanding after the old cuſtome of thoſe countries for the exerciſe of the garriſon ſouldiors, did beare with the taking of bootie, and light skirmiſhes without any breach thereof; ſo that it were done without any great power or field pieces: which wrong named peace, Mathias and the auncient kings of Hvngarie had of long time vſed with the Turks; doing them with their nimble light horſemen no leſſe harme than they receiued. But the Germans now vſing no ſuch light horſemen, but ſeruing vpon great horſes, and charged with heauie armour, receiued great hurt by thoſe
B light skirmiſhes; the Turkes with their light horſes eaſily ſhunning their charge, and againe at their pleaſure charging them afreſh, when they ſaw the heauie German horſes almoſt wearie and ſpent: by which meanes the German horſemen were oftentimes by the Turkes light horſemen ouerthrowne, and ſo either ſlaine or taken. King Ferdinand not well brooking theſe continuall iniuries, and grieued in mind with the league which Solyman had to his profit made with him at his going into Persia, finding the ſame both vnprofitable and hurtfull to himſelfe; determined to take vp armes, with purpoſe, that if he could driue the Turks out of the countrey of Possega, then forthwith to paſſe ouer Dranus, and to go directly to Bvda againſt king Iohn. It ſtill ſtuck in his mind how that kingdome was taken from him by Solyman, and that more was, as it were in diſgrace of him and the houſe of Avstria, beſtowed vpon a ſtranger, which had
C neither right thereto, nor was any way roially deſcended. Yet were there ſome which wiſhed him not raſhly to enter into armes againſt ſo mightie an enemie, as was not to be vanquiſhed but by the vnited forces of all the Chriſtian princes of Evrope: For they foreſaw that Solyman ſo prouoked, would not put it vp, but for the hatred he bare againſt the Chriſtians, and for his owne honour ſeeke more cruell reuenge: as he had of late done againſt the Venetians, with whom vpon a light occaſion he had broken a moſt auncient league, for ſincking one or two of his gallies; for which he would admit no excuſe or ſatisfaction. All this Ferdinand knew to be true, yet all the people of his dominions lay ſo earneſtly vpon him to take that warre in hand, that they ſaid plainly, they would neuer beare armes more againſt the Turks, if he omitted that occaſion. For they of Carinthia, Stiria, Croatia, and Noricvm, ſubiect to the D inuaſion of the Turks, and daily receiuing great harmes, thought the Turks might eaſily be driuen out of Possega, for as much as Mahometes had no great power nor like to haue any greater, Autumne now almoſt ſpent.

An euill aſſured peace.

King Ferdinād breaketh his league with the Turkes.

So, king Ferdinand with the wonderfull reioycing of his ſubiects, cauſed ſouldiors to be taken vp in all parts of his kingdome, ſending for moſt of his nobilitie and beſt captaines, as to a religious warre: and in a very ſhort ſpace had raiſed a good armie, yet ſuppoſed of greater ſtrength than number, as conſiſting moſt of ſelect men. The footmen were for moſt part Germans, to whom were ioyned as wings certain companies of Italians, harquebuſiers, whom Lewes Lodronius a valiant captaine & generall of the footmen had raiſed in Rhetia, and thoſe parts of Italie which lie neere vnto the Alpes. The horſemen were of Bohemia, Silesia, Moravia,
E Stiria, Carinthia, and ſome alſo out of Hvngarie, all conducted by their ſeuerall captaines: all theſe horſemen were in number eight thouſand, but the footmen were ſixteene thouſand ſtrong: with great ſtore of artillerie of all ſorts. This armie for the expertneſſe and valour of the ſouldiours, was thought ſufficient to haue met the greateſt armie of the Turkes in field, if it had been conducted by a politick Generall, and (as he had at other times been) fortunat: which was one Iohn Cazzianer a noble man of Croatia, whom as one of great experience and famous for the late defence of Vienna, king Ferdinand had made Generall of his armie. For Ferdinand by the aduiſe of his beſt friends, neuer vſed to aduenture his perſon vnto the danger of any battell, eſpecially againſt the Turks, by whom many Chriſtian kings had in former time been vanquiſhed & ſlaine, but performed all his wars by his lieutenants: which he was thought
F to doe, not ſo much for want of courage, as moued with the fatall miſhap of ſo many Chriſtian kings. Mahometes Gouernour of Belgrade, vnderſtanding of this preparation made againſt him, ſent for diuers cōpanies of the garriſon ſouldiors, which lay vpon the borders neere hand; he required aid of the gouernours of the Turkes prouince thereabouts; and was eſpecially holpen by Vſterf Gouernour of Bosna, who of all Solymans lieutenants in Evrope, was able to bring

bring into the field moſt good horſemen: he ſent him Amurathes a famous captain with a great G companie of gallant horſemen, vnto whom were ioined certaine companies of footmen of the wild and mountaine people of DALMATIA, entertained for pay; which rough and rude kind of people were gouerned and kept in order by certaine companies of Ianizaries, drawne out of the garriſon townes as far as BELGRADE and SAMANDRIA: after them followed many out of SERVIA and RARCIA, ſome for pay, ſome for prey. The Turkes receiuer liberally paying to ſuch as were willing to ſerue, two months pay beforehand. Neither wanted he aid of the Hungarians from BVDA: ſo that the Turkiſh gouernours on euerie ſide putting to their helping hands, Mahometes had in ſhort time gathered ſuch an armie, as for number and ſtrength was not much inferior to king Ferdinands, and reſolued to expect the comming of his enemies at EXEK. Cazzianer was now come as farre on his way as CAPRVNZA, a towne vpon the riuer Dranus; H hauing before well and conueniently prouided for the victualling of his armie, if they whom he put in truſt and had taken the matter vpon them, had with like ſpeed and diligence performed their charge: for they were the chiefe men of all the countrie, who all followed the direction of Simon, biſhop of ZAGRABIA: who inflamed with zeale aboue meaſure, or elſe for want of iudgement deceiued, had promiſed to ſerue the whole campe with plentie of victuals at a verie low rate. Which thing, the countrie people which were to bring in the victuall, ſome by waggon, ſome by boats alongſt the riuers, many difficulties now ariſing, were not able to perform: which was not to be remedied, by reaſon of the neereneſſe of the enemie, and alſo for that Mahometes with ſmall gallies in both riuers, and his troupes of horſemen pricking vp and downe the countrie, did either ſtay the countrie people from bringing of victuall, or els allured them I for a greater price to bring it to his owne campe: where they receiued for it readie money. Cazzianer ſetting forward from CAPRVNZA, hardly came in ten daies to the caſtle of VERVCZA, which is about fortie miles diſtant from CAPRVNZA, being inforced to make ſhort marches,
A ſlow march. by reaſon of the troubleſome carriage of ſome great pieces of artillerie for batterie. The wiſer ſort began euen then to miſdoubt the want of victuall both for the reaſons before alledged, and for that ſuch victual as was looked for, came not, although they had marched verie ſoftly; ſo that they were then enforced to ſpend ſuch victuall as they had prouided, not for the beginning, but for the difficulties of a long protracted warre. Wherefore Cazzianer writ ſharpely to the biſhop, and the other which had taken vpon them the charge of prouiding victuall for the armie, K commaunding them to vſe all poſſible diligence and ſpeed, and not to let the hope of a notable victorie to be loſt through their negligence, for want of victuall rather than the valor of the enemie. In the meane time Cazzianer thought good there to ſtay, and to expect the comming of the victuall, ſending before him Paulus Bachitius with a thouſand Hungarian light horſemen, and certaine companies of Italian harquebuſiers, as farre as the caſtle of ZOPIA, to the intent, that he might of ſuch priſoners as he could take, learne ſomething of the enemies purpoſe. The Turks in the caſtle of ZOPIA deſcrying the comming of Bachitius, and thinking the whole armie of the Chriſtians had beene there at hand, ſet fire on the caſtle, which they thought they could not keepe, and by boats fled downe the riuer Dranus. Yet for all their haſt Bachitius took ſome of them in their flight: of whom Cazzianer learned that which he before knew by his L owne eſpials, how that Mahometes and the Turkes lay encamped at EXEK, with a full reſolution to giue him battel. Cazzianer ſetting forward againe, ſtil keeping alongſt the riuer Dranus, came Cazzianer commeth to Walpo. in eight daies to the caſtle of WALPO: where by the way he was glad to ſtay ſeuen daies at the riuer Craſſus, which falleth into Dranus, vntill ſuch time as a bridge was made for the tranſporting of his armie, for that the riuer was not to be waded ouer: in which time Cazzianer entred oftentimes into counſell with the other captaines, what courſe to hold for the better proceeding in that warre. Where diuers men were of diuers opinions, ſome ſaid it were beſt to leaue EXEK, and to beſiege a caſtle of the enemies thereby, called VILLACH: others more wearie than the reſt, were of opinion, That it were better there to ſtay, vntill the reſt of the aide, and the victuall which they dayly expected, were come. But the greater number, which alſo prevailed, vrged the firſt determination of going directly to the enemie at EXEK, for that longer M delay would but breed further danger: and there was in the campe (as they ſaid) both ſtrength and victuall ſufficient for the obtaining of the victorie, if they would make an end of their needleſſe conſultations, and not protract the warre vntill Winter were come on; whereby they did nothing els, but cauſe the ſouldiours to thinke that they were afraid to meet the enemie, and ſecretly

A cretly to ſteale away back againe into their countries: Whereas if they would like reſolute men march on forward againſt the enemie, who at other times truſting moſt vnto his multitudes, and now hauing no great power, would neuer abide the ſight of the Chriſtian armie, bringing with it ſo much artillerie, but would forthwith forſake the place, and neuer ſhew his face: for as much as the Chriſtian men at arms would (as they ſaid) eaſily breake thorow & ouerthrow the naked Turkiſh horſemen, if they durſt abide the field. The young ſoldiors, who as yet had neuer made proofe of the Turks manner of fight, did with ſuch cheerefulneſſe like of this reſolution, that they thought two dayes ſtaying a long delay of ſo readie and eaſie a victorie. Wherefore it was reſolued vpon preſently to ſet forward, and therupon the armie was muſtered: where, vpon view
B taken, there was found to be ten thouſand horſemen (for diuers troups of Germans were come to the campe, after the time of the firſt ſetting forward of the armie:) a more gallant companie of horſemen, both for the ſtrength of their horſes, and goodly furniture of the men, had ſeldome been ſeen in an armie ſo ſuddenly raiſed. But the footmen, ſelected out of all the prouinces, was greatly deminiſhed, being now in number ſcarce eight thouſand ſtrong: for many were ſick in the camp, others wearie of the long iourney, lingering behind, were ſtolne away; and generally all they which were left, moyled with dirt and myre, by reaſon of the deepeneſſe of the rotten way, wet thorow with raine, and almoſt ſtarued with cold, and thereto pincht with hunger, were thought ſcarce able to endure the hardneſſe of the preſent war. After that, commandement was giuen, That euery ſouldior ſhould carrie with him three days victual: and proclamation made,
C That no man ſhould vpon pain of death take any Turk priſoner, although he yeelded himſelf, or charge himſelfe with any ſpoile before the battell were fully ended; for as much as the captains would afterwards deuide the ſpoile of the enemie amongſt the ſouldiors. This proclamation thus made thorow the camp, they ſet forward towards Exek: and the third day they came to a certaine valley, about three miles from Exek, where they encamped. The next day a com-panie of Turks ſhewed themſelues, which was by the great ordinance repulſed. The day following the enemie ſallied out of the towne and skirmiſhed oftentimes with the Chriſtians: in which skirmiſhes many were ſlaine on both ſides, but more wounded of the Chriſtians, for that the Turkes had politickly mingled certaine Ianizaries harquebuſiers, and archers, with their horſemen; who vſed to that manner of fight, ſore gauled the Chriſtian horſemen. For which D cauſe the Generall forbad all ſuch light skirmiſhes, as purpoſing to keepe his ſtrength whole a-gainſt the generall day of battell: commaunding his cannoniers ſo to place the great ordinance as might moſt annoy the enemie, if he ſhould ſhew himſelfe by troups within the danger of the ſhot: which was ſo well performed, that the Turks ſallying forth, receiued thereby great hurt; the deadly ſhot flying thorow the middeſt of their companies. The ſame day Symon biſhop of Zagrabia came into the camp with his horſemen, and a certain prouiſion of victuall, whereby the feare of the want before conceiued, was well eaſed. Mahometes perceiuing that the Chriſtians were not longer to be drawne to thoſe harmefull skirmiſhes, but that he muſt bring his men in danger of the great ſhot: to annoy them by another meanes, ſent many ſmall boats, manned with harquebuſiers & ſmall pieces of ordinance, into the lake neere vnto the camp, ſo to keepe
E the Chriſtians from watering there, and with thoſe ſmall pieces ſhot oftentimes into the camp.
Neere vnto the valley where the Chriſtians lay, was a hill, whereupon ſtood a village, wherein were placed certain companies of Turks, to skirmiſh as occaſion ſhould ſerue with the Chriſti-ans: for diſplacing of whom the whole armie was put in order of battell, and the great artillerie bent vpon them, that they ſhould not with their light skirmiſhes, after the maner of the Turkiſh fight, trouble the order of the armie. Which thing the Turks perceiuing, and that they were not able to hold the place, ſet fire on the towne, and ſo retired to Exek. The Chriſtians keeping on their march, came to the top of the hill, from whence they might ſee Exek ſtand about two miles off in a faire plaine, neere vnto the banke of Dranus: all which low ground betwixt the hill and Exek, was ſo ſubiect to the caſtle, that it was thought a matter too full of danger to at-F tempt that way to batter the caſtle, and to expoſe the armie to the ineuitable furie of the enemies ſhot. Wherefore deſcrying a riſing ground on the further ſide of the citie, equall with the top of the walls, they thought it beſt to remoue their camp thither, and on that ſide to plant their bat-terie againſt the citie. But to come to that place, was thought a matter of no ſmall trouble: for they muſt fet a compaſſe three miles on the right hand thorow a forreſt by a foule and trouble-ſome way, before they could come to the place they deſired: for the armie was not ſo great, as to beſiege the citie round; wherein were not (as is reported) aboue ſixteen thouſand men: neither G was there ſuch ſtore of victuals in the campe, but that the armie was like ſoone to feele the want thereof, without a continuall ſupplie, which would hardly be had, the enemie ſtill beſetting euery paſſage, and with their light horſemen ſcouring about all the countrey, of purpoſe to keep them from victuall. For which cauſe, ſome were of opinion, That it were beſt for them there to ſtay where they were, vntill ſuch time as both more aid and better ſtore of victuals were come vnto them: but others of contrary mind, ſaid the enemie was but barely ſtored with victuall himſelfe, and therefore could not long hold out, which they ſaid they vnderſtood by certaine Chriſtian fugitiues; and that Mahometes had put his cheefe ſubſtance into certaine boats, to be conueyed downe the riuer, as purpoſing to flie, and would not hold out the ſiege aboue three dayes: As H for the forreſt, they thought it would well ynough be paſſed thorow, if they would couragiouſly ſet forward: Beſide that, the time of the yeare ſuffered no delay, Winter comming ſo faſt on, that except ſome notable thing were done quickly, they ſhould be enforced by the very time of the yeare to returne with ſhame, without doing any thing. This opinion was beſt liked of, as more honourable and better beſeeming men of valour, than to lie ſtill in one place: whereupon the next day the armie remoued, and in good order marched thorow the forreſt. Which thing Mahometes quickly perceiuing, preſently ſent forth a thouſand light horſemen, and certaine companies of the Ianizaries, harquebuſiers, to trouble the Chriſtians in their paſſage: who by a neerer and well knowne way ouertaking the armie, ſuddenly charged the rereward, wherein the Italians and Bohemians marched. The Bohemians quickly fled, and the Italians I with much adoe endured the charge: but being relieued by the Carinthian men at armes, they notably repulſed the Turks, and put them to flight. So the armie with ſmall loſſe paſſed the forreſt, and came to the place they deſired: where after they had encamped themſelues, and in good order placed all things needfull for the ſiege, they in ſeemely order offered vnto the enemie battell. But he keeping himſelfe within the towne, ſhot at the Chriſtians with his great ordinance: and they to requite him, with two great pieces which they had placed vpon the riſing of a hill, ſhot thorow both the wals of the towne and the bulwarke alſo, to the great terrour of the defendants. The Chriſtians in the meane time hauing ſtood almoſt all the day in order of battell in the ſight of the enemie, vainely expecting when he ſhould come forth to giue them battell, returned at night into their campe: For Mahometes vpon great conſideration kept in his ſouldiors, K

Mahometes wiſely refuſeth to fight with the Chriſtians, offering him battell

although they were moſt deſirous to fight, vnderſtanding right well of the want of victuall in the Chriſtian campe; and beſide that (as the fugitiues reported) being ſtraightly commanded by letters from Solyman, that he ſhould not vpon paine of a moſt ſhamefull death forſake the place, but to defend it to the laſt. Now the Chriſtians deſirous of battel, being thus delaied and deceiued of their expectation, had in a few daies ſpent the ſmall ſtore of victuall they had, and began to feele a generall want: neither was there any apparant means how they ſhould bee relieued, ſo that euerie man began to feare ſome generall miſchiefe to enſue. When Baltaſar Pamphilus, a noble Hungarian, and a captaine of great experience, ſitting in counſell with the reſt, entred into this ſpeech.

Baltaſar Pamphilus his counſell for releefe of the armie.

Captaine (ſaid he) wee doe all that wee doe, vnaduiſedly: for whileſt we conſult at large how wee L may ouercome our enemies, the ſtrength of our armie is in the meane time ſo weakned for want of victuall, that the ſouldiours are neither well able to ſtand on their legs, nor to hold their weapons in their feeble hands: and generally, euen they which are of greateſt courage begin now to quaile, and deſpairing of battell, ſee that they muſt miſerably and ſhamefully periſh for want. Wherefore in my opinion, we ought firſt and aboue all things moſt ſpeedily to prouide for this want, which ſo grieuouſly pincheth vs: and preſently to remoone hence vnto the caſtle of Hermande, that with the proviſion thereof, which is not like to be little, we may refreſh our whole armie; and ſo relieued, to proceed further as occaſion ſhal require.

This caſtle was about ten miles diſtant from Exek, whereinto many of the Turkes had conueied their wiues and children, and chiefeſt ſubſtance, being kept with a ſmal garriſon of twenty M Turks. Faſt by the caſtle was a pretie little walled towne, without flankers, after the manner of the old fortifying: which towne and caſtle Balthazer ſaid would eaſily be taken. This his counſell was well liked of all men, and he himſelfe ſent with certaine companies of ſoldiors to take the towne. Wherein fortune ſo fauoured him, that it was at his firſt comming ſurrendered vnto him: but when he had it, he found not therin any ſuch ſtore of corne or victuall as he had hoped for:

A for: yet he tooke there certaine vessels of wine, to the great reliefe of the weake souldiors. Vpon the newes of the taking of this towne, the campe remoued from EXEX about ten a clocke in the night, but so disorderly, that the souldiors scarce knowing their owne ensignes, seemed rather to haue fled for feare than marched for spoile: yet the Turkes for all that moued not out of EXEX, misdoubting some deceit, and loath to attempt any thing rashly in the night. When the armie was come to the towne, the captains tooke order, that the victuall there found, was equally deuided amongst the souldiors, and the next morning batterie laid against the castle; which those few Turks valiantly defended halfe a day, and then by composition yeelded it. But when the castle was taken, there was found in it but two barrels of meale, and other two of millet. Then might a man haue seen the captains themselues hanging their heads as men strucken with
B a sudden feare, who in steed of a great prey & victuall to haue serued many daies, found nothing but a few women and children, and scarce so much victuall both in the towne & castle, as would serue the army two daies. Yet they dissembled the matter, & fed the souldiors with hope of better store, after the bridge were once repaired, that they might passe the riuer of Bodrog, which ran by the town: which bridge the Turks had before (for defence of themselues) broken, by plucking vp of certaine piles, and taking away of the planks. wherefore the Carpenters being set on worke and euery man putting to his helping hand, the bridge was with continuall labour in three daies repaired. The fourth day, the wagons and smaller pieces of ordinance passed ouer the bridge, & after them six of the great pieces for batterie: but the bridge ouercharged with the seuenth, which was of a wonderfull waight, and much greater than the rest, began to breake; so that the
C captaines were enforced to breake that faire piece of ordinance, and so by pieces to carrie it away, that the enemie should not get so great a spoile. All things, being thus well passed ouer, the piles were againe cut downe, and the plancks strucke off, to the intent the enemy should not that way pursue them: and other way was there none, but to fetch a compasse about the great lake which was many miles about. Here the captaines began to consult, whether it were best to breake the great pieces of ordinance, that so they might more speedily march away, or not. Of which opinion was Cazzianer himselfe, promising of his owne charge to new cast them. As for the scaling ladders, & such other like things prouided for the siege, they burnt, because they should not come into the enemies hand, or trouble themselues in their march. But most of the captaines
D were of opinion, that it was not best so dishonourably to break those goodly pieces, the greatest ornament and defence of their countrey; but to hold on their march thorow POSSEGA, vntill they came to IUVANCHA, where they should find great store both of corne and wine: which towne, with the castle of GARA fast by it, stored with all kind of prouision, they said would easily be taken before the Turks could possibly come so farre about the lake from EXEK: and that it were a great shame, so to returne without doing any thing. Cazzianer thus perswaded, set forward, & with great toile (by reason of the deepnesse of the way and heauinesse of the great ordinance) came by night to IUVANCHA, which was but three miles off: where the Turks hauing with incredible celeritie passed a long iourney, arriued at the same time also. Neere vnto this castle was a little towne, out of which all the Turkes were fled: the townesmen being Christians, opened the gates and receiued in the souldiors; who there filled themselues abundantly with E wine, and could hardly be driuen out thence by their captaines to the campe. The same night the Turkes burnt the same towne, and whatsoeuer the Christians had therein left. And euery man betooke him to his armour in the camp, for the enemie was now at hand: and in the dawning of the day began hoatly to skirmish in diuers places with the Christians, but especially in that quarter of the campe where the Bohemians lay. Wherewith Petrus Raschinius Generall of the Bohemians being grieued, set vpon them with a troupe of his best horsemen, and enforced them to flie: But the Turkes after the manner of there fight, quickly returning againe, and relieued by the comming in of their fellowes, beset the Bohemians on euery side, and slew many of them. Raschinius the Generall fighting most valiantly, was their slaine with his followers. The Christian captaines purposing to retire home, placed on each side of the armie foure rankes of F wagons for defence on both sides: in the vauward were placed the weake and sicke men, yet so, that in the frunt of the armie were certaine companies of lustie tall souldiors: but in the rearward was placed the greatest strength both of horse and foot. The armie thus marching as it were on both sides intrenched, as it oftentimes met with wooddie hils which hindred their way, so did the same fitly serue the Christians, that the Turkes could not conueniently assaile them in their march,

The castle of Hermande yeelded to the Christians.

The Turkes ſore trouble the Chriſtians in their retire.

march, both before and behind. Which thing Mahometes perceiuing, ſent before certaine companies of Ianizaries and nimble footmen, which knew the countrie and the paſſages well, with certaine faulconets and other ſmall pieces to take the ſtraits whereby the armie was to paſſe, and ſo to gaul them in their paſſage; and when they could keepe the place no longer, to flie back to another, and ſo from place to place: and in the open places he had his troupes of light horſemen, which were euer buſie in one place or another of the armie. By which meanes the Chriſtians in their march receiued much harme, which grieued them the more, for that no great power of the Turks was any where to be ſeene togither, but ſtragling companies; which as they were commaunded, ſometime would come on with a fierce charge, and by and by retire againe, and with their arrowes and faulcon ſhot, from places of aduantage aſſaile them. At one of theſe ſtraits ſomewhat bigger than the reſt, Paulus Bachitius one of the Hungarian captaines, in whom the ſouldiors generally repoſed their greateſt truſt, was ſlaine with a faulcon ſhot, with diuers other of the valiant Hungarians; who ſeeing there a greater number of the Turks than they had ſeene in other places, thought to haue done ſome good ſeruice vpon them: His death brought a generall feare vpon the whole armie, for as much as both then and at other times, without him they neuer had any good ſucceſſe againſt the Turkes. Yet in that skirmiſh, the Hungarians to reuenge the death of their captaine, did with ſuch force repulſe the enemie, that they cauſed him after he had loſt many of his men, to run away and leaue his ſmall field pieces behind him. But ſuch was the weakeneſſe or cowardiſe of the Chriſtian footmen, and the agilitie of the Turkes, eſpecially the Ianizaries, that they with their ſhot out of the woods, ſtaied the Hungarian horſmen from the purſuit of their fellowes, and recouered their ſmall field pieces before they could be carried away by the Chriſtian footmen: wherewith they did againe forerun the armie, and ſtill trouble it as before. The Chriſtians beſet with theſe dangers, and almoſt ſpent for want of victuall, ſeeing no meanes to relieue their weake bodies, nor any ſmall hope to comfort their fainting ſpirits, did generally feare ſome extreame calamitie to inſue: and ſo much the more, for that it was reported, that Mahometes ſtill expected freſh ſupplies from BELGRADE, SAMANDRIA, and NICOPOLIS: and many of the Hungarian light horſemen ſtole away from them, as carefull of their owne ſafetie: neither did they ſee any comfort in the diſmaied captaines, who at other times were woont with cheerefull and couragious words to relieue the ſouldiors, if they ſaw them any thing diſcouraged. But when they were come into a faire open field neere vnto a towne called GARA, they were aduertiſed, That the enemie had in the woods before them whereby they were to paſſe, cut downe great trees croſſe the waies, ſo that neither their great ordinance nor wagons, nor yet their horſemen could poſſibly paſſe that way but that they muſt needs breake their order.

A generall feare in the Chriſtians campe.

This once bruted thorow the armie, filled them with all heauineſſe and deſperation: and ſo much the more, for that Ladiſlaus Moreus, and others which knew the countrie well, ſaid there was but two waies to eſcape: the one thorow the woods about ten miles ſpace to WALPO, which by reaſon of the trees cut downe croſſe the waies by the Turks was not to be paſſed, but they muſt needs leaue behind them their great ordinance and carriages: the other towards the caſtle of ZENTHVERZEBETH, which was in Ladiſlaus Moreus his countrey, certaine miles diſtant from GARA: by taking of which way, the enemie by reaſon of the ſtraightneſſe of the paſſage, muſt of neceſſitie be inforced to giue ouer his purſuit. Yet for all that, it was in counſell reſolued vpon, to take the way thorow the woods of WALPO, for that there was there victuall enough, and in the caſtle of WALPO was kept money ſent from king Ferdinand, ſufficient to pay the ſouldiors for all that Winter. And ſo leauing the great ordinance behind them, and burning the pouder and whatſoeuer elſe could not well be caried on horſeback, to ſet forward with all ſpeed: As for the trees, they ſaid, they would be well enough remoued, & the way opened by the pioners and wagoners: wherfore euery captain was commanded to haue his ſoldiors in readines to ſet forward vpon the ſigne giuen; which was by the ſound of a ſhalme or hoboy, which when it ſhould be giuen, was referred to the diſcretion of the Generall. There were many which wonderfully diſliked of this reſolution, and ſaid openly, that the enemie was fewer in number than their horſemen, and pinched almoſt with like want of victuall: beſides that, that the Turks durſt neuer in iuſt fight encounter with the Chriſtian men at armes, but like theeues aſſaile them vpon a ſudden at ſome aduantage, and by and by be gone againe: and that the towne of GARA where the enemie lay encamped, was not ſo ſtrong but that it might be woon: wherefore all

A things were to be proued, and ſome great matter to be attempted of valiant men, pinched with wants: for that to run away, would be not onely a diſhonour vnto the captaines themſelues, who ought alwaies to preferre their honor before their liues; but alſo dangerous to them, which reſpected nothing but life. And if they ſhould ſet forward in the night, many would be loſt in the woods; and valour in the darke could not be knowne from cowardiſe: beſides that, the Turkes (as they ſaid) lay ſo nigh, that it was not poſſible to depart without their knowledge, eſpecially if they ſhould burne the powder, or breake the great ordinance. For which cauſes, they thought it better to fight a battell with them, and not to beleeue the falſe reports of new ſupplies come vnto them; and that God would vndoubtedly giue them aid, which were readie to lay
B downe their liues for their religion and glorie of the Chriſtian name. After all this, they began to conſult what was now to be done with the ſicke and wounded ſouldiors, which were before carried in wagons or amongſt the other baggage of the armie: for it was like, that ſo great a multitude of ſicke and wounded men, vnderſtanding what was decreed concerning the departure of the armie, would as miſerable forſaken men, fill the campe with lamentation and mourning; which it was thought would be alſo increaſed by the weeping and wailing of them, which ſhould neuer afterwards ſee their brethren, kinſmen, fellowes or friends, ſo miſerably & ſhamefully left behind and forſaken: the noiſe whereof, muſt needs come to the eares of the Turkes, which lay within a ſmall gun ſhot. Wherefore it was determined, that theſe ſicke and wounded ſouldiors ſhould be carried vpon the wagon and cart-horſes; and that ſuch as were not able to
C ſtay themſelues, ſhould be holden vp by other of more ſtrength riding behind them vpon the buttocks of the horſe. In fine to colour the matter, they which were ſo deſirous to go, ſaid that this their manner of departure groũded vpon good reaſon, was not to be accounted a ſhameful flight (as ſome would tearme it) but a right honeſt and neceſſarie manner of retiring: for as much as they were ſtronger than their enemies in horſemen, and equall alſo (if not ſtronger) in footmen, although they were ſore weakened with ſickneſſe. Whileſt theſe things were in counſell diuerſly diſcourſed, and the reſolution ſet downe is before ſaid, the matter was brought to this paſſe, that euerie captaine with troubled iudgement conceiued in himſelfe ſecret cogitations, far from the common good, and without regard of ſhame and diſhonour, bethought himſelfe how he might betake himſelfe to flight, the vncertaine hope of deſired life. On the contrarie part,
D Mahometes vſing moſt certaine ſpies, and aduertiſed euerie houre of all the diſtreſſes of the Chriſtians, and thereby preſaging his future victorie; did by moſt diligent watch and troupes of horſemen, beſetting the paſſages farre and neere, moſt vigilantly attend euerie motion in the Chriſtian campe: of purpoſe, that when the armie ſhould riſe and ſet forward, he after his wonted manner might in the ſtraits (fit for his purpoſe) ſet vpon them being deuided and diſperſed one from another, as they muſt needs in thoſe troubleſome paſſages: for he had ſo placed his horſemen and footmen in the knowne tracts of thoſe woods, that he had ſhut vp the Chriſtians as it were in a toile. It was now almoſt midnight, and the armie taking no reſt, ſo carefully expected the ſigne of ſetting forward, that euerie little delay ſeemed to moſt men both tedious and dangerous: ſo that many great captaines vpon a cowardly conceit would ſtay no longer, but
E haſted to depart, and to go before the reſt, without any leaue of the Generall. The beginning of this miſchieuous departure, is reported to haue bin begun by the common Hungarian horſmen, which knowing the paſſages and waies thorow the woods, made moſt haſt to WALPO. Ladiſlaus Morem diſhonourably following their example, went the other way to his caſtle ZATHVERZEBETH. After them followed in great haſt the Stirian horſemen, without regard of ſhame, led by Iohn Hunganot their Generall, who was appointed to haue guarded the rearward. Symon biſhop of ZAGRABIA fled in like manner, knowne by his great lanterne wandring in the wood: yet with leſſe ſhame than the reſt, becauſe he being a clergie man, thought it not to belong to his vocation to put on armes, or to go into battell. In the meane time it was fearefully told to Carzianer, That the Hungarian horſemen were fled, and that Ladiſlaus and Hunganot, F with the Stirian troupes were gone alſo; and that all the reſt of the armie not expecting the appointed ſignall, were in like manner vpon flying: With which report, the cowardly and diſmaied Generall was ſo terrified, that he preſently got to horſe, quite forgetting the ſignall he ſhould haue giuen (for that he thought all the reſt, as he afterwards ſaid, to haue been gone before) and as he was, vnarmed, betooke himſelfe to flight, leauing behind him for haſt his tent ſtored with plate and other rich furniture. In this tumult of them which ſo diſorderly fled, Lodro-

nius that famous captaine was called vp, and told by his ſeruants, that the Generall was fled and gone: to whom he anſwered againe, without doubt it cannot be ſo, that I ſhould be ſo ſhamefully and perfidiouſly betraied of him: & ſo as a man megered with long watching & painfull labour, laid himſelfe downe againe to ſleepe. Not long after, Mahometes hearing the ſtir that was in the campe, riſe with his Turks to aſſaile his enemies: yet to be better aſſured what the enemie did, he thought it good to ſtay for day light, cauſing his men to ſtand ſtill in order of battell, and with wonderful ſilence to expect the ſigne of ſetting forward, which was giuen by the ſoft ſound of a horſemans drum paſſing thorow euerie companie. For the old captaine acquainted with many battels againſt the Chriſtians, doubting of their faigned flight, would not vnaduiſedly be drawne into battell, but in a place commodious for his ſouldiours; as one before fully ſet down (after his wonted manner) to performe that ſeruice, not by the hazard of one ſet battell, but by dallying off the time with often skirmiſhes, when he could take the enemie at aduantage. The day appearing, Lodronius againe awaking, heard a certaine confuſed noiſe of the Turkes, and withall, ſaw himſelfe forſaken of the greateſt part of the horſemen: whereupon he complained in vaine, that he was betraied: yet for all that he was nothing diſcouraged, but cheered vp the footmen, exhorting them to remember their former valour, and to reſolue with themſelues only with courage to ouercome the danger, which hard fortune had at that time brought them into; for that valiant men were rather to thinke of an honourable death than ſhamefull flight, whereby whether they ſhould eſcape with life or not, was vncertaine: As for himſelfe, who had been their happie Generall in many battels, he ſaid he was reſolutely ſet downe by repulſing the enemie to bring them into place of ſafetie, or elſe valiantly fighting togither with them to end his daies. As Lodronius was yet thus encouraging the footmen, the horſemen of CARINTHIA, SAXONIE, AVSTRIA and BOHEMIA, who mindfull of their duetie, had in vaine expected the appointed ſignall from the Generall, came to Lodronius as vnto the moſt valiant captaine, beſeeching him, in ſteed of their treacherous Generall, to take vpon him the place, promiſing to doe whatſoeuer he commaunded, and to fight as men againſt thoſe infidels for their religion and king, ſo long as they were able to hold vp their weapons. Lodronius would in no caſe accept of that honour ſo frankly offered, modeſtly proteſting himſelfe vnworthie thereof: Yet as a man of courage, and moued with the hard eſtate of ſuch an armie, he with a ſolemne proteſtation promiſed to execute the place in the beſt manner he could, and ſo did as long as his fortune gaue him leaue.

Lodronius encourageth the footmen.

It is reported, that as Lodronius was encouraging the footmen, and earneſtly inuaying againſt ſhamefull flight, an old German ſouldior was ſo bold, as bluntly, yet ſharpely to ſay vnto him: Worthy Lodronius, thou canſt neuer be thought to flie ſhamefully, with a horſe of ſuch a price vnder thee. Lodronius perceiuing the old ſouldiors meaning, alighted, and with his ſword hoxed his horſe: ſaying alowd, This day valiant ſouldiors, ſhall you haue me both your Generall and fellow ſouldior, fighting on foot as one of your ſelues: ſee now that you deceiue not my expectation, but let vs either with glorious victorie or honourable death end this warre togither, yet ſo, as that we die not vnreuenged. All his other horſes he gaue away vnto ſuch ſicke and wounded ſouldiors as he beſt knew, amongſt whom was one Picenard of CREMONA, a captaine who was then in an extreame fit of an ague, and had hardly eſcaped the hands of the enemy. The firſt troupes of horſemen and bands of footmen, were ſcarcely out of the campe with their enſignes, but the Turkes comming on with a hideous cry, aſſailed them on euery ſide, and many ſharpe skirmiſhes were giuen vnto the horſemen as they marched, with ſuch euent, that the Chriſtians ſometime valiantly receiuing the enemies charge, and ſometime charging them againe, repulſed the proud enemie ſtill buſie with them. In theſe continuall skirmiſhes, Antius Mager Fuchſtat, Generall of the Carinthian horſemen, fighting valiantly was ſlaine, being for his braue armour ſuppoſed by the Turkes to haue beene the Generall of the field. And by like miſhap foure and twentie horſemen of great name were ſlaine alſo, and their guidon taken; amongſt theſe were three noblemen, Andreas Reſchius, Chriſtophorus Hernaus, and Georgius Himelbergus. In another place was made a moſt cruell skirmiſh with the Saxon horſemen, and them of MISNIA, THVRINGIA and FRANCONIA, who followed the Saxons enſigne: of theſe, fighting moſt valiantly, was ſlaine aboue 36 worthie captaines, lieutenants, or ancients; and Chuenricus a principall captaine of the Saxons taken, who afterwards died in bonds amongſt the Turks. Amongſt them which were ſlaine, Sebaſtianus Metheſcus, and Iacobus Scullemburgh were of greateſt nobi-

A litie. In like manner the horſemen of AVSTRIA couragiouſly reſiſting the enemie for a ſpace, were in the end ouerthrowne: where amongſt them was ſlaine two valiant noblemen, Fettaius and Hofchirchius, with diuers other men of great place and reputation both in their owne countrie and abroad. But the greateſt ſlaughter was made amongſt the Bohemian horſemen, vpon whom (being diſordered by the Ianizaries harquebuſiers) the Turkiſh troupes of the old garriſon ſouldiors breaking in with their ſcimiters and heauie yron maſes, made a moſt bloudie execution. The battell of footmen being ſore gauled, and almoſt diſordered in their march by certeine compaines of Ianizaries and archers of the Aſapi, who from a woodie banke of a marriſh diſcharged their ſhot and arrowes continually vpon them, yet neuer comming to handie blowes, The Chriſtian footmen ouerthrowne.

B was on the other ſide ſo hardly charged by Amurathes with his troupes of horſemen of BOSNA, that being not able longer to keepe order, it was at laſt by him broken and cut in pieces: where the Turks with their ſwords and hatchets ſlew the poore Chriſtians without mercie. Lodronius himſelfe carried away with the breaking in and force of the horſemen, was driuen into a marriſh: where after that he being ſore wounded, and almoſt faſt in the deep mud, had done the vttermoſt of that his laſt indeauor; he by the faire intreatie of the Turkes perſuading him rather to yeeld, than there to be ſlaine, ſo yeelded himſelfe, that he with three companies which were with him, after they had laid downe their weapons, were all ſaued as valiant ſouldiours: for now the merciles Turks embrued with the Chriſtian bloud, were wearie of ſlaughter, & began greedily to ſeeke after the ſpoile, hunting after them, who flying diſperſedly, thought themſelues to

This ſhamefull ouerthrow at EXEK was reported to haue exceeded the moſt grieuous ouerthrowes that the Chriſtians had receiued in any former time: for the flower both of horſe and foot there loſt by the raſhneſſe and fault of an vnluckie Generall, rather than by the valor of the enemie, ruthfully periſhed; ſo that many prouinces were filled with heauineſſe and mourning. For it neuer chanced before, as was to be ſeene by the vnfortunat battels of Sigiſmund the emperour, and king Ladiſlaus, that the Turkes got ſuch a victorie without ſome loſſe: ſo that they which fell almoſt vnreuenged at EXEK, may ſeeme to haue augmented that loſſe by the great

For as many noble gentlemen, and amongſt others Laurentius Streiperg and Dietmarus Loſenſtaine haue reported (who raunſomed afterwards, returned home againe to their wiues and children) amongſt the priſoners which were together with the faire enſignes and other gallant warlike furniture (eſpecially gilt armour and headpieces) preſented by Mahometes his meſſengers to Solyman, three of the greateſt captaines heads were in a ſiluer baſon there ſeene and knowne, which were the heads of Paulus Bachitius the valiant Hungarian captaine, Antius Macer Generall of the Carinthian horſemen, and Lodronius Generall of the footmen: which after

As Lodronius was yet thus encouraging the footmen, the horsemen of Carinthia, Saxonie, Avstria and Bohemia, who mindfull of their duetie, had in vaine expected the appointed signall from the Generall, came to Lodronius as vnto the most valiant captaine, beseeching him, in steed of their treacherous Generall, to take vpon him the place: promising to doe whatsoeuer he commaunded, and to fight as men against those infidels for their religion and king, so long as they were able to hold vp their weapons. Lodronius would in no case accept of that honour so franckly offered, modestly protesting himselfe vnworthie thereof: Yet as a man of courage, and moued with the hard estate of such an armie, he with a solemne protestation promised to execute the place in the best manner he could, and so did as long as his fortune gaue him leaue.

For as many noble gentlemen, and amongſt others Laurentius Streiperg and Dietmarus Loſenſtaine haue reported (who raunſomed afterwards, returned home againe to their wiues and children) amongſt the priſoners which were together with the faire enſignes and other gallant warlike furniture (eſpecially gilt armour and headpieces) preſented by Mahometes his meſſengers to Solyman, three of the greateſt captaines heads were in a ſiluer baſon there ſeene and knowne, which were the heads of Paulus Bachitius the valiant Hungarian captaine, Antius Macer Generall of the Carinthian horſemen, and Lodronius Generall of the footmen: which after Lodronius ſlain.

F the tyrant had looked aſquint vpon, as abhorring that loathſome ſight, he with ſterne countenance commanded all the priſoners to be ſlain. But vpon the interceſſion of the Ianizaries, who intreated for them, as valiant men, to whom they had at the time of their taking giuen their faith, and might afterwards doe him good ſeruice, he changed his countenance, and ſaued many of them. But Cazzianer flying to his owne caſtle, was of all men accuſed, as a wicked forſaker of his owne campe and enſignes, and commonly railed vpon, as the eternall infamie of his coun- Three of the great captaines heads preſented to Solyman at Conſtantinople Cazzianer generally hated.

trey, and author of the publike calamitie: ſo that it was reported, that he durſt neither go abroad G nor ſhew his face for ſhame. He was ſo generally hated, that infamous libels, made againſt him and the other captaines which had ſhamefully fled as he did, were commonly ſung in the ſtreets by boyes in all the cities of GERMANIE. Wherewith he was ſo much grieued, that he requeſted of king Ferdinand, that he might ſafely come to the court, to anſwere whatſoeuer could be laied againſt him: which his requeſt the king eaſily graunted, and when hee came to the court receiued him with doubtfull countenance. But when the hearing of his cauſe was by the king ſomewhat longer protracted than he would haue had it, and hee in the meane time kept vnder ſafe cuſtodie; impatient of ſuch delay, and halfe doubtfull whether he ſhould be quitted or con-vp by little and little with his knife a bricke pauement vnder his bed, and ſo in the night getting out firſt one bricke, and after that another, at length brake thorow the vault, and with his ſheets letting himſelfe downe, eſcaped, hauing poſt horſes readie for him without the caſtle. Not long after, as he was a man of a haſtie and vnconſtant nature, deſpairing of his eſtate, he fled to the Turkes, Mahometes gladly receiuing him, and beſide his great entertainment, promiſing him the gouernment of all CROATIA, in manner of a tributarie king, if he would faithfully ſerue Solyman, and helpe him in the ſubduing of the cities of AVSTRIA. After he had agreed vpon all the conditions of his reuolt, that he might returne to Mahometes with ſome more credit, he began boldly to deale with Nicholaus Sirenus, a noble man of CROATIA, and his deere friend as he ſuppoſed, to reuolt with him; aſſuring him, that Solyman would deale as kindly with them I both, as hee had before with king Iohn in the kingdome of HVNGARIE. Sirenus promiſed him he would, or at leaſt made as if he promiſed to do what he deſired, and ſo agreed as it were vpon the matter, promiſing to go ouer with him to the Turke with a troupe of his beſt and moſt

But Sirenus conſidering with himſelfe the heinouſnes and impietie of ſo great an offence, changing his purpoſe, choſe rather to deale treacherouſly with his old friend, fearing no ſuch thing in his houſe, than to offend both againſt God and his prince. Wherefore after hee had well feaſted Cazzianer at his houſe, he as a moſt cruell hoaſt, cauſed him to be ſlaine, and ſent his head to king Ferdinand: in reward whereof he receiued of the kings gift Cazzianer his caſtle, with all his ſubſtance.

In the meane time the Venetians, prouoked by the Turks with diuers iniuries both by ſea and K land (when as Solyman but a little before hardly beſieging CORCYRA, and with moſt barbarous crueltie waſting the iſland, had broken the league, and euen then by his lieutenant Caſimes Baſſa beſieged EPIDAVRVS and NAVPLIVM, two of their cities in PELOPONESVS) reſolued without delay to make warres likewiſe vpon him, who for a ſmall treſpas would admit no excuſe or recompence. Wherunto they were alſo animated both by Charles the emperour, and Paulus the great Biſhop: who warned by the late and dangerous attempts of Solyman and Barbaruſſa, thought it more for the ſafetie of their eſtates, by giuing aid to the Venetians to keepe the Turks buſied farther off, than to ſuffer them to acquaint themſelues too much with the ports of ITALIE or SICILIA. Wherefore all the Winter following they laboured by their embaſſadours to ſet downe what number and what manner of ſhips, what ſouldiours, what money, was to be L

At laſt it was agreed amongſt theſe confederat princes by their embaſſadours at ROME, That the emperour ſhould furniſh and ſet forth foureſcore and two gallies, the Venetians the like number, and the biſhop ſix and thirtie, to make vp the number of two hundred gallies; that the Venetians ſhould lend vnto the biſhop ſo many gallies readie rigged as he ſhould deſire to be furniſhed by him with marriners and ſouldiors; and that the emperour and the ſtate of GENVA ſhould find ſufficient ſhipping for the tranſportation of the land forces and victuall. The Generals alſo of this great fleet to be ſet forth, were at the ſame time appointed. Andreas Auria for the emperour, Vincentius Capellus for the Venetians, and Marcus Grimmanus patriarch of AQVILEA, for the Bi- M ſhop; to whom was ioyned Paulus Iuſtinianus, one of the cheefe Senators, a man of great experience in ſea matters. It was alſo agreed, that Ferdinand Gonzaga viceroy of SICILIE ſhould haue the commaunding of the land forces, and that whatſoeuer was got from the Turks in that expedition in GRÆCIA, the Iſlands, or DALMATIA, ſhould be all faithfully deliuered to the Venetians, who had receiued ſo many iniuries from the Turks. The emperour alſo of his liberalitie

Solyman vnderſtanding of this confederation and preparation made againſt him by theſe Chriſtian princes, commaunded Barbaruſſa his Admirall to make readie his fleet to goe againſt theſe enemies, and to doe all the harme he could vpon the Iſlands ſubiect to the Venetian ſtate. Which thing Barbaruſſa with great care and diligence in ſhort time performed: and ſo with a hundred and thirtie gallies in moſt warlike manner appointed, with the firſt of the Spring in the yeare 1538 departed from HELLESPONTVS directly to CRETE, where hauing paſſed the promontorie of GYAMVS, which at this day is called SPARTA, he vnaduiſedly landed moſt part of his men, to haue ſurpriſed the citie CANEA, which was in auncient time called SYDO-
B NIA: For Grittus one of the Venetian Senatours then kept the citie with a ſtrong garriſon, who from the walls and bulwarks thereof ſo plagued the Turkes with great and ſmall ſhot, and the ſallying out of two companies of Italians, that Barbaruſſa hauing loſt many of his men, was fain to retire againe to his fleet in ſuch haſt, that he left behind him a thouſand of his Turkes, which were gone further into the Iſland after bootie, who were afterwards all ſlain by them of CRETE. After that, he attempted to haue taken diuers places in the Iſland, and was euery where notably repulſed. With the citie of CANDIA, whereof the Iſland now taketh name, and was in ancient time called CYTHEVM, he durſt not meddle: but ſayling almoſt round about the Iſland, tooke onely CECILIA, a little towne before forſaken of the inhabitants, which he ſet on fire, and ſo departed from CRETE: for he was aduertiſed, that Vincentius Capellius the Venetian admirall, who
C was now come to CORCYRA, would in ſhort time come to releeue them of CRETE. Auria Admirall of the Emperours fleet, paſſing the ſtrait of MESSANA, came to CORCYRA alſo, and there ioyned with the Venetians. The Chriſtian fleet was then ſo great, that it was thought the Turkes durſt not meet it at ſea, but by all meanes ſhun to giue battell. For Barbaruſſa then lay with the Turkes fleet in the bay of AMBRACIA, expecting when the Chriſtians ſhould enter the ſtraight entrance thereof, where he had on both ſides placed diuers peeces of great Ordinance, to haue ſunke them in their comming in: for Grimanus the Patriarch a little before departing from CORCYRA, had with the great Biſhops gallies begun to beſiege PREVESA, a towne vpon the promontorie of ACTIVM faſt by that ſtrait; and landing ſome of his ſoldiors, with three great peeces of artillerie, ſo battered the caſtle of PREVESA, that he was like ynough
D to haue taken it, had not the Turks from ÆTOLIA come to relieue it with a ſtrong power both of horſe and foot. Wherefore the Patriarch ſhipping again his men and ordinance, returned to the fleet at CORCYRA, not repenting him of his iourney, for that he had well viewed the ſtraits of that bay, and all the enemies fleet riding at anker within it. Vpon the returne of the Patriarch, and relation made what he had both done and ſeene, the great commaunders of the Chriſtian fleet entred into counſell, what courſe were beſt to take for their better proceeding in that great action. Gonzaga the Viceroy, Generall of the land forces, was of opinion, That it was beſt to land the ſouldiors and great ordinance, and with all their force to aſſault the caſtle of PREVESA: which once taken, & their ordinance there placed, the enemies fleet might in the bay be vtterly defeated, for that all paſſage to ſea might eaſily be taken from them, by ſinking of one of their
E great ſhips in the mouth of the ſtrait, and by mooring there of three great galleons full of artillerie: ſo that if Barbaruſſa would deſperatly aduenture to come out, he muſt needs be ſunke in the mouth of the bay. Whereunto Auria replied, That Gonzaga his counſell was in words and ſhew glorious, but to be put in execution moſt dangerous: for that firſt to land the ſouldiors and great artillerie, he ſaid was a thing too too full of hazard & perill: for it was to be thought, that the Turks in ÆTOLIA would as they had before done, come with ſpeed with their horſemen to relieue the beſieged in the caſtle, whoſe force the Chriſtian footmen could hardly abide: Beſides that, if the fleet ſhould by force of weather be cõſtrained to forſake that coaſt, as it well might, Autumne now comming faſt on, after the ſouldiors were landed; from whence ſhould they then get any victuall in the enemies countrey, or what releeſe ſhould they hope for, if they F ſhould hap to be diſtreſſed, being on euery ſide beſet with their enemies, and their friends by tempeſt driuen from them. Wherefore he thought it beſt, if the enemie could not be drawn out of the bay to battell, to goe directly into the bay of NAVPACTVM, and to take that towne which was not greatly fortified, and ſo to ranſack and ſpoile all the townes euen to the bottome of the bay of CORINTH; which the Græcians in the fleet ſaid might eaſily be done: By taking of which course it might so fall out, that Barbarussa moued with the danger of his friends, would for shame G come out and ioine with them in battell. This counsell of Auria was best liked both of Capellius and the Patriarch, being farre more desirous to fight with their enemies at sea, than at land.

Auria hauing put in order his fleet, came to PREVESA, and so to the strait of the bay of AMBRACIA, where he so placed the whole fleet, which was in number two hundred and fiftie saile, that it might easily of the enemie be numbred. Which sight (as it was reported) wonderfully troubled Barbarussa, who although he was of a courageous disposition, and such a man as greatly feared not either the valor or martial discipline of the Christians, yet was he exceedingly moued with the sight of so great a fleet, so well appointed; for a greater had not of long time been seene in the Ionian sea. So that an eunuch of Solymans court, sent by him as Barbarussa his H companion, seeing him to delay the time, as a man halfe discouraged, did with most vnciuill and proud words take him vp, because he would not forthwith goe out of the bay and fight with the Christians which lay at the mouth therof daring of them; wherein he was not (as he said) to regard his owne safetie, who as a coward could not endure the sight of the enemie, but the honour of Solyman his soueraigne, who would not take it well, to haue the glorie of his name stained with so shameful a delay: for if he were a valiant and martiall man, as he professed himselfe to be, hee ought neuer to dispaire of victorie: And if it should so fall out, that fortune should frowne vpon them, and not answere to their desires, yet should not Solyman therefore want captains and souldiors better than they, if they were ouercome, and the woods of PONTVS would affoord him timber ynough to build twice so great and strong a fleet. And for a conclusion, the I insolent Eunuch willed Barbarussa to beware, that whilest he feared a most honourable death, (which was vncertaine, though the battell were lost) he drew not vpon himselfe the certaine danger of a most shamefull death by the displeasure of Solyman.

Auria braueth Barbarussa lying in the bay of Ambracia.

Barbarussa reproued of cowardise by one of the Turkes eunuchs.

At which speech Barbarussa turning himselfe about to Salec, one of the arch pyrats, a famous sea man, said vnto him: Wee must for ought that I can see, most valiant and faithfull captaine, aduenture this battell, although it be at too much disaduantage, least happily we perish by the complaints of this barking demie man. And so presently commaunded all his fleet to weigh anker, at the same time that Auria had hoysed saile and was on his way toward the bay of NAVPACTVS, thinking that the enemie durst not for feare haue come out of the bay of AMBRACIA. Auria keeping on his course, was come to LEVCADE, when the enemies fleet was descried out of K
the top of Bondelmerius great galleon to bee come out of the bay, and to make towards them, keeping close by the shore: which maner of course the craftie Turke misdoubting his owne strength, held of purpose, that if he should chance to be ouermatched by the Christians, he might turne the prow of his gallies vpon them, and running the poupes aground, so to land his men and great ordinance, and from land as he might to defend his fleet: accounting it a lesse losse (if the worst should chance) to lose the gallies than the men.

Barbarussa his answere to Salec concerning the eunuchs speech.

Barbarussa putteth out of the bay of Ambracia, and followeth Auria.

Auria somewhat troubled with this sudden comming out of the enemie, as with a thing which he then least expected, yet notably staied himselfe, and commaunded all the fleet to prepare themselues to battell, and to follow his Admirall gallie. Now all the Turks fleet was come L into the open sea in such order, that Barbarussa himselfe was in the middle battell, where his Admirall gallie was to be seene with many purple flags and streamers flying gallantly in the wind: on his right hand was Tabaches, and Salec on the left, both men of great fame, euery one of them hauing almost like number of gallies, which were in all a hundred and fiftie: Vnto the middle battel were ioined the two wings, in such order, that which way soeuer the Admiral turned, they turning also, still represented the forme of a flying Eagle: so that (as Auria himselfe afterwards confessed) a more firme or orderly fleet could not haue bin brought out by any expert captaine. Before the fleet, came about twentie nimble gallies, conducted by Drogut (or Dragut) an arch pirat, famous afterwards for the great harme he did vnto the Christians. Capellius the Venetian Admirall came in his long boat to Auria, requesting him, That he with his gallies might giue the first charge vpon the enemie: to whom Auria gaue great thankes, and praising his forward- M nesse, requested him to follow him, to whom he would in good time giue a signe what he would haue done. The formost of the Turks light gallies was now come vnto the great Galleon of Bondelmerius, which was the formost of the Chrihian fleet, whereunto were sent also certaine gallies from Salec, to help to assaile that tall ship; which shooting a farre off, did no harme, neither

A Bondelmerius them: who would not ſuffer one piece to be diſcharged, for he being an expert ſea man, and loath to ſhoot in vaine, expected that they ſhould come neerer vnto him, and then vpon the ſudden to diſcharge all his great ordinance vpon them. Neither was he deceiued in that his expectation, for the Turkes comming neere vnto him, were ſo ouerwhelmed with the great and ſmal ſhot out of the Galleon, that they were glad to ſtay their courſe, & to retire. In the mean time Auria called backe againe the ſhips which were gone before, and cauſed his Galleon to be towed out; and by boats of purpoſe ſent out, charged the captains of the gallies to make themſelues readie to fight, vpon ſignall giuen by the ſound of the trumpet and the diſplaying of the Admirals enſigne: yet was not Auria of mind to fight with his gallies, without his ſhips: which thing the craftie enemie well perceiued, and ſought by all means to ioine battell with the gallies
B before the comming in of the tall ſhips, which were as caſtles in reſpect of the gallies: for it was then ſuch a calme, that the ſhips were not able to keep way with the gallies, and the ſmooth water ſeemed to offer a fit opportunitie for battell; which ſo well pleaſed the Patriarch, that many heard him crying a loud to Auria, to giue the ſignall, and maruelled much why he deferred to giue battell. For he fetching a great compaſſe, and houering about his ſhips, with his gallies kept ſuch a courſe, that many thought he would vpon the ſuden haue done ſome ſtrange and vnexpected exploit vpon the enemie: but Auria held that ſtrange courſe, of purpoſe to haue drawne the enemies gallies within the danger of his great ſhips, who thundring amongſt them with their great ordinance, might haue eaſily ſore beaten & diſordered them, and opened a way vnto his gallies to haue gotten a moſt certaine victorie. But the craftie old Turke doubting by the
C ſtrangenes of Auria his courſe, to be circumuented with ſome finenes, ſtaied his courſe, & lay ſtill with his owne ſquadron of gallies, warily expecting to what purpoſe that ſtrange courſe of the enemie tended. In the meane time, both the wings of his fleet had a little before the going down of the Sunne begun in diuers places to encounter with the Chriſtians: Some were in vaine ſtill aſſailing Bondelmerius his great Galleon; others with their great ordinance had ſo ſore beaten two tall ſhips, wherein Buccanigra and Mongaia, two Spaniſh captaines, were embarked with their companies, that they were giuen for loſt, many of the ſouldiors and mariners being ſlaine: Two other ſhips loded with victuall, the one of VENICE, the other of DALMATIA, were burnt by the Turkes, & ſome few of the men ſaued by their ſhip boats, and by ſwimming to the ſhips neereſt vnto them. In the ſhutting in of the euening, Salec tooke two gallies ſtragling behind the D reſt of the fleet, whereof Mozenicus a Venetian, and Bebiena a Florentine, were captaines. After theſe gallies, was taken alſo the ſhip of Aloyſius Figaroa a Spaniard, although his ſouldiors had for a time fought moſt valiantly. In this ſhip with Figaroa the father, was taken his ſon, a young gentleman, and beautified with all the good gifts of nature; who afterwards preſented to Solyman, turned Turke: and growing in credit in Solymans chamber, after three yeres miſerable impriſonment, obtained his poore fathers libertie, and ſent him well rewarded home againe into SPAINE. Whileſt both the fleets were thus expecting how they might to their moſt aduantage ioine battell, ſuddenly aroſe a great tempeſt of thunder, lightening, and raine, with a freſh gale of Eaſterly wind: whereupon the Chriſtians ſeeing the Turks hoyſing vp their ſmal ſailes, without delay hoyſed vp both ſmall and great to cleare themſelues of the enemie, and with that
E faire wind returned againe to CORCYRA; ſo diſorderedly and in ſuch haſt, ſparing neither ſaile nor oare, that it ſeemed rather a ſhamefull flight then an orderly retreat. So that Auria, a man of ſo great fame at ſea, as that he was called a ſecond Neptune, was that day accounted no captain. It is reported, that Barbaruſſa with the ſame wind purſued the Chriſtians a while, and being not able longer to ſee what courſe they held, by reaſon of the darkeneſſe of the night, to haue ſtaied his courſe: for the Admirals had cauſed their lights, which they vſed to carrie in the poupes of their gallies, to be then put out. Whereat Barbaruſſa heartily laughing, ſaid oftentimes in the Spaniſh tongue: Auria hath therefore put out his light, the better in the darke to hide his flight: noting in him ſuch a feare, as that he without regard of honour ſought only how by flight to eſcape. When they were come to CORCYRA, they were all generally of opinion, That by the F benefit of that ſudden ſtorme they had auoided a great danger. The emperials, eſpecially the Genowayes, to excuſe Auria, imputed the cauſe of ſo ſhamefull a flight vnto the Venetians, who would not from the beginning receiue any Spaniſh ſouldiors into their gallies, the better to haue withſtood the enemie; and that Auria therefore doubting of the Venetians, refrained from ioining battell, and the rather, becauſe that vpon the comming forth of the Turkes fleet, they had hoiſed vp their ſailes tied vp to the yards with ſmall lines, which they might at their pleaſure eaſily cut, and ſet ſaile to flie which way they would. Shortly after came Barbaruſſa with all his fleet to the Iſland of PAXVS, about foure leagues from CORCYRA Eaſtward, brauing the Chriſtians as if hee would haue fought with them, if they durſt come out. Whereat Gonzaga the Viceroy fretting, went to euerie one of the three great commaunders, requeſting them for the honor of the Chriſtians, to repreſſe that prowd Turks inſolencie. At laſt the matter was brought to that paſſe, that the Venetians hauing taken in certaine companies of Spaniards, the fleet ſhould be diuided into foure ſquadrons, and ſo to giue battell: But this conſultation was ſo long protracted, that Barbaruſſa fearing the tempeſtuos Autumn weather, hoyſed ſaile, and about the ſeuenth of October returned againe into the bay of AMBRACIA. After the departing of Barbaruſſa, the generalls of the Chriſtian fleet directed their courſe into the bay called SINVS RIZONICVS, to beſiege CASTRONOVUM or new Caſtle, a ſtrong towne of the Turkes ſtanding in that bay, and bordering vpon the Venetian ſeigniorie: the inhabitants were part Dalmatians, part Epirots, which had renounced the Chriſtian religion, and ſome Turks, liuing moſt part by merchandiſe: Vnto this towne the Chriſtians laied ſiege, and in ſhort time woon it, where they had a great prey, and a wonderful number of captiues of all ſorts. Three daies after the taking of the towne, the caſtle was alſo yeelded by the Turkes garriſon, couenanting in vaine to depart with life and libertie.

Barbaruſſa braueth the Chriſtians.

Caſtronouum taken by the Chriſtians.

This towne taken by common force, ought of right by the couenants of the league to haue been deliuered to the Venetians; yet was it for all that by Auria and Gonzaga reſerued for the emperour, and Franciſcus Sarmentus with foure thouſand Spaniards all old ſouldiors, left there in garriſon: Capellius the Venetian Admirall vrging in vaine the right of the Venetians. Which thing ſo much grieued the Senat, who euer had the ambitious Spaniard in ſuſpect, and now aſſured of him as an euill neighbour to their towne of CATARVM, that repenting themſelues of the league with the emperour, they decreed to ſue to Solyman for peace: which they afterwards eaſily obtained, for a ſhort ſpace, by Laurentius Grittus their dukes ſonne, and by the help of Antonius Rincus the French kings embaſſadour; who then lying at CONSTANTINOPLE, in good time told the great Baſſaes, that the league the Venetians had made with the Emperour, was made without the conſent of the greateſt part of the Senat, and that warre taken in hand againſt moſt of their wils.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Barbaruſſa put to ſea againe to haue relieued CASTRONOVUM; but being at ſea, many of his gallies were by the violence of a ſudden tempeſt driuen vpon the ACROCERAVNIAN rocks, and there caſt away. It is reported, that he loſt there twentie thouſand men, which with the broken pieces of his gallies were found almoſt all alongſt the coaſt of DALMATIA. This ſhipwrack being certainly known, Capellius would haue perſuaded Auria to haue preſently purſued Barbaruſſa ſo diſtreſſed: which motion Gonzaga well liked, as a man deſirous by ſome notable exploit to recompence the diſgrace before receiued at LEVCADE. But Auria for diuers cauſes not liking of the matter, was ſo ſet downe vpon his returne to ITALIE, that he preſently hoiſed ſaile: leauing the Venetian Admirall in ſuch a rage, that he deteſted himſelfe for ſubmitting himſelfe to another mans power; and wiſhed the captaines there preſent, neuer to ſubiect themſelues to the commaund of a ſtranger, for as much as that Genoway, either vpõ cowardiſe or malitious mind, as an old enemy to the Venetian ſtate, would not proſecute ſo manifeſt a victorie, but put vp ſo ſhameful a diſgrace as he had before receiued. But of all this Auria made ſmall reckoning, referring all that he both ſaid and did, ſo far vnto the emperors cõmoditie, that Valerius Vrſinus a noble gentleman, then ſeruing in the Venetian pay, merily ſaid, That Auria had don nothing but wiſely & politickly, in ſetting the Venetians togither by the eares with the Turks, & opening a gate for a long war, whether the Venetians would or not, ſo as the emperour himſelfe could not haue better wiſhed, and that without the loſſe of one gallie. For it was thought by many, that the long wars betwixt the Turks and the Venetians, would ſort to the great good of the emperour; when as the Venetians worne out and ſpent with thoſe long and chargeable warres againſt ſo mightie an enemie, ſhould be ſtripped of their lands & territories, either by force, or ſome hard compoſition wrung from them by neceſſitie.

Auria neglecting to purſue Barbaruſſa, yeturneth into Italie, to the griefe of the Venetian Admirall.

CASTRONOVUM thus taken, and Sarmentus with a garriſon of foure thouſand Spaniards there placed as is aforeſaid, and the Chriſtian fleet diſſolued, Solyman tooke the matter ſo grieuouſly, that hee determined to beſiege it againe both by ſea and land: and in his furie, cauſed

NAVPLI-

A NAVPLIVM and EPIDAVRVS, two of the Venetian cities in the country of PELOPONESVS, to be straightly besieged. Yet tooke he singuler pleasure, that Barbarussa his Admirall, in all respects worse furnished, had driuen out of the Sea the great fleet of the Christians, which he before that time had made too great account of. Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring, which was in the yeere 1539, Barbarussa by his commandement repaired againe his fleet, and notably furnished it with all manner of warlike prouision; manning his gallies for the most part with Ianizaries and other such select souldiors. With this fleet Barbarussa (Sommer now well come on) departed out of the HELESPONTVS, and came to the bay RIZONICVS; at which time also Vlames the Persian, then Gouernour of BOSNA, shewed himselfe with his forces vpon the mountaines as he had in charge from Solyman. Barbarussa before he entred the straits of the bay,
B sent before him Dragut and Corsetus, two notable pirats, with thirtie galliots, who landing their men neere vnto CASTRONOVUM (as they were commaunded) were valiantly encountred by Sarmentus with his Spaniards, and forced againe to their galliots, many of the Turks being slain and taken prisoners. After that came Barbarussa, with ninetie gallies, and three tall ships which carried the artillerie for batterie and other necessarie prouision for the campe; where he spent three daies landing his great ordinance and casting vp trenches, which could not be done but by night, by reason of the continuall shot out of the towne: wherewith the Spaniards had in that three daies space slaine aboue a thousand Turkes; amongst whom was Agis Hariadenus, who had made himselfe as it were a king at TAIORBA, a citie neere TRIPOLIS in AFRICA; whose death much grieued Barbarussa, as one of his most antient and best friends. At length Barba-
C russa hauing cast vp his trenches, landed foure and fiftie great pieces of artillerie for batterie; whereof he gaue a fourth part to Vlames to batter the towne on the North side, whilest he in the meane time, in three diuers places battered the East side; and Salec from Sea with ten gallies, did morning and euening batter another part of the wall. Whilest Sarmentus was thus in so many places assailed, and did what was possible to haue repaired the breaches; the Turks by force tooke one of the towers, where after they had displaied their ensignes, they from thence with their shot sore troubled the Spaniards. At the same time also, Vlames had made a breach, and was readie on the other side of the citie to enter. In which extremities, Sarmentus seeing no meanes longer to defend the citie, commanded the hurt souldiers to get them into the castle below, & the rest with him to take the market place, there to die togither like men: where the Turks
D straightway breaking in on euerie side vpon them, made a most bloudie and cruell fight, wherein the Spaniards ouerwhelmed with shot, and the multitude of their enemies, were slaine almost euerie man. Sarmentus wounded in the face with three arrowes, and wearied with long fight, seeing Sancius Fria a captaine readie to flie, sharpely reproued him, and catching him by the hand, made him there to tarie by it, vntill they were there both togither slaine. Many valiant captaines were there lost, whose names for breuitie I omite. Aloysius Arius, and certaine other captaines who togither with the wouuded souldiors were got into the castle, seeing no meanes to defend the place, yeelded themselues: whom Barbarussa according to his promise, tooke to mercie in sparing their liues, yet carried them away into captiuitie to CONSTANTINOPLE.
E The dead bodie of Sarmentus could not be knowne amongst so many heapes of the dead, although Barbarussa had caused most diligent search to be made for it, and offered great sums of money and libertie also, to who soeuer could recouer it; being desirous to haue sent his head for a present to Solyman. Barbarussa proud of this victorie, began forthwith to gape after CATTARVS a citie of the Venetians in the bottome of the same bay: and thereupon writ threatning letters to Ioannes Bembus one of the Venetian Senators then Gouernour of the citie, presently to deliuer the citie; which he would (as he said) otherwise assault by force. Whereunto Bembus answered againe by letters, That in so doing, he should violate the league lately made with Solyman, and that he should find him readie by force to repell his forces. Wherewith Barbarussa displeased, sent certaine gallies into the bottome of the bay; who discharging certaine great pieces at the citie, made shew as if they had come to besiege it. At whom Bembus as a man of F good courage, caused as many mo like pieces to be discharged, and shewed his men vpon the wals: Which thing Barbarussa perceiuing, staied his course, and calling backe his gallies, returned to CASTRONOVUM, from whence (better appeased with presents afterwards sent from Bembus) he departed out of that bay.

The long warres betwixt Charles the emperour and Francis the French king, were now well pacified; pacified, and ſuch friendſhip (at leaſtwiſe in ſhew) now growne betwixt theſe two great princes, that moſt men thought that all other quarrels laid aſide, they would now at length with vnited forces go againſt the great and dangerous enemie of Chriſtendome: Which opinion not altogether of the wiſer ſort beleeued, was yet at this time wonderfully confirmed by many extraordinarie and rare courteſies then paſſing betwixt them, which concerne not this hiſtorie; as alſo, in that two of their moſt famous captaines, Alphonſus Vaſtius, and Hanibald, were as it were with one conſent by them both ſent embaſſadours to VENICE, to haue drawne the Venetians into the confederation of that warre againſt the Turke. Which two renowned captaines comming to VENICE, moſt gallantly accompanied, were by Landus the duke, and the whole State, with great magnificence receiued, the people after their wonted manner flocking together in euery place to behold them ſo noble captaines ſent from ſuch mightie princes; but eſpecially Vaſtius, whoſe fame hauing many times before filled their eares, made them now the more deſirous to ſatisfie their eyes alſo with the beholding of his tall and comely perſon. Which two famous captaines admitted into the Senat, for that purpoſe fully aſſembled, and audience giuen: Vaſtius ariſing from the dukes ſide, in theſe or like words deliuered their embaſſage.

Alphonſus Vaſtius and Hanibaldus ſent embaſſadours from the emperor and the French king to the State of Venice.

Vaſtius his Oration to the Venetian Senat.

It is come to paſſe (as I ſuppoſe) by the great prouidence of Almightie God, and of all the diuine powers (moſt noble duke and honourable Senators) that two of the moſt mightie kings of EVROPE, who of late had of long time made mortall wars one vpon another, touched with the zeale of religion, are become great friends: Vndoubtedly to that purpoſe onely, that hauing made a firme peace, they may bring ſuch a generall quietneſſe to the long troubled and afflicted ſtate of Chriſtendome, as beſt beſeemeth their greatneſſe; and taking in hand a ſacred warre to reuenge ſo many calamities receiued from the Infidell. That this might be made knowne vnto you (moſt noble Venetians) theſe mightie Monarchs haue ſent vs hether in good time to kindle in you the like zeale, wherewith it is well knowne you haue alwaies for the honour of your State been enflamed: for you of all others, which are of ſuch power and valour at ſea, they wiſh for, as their fellowes and confederates in this ſacred warre and hoped victorie, and thinke you worthie, which ſhould enioy the eſpeciall fruit of all that labour. For as much as the Chriſtian forces once renewed, and ſo great and ſtrong a fleet once aſſembled, euery man ſeeth that the Turks muſt needs be too weake: although they brag, that they carried away the victorie of late at ACTIVM, when as they then eſcaped the victorious hands of our men, not by their owne valour, but by the vnexpected hap of a ſudden ſtorme. For all the powers of heauen and earth, and of the ſea alſo, will be propitious vnto vs, vniting ſo great forces, in the regard of our ſacred religion; and will ſo take away the hearts of the Infidels, that they ſhall learne to be ouercome. As for our land forces, we are to hope nothing but well, for as much as vnto thoſe which the emperour of late brought into the field at VIENNA, and cauſed the Turkiſh emperour to flie, ſhall be ioyned not onely all the horſemen and infanterie of FRAVNCE, a wonderfull ſtrength, but Sigiſmund alſo king of POLONIA will without delay bring forth his armies, wherewith he hath beene vſed in the quarrell of the Chriſtian religion happily to fight againſt the Infidels: ſo that it is not to be doubted of a moſt certaine and aſſured victorie. Wherefore the victorious emperour and moſt Chriſtian king Francis moſt inſtantly requeſt you to enter into the like godly cogitations, conceiued for the generall good of the Chriſtian name, and religiouſly to embrace the hope of a moſt true and glorious victorie: and further exhort you, by a wholeſome decree to auert your religious and courageous hearts from the friendſhip of the Infidels. For it may worthely ſeeme vnto your moſt honourable minds, a moſt foule and ſhamefull thing, to haue renewed your league, and to haue preferred an infamous and vncertaine peace before a moſt religious and iuſt warre. Neither doth it beſeeme this moſt wealthie State to be terrified from that which is good and right, with any charges of war, be they neuer ſo great: for if we ſhall once ouercome, which is incident to this preſent and long wiſhed occaſion, wee ſhall by the profit of one victorie, either by ſea or land, to your incomparable praiſe recompence all the loſſes by vs in former times receiued.

The anſwere of the duke to Vaſtius.

Whereunto the duke in the name of the whole State anſwered, That there neuer happened any thing at any time vnto the Venetian Senat more honourable, for the manner of the embaſſage, or for the publicke ſecuritie of their eſtate, more to be deſired than the hope of ſuch a peace: after that two moſt mightie kings by two ſuch famous captaines their embaſſadours, did certifie them of their attonement and aſſured peace, moſt glorious to themſelues, to their eternall praiſe, whole-

A wholesome also to the Venetian state, beset with so many dangers, and wonderfully to be wished for of all the other princes of Christendome, if they would sincerely & religiously with their forces by common consent vnited, resolue vpon that sacred war: for then would not the Venetians be wanting to themselues or the Christian commonweale, but end the league they had with the Turke, not with a dishonourable peace, but with armes and victorie. Wherefore it was to be requested of Almightie God by prayer, That those puissant kings would with religious and happie euent speedily and seriously fulfill all that hope of peace, which they had by their mutuall discourses and embracings in shew promised vnto the world.

In few dayes after certaine of the select Senatours sitting in counsell, after the manner of that
B State, called the embassadors vnto them and asked them, Whether they knew any thing of the articles and capitulations wherein that league and confederation was to be concluded? and by the way, Whether they thought the Emperour in regard of that peace would giue vnto the French kings sonne the Dukedome of MILLAN, as was reported? Whereunto Hanebald the French embassador answering nothing, Vastius said, That he knew nothing more, but that the two great princes had agreed thereof betwixt themselues, and that the Emperour had desired the peace, as one willing to help the afflicted & declining state of the Christian commonweale: which thing any man might see could not be effected or brought to passe, but that the Emperour must in many things yeeld to the requests of the French king, and redeeme his good will: For the noble mind (said he) worthie Senatours, can easily make light of the greatest losse of his
C owne things, when it foreseeth a large way opened thereby to eternall fame and glorie. These words were very glorious & gracious to the hearers: but they, as men of great experience, could not let it sinke in their minds, that the Emperour whom they had often deeply sounded, would euer depart with the Dukedome of MILLAN, which only thing the French king required, and had for the recouering thereof vnfortunatly striuen almost twentie yeares, to the trouble & disquiet of a great part of the world. The nobilitie and authoritie of this embassage more mooued the Senat than did the other former embassadours, Didaco Mendoza, a Spaniard, and Guilielmus Pellicerius, a Frenchman, then both present: yet was it much suspected by the Venetians, because it contained no certaine resolution, but onely the bare hope of a future peace; so that it was by many men supposed to be but a matter deuised to deceiue others and to serue the Emperours
D turne to his great profit. Yet all the cunning seemed to rest in this point, That the Venetians led on with the hope of this league, should neglect the renewing of the league they had the yeare before taken with Solyman, which was now almost expired. Vpon which vncertaintie of other mens resolutions, the graue Senatours thought too dangerous a matter to depend.

Vastius his answere to the demaund of the Venetian Senatours.

Vpon this question of this new league and confederation to be made with these Christian princes against the Turke, the Senat was wonderfully deuided: some fauoring the Emperours requeſt, inueighed against the renewing of that shamefull league with the infidels, which they said was nothing els, but as much as in them lay to betray vnto them the other parts of Christendome, and especially ITALIE, destitute of their help, and yet not to be obtained without great charge; and with many reasons vrged the honourable confederation with these Christian prin-
E ces: others of a deeper reach, considering what infinit harmes they had from time to time receiued by falling out with the Turks, and suspecting also the Emperours drift, and ioyning thereunto the consideration of the great dearth then raigning in the citie, which was not to be relieued but out of MACEDONIA and GRÆCIA, the Turks countries; the Emperour hauing at that time as it were of purpose imposed so great a custome vpon all corne to be transported out of SICILIE, that the very custome came to as much as both the price of the corne and the fraight together: all which mischeefes they said were to be preuented by renewing the league with Solyman. This matter was with great heat debated in the Senat too and fro, either part hauing great faultours: so that the Senatours spent almost whole Winter nights in the court in discoursing and consulting what were best to be done. But whatsoeuer was there said or decreed, was forthwith
F by one of the factions or other made knowne, not onely to the embassadours present in the citie, but by letters also discouered into prouinces far off: a thing neuer before in that state known, which had euer vsed as it were with a religious silence to keepe secret whatsoeuer was there decreed. Which thing Marcus Foscarus, an old Senator and a man of great wisdome, perceiuing, said openly, That the state was betrayed by the multitude and corruption of voices, and must needs shortly perish, if it were not speedily committed to the graue and faithfull iudgement of some ſome few: for there was almoſt two hundred of them which gaue voices, reducing that multitude to the number of fiftie, who for their experience and loue toward their countrey, were holden for men of greateſt grauitie and ſecrecie: ſo was the madneſſe of many ſtayed by the diſcretion of a few. But Foſcarus ſhortly after fell into ſuch hatred of the multitude, grieued to be as light headed men without diſcretion, ſo excluded out of the counſell, that he was by the voices of the multitude firſt thruſt out of the counſell himſelfe, and by them kept a great while after from all the preferments and honours of the citie: being indeed one of the graueſt Senatours, and a man of deepeſt iudgement. Which diſgrace turned afterward to his great honour and credit, as one that had foreſeene much, after they were once found out and condemned which had traiterouſly reuealed the ſecrets of the State. The Venetians ſend Aloyſius Badoerius their embaſſadour to Solyman, to conclude a peace.

But this long conſultation concerning the confederation, came to this end, That the Senatours doubting the vnion of thoſe two great princes, & yet willing to expect the euent, decreed forthwith to ſend three embaſſadours; whereof two ſhould be ſent to the emperour and the French king to diſcouer their deſignes, and the third, which was Aloyſius Badoerius, a wiſe and well ſpoken man, was with all ſpeed diſpatched away to Solyman, to preuent the fame of the diſtruſt to be conceiued of the agreement of thoſe great Chriſtian princes, and if he could by any meanes, to ſpare for no coſt, to ſaue vnto the Venetians their cities of NAVPLIVM and EPIDAVRVS, which Solyman required of them before he would graunt them peace. Which if it could not be obtained of the proud and craftie tyrant, than to yeeld vnto neceſſitie, and to conclude a peace with him vpon any conditions: which courſe the Decemviri thought to be moſt I expedient for the State: yet concerning the yeelding vp of the cities, they gaue him ſecret inſtructions and warrant, fearing forſooth the force and tumult of the headſtrong multitude, who if they had knowne any ſuch thing, would vndoubtedly thereupon haue taken occaſion to haue croſſed and ouerthrowne that moſt wholeſome decree: for there was no doubt, that if they had delayed the matter, and ſought for peace too late, but that Solyman would vpon another mans weakeneſſe and neceſſitie haue encreaſed his inſatiable deſire, and not graunted them peace, being brought low & forſaken, except they would deliuer vnto him the iſlands of CEPHALENIA, ZACINTHVS, and CORCYRA, a matter no leſſe grieuous than the deſtruction of the very citie of VENICE it ſelfe. So that the great embaſſadours Vaſtius and Hanebald, who came of purpoſe to haue hindered the league with the Turke; by their great diligence wrought nothing more effectually, than that the Venetians the better foreſeeing the danger of their eſtate, ſhould as they did, make haſt to conclude the ſame: for it falleth out in mens purpoſes and actions, That a good and happy ſucceſſe otherwiſe wel hoped for, is oftentimes marred with too much diligence and care. Neither was it any doubt, but that Hanebald was ſent by the French king but for faſhion ſake, and ſecretly vnderſtand by Pellicerius the old embaſſadour perſuaded the Venetians to haſten the concluſion of peace with Solyman. Which as Badoerius their embaſſadour was carefully ſolliciting the matter at CONSTANTINOPLE, and being loth to yeeld the ſtrong cities which Solyman required, offering vnto him in ſtead of them a great ſumme of money: Solyman tooke him vp with threatening words as a ſhameleſſe diſſembler, earneſtly proteſting, That he would neuer grant him peace, without the yeelding of thoſe cities; rehearſing vnto him the moſt ſecreteſt points of his embaſſage, and how that he was authoriſed from the Decemviri to yeeld them vnto him: which thing the embaſſadour little thought Solyman had knowne. Wherefore Badoerius ſo ſhamefully reproued, and ſtanding in doubt of his life, ſeeing the greateſt ſecrets of his embaſſage reuealed to Solyman and his Baſſaes, was glad to accept of peace, by yeelding vnto him NAVPLIVM and EPIDAVRVS, two cities in PELOPONESVS, and with them NADINVM and LABRANIA, two caſtles of DALMATIA, to the great greeſe of the whole Senate: for graunting wherof the common people ignorant of the ſecret decree of the Decemviri, and ſuppoſing that Badoerius had giuen away that which he had no authoritie to giue, were ſo enraged againſt him at his returne, that it was much adoe to ſaue the guiltleſſe man from exile, and his goods from confiſcation, although the traitors were then knowne which had diſcouered the ſecrets of the ſtate vnto the Turkes. Theſe were Mapheus Leonius a Senatour, and Conſtantinus Cobatius, ſecretarie to the colledge of the Decemviri, and Franciſcus Valerius, one of the Senators baſe ſonnes, the traiterous diſperſer of the Turks money for the corruption of others: who with other his complices were for the ſame fact hanged in the marker place, when as Leonius and Cobatius were a little before fled into FRAVNCE. About

A About the ſame time which was in the yeare of our Lord 1540, died Ioannes Sepuſius king of HVNGARIE, Solymans tributarie; after whoſe death enſued great warres in HVNGARIE, and the lamentable ſubuerſion of that flouriſhing kingdome: for the better conceiuing whereof, it ſhall not be amiſſe with as much breuitie as the plainneſſe of the hiſtorie will permit, to open the cauſes & grounds of the endleſſe calamities which afterwards enſued, and neuer tooke end, vntill that warlike kingdome was to the great weakning of Chriſtendome vtterly ſubuerted.

King Ferdinand and this tributarie king Iohn, had with like deſire of peace and quietneſſe, made betweene them a league; profitable to them both as their eſtates then ſtood, rather than honourable: yet moſt welcome to the Hungarians, who deuided into factions, and hauing followed ſome the one king and ſome the other, enioyed neuertheleſſe their lands and goods by
B the benefit of this peace; the townes and caſtles being ſtill kept by them in whoſe poſſeſſion they then were at the making of the peace. In the capitulations of which peace, it was compriſed, That Ferdinand ſhould from thenceforth call Iohn by the name of a king, whereas before he had both in his common talke and letters called him by the name of the Vayuod only: It was alſo expreſſely ſet down in the ſame articles of peace, and ſubſcribed with the hands of diuers of the nobilitie of HVNGARIE, That if king Iohn ſhould die, king Ferdinand ſhould ſucceed him in the whole kingdome of HVNGARIE: Which condition was ſuppreſſed and kept verie ſecret for
C feare of Solyman, who accounted of that kingdome as of his owne, gotten by law of armes, and beſtowed vpon king Iohn as vpon his vaſſaile: neither was it to haue been thought, that if he ſhould haue known thereof (being of a hautie mind by nature, and not able to endure any iniurie) he would haue ſuffered that kingdome, got and defended with ſo great danger and coſt, to be by the will of an vnthankfull man, transferred vnto his enemies.

This matter of ſo great importance, was (as it is reported) by Hieronymus Laſcus embaſſadour for king Ferdinand to CONSTANTINOPLE, reuealed vnto Solyman and the Baſſaes, to bring king Iohn into hatred. So much did this noble gentleman, for his rare vertues otherwiſe greatly to haue been commended, yeeld vnto his griefe, and deſire of reuenge: when after the death of Aloyſius Grittus, he fell from the friendſhip of king Iohn, being (as is before declared) by him committed to priſon, and hardly afterwards enlarged, at the requeſt of king Sigiſmund. Whereupon Solyman being exceedingly angrie with king Iohn, called him vnthankfull churle, and turning himſelfe about to Lutzis baſſa his brother in law, ſaid, How vnworthely doe theſe
D two Chriſtian kings weare their crownes vpon their faithleſſe heads; who as ſhameful deceiuers are not afraid, either for worldly ſhame or feare of God, for their profit to falſifie their faith? But king Iohn vnderſtanding thereof, and wonderfully fearing his owne eſtate, did by good friends and rich preſents, pacifie Solyman againe, laying all the blame vpon king Ferdinand, as better able to beare it. Not long after, king Iohn hauing ſet his kingdome in good order, and ſtrongly fortified the citie of BVDA: being now farre ſtricken in yeares, at the earneſt requeſt of moſt of the nobilitie of HVNGARIE and other his beſt friends, married Iſabella the daughter of Sigiſmund king of POLONIA, a gratious ladie, and of great ſpirit: which king Sigiſmund had long
E before married Barbara king Iohn his ſiſter, after whoſe death he married the ladie Bona Sforția, the daughter of Ioannes Galeacius duke of MILLAIN, by whom he had this ladie Iſabella whom king Iohn now married. Which marriage Solyman liked well of, hauing many times by way of talke before condemned the ſingle life of the king: but king Ferdinand liked thereof nothing at all, plainly foreſeeing, that the Hungarians (if the king ſhould chance to haue a ſonne) would forthwith looke vpon him as their naturall king, and reiect himſelfe as but a ſtranger.

This young queene in ſhort time (as he had feared) conceiued with child, and was now very big: when king Iohn was enforced to make an expedition in perſon himſelfe againſt Maylat (famous for the death of Aloyſius Grittus) and Balas, both Gouernours of TRANSILVANIA: whereof Maylat not contented with the name of Vayuod or Gouernour, ſought to make himſelfe king. But Solyman deteſting the impudent arrogancie of the faithleſſe man, and hating him for the death of Grittus, and the Turks ſlaine with him, aduertiſed king Iohn of all the matter, wi-
F ſhing him to be more circumſpect whom he truſted with the gouernment of ſo great and rich a countrey. So Maylat ſhamefully reiected of Solyman, and out of hope of a kingdome, fearing alſo to be thruſt quite out of his gouernment by king Iohn, thought it beſt for his owne ſafetie, to raiſe vp all the prouince into rebellion, and to take part with king Ferdinand: which thing Ferdinand by his diuers agents ſecretly furthered to the vttermoſt. For theſe two kings, although though they were at peace the one with the other, and in words and ſhew made ſemblance of G friendſhip; yet in heart they enuied and hated each other, as if they ſhould preſently haue waged warre. At that ſame time king Iohn exacted of his ſubiects, and eſpecially of them of TRANSILVANIA, a great ſumme of money, to pay the Turke his tribute, then two yeares behind: which thing ſerued Maylat and his complices, as a fit occaſion to raiſe the people into rebellion; perſuading them, that there was no reaſon to pay vnto the Turke ſuch a tribute, as would ſerue well to wage ten yeares honourable warre againſt him: ſo that by that and ſuch like perſuaſion, all the prouince was in an vprore, little differing from manifeſt rebellion. To appeaſe theſe dangerous troubles thus ariſing, king Iohn ſent certain of his chiefe nobilitie and beſt captaines with a great power into TRANSILVANIA, following after himſelfe in his chariot, not yet well recouered of his late ſickneſſe: Theſe noble men entring in two places into TRANSILVANIA, and H ſcouting vp and downe the countrey, had in ſhort time ſo vſed the matter, that what by force what by policie, the tumult was well pacified, and diuers of the chiefe offenders worthely executed. Maylat the ambitious author of this ſedition, not able to hold the field againſt the king, and ſeeing himſelfe beſet on euery ſide with his enemies, retired himſelfe with all his wealth into a towne called FOGARAS, a place of great ſtrength, which the kings power ſhortly after hardly beſieged: the king himſelfe then lying at SIBYNIVM, the chiefe citie of TRANSILVANIA, about a mile diſtant from FOGARAS, ſicke of an ague, whereinto he was againe fallen through too much care and pains taken in trauelling in that hoat time of the yeare, the dayes being then at the longeſt. Whileſt he thus lay ſicke at SIBYNIVM, and his armie faſt by at the ſiege of FO-

a faire young ſonne: which was no ſooner bruted abroad, but the Hungarians as mē ouerioyed, came flocking to the court where the king lay, diſcharging their pieces in triumph, with all other ſignes of ioy and mirth they could poſſible deuiſe: the noble men came from the campe to reioice with the king, and all the armie was filled with gladneſſe. And for the greater ſolemnitie of this ſo common a ioy, a royall feaſt was prepared, which the noble men would needs haue the king to honour with his preſence, though he were thereto vnwilling, being as yet but a little recouered: Howbeit yeelding to their importunitie, hee ſuffered himſelfe to be ouerruled and brought to the feaſt by them, which was vnto him the merrieſt and the laſt that euer he made: for willing to ſhew his inward ioy, and to content his nobilitie there preſent, he forgot himſelfe, K and eat and dranke more liberally than was for the health of his weake bodie: whereby the feauer which had but a little before left him, was againe renewed, in ſuch ſort, as that he well perceiued he could not long endure. Wherefore feeling his end to draw faſt on, he made his will, appointing his young ſonne to be his heire, whom he committed to the tuition of George biſhop of VERADIVM, and Peter Vicche a noble gentleman and his neere kinſman, vntill he came to age: requeſting the reſt of the noble men to preferre his ſonne in the ſucceſſion of the kingdome, before a ſtranger, telling them, That Solyman would vndoubtedly take vpon him the protection both of the kingdome and of his ſonne, if they would in time ſend embaſſadours vnto him with preſents, and promiſe for his ſonne, that he ſhould raigne as his tributarie as he had done before: and ſo preſently after died. L

This king was of a courteous and gentle nature, bountifull, and in all his doings iuſt, of no fierce and rough diſpoſition, as the Hungarians commonly are, but of a moſt ciuile behauiour, garniſhed with good letters, and thorowly ſchooled in the diuers chances of both fortunes, not meaſuring his actions by the ſtrength of his power, but by the exact rule of diſcretion; for in time of buſineſſe no man was more circumſpect or vigilant than he, nor in time of recreation any man more courteous or pleaſant. He vſed oftentimes to ſay, That the fauour and loue of valiant men gotten by bountie and courteſie, was the beſt treaſures of a prince; for that courteous and thankfull men, did oftentimes in ſome one worthie piece of ſeruice, plentifully repay whatſoeuer had been beſtowed vpon them: as for ſuch as were vnthankfull, they did to their ſhame beare the teſtimonie of another mans vertue.

The kings death was kept ſecret vntill ſuch time as the noble men had agreed with Maylat, M that he ſhould take an oath of his faithful alleageance to the king, and his ſonne his lawful heire, and ſo ſtill to enioy his former place and gouernment: which offer Maylat gladly accepted, Then calling togither the counſell, it was decreed to ſend the ſame embaſſage to Solyman, which was appointed the old king yet liuing. So were preſently diſpatched away two moſt honourable

A ble embaſſadours, Ioannes Exechius biſhop of QVINQVE ECLESIE, and Stephanus Verbetius the Chancelor, a man of great yeres, carying with them ten boles of pure gold courioufly wrought, ſix hundred of ſiluer, gilt and engrauen; fortie pieces of purple ſilke and cloth of gold for Turkes gownes, and fiftie pound of coined gold, to bee paied in the name of two yeares tribute. Which embaſſadours paſſing directly from SIBYNIVM ouer Danubius into SERVIA, and ſo trauelling thorow THRACIA, came to CONSTANTINOPLE. In the meane time, the dead body of the king was with much heauineſſe carried from SIBYNIVN to ALBA REGALIS, moſt part of the armie following it, and there with great ſolemnitie buried. After this the young child was chriſtened and called Stephen, and there preſently crowned with the ancient crown of king Stephen, who firſt erected that kingdome, & without which the Hungarians neuer accounB ted their kings lawfully crowned. Yet the royal dignitie was by the common conſent of the nobilitie giuen vnto the queen, with condition, that in all publike writings the names of the ſonne and of the mother ſhould be ioined, and the kings money coined with the ſame inſcription: but the chiefeſt authoritie reſted in George the biſhop, for he was treaſurer, and had at his commaund the caſtles and ſtrong holds: yet were the ſouldiors with their enſignes and furniture, at the deuotion of Valentinus Thuracus: In the middle between theſe two was placed Peter Vicche the kings kinſman, and by the old king appointed for one of the tutors of his young ſonne, ſuſpected of neither part, honoured with the name of high Conſtable. But becauſe the name of this George the biſhop was moſt famous in this wofull war which we are about to write, I thought it worth the labour to ſpeake ſomething of his nature and diſpoſition, that it may be known to all C poſterity by what policie this war was managed, & how this flouriſhing kingdome by the madneſſe of the Hungarians came into the hands of the Turks.

Embaſſadours ſent out of Hungarie to Solyman.

A young child crowned king of Hungarie.

This George was borne in CROATIA, and brought vp from his yourh in the houſe of king Iohn, where vertue and induſtrie neuer wanted reliefe; when as he vnaduiſedly before, had entred into the orders of a monaſticall life, and wearie too late of the ſtraightneſſe therof, had forſaken his profeſſion. Wherefore being of a wonderfull pleaſing nature, and ſtill following king Iohn, driuen out of his kingdome and long liuing in exile, he woon ſuch credit and commendation for his fidelitie, integritie, and readie counſell in the kings moſt doubtfull and dangerous affaires, that after Sibacchus that worthie biſhop, was by the treacherie of Aloyſius Grittus ſlain at BAXOVIA, he obtained the great biſhopricke of VERADIVM. After that, when he had ſtrengD thened his credit with great wealth, he alwaies as a faithfull counſellor ſwaied and happily ruled both the court and kingdome, to the profit of the king. But he was of ſuch a diuers and pliant nature, that performing in all actions all the parts of a moſt readie and excellent man, he ſeemed to be made of contrarie qualities, and borne to do any thing: For in ſaying of his princely ſeruice, and performing the other ceremonies of the Chriſtian religion, he ſhewed, or at leaſtwiſe counterfeited ſuch a contrition in his deuout countenance & ſpeech, that a man would not haue thought it could poſſibly be the ſame man, who in the moſt waightie affaires both of warre and peace, did moſt ſtoutly ſhew the wonderfull force of a moſt pregnant and couragious wit: For he vſed to keepe whole companies of moſt excellent and readie horſemen, & would oftentimes come forth into the battell armed: he would with often banquets and rewards win the hearts of E the ſouldiors; and after the maner of great chiefetaines, maintaine the honour and credit of his name, both with puniſhment and reward, as occaſion required. Beſides that, no man looked into the wealth of the kingdome more diligently than he, no man did to more profit let to farme the cuſtomes, gold mines, feedings, and ſaltpits; no man could deuiſe finer meanes to raiſe mony, of all others the readieſt way to credit: inſomuch, that king Iohn would confeſſe himſelfe to raigne by the eſpeciall induſtrie of that man: and K. Ferdinand would many times ſay, That he enuied at K. Iohn for nothing he had, but for one hooded fellow which was better for the defence of a kingdome, than 10000 with helmets on their heads. Wherfore this biſhop hauing taken vpon him the tuition of the young king, was ſtil buſied in all the waightie cauſes of the kingdome, both ciuill & martial: he labored with great care, that the Hungarians ſhould agree togiF ther in loue & vnitie, and did what he might, prouidently to foreſee that no tumult or rebellion ſhould any where ariſe, wherby the beginning of the kingdome, yet but weake, might any way be troubled. But king Ferdinand hearing of the death of king Iohn, thought it now a fit time for him to recouer againe the kingdome of HVNGARIE, which he had ſo long deſired. Whereunto he was alſo the more prickt forward by the perſuaſion of Alexius Torſo, Ferentius Gnarus, Petrus

George biſhop of Veradium one of the kings tutors a notable man.

The fugitiue Hungrians perſuade king Ferdinand to inuade Hungarie.

Bachit, Balthazar Pamphilus, Francus Capolnates, Ianus Caſtellamphus, and Caſparus Seredus, all G noblemen or gentlemen of great account in HVNGARIE, who in the former troubles following the part of king Ferdinand againſt king Iohn, liued now in exile: theſe all with one conſent told king Ferdinand, That now or neuer was the time when they might be againe reſtored vnto their countrie with honour; and that the war might that Autumn be diſpatched, if he would make haſt: for as much as Winter comming faſt on would ſtay the comming of the Turks, and ſuch noblemen of HVNGARIE as tooke part with the queene, did not very well agree togither, being vnwilling to be commaunded by George the Apoſtata monke, who (as they ſaid) with great cunning and diſſimulation ſeducing the queene, and poſſeſſing the treaſure, enioyed all alone the power of a king: and that they, which for taking part with the right had long liued as baniſhed men, might now ſafely returne into their countrie, and be honourably preferred by H the queene; the Biſhop (which all commaunded) aſſuring them thereof, if they would returne vnto the young kings court, vnto their friends and ancient houſes. But they had as they ſaid, before giuen their faith vnto him as to a vertuous and faithfull prince, whom they had preferred before one that was an Hungarian borne: wherefore he ſhould doe both vnaduiſedly and vnkindly, if letting ſlip the occaſion preſented, he ſhould deferre to make war. For what could be more diſhonour to him ſo great a King, and alſo Emperour elect, than by ſhamefull delay to forſake them, being noble and valiant gentlemen, which had followed his part, and were then readie with ſtrong troupes of horſemen to doe him the beſt ſeruice they could?

The German Captaines in like manner perſuaded him to take the matter in hand, who as martiall men, expecting ſome one preferment, ſome another, in the armie, were deſirous of ho- I nour, pay, and prey, the chiefe comforts of their trauell and perill.

Laſchus diſſuadeth king Ferdinand from ſeeking for the kingdome of Hungarie by force, perſuading him rather to requeſts of courteſie of Solyman.

But Laſchus the Polonian, who in matters concerning peace and warre ſaw more than all they (as he that knew the diſpoſition of many princes, and had ſeene the manners and faſhions of diuers nations, hauing trauelled thorow a great part of the world, and oftentimes beene Embaſſadour in the courts of the greateſt Princes) was of a contrarie opinion, and told king Ferdinand plainly, That the kingdome of HVNGARIE was to be obtained rather by pollicie than by force, by crauing it at Solymans hand, to hold it of him by tribute as king Iohn did.

For (ſaid he) that may by petition and faire entreatance be eaſily obtained of that heroicall prince, (who in his vaine humor oftentimes fondly ſeeketh after honour) which will neuer be got from him K by force of armes. I thorowly know (ſaid he) Solymans hautie mind, and the proud diſpoſition of his Baſſaes: he contemneth wealth, and is cloied with ſo many kingdomes: but they vpon their inſatiable couetouſneſſe and exceeding pride, deſire nothing, nor perſuade him to nothing more than warre. Wherefore it is good to beware, that with the noiſe of this ſudden warre you ſtir not vp the Turkes, which lie readie as it were expecting ſuch an occaſion, which cannot be withſtood, but by the vnited forces of the Chriſtian princes; which might by their generall conſent be done, but that their eyes blinded with fatall darkneſſe cannot ſee it, and the vnitie of the Chriſtians now deſperate, ſeemeth by God reſerued to ſome better time: ſeeing that of late the Chriſtian kings are fallen off, and cannot agree vpon the long expected peace. Is not (ſaid he) the French king deceiued of his hope? and as he L would haue it thought, greatly diſhonored with this late vnkindneſſe? which renewing his old wound, will reuiue in him an endleſſe hatred. Away with all diſſimulations, enemie vnto graue counſels, and let plaine truth, although vnpleaſant vnto princes eares, preuent flatterie: Vndoubtedly, he being a prince of no baſe courage (as it oftentimes falleth out with men thorowly grieued) will in his anger as an enemie powre forth his gold, whereof he hath good ſtore, to croſſe the Emperours deſignes, to trouble the aſſemblies of the ſtates of GERMANIE, to withdraw the minds of the princes, and with bountie to gaine them to himſelfe: who mightily enuying the imperiall dignitie, woont to be indifferently giuen to them that beſt deſerued the ſame, to be as it were inueſted in the houſe of AVSTRIA; which in this perpetuall ſucceſſion of ſo many Emperours, hath as it were got a right by long cuſtome. Wherefore they will ſecretly conſpire together, and as notable lingerers by nature, will either giue no helpe at all, or elſe too late: at ſuch time as the Turkes garriſons ſhall come flying to the ſuccour of the M young king. Neither is there any cauſe why any man ſhould thinke that the gouernours of the Turkes countries neere at hand, will for the approach of Winter be ſlacke in this cauſe: for they vndoubtedly making an honeſt and honourable ſhew will take vpon them the defence of the fatherleſſe child and widdow; of purpoſe, to make an entrance to the ſecret deſire they haue to gaine the kingdome to themſelues:

A ſelues: for if you ſhall once ioyne with them in battell, if the beſt happen, and fortune fauour our firſt attempts, truly you ſhall haue war without end, with ſuch an enemie, which will bring with him wealth that will neuer be ſpent, power not to be ouercome, and courageous ſouldiors ſworne to our deſtruction: So will it come to paſſe, and I pray God I be a falſe prophet, that in ſeeking for the kingdome of Hvngarie by warre, you ſhall at length be glad to fight for Avstria it ſelfe and your owne kingdome alſo.

This ſpeech ſo moued king Ferdinand, that although he purpoſed to goe on with the warre, yet he thought it good by an honorable embaſſage to proue Solymans mind and purpoſe alſo; which to doe no man was thought fitter than Laſchus himſelfe, author of that counſell, being
B vnto him very well knowne, and familiarly acquainted with all the great Baſſaes of the court: which ſeruice Laſchus refuſed not, but being furniſhed with all things needfull for ſuch an embaſſage, departed from Vienna towards Constantinople. Laſchus ſent embaſſador frō king Ferdinand to Solyman.

Yet for all that, king Ferdinand perſiſting in his former purpoſe, made withall preparation for warres, truſting vpon the aid of the emperour his brother, & the comming ouer of the Hungarians, who euer thought it cauſe honeſt ynough for them to reuolt, if it ſo ſtood with their preſent profit. But before he would enter into open warres, he ſent Nicholas countie of Salma to the queene, to ſhew her the inſtruments of the laſt league betwixt the king her late huſband and him, & to exhort her to yeeld vp the kingdome, which by the late league was another mans
C right: and not by delaying of the matter, to hurt both her ſelfe and her ſon: for king Ferdinand offered to giue vnto the child the prouince of Sepvsia, as was before agreed betwixt the two kings expreſſely in the league, and to the queene a greate reuenew, and whatſoeuer elſe ſhe had in dowrie: But if ſhe would forget that lawfull league, he threatened, that neither the emperour Charles his brother nor he wanted force wherewith to recouer by ſtrong hand the kingdome, annexed to the houſe of Avstria both by auncient right and the new conſent of moſt of the Hungarian nobilitie. The countie Salma being receiued at Bvda, hardly obtained to be admitted to the preſence of the queene: for George the Biſhop, and Vicche, miſtruſting her womanlike courage, ſaid, ſhe was not to be ſpoken withall, by reaſon ſhe was ſo full of heauineſſe and
D ſorrow: and that they were of authoritie, as the kings tutors, and readie to giue him both audience and anſwere. Which opinion of her weakeneſſe, and want of iudgement, the queene being a woman of an heroical and royall ſpirit, tooke, as tending ſo much to her diſgrace, that ſhe ſaid ſhe would kill her ſelfe, if the embaſſadors were not permitted to come into her chamber (which was a darke roome hanged with black, as the maner is:) and ſhe ſitting vpon a low pallet negligently attired, as one that had no care of herſelfe,, wan and pale coloured, but as then ſhedding no teares, yet with voice and countenance ſo heauie, as might ſhew her teares to be rather dried vp with long mourning, than that her ſorrow was any thing abated: for the deſire of bearing rule had now ſo poſſeſſed her mind, that ſhe contemned all the dangers of imminent war, and for defence of her ſoueraignty reſolued with her ſelfe to call in the Turks. After the countie admitted to her preſence, had with due reuerence and great proteſtation deliuered his meſſage, ſhe demurely anſwered, That ſuch was the fortune of her ſex and yeares, that being bereft of the king
E her huſband, and perplexed with the dayly griefes both of bodie and mind, ſhee could neither take nor giue counſell, but purpoſed in ſo weightie a cauſe to vſe the aduice of Sigiſmund her father, whoſe integritie and iuſtice was ſuch, as king Ferdinand needed no other Iudge or arbitrator to end that controuerſie: Wherefore ſhe requeſted a conuenient time and ſpace, wherein ſhe might aske counſell of her father; to whoſe iuſt iudgement ſhe ſaid ſhe would ſtand, as ſhe thought the nobilitie of Hvngarie would alſo. Which ſmall time of delay if it ſhould be denied, and that they would needs forthwith make warre vpon her; ſhe ſaid, that the emperor and king Ferdinand his brother ſhould ſurely win no great honour, if they ſhould come to oppugne her a widdow conſumed with teares, and a young child yet crying in his cradle. The countie ſo
F ſent away, when he was returned to king Ferdinand, told him, That the queene was altogither in the power of the Biſhop, and could neither ſay nor do any thing, but what ſhe had before receiued from him: for he only (as he ſaid) commaunded all: as for the reſt of the nobilitie, they ſhared amongſt them the honours and preferments of the realme, and as men deſirous of credit and gaine, had rather be the gouernors of the young prince, than the ſeruants and waiters of a great and mightie forreine king: all which he ſaid he had both heard and ſeene. Wherefore all King Ferdinād ſendeth an embaſſador to the queen to demād of her the kingdome of Hungarie. The queens anſwer to the embaſſadour.

the hope was in war, wherein ſuch ſpeed was to be vſed, as that the queen with her ſonne vnprouided, and expecting the euent of their embaſſage from CONSTANTINOPLE, might be driuen out of BVDA before they could take vp armes, or well aduiſe themſelues what to do; and that the queene ſought delay but to make her ſelfe the ſtronger, and in the meane time to call in the Turke, and ſo to make a more dangerous war. Wherfore if euer he purpoſed to raigne in HVNGARIE, he ſhould forthwith caſt off all other cogitations, and make readie his forces with all ſpeed poſſible. G

King Ferdinand inuadeth Hungarie.

Hereupon king Ferdinand furniſhed with money from Charles the emperour, without delay raiſed a great armie, which he ſent downe the riuer Danubius to STRIGONIVM, which citie had all the raigne of king Iohn continued faithfull to king Ferdinand. The Generall of his armie was Leonardus Velſius, a nobleman of RHETIA: who for many cauſes thought it expedient firſt to open the way to BVDA, for almoſt in the middle of the way ſtood VICEGRADE, with a goodly caſtle vpon the top of an hill by the riuer ſide; which towne (but not the caſtle) Velſius after nine daies ſiege tooke, with the loſſe of about two hundred of his men, all the garriſon ſouldiors therein being either ſlaine or taken priſoners, with Valentinus Litteratus their captaine. Vicegrade taken.

Peſth and Vachia taken.

From VICEGRADE he paſſed ouer the riuer Danubius to PESTH, which he tooke, being forſaken of the enemie. With like ſucceſſe he tooke the citie of VACIA, without loſſe: and remouing thence, and croſſing againe the riuer with his fleet, came and encamped before BVDA, ſo to terrifie the citiſens, and to diſcouer as farre as he could the purpoſe of the queene. Where Perenus, Stephanus Raſcaius, and Franciſcus Francopanes biſhop of AGRIA, all men of great nobilitie amongſt the Hungarians, reuolted from the queene to king Ferdinand: the Biſhop was reputed for a man of great integritie, and vpon meere conſcience to haue gone ouer to Ferdinand, yet was he by letters from George the kings tutor challenged to haue reuolted, in hope by meanes of Charles the emperour to be made a Cardinall. Velſius lay with his armie at the hot bathes about a mile and a halfe from the citie, as if he would rather beſiege it, than aſſault it. The Germans lying there, did fetch in bootie round about the countrie, which was taken in euil part by the Hungarians on their ſide; who ſeeing their owne cattell or their friends driuen away, the villages burnt, and the poore huſbandmen bound and taken priſoners, fell togither by the eares oftentimes with the Germanes. On the other ſide they of BVDA ſending out their troupes of horſemen, skirmiſhed with the Germanes, if they did but ſtirre out of the campe, and well defended the villages from the iniurie of the enemie: for Valentinus Thuraccus, Generall of the queenes power, had taken into the citie a wonderfull number of light horſemen. Whileſt the armie lay thus encamped, it fortuned that Balthaſar Pamphilus, a noble Hungarian, ſtraying out of the campe euen to the gates of BVDA, deſired the warders at the gate to giue him leaue to talke with Valentinus their Generall, for that he deſired to ſee his old friend, and to conferre with him of certaine matters concerning the good of the common ſtate. Which thing being graunted by the Generall, he was immediatly receiued into the citie with his troupe of horſemen. Shortly after returning againe into the campe, he reported how he had beene entertained by his old acquaintance in the citie: where viewing the garriſon, the great artillerie and fortification of the citie, he perceiued it was not to be taken without a greater power, and in a more ſeaſonable time of the yeare. Which thing ſo moued Velſius, by nature ſuſpitious, and doubtfull of the fidelitie of a ſtranger, that he commaunded him in anger to void the campe, becauſe he had without his leaue gone into the citie, and vpon his owne priuat inſolencie had conference with the enemie, and by amplifying their ſtrength, to haue diſcouraged the armie, by putting them out of hope of victorie. Wherefore Velſius neuer attempting to aſſault the citie, returned againe to VICEGRADE to beſiege the higher caſtle (wherein the auncient crowne of king Stephen, wherewith the Hungarian kings were euer after him crowned, was kept) which caſtle he alſo tooke with ſomething leſſe loſſe than he had done the lower towne. Not long after he marched with his armie to ALBA REGALIS, the citie where the Hungarian kings were vſually crowned and buried, which by the meanes of Perenus was deliuered vnto him, and a garriſon put into it for king Ferdinand. Theſe things thus done, Velſius retired againe to STRIGONIVM, which he did the rather, becauſe the Germans and Hungarians, two rough nations, could by no meanes agree togither, inſomuch, as that Velſius the Generall in parting them was wounded in the thigh, and Perenus hurt with a ſtone; beſides that Winter was now come farre on, and the ſouldiors cryed out for pay. For which cauſes Velſius (being alſo ſicke of the ſtone) billitted his ſouldiours for that Winter about I K L M

King Ferdinands army departeth from Buda.

Alba Regalis yeelded to king Ferdinand.

A about in the countrey. Yet before that he new fortified PESTH, and left therein a garriſon, becauſe it was reported, that the Turkes vpon their frontiers were making preparation to come to aid them of BVDA.

At ſuch time as king Ferdinand was leuying his forces for the inuaſion of HVNGARIE, the Queene by the counſell of the Biſhop, had in good time craued aid of the Turkes lieutenants in the countries bordering vpon HVNGARIE, eſpecially of Vſtref, gouernour of BOSNA (a very aged man, and of great honour, who had married one of the daughters of Baiazet the old emperour) as alſo of Mahometes gouernour of BELGRADE, and Amurathes who had the charge of the frontiers of DALMATIA: from whom ſhe receiued one anſwere, That they might in no caſe without expreſſe commaundement from Solyman depart from the places of their charge.

B Beſides that, Mahometes was by rewards ouercome by Laſchus, as he paſſed by BELGRADE to CONSTANTINOPLE, not to ſtirre or aid the Queene. Wherefore ſhe reiected by theſe great captaines, certified Solyman by her embaſſadours what danger her ſelfe, her ſonne, and the kingdome was in, crauing his ſpeedie aid. Laſchus was not yet come to CONSTANTINOPLE, being fallen ſick by the way, but had ſent before Ptolomeus his phyſition to the great Baſſaes, and eſpecially to Lutzis his old acquaintance, vpon whom he had beſtowed great gifts, and was in hope by him to haue obtained what he deſired: but all in vaine, for Solyman who thought it much for his honour to defend his owne right, and that he had before giuen vnto king Iohn; thought alſo, that it would redound both to his great profit and glorie, if he ſhould as it were vpon charitie take vpon him the protection of the widdow and fatherleſſe child, in their ſo great diſtreſſe

The Queene craueth aid of Solyman against Ferdinand.

C and danger. Wherefore calling vnto him the embaſſadours, the three great Baſſaes ſtanding by, he ſaid, That he had of his meere bountie before giuen the kingdome of HVNGARIE vnto king Iohn, to deſcend to his poſteritie, ſo long as they ſhould retaine the kind remembrance of ſo great a benefit; wherefore to declare his conſtancie, inſeparable from his bountie, he ſaid he would take ſuch a courſe in the matter, as that the Germans his enemies ſhould not long reioice of the warres they had begun. And in token of friendſhip, and that he had taken vpon him the protection of the young king, he cauſed to be deliuered vnto the embaſſadours a royall robe of purple and gold, a buckler with the boſſe moſt curiouſly wrought, a horſemans maſe with a handle of gold, and a ſcimitar with the ſcabberd richly ſet with ſtones: and afterwards writ effectually to Vſtref & Mahometes, his lieutenants, that they ſhould without delay aid the Queene, Solyman promiſeth to protect the Queene and her ſonne againſt Ferdinand, and ſendeth preſents to the yong king.

D and not to make excuſe, becauſe it was Winter, threatening them, that if ſhe tooke any harme through their default or negligence, it ſhould coſt them their heads. The Queenes embaſſadours glad of their good diſpatch, were ſcarce departed from the Turks court, wen Laſchus came to CONSTANTINOPLE; and vnderſtanding by his phyſition the ſucceſſe of the Hungarian embaſſadours, proceeded for all that in his buſineſſe, and deliuered his meſſage, and vpon many reaſonable conditions requeſted the kingdome for king Ferdinand. But when he in ſpeaking had oftentimes made mention of Charles the emperour, as if he would with all the power of GERMANIE aid his brother; Solyman was ſo mooued therewith, that he was preſently taken away and committed to priſon: the great Baſſaes, but eſpecially Ruſtan, Solymans ſonne in law, a proud

Laſchus king Ferdinand his embaſſadour impriſoned by Solyman.

E and furious young man, chiding him and ſhaking him vp as worthie of death, for offending with his liberall ſpeech the maieſtie of ſo courteous a prince, and as it were mocking the king of kings, requiring friendſhip, when in the meane time his maſter moſt impudently made wars in HVNGARIE.

Vſtref and Mahometes, the Baſſaes aforeſaid, hauing receiued ſuch ſtraight commaundement from Solyman, aſſembled their diſperſed ſouldiors, and by ſhipping brought them downe the riuers Sauus & Dranus into Danubius, (for it is a hard matter to performe any great thing by warres in HVNGARIE, without the help of a great fleet, for conueying of the great ordinance, victuall, and other ſuch neceſſaries of the armie, from one ſide of the great riuers to the other, as occaſion requireth) but as then being the middeſt of Winter, and the North wind blowing hard, Danubius was ſo frozen on both ſides, that the middle of the riuer was ſcarce open: ſo

F that the Turks not able to paſſe for the extremitie of the weather, not daring to returne for the ſtraight command of Solyman, were enforced in their tents there to abide the hardneſſe of Winter, to ſhew their readineſſe. It is almoſt incredible to be ſpoken, with what patience and reſolution the ſouldiors endured all the extremities of the time, in ſo bare a place, their horſes which of all other things they hold moſt deare, ſtaruing for cold and want of meat.

1541 The Spring at length comming on, right welcome both to the Turks and the queene; Mahometes with his Turkes and wild Illyrians, and Vstref with his ſouldiors of BOSNA, entred into HVNGARIE, with whom Valentinus Generall of the queens forces ioined alſo, with a ſtrong power of Hungarians brought from BVDA. And the queene to further the matter, ſent preſents to the Turks Generals, victualed the camp, and furuiſhed them with great ordinance, for the beſieging of ſuch cities as were holden by king Ferdinand her enemie. They paſſing ouer Danubius tooke the citie of VACIA, being but badly defended for king Ferdinand, and putting many to the ſword (after the manner of their barbarous crueltie) burnt the citie. From thence they remoued to PESTH, which was ſo valiantly defended by Barcocius and Fotiſcus, the one a Hungarian captaine, the other a German, that the Turks deſpairing of the winning of the citie, and not well relieued with victuall by the queene, then fearing future want, paſſed againe ouer Danubius, and faithfully reſtoring the great ordinance without any more doing, returned againe into their owne countries: but in their retiring, the Hungarians by the leading of Ferentius Gnarus ſlew many of them, amongſt whom was one Achomates, one of their beſt and valianteſt captaines.

The queene ioyneth her forces with the Turks, and burneth Vacia.

Peſth in vaine beſieged by the Turkes.

King Ferdinand aduertiſed of the Turks departure, returned again to his old hope of recouering the kingdome: perſuading the emperor his brother, not to giue ouer the war ſo fortunatly begun, eſpecially now that the Turks hauing forſaken the queen, were departed & gone. Wherfore the new forces lately before raiſed in AVSTRIA, BOHEMIA, SILESIA, and MORAVIA, for the ſupplie of Velſius his armie, were preſently ſent into HVNGARIE vnder the leading of the Lo. William Rogendorff ſteward of the kings houſe, who was then gone as farre as POSSONIVM to haue relieued them of PESTH, vnto whom as a more auncient and honourable Generall Velſius gaue place. He, furniſhed with theſe new ſupplies, three monethes victuals, and great artillerie from VIENNA, ioining with the old armie, marched directly to BVDA, and laid ſiege vnto it. Ouer againſt the ſtately caſtle of BVDA wherein the queene lay, was a great hill called S. Gerrards mount, ſo high, that the middle therof was equall with the higheſt place of the caſtle, and from the top thereof they might looke into the ſtreets of the citie, betwixt which hill and the caſtle was a great valley and a deepe ditch: vpon this hill, Rogendorff to beat the caſtle and to terrifie the queene, planted his batterie, and ſo ſhooke a new built tower thereof, that it was thought it would haue ſodenly fallen; which if it had, yet was it ſuppoſed a dangerous matter to aſſault it, becauſe it was walled about with a treble wall. But the ſumptuous turrets and princely galleries of the kings pallace in the caſtle, which euerie man ſaw Rogendorff might haue beaten downe with his great ordinance, he ſpared: but whether of himſelfe, or elſe commaunded by the king (as loath to deſtroy ſo goodly buildings, as could not without great charges be in long time againe repaired) was vncertain. Wherfore by diuers heraulds ſent vnto the queen, he wiſhed her to breake in ſunder thoſe giues and fetters wherin the biſhop vnder the colour of protection had faſt bound her ſonne and her, and to accept of king Ferdinands offer, who was readie to beſtow vpon her a goodly ſeignorie, wherin ſhe might moſt honourably liue at quiet, and bring vp her ſonne in ſafetie: Which thing, if ſhe as a ſimple woman, and ignorant of her owne danger, ſhould refuſe and obſtinatly contemne the perill wherein ſhe ſtood, hee would forthwith in moſt terrible manner beat downe the pallace about her eares. Whereunto the biſhop in the queenes behalfe aunſwered, That ſhee was not ſuch a foole to exchange the kingdome of HVNGARIE for the principalitie of SERVSIA: and that ſhe thought Rogendorff a verie doting and mad old man, who being once before well beaten in thoſe ditches, came now again like a foole to receiue his vtter deſtruction in full guerdon of his raſh follie: wherfore he ſhould ceaſe to terrifie valiant men, fighting with diſcretion for their naturall king and countrie againſt his drunken companie, for that they were nothing troubled with the noiſe of his great ſhot: But yet he ſaid, that he would aboue all the reſt by way of priuat courteſie, gently requeſt Rogendorff to diſcharge his pieces with a little leſſe noiſe, becauſe he had a ſow at home great with pigs, which terrified with the thundring of his guns, would farrow he doubted before her time, to the griefe of his gueſts. For the biſhop was of a ſharpe and taunting ſpirit, and ſuch a contemner of the Germans, that when two of them were taken in the kings orchards burning certaine houſes, he in diriſion cauſed two hogs to bee hanged vpon the ſame gallowes with them. Not long after, Rogendorff remoued his campe from the mount of S. Gerrard to a more conuenient place for the battering of the citie, called the Iewes graues, neere vnto the gate called the Iewes gate.

Which

A Which thing the biſhop ſeeing, after his quipping manner requeſted of Rogendorff to pardon him, in that he had of late wrongfully called him a doting old man; for that in remouing his camp into a more commodious place, he ſeemed to be a proper wiſe man and of good diſcretion, now that he had pitched his tents in a moſt fit place amongſt the dead, both for himſelfe being an old man and almoſt worne with vaine labour, and for his armie there condemned to die with him. Rogendorff thus encamped, begun in two places to batter the wals: Perenus and the Hungarians with the Bohemians neere vnto the gate called SABATINA in one place, and he himſelfe with the Germans betwixt the Iewes gate and the caſtle in another: which was done with ſuch violence, that a great part of the wall was beaten downe, & another part thereof ouer-
B charged with earth, which the defendants had caſt vp on the inner ſide for the ſtrengthning thereof, was at the ſame time born quite out and ſo fell down, to the wonderfull diſmaying of all that were in the citie. Which faire opportunitie to haue taken the citie Rogendorff let ſlip, either not well aware thereof by reaſon of the great ſmoke of the artillerie on both ſides, and the duſt ariſing with the fall of the wall which couered all; or elſe according to his naturall diſpoſition, doing all things leaſurely and ſuſpitiouſly; ſo that a little delay bereft him of the preſent apprehenſion of ſo ſudden a reſolution: and the Germans, vſed more to ſtanding battels than to aſſault, were not to be ſo eaſily brought on to aſſault the breach vpon the ſudden, as were the Spaniards, Italians, or French. The wall was opened in that place almoſt two hundred paces in length, yet ſtanding almoſt the height of a man, which might eaſily haue bin ſcaled with ſhort ladders; but
C night was now comming faſt on, wherein the Germans would not willingly attempt any dangerous matter: ſo that the aſſault was deferred vntill the next morning. Whereas they of BVDA in the meane time taking the aduantage of the enemies delay, with incredible diligence and labour in that night raiſed vp a new rampier in ſteed of the wall that was fallen, euerie man without exception putting his hand to the worke. In the morning the Germans comming to the breach, gaue ſuch a fierce aſſault vnto the new made rampier, that Otho Fotiſcus deſperatly entered into a ſhattered houſe which ioyned vnto the wall; and certaine other companies, one ſouldiour helping vp another, had almoſt recouered the top of the rampier, and were there readie to haue ſet vp their enſignes. When they of BVDA with wonderfull conſtancie and reſolution withſtood the aſſailants, George the biſhop encouraging them and fighting amongſt them; who
D hauing laid aſide his hood, was now to be ſeene with his helmet on his head, running too and fro as need required all alongſt the rampier. At length the Germans ſeeing themſelues to ſtriue in vaine againſt reſolute men, were enforced to retire. In this aſſault Rogendorff loſt aboue 800. men. Perenus was alſo in like manner, but with leſſe loſſe, repulſed at the other breach he had made at the gate SABATINA. After that Rogendorff attempted by vndermining to haue taken the citie, but was by countermines diſappointed of his purpoſe. Yet for all this, they in the citie began to feele the want of many things, ſo that it ſeemed they were not able to endure any longer ſiege; the common people pinched with hunger crying openly out in mutinous ſort, that it was time to yeeld and make an end of thoſe common miſeries: but ſuch was the authoritie of the biſhop with his prouident foreſight of all vrgent euents, that once ſhewing himſelfe in the E market place as if he would haue preached, he could turne the peeuiſh minded people which way he pleaſed.

A great breach in the wals of Buda.

The Germans aſſaulting the breach, are with loſſe repulſed.

After all this, it miſſed but a little, but that this citie which could not by enemies force be woon, had by ſhamefull treaſon beene loſt: there was at that time in BVDA one Bornemiſſa a lawyer, who had in former time beene maior of the citie: this Bornemiſſa exceedingly hated the biſhop for taking part with a banckerout Iew againſt him, and being full of malice, and deſirous of reuenge, promiſed to Renalius (martiall in the enemies campe) to deliuer vnto him a blind poſterne in S. Maries churchyard, whereby he might enter the citie: which gate ſerued the citiſens in time of peace to go thorow to the riuer. Rogendorff the Generall made acquainted with the matter, ſo liked thereof, that he in himſelfe thought it not good, in a matter of F ſo great importance, to vſe at all the ſeruice of the Hungarians: Quite contrarie to that Bornemiſſa had requeſted of Renalius, who deſirous to haue the matter brought to paſſe without the ſlaughter of ſo many guiltleſſe people as was by him to be betraied, would haue had it altogither performed by the Hungarians, who he was in good hope would ſhew mercie vnto their countrey men and kinſmen, and vſe their victorie with more moderation than the Germans, who prouoked with many deſpights, and comming in by night, were like enough to make great effuſion of bloud. But Rogendorff after the manner of his nation, to be counted polliticke, vſing to keepe promiſe with no man, and hoping by excluding the Hungarians to haue all the glorie of the conceiued victorie wholly to himſelfe; made as if he would haue vſed only the Hungarians, and gloſed with Renalius, whoſe ſon for the more aſſurance he tooke as pledge: For againſt the appointed houre, which was about midnight, hauing before giuen ſtraight charge that no man ſhould ſtir in the camp, he ſent foure ſelect companies of Germans with great ſilence vnto the poſterne; at which time his ſonne Condi ſtood with a ſtrong troupe of horſemen, readie to haue entred, at ſuch time as the Germans (receiued into the citie) ſhould breake open the great gate, as was before agreed. Neither did Bornemiſſa faile to performe what he had as a traitor promiſed: but opening the poſterne we ſpake of, had with great ſilence receiued in moſt part of thoſe German companies. But when he ſtill asked ſoftly of them as they came in for Renalius, and heard them anſwere nothing but in the German language; although hee was otherwiſe a man of a bold ſpirit, yet then ſurpriſed with a ſoden feare (as it oftentimes chanceth in ſuch actions to men deceiued of their expectation) he ſtood as a man amaſed that knew not what to do, and forgot to conduct the Germans: who altogether vnacquainted with the citie, knew not which way firſt to go; & ſtealing on ſoftly in the darke, went on with no great courage, for feare of treaſon, ſtill asking of them that followed, for him that ſhould direct them. The Germans could not go ſo cloſely, but that they were by the clattering of their armour & the light of their matches, deſcried by the watch; who asking for the word, & they not giuing it, preſently raiſed an alarum: but now all too late, the citie being as good as halfe taken, had the Germans wel conducted reſolutely gone on with the matter ſo well begun; but they ignorant of the way, and now deſcried and chaſed with their own feare, ran back againe to the poſterne, in ſuch haſt, that one of them miſerably wrong another, in ſtriuing who ſhould get out firſt; and their paſſage out much letted by the pikes and weapons which they which fled firſt had caſt croſſe the way to run the lighter into the campe. The firſt that ſet vpon the Germans was Bacianus, who had that night the charge of the watch; and after him Vicche, who kept the court of guard in the market place, and hearing the alarum, came thither with a ſtrong companie both of horſemen and footmen. Many of the moſt valianteſt Germans, who comming in firſt, were in flight become laſt, were ſlaine or taken, and amongſt them many of Bornemiſſa his familiars and friends (as for himſelfe, he was got out amongſt the formoſt) from whom the biſhop by exquiſite torture wrong out the whole plot of the treaſon, and afterwards cauſed them to be ſeuerally executed to the terrour of others. Renalius in the meane time complaining in the campe, That he was deceiued by the Generall: and Bornemiſſa wofully lamenting, That hauing worthily got the name of an infamous traitour, he had thereby loſt all his ſubſtance, and vndone his friends and kindred. The Generall Rogendorff (condemned euen of the common ſouldiors, for his fooliſh arrogancie and pride) was hardly ſpoken of thorow all the campe, as he that by too much inſolencie had ouerthrowne the faireſt occaſion of a moſt goodly victorie: wherfore from that time he attempted no great matter, but ſet himſelfe downe by long ſiege to tame his enemies, and ſo to win the citie.

Solyman vnderſtanding of the queens diſtreſſe in HVNGARIE, and with what deſire Ferdinand (ſupported by the emperour his brother) thirſted after that kingdome; conſulted with his Baſſaes of the purpoſes & power of his enemies, both there and elſwhere: and politikely reſolued at one time, with his diuided forces, to withſtand their attempts in diuers places, and thoſe farre diſtant one from another, wherby the greatneſſe of his power is well to be perceiued. Firſt he ſent Solyman Baſſa an eunuch to BABYLON, to defend the countrie of MESOPOTAMIA, and the frontires of his empire alongſt the riuer Tygris, againſt Tamas the Perſian king. Mahometes another of his great Baſſaes, he ſent into HVNGARIE to relieue the beſieged queene: And after him Peſtref Baſſa, which was the fourth of his chiefe Baſſaes, with another armie to ſtay at BELGRADE, in readineſſe to aid the other Baſſa ſent before him as occaſion ſhould require, if he ſhould find his enemies too ſtrong. Vnto Barbaruſſa he committed his nauie, for the defence of GRÆCIA and EPYRVS againſt Auria, who but a little before aided by the gallies of SICILIA and NAPLES, had driuen the Turkes and Moores (which tooke part with the Turks) out of CLVPEA, NEAPOLIS, ADRVMENTVM, RVSPINA, TAPSVS, and all alongſt that coaſt of AFFRICKE which the Moores call MAHOMEDIA, except the citie of LEPTIS, and cauſed thoſe cities to ſubmit themſelues to the gouernment of Muleaſſes king of TVNES.

Solyman at one time maintaineth wars in diuers places of the world ſo re diſtant.

Theſe

A These cities are at this day called CALIBIA, SVSA, MAHOMETA, MONASTERIM, SPAXIA and APRICA. And becauſe Solyman vnderſtood, that Maylat the Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA tooke part with king Ferdinand, he ſent againſt him Achomates gouernour of NICOPOLIS, and commaunded Peter of MOLDAVIA, prince of VALACAIA, to aid him: who afterwards accordingly came vnto him with thirtie thouſand horſemen. He himſelfe alſo doubting the purpoſes of the Chriſtian princes, and eſpecially of Charles the emperour, more than he had need, came to HADRIANOPLE, and in the countries thereabouts raiſed a third armie, to aid the two Baſſaes ſent before into HVNGARIE; keeping with him his ſon in law Ruſtan, whom he had made one of the foure great Baſſaes of his counſell, hauing thruſt out Luſtibeius, whom the Turkes call Lutzis, his brother in law, and exiled him into MACEDONIA for euill entreating and ſtri-
B king his wife, which was Solymans ſiſter, as is before ſaid, but was at this time done.

Mahometes the Baſſa deſirous to doe his great Maſter the beſt ſeruice he could, entred into HVNGARIE with his armie about the middle of Iune in the yeare 1541, taking with him in his way the other Mahometes gouernour of BELGRADE, who gaue the ſhamefull ouerthrow vnto the Chriſtians at EZEK; ioyning alſo with him the power of BOSNA, now commaunded by Vlamas the Perſian, for that Vſtref the old Baſſa was lately dead. The captaines of the Chriſtian armie hearing of the comming of the Turks, entred into counſell, Whether they ſhould continue the ſiege, or els goe and meet them by the way and giue them battell. But the period of the Hungarian kingdome drawing faſt on, and the ineuitable deſtinie thereof ſo requiring, the opini-
C on of Rogenderff preuailed againſt the reſt for the continuing of the ſiege, he ſeeming more willing to die than to croſſe ouer the riuer to PESTH, or to retire to VICEGRADE or STRIGONIVM, as diuers would haue perſuaded him: wherefore he remoued from the place where he lay before, and encamped his armie on the further ſide of the citie at the foot of S. Gerards mount, where the hill lying betweene BVDA and the campe, and departing from the riuer leaueth a faire plaine toward the Eaſt; of purpoſe, that the Turks which he knew would not goe far from the riuer and their fleet, ſhould be enforced dangerouſly to paſſe by the mouth of his great ordinance, which he had aptly placed vpon the front of his trenches: for ſuch was the nature of the place, that the campe lay defended on the right hand with the ſteepe hill, on the left hand with the riuer, and behind toward the citie with a ſtrong bulwarke. Vpon the right hand, vpon a little
D riſing ground he placed the leſſer campe, wherein were the Hungarians which fauoured king Ferdinand, and then followed his enſignes. He made alſo a bridge from his campe into a little iſland which lay in the riuer, and with a fort well planted with ordinance commaunded both the riuer and the plaine, ſo to beat the enemies fleet comming vp the riuer, and themſelues alſo as they ſhould march alongſt the plaine. He was about alſo to haue made a bridge of lighters and boats quite ouer the riuer, from his campe to PESTH, and in this order to expect the comming of new ſupplies from king Ferdinand, and to repell the enemie who was comming, and with long ſiege to wearie them in BVDA: for there was ſuch ſtore both of victuall and all other warlike prouiſion in PESTH, as would well haue ſufficed his armie vntill Winter had beene ſpent. As ſoone as the Turks were come nigh the citie, Valentinus as an embaſſadour from the queene met them with two thouſand horſe, and fully inſtructed both the Mahomets what the E Chriſtians did, what ſtrength they were of, and how they might moſt conueniently encampe their armie. Wherefore the Baſſa marching on boldly forward, came within halfe a mile of the Chriſtian campe, where he quickly entrenched himſelfe round with a ſtrong trench, filling a great part of the plaine with his tents. But the other Mahometes, gouernour of BELGRADE, a moſt polliticke captaine, tooke the higher ground towards the riſing of the hill, neerer vnto the tents of the Hungarians than of the Germanes. Vnto theſe two armies thus encamped, belonged alſo two fleets, the Chriſtian fleet conſiſted of foure and twentie galleots, about foureſcore ſmall pinnaces, and little leſſe than a hundred ſhips of burden and other great boats: whereas the Turks fleet was not thought to be paſt halfe ſo great. Neere vnto the little iſland, ioyned as we haue before ſaid by a bridge to the Chriſtian campe, beneath in the riuer had the Turkes taken
F another iſland called CEPELLIA, oueragainſt their owne campe; where caſting vp a great bulwarke in the vppermoſt end thereof, and planting it with great ordinance, they from thence ſhot at the fort which the Chriſtians held in the little iſland, and at their veſſels paſſing too and fro in the riuer; as the Chriſtians did at them likewiſe. This Iſland of CEPELLIA lieth ſomewhat more than fortie miles in length in the riuer Danubius, ful of countrey villages, ſo commodiouſly, ſly,that if Rogendorff had at the firſt taken it and fortified it,before the comming of the Turkes, G as the Hungarians perſuaded him to haue done,the Turks could by no means haue encamped in the plaine,but muſt needs haue forſaken their fleet,fetching a great compaſſe about more toward the Weſt,further off from the riuer : which would haue turned to the Turkes great diſaduantage. But no man is ſo wiſe as to foreſee all things,when as the verie euill ſucceſſe, bee the plot neuer ſo well laied, ſhall of it ſelfe, beſide the loſſe, leaue vnto the vnfortunate man the note of the want of prouident foreſight and diſcretion. But Rogendorff was not willing to deuide his forces, vntill he had ſome new ſupplie from king Ferdinand. Whileſt the armies lay thus neere one to the other, there were ſome light skirmiſhes made euery day,either by the horſemen or the footmen, and Skirmiſhes betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turkes. ſometime one braue man challenging forth another hand to hand,whom he thought by his armour or ſome other ſigne of his worth, to be like to himſelfe : which was ſo pleaſant a ſight to H behold,that both the armies vpon a militarie courteſie,as if it had been ſo agreed, would many times for certaine houres forbeare to ſhoot any ſhot,of purpoſe to ſee thoſe gallants,with true proweſſe to prooue their valour and manhood one vpon another with their ſpeares and ſwords only. In which light skirmiſhes the Germane horſemen were oftentimes put to the worſt, who mounted vpon great heauie horſes,fitter for a ſet battell,could neither ſo readily charge the ene-mie,nor purſue him in his flight; as could the Turks with their nimble and readie light horſes, ſo well acquainted with that maner of flying fight,that they would with wheeling about eaſily fruſtrate the firſt charge of the heauie horſemen, and by and by come vpon them againe with a freſh charge,& ſo often retire and come on againe,vntil they had either wearied or ouerthrown them. But the Hungarians acquainted with that manner of fight as well as they,and alſo better I armed,did eaſily incounter the Turkes, and foile them,although they were in number moe.

Rayſchachius for ſorrow of his ſonne ſlaine by the Turks,ſuddenly dieth. There was amongſt the Germane captaines a noble man called Eckius Rayſchachius, whoſe ſon (a valiant yong gentleman) being got out of the armie without his fathers knowledge,bare himſelfe ſo gallantly in fight againſt the enemie in the ſight of his father & of the armie, that he was highly commended of all men,and eſpecially of his father,who knew him not at all: yet before he could cleare himſelfe, he was compaſſed in of the enemie, and valiantly fighting ſlaine.
Rayſchachius exceedingly moued with the death of ſo braue a man, ignorant how neere it touched himſelfe,turning about to the other captaines, ſaid, This worthie gentleman,whatſoeuer he be,is worthie of eternall commendation,and to be moſt honourably buried by the whole armie. As the reſt of the captaines were with like compaſſion approuing his ſpeech, the dead bo- K die of the vnfortunate ſonne reſcued,was preſented to the moſt miſerable father; which cauſed all them that were there preſent to ſhed teares: but ſuch a ſoden and inward griefe ſurpriſed the aged father, and ſtrucke ſo to his heart, that after he had ſtood a while ſpeechleſſe,with his eyes ſet in his head,he ſuddenly fell downe dead. From that time the Generall commanded, That no man ſhould vpon paine of death go out of the armie to skirmiſh with the enemie without leaue, wherein he was ſo ſeuere,that he hanged vp one or two which preſumed to tranſgreſſe his commandement : which thing much diſcouraged his owne men,and ſo incouraged the enemie,that they would ſometime braue the Chriſtians vpon the top of their owne trenches.

Many daies had now paſſed ſince the comming of the Baſſa,the Turkes and they of BVDA dayly increaſing both in ſtrength and courage : when on the other ſide, faint courage, weake L ſtrength,troubled counſel,vncertain reſolution,the ominous ſigns of an vndoubted ouerthrow, were eaſie to be ſeene; & hope it ſelfe,the ſtay of all human actions,eſpecially of martial affairs, almoſt loſt : the onely things that held their fainting hearts, was the often letters of king Ferdinand, and the firme opinion they had conceiued, That Charles the emperour would not in ſo great a danger faile to aid his brother, both with men and mony : and laſt of all, the firme reſolution of a Generall,which far paſſed all reaſon, the ſooner to draw him to his end. The armies lying in this order,the Turkes from the higher ground, and out of CEPPELLIA, perceiuing the Germanes in the little Iſland as careleſſe men to keepe but negligent watch, agreed amongſt themſelues at one inſtant out of both their campes, to aſſaile diuers of their forts : and ſo in the ſlaine almoſt ſix hundred of the Germanes, before they were thorowly awake or could well arme themſelues : wherewith the reſt were put in ſuch a feare, that they fled to the camp in ſuch haſt, that many of them fell beſide the bridge and were drowned in the riuer. All the campe was wonderfully troubled with the ſuddenneſſe of the matter, the Turks with their hideous cries rai-

ſing

A sing the alarum in diuers places at once: yet for all that, certaine German companies in one of the forts neereſt vnto the riuer, and the ſouldiors in the fleet, well declared their preſent reſolution and valiant courage, in recouering againe of the iſland. For Herbeſtulfus the campe-maſter, perſuading them not to ſuffer the Chriſtian enſignes and great ordinance to be ſo ſhamefully carried away of the Turkes; and Marius the Admirall at the ſame time landing diuers companies in the iſland with his pinnaces and great boats: they ſo couragiouſly charged the Turkes, then buſied in the ſpoiling of the dead bodies and drawing away of the great ordinance, that they draue them againe to their boats; leauing vnto them as victors, both the iſland and the ordinance, hauing before their departure, receiued no leſſe loſſe themſelues than had the Ger-
B mans before.

It was reported, that the Turkes fleet might that day haue beene quite ouerthrowne, if the Chriſtians vſing the victorie, and holpen with the courſe of that ſwift riuer, had couragiouſly purſued them and landed with them. But many things after a matter is done are eaſily ſeene, which in the verie heat and hurle of the danger cannot well be foreſeene; for as much as ſudden accidents attended with great perill, do oftentimes dazle the minds of right wiſe & valiant captaines: yet foure of the Turkes pinnaces were ſuncke, and three taken, and many of the Turkes ſlaine or drowned in the riuer. Shortly after, the Turkes more and more encouraged with the multitude of themſelues, and the feareſulneſſe they perceiued in their enemies, did at ſundrie times ſo inſolently trouble and aſſaile the campe of the Chriſtians on euerie ſide, that they left
C them almoſt no time of reſt, one company ſtill ſucceeding another; ſo that they were almoſt in deſpaire, to be able long to defend their camp, the enemie ſtill growing both in ſtrength and courage. For the Baſſa that lay at Belgrade, ſtill taking vnto him the ſicke and wounded ſouldiors, ſent continually freſh men in their ſteed: and Valentinus taking vnto him a companie of the Turks Ianizaries harquebuſiers, had driuen Perenus with the Hungarian horſmen out of the vpper campe. So that they in the nether camp were now hardly beſet with their enemies on euerie ſide: yet were they well holpen by the great artillerie from Pesth, which much troubled Valentinus and his horſemen in aſſailing the campe on that ſide.

Some report that Valentinus, not greatly angrie with the Hungarian baniſhed men, but with the Germans, did by the way of priuat courteſie and friendſhip, by a faithfull ſouldior wiſh Pere-
D nus ſpeedily to prouide for the ſafetie of himſelfe and the Hungarians with him; for that there was a great beaſt comming, which would at one morſell deuoure them all. For Solyman aduertiſed of the doings of the emperour and king Ferdinand, thinking that they would haue come downe to Buda with a puiſſant armie, was reſolued to be preſent himſelfe at ſo notable a battell, and was therefore comming thither with his armie in all haſt. Wherefore Perenus thus forewarned, ſaid plainly to Rogendorff and the other captaines, That except they would preſently riſe with the armie and depart, he would now whiles he had yet time, make ſhift for himſelfe and his countrey men. Their opinions diuerſly deliuered, at laſt they all agreed that it was beſt the next night to paſſe ouer the riuer to Pesth: only the Generall vpon a fatall obſtinacie ſaid He would not without king Ferdinands commandement depart from Buda: and therfore ſent
E countie Salma with a ſwift pinnace vp the riuer to Vienna to know his pleaſure therein. In the meane time vrged with feare, Perenus fretting at their long ſtay, it was reſolued vpon, that they ſhould the next night after the Moone was done, paſſe ouer the riuer in foure conuoies to Pesth: In the firſt, were to paſſe ouer the Hungarians, with the great ordinance: in the ſecond, the Germane and Bohemian horſemen: and in the other two, the footmen and the baggage of the armie. For it was not ſo eaſie a matter to make a bridge ouer Danubius, as they had at firſt ſuppoſed: for after they had begun it, and almoſt planked it, there riſe ſuch a wind and tempeſt, and the violent riuer became ſo rough, that the timber wherewith the bridge was faſtened togither was broken, the ioints vnloſed, and many of the boats wherof the bridge was framed, their cables being broken, were carried away with the force of the ſtream. The firſt and ſecond
F conuoy fortune ſo well fauoured, that they paſſed well ouer: for although they of Buda and the Turks, ſeeing in the day time from their high places the fleet drawing togither into one place, might haue ſome ſuſpition of the matter, ſome gheſſing one thing and ſome another; yet could they foreſee nothing of the ſudden departure of the enemie: But that multitude of ſhips and boats now paſſing too and fro, could not long deceiue the attentiue and vigilant enemies; and ſo much the leſſe, for that two fugitiue Hungarians euen then diſcouered vnto the biſhop, mour both of his owne people and of the enemie, and the thundering of the ordinance) was as H nothing: He (besides that he was then sick in mind) lay in his bed wounded, by a wonderfull and fatall chance: for as he was writing letters to the king, a faulcon shot out of the enemies campe falling in his tent, and striking in sunder a chest which stood there, wounded him grieuously in the left shoulder with a splinter of the same. The other captaines of the footmen, enuying that the horsemen were so well escaped, stood as men more carefull of themselues than of the common danger, faintly resisting the enemie. The vppermost tents wherein Perenus lay, were first taken by Mahometes of Belgrade, and Valentinus; and the German footmen chased all ouer

S. Gerrards mount. They of Buda also sallied out, and entred the campe on that side which was next vnto the citie, & with wild fire burnt the tents a little before forsaken by the Germans.
A mischieuous practise of the bishop. And the bishop at the same time caused a great stack of straw standing by the kings stables neere I vnto the riuers side, to be set on fire; which gaue such a light, that a man might haue seene all ouer Danubius vnto the wals of Pesth, as if it had been light day: whereby the great confusion of the Christian armie by land, as well as the shamefull flight by water, was of the Turkes plainly discouered. Then was the great artillerie from euerie place discharged vpon the flying fleet, as well from Buda as the Turks campe. And to encrease the feare, Cason the Turkes Ad-mirall rowing with his light boats against the streame, set vpon the ships crossing the riuer to Pesth, where he tooke certaine boats loaded with souldiors, and with his great ordinance sunck Great slaughter of the Christians diuers others: so that the riuer was filled with dead bodies, and the miserable companie of soul-diors and mariners labouring to saue their liues by swimming: for at such time as the Ianizaries hauing slaine the first companies, were broken into the lower campe; and the rest of the Ger- K mans flying ouer the bridge into the little island, were there slaine without mercie, by the Turkes pursuing them, many of them leapt into the riuer, and there perished. Three hundred saile of one sort of ships and other, were so confused and mingled togither, that Danubius seemed that night to haue beene couered ouer, as if it had beene with a great bridge. But the Christian fleet seeing all lost, cleered themselues so soone as they could of the Turks; and so beating them
backe with their great ordinance out of the poupes of their ships, got vp the riuer to Comora.
The rest of the land forces endured the same fortune in the camp, of whom the Bohemians died most honourably, slaine by the enemie in fight. Many falling into the hands of them of Buda were saued, or slaine, as was their fortune to fall into the power of a mercifull or mercilesse man.
But the funne rising, plainly discouered the slaughter of the Christians and the victorie of the L Turkes, not so well before knowne. There was about 3000 men of one sort and other, who in warlike manner had taken a little hill by Saint Gerrards church, and there stood vpon their guard, vntill such time as more than two thousand of them were slaine; the rest casting away their weapons yeelded in hope of life, and were reserued for a spectacle more grieuous than death it selfe.

At the same time Cason with his victorious fleet comming to the shoare of Pesth, brought such a feare vpon them that were escaped thither, and might easily haue defended the wals (only with the crie of his souldiors and the thundring of the artillerie) that the horsemen for haste to get out, were like to ouerrun one another. The Germans had at that time so much forgot their wonted valour, and so trembled at the name of the Turks, that as soone as they saw their white M caps in their ships, they ran away as men dismaied, vnarmed, leauing behind them their plate, their carriages, and whatsoeuer good thing they had else. Yet some of the Hungarian horsmen, more desirous of the spoile than afraid of death, staied behind rifling the merchants shops: for Pesth was become a notable rich mart towne for all kind of merchandise, merchants resorting thither

A thither from all other places of the troubled countrey, as to a ſtrong and commodious citie, and of more ſafetie than the reſt. But Caſon now entering without reſiſtance, ſlew ſome of thoſe greedie Hungarians, and ran thorow the towne with ſuch barbarous crueltie and thirſt of the Chriſtian bloud, that he ſpared neither man, woman, nor child, except ſome few ſuch as either for their beautie or ſtrength of bodie were reſerued for the Turks beaſtly luſt, or ſlauiſh labour: ſo that in this warre it is reported, more than twentie thouſand Chriſtians were one way and other by diuers chances ſlaine. There was taken at PESTH in the campe, and in the iſland, ſix and thirtie great pieces for batterie, of wonderfull beautie; and of leſſer field pieces a hundred and fiftie. As for ſhot, pouder, armour, weapons, and victuall prouided for Winter, ſuch ſtore was found, that the Turks accounted it for the greateſt part of their victorie. Rogendorff the vn-

B fortunat Generall, at ſuch time as the Turks hauing woon the trenches were fighting in the middeſt of the camp, deſiring rather to be ſlaine in his tent, than to liue after ſo great an ouerthrow, was againſt his will by ſtrong hand carried abourd a little pinnace by his phyſition and chamberlaine, which would not in any caſe forſake him as he lay, and was ſo conueied vp the riuer to the iſland of COMARA: where he ſhortly after, partly for the painfulneſſe of his wound, but more for greefe of mind, died in a little countrey village called SAMARIVM, leauing vnto the Germans a wofull remembrance of his accurſed obſtinacie and pride. Solyman ſtill doubting the comming of Charles the emperour and king Ferdinand to BVDA, was comming with his armie from

Where calling vnto him the other armie, and making one huge campe of both, he highly commended all his captaines, but eſpecially the two Mahometes. And vnderſtanding that the victorie was eſpecially gotten by the meanes of Mahometes gouernour of BELGRADE, he made him generall of all his Europeian horſemen, one of the moſt honourable preferments of the Turkiſh empire: the other captaines he rewarded according as they had deſerued, and withall augmented their pay.

Amongſt theſe priſoners was one ſouldior of BAVARIA, of an exceeding high ſtature, him in deſpight of the German nation he deliuered to a little dwarfe (whom his ſonnes made great account of) to be ſlaine, whoſe head was ſcarce ſo high as the knees of the tall captiue, with that cruell deſpight to aggrauate the indignitie of his death: when as that goodly tall man, mangled about the legs a long time by that apiſh dwarfe with his little ſcimitar, as if it had beene in diſport, fell downe, and was with many feeble blowes hardly at laſt ſlaine by that wretch, ſtill heartened on by others, to ſatisfie the eyes of the princes, beholding it as their diſport.

E This barbarous and cruell execution done, Solyman ſent his embaſſadours with preſents to the young king, which were three beautifull horſes, with their bridles of gold, & their trappings richly ſet with pretious ſtones, and three royall robes of cloth of gold, and vnto the cheefe of the nobilitie he ſent rich gownes and chaines of gold. The embaſſadours which brought theſe preſents, in courteous manner requeſted of the queene to ſend the young king her ſonne, attended with his nobilitie, into the campe, and without all feare to hope that all ſhould goe well both with her and her ſonne: for that Solyman, who exceeded all other kings, not in power and fortune onely, but in vertue and vpright dealing alſo, was of ſuch an heroicall diſpoſition, that he would not onely defend the child, whom in the right of his father he had once thought worthie his protection and fauour, victorie confirming the ſame, but would alſo augment his eſtate, with

You haue now within the ſpace of theſe twentie yeares come in armes your ſelfe in perſon fiue times into this countrey, when I as no obſcure captaine or ſouldior, was in all thoſe warres and battels euer preſent, of purpoſe as I ſuppoſe to reuenge your iniuries, to enlarge your empire, and in breefe to aſſure you of a good peace, which could neuer be but by force of armes and victorie. And therefore you valiantly woon* Belgrade, the infamous dwelling place and receptacle of moſt outrageous theeues and robbers, and in former time famous for the vnfortunat attempts of your anceſtors: when as from thence the Hungarians in time of peace had at their plea- done: for that you thought it to ſtand with your honour to protect him with your power, whom you had of your rare bountie made a king, and then deſired aboue all things to fight a noble battell with the two brethren for the Empire of the Weſt. But they at ſuch time as you with fire and ſword ran thorow their auntient kingdomes, endured not the noiſe of your comming. After that enſued a peace betweene the Hungarians and the Germane, your Maieſtie permitting and approouing it, at ſuch time as you made haſt to goe againſt the Perſians: but the Germane king ſo broke that peace, that had not I in good time reuenged his trecherie by the ouerthrow of a great armie of his at EZEK, you muſt of neceſſitie haue beene ſent for from BABILON your ſelfe, as but now you were glad to come in haſt by long and painfull iournies from CONSTANTINOPLE, to aid vs in time, and as I verely hope, to make an end for all; that all things ſet in firme order in HVNGARIE, the inconueniences of ſo many labours and ſo great charge, fiue times vndertaken for another mans profit, might now at length take end: except (as I ſee ſome wiſh) you be in mind neuer to giue ouer the protection of the child and widdow, a matter full of infinit labor and perill, not to be counteruailed with that glorious ſhew of honor, which by theſe (in my opinion) too too wiſemen is pretended to your haughtie mind, euer deſirous of honor and fame. But I as a blunt man vnderſtand not this high point of wiſedome, abounding with glorie, which in the very courſe thereof cutteth in ſunder the ſinewes of victorie, and is neuer by politicke Generals admitted into their campes. In which doing, as I wiſh you more fortunat than your auncеſtours, who haue vnited eighteene kingdomes to this your empire, ſo would I not haue you more wiſe than they: for what can be a more vnwiſe part, than alwayes to play the vnwiſe man? that is to ſay, alwayes to be carefull of other mens affaires, and in meane time oftentimes to endanger his owne eſtate, his health, his wealth, his honour. You haue ſatisfied (and that in my opinion) plentifully the duties both of charitie, fidelitie, and if it muſt needs be ſo, of honour and glorie alſo; if it be to be gotten rather by courteſie, clemencie, and lenitie, than by the inuincible ſtrength of wiſe policie, and the conſtant reſolution of a martiall mind: for by theſe inſtruments, and none other, hath worthie vertue alwayes promoted and ſupported the Othoman kings. Wherefore let thoſe vaine ſhowes (as ſeemeth vnto me) of counterfeit honour delight the minds of idle and ſlouthfull kings: aſſuredly, they neuer pleaſed your armed auncеſtors, but after the enemie was quite ouerthrowne, the triumph made, and the trophees of victorie erected. But let this be as beſt pleaſeth your high wiſedome and iudgement, whereunto the greateſt wits giue place. Truly I (if I well foreſee the chances of war, and the aſſured euents of things) will not follow that manner of counſell which the pleaſure of my mind perſuadeth me vnto; when as neceſſitie, which ruleth all things, preſently forceth me and ſheweth me a farre better courſe. The Hungarians aboue all other things notably warne vs not to truſt them, who infamous for their vnconſtancie, after reuolt, and trecherie, are ſtill at variance amongſt themſelues; and their baniſhed men are continually ſetting on the Germanes to inuade the country; and the weake power of the Queene and the child is not ſuch as may withſtand ſo neere and ſo mightie an enemie: ſo that another mans kingdome muſt of neceſſitie be defended by our helpe, which may not be leſſe than a ſtrong armie, without our great perill. To be breefe, euery yeere to take in hand ſo long an expedition of ſo great labour and trauell, with an armie furniſhed with horſemen, footmen, artillerie, and a fleet of ſhips for defence of another man, as commonly we doe, ſeemeth to me meere madneſſe: Neither doe I thinke it to ſtand with the maieſtie of the Othoman emperours, thus to be mooued euery yeare at the requeſt of a puling woman, crying for helpe: except you thinke it more profitable and honourable to maintaine a defenſiue than an inuaſiue warre. Wherefore (in my opinion) it is beſt to turne this kingdome (ſo often conquered and defended by law of Armes) after the manner of your auncеſtors, into the forme of a Prouince: the Queene I would haue ſent to her father, and the boy her ſonne brought vp in your Court at CONSTANTINOPLE, and there inſtructed in our religion: the nobilitie of the country I wiſh to be ſlaine, and their caſtles raſed, and the notable families which bare the braueſt minds, to be carried away out of all parts of the country into ASIA: as for the baſe multitude, I would haue kept vnder with good garriſons, to till the ground, and inhabit the cities. By this onely meanes (mightie Solyman) ſhall both the Hungarians perceiue themſelues conquered, and the Germans glad to forbeare comming into HVNGARIE, vnleſſe they will raſhly and vnfortunately hazard both STYRIA and AVSTRIA.

Miſchieuous counſell.

Solyman entreth Buda the 30. of Auguſt 1541, and there firſt ſacrificeth after the Mahometan manner.

But Solyman thinking it good to doe ſacrifice before he would reſolutely determine of ſo great a matter, entred into BVDA with his two ſons, Selymus and Baiazet, the thirtith day of Auguſt in the yeare 1541: and there in the Cathedrall church dedicated to the virgin Marie (being before

A before by his priests purified after the maner of their superstition) sacrificed the first Mahometane sacrifice in BVDA. Shortly after, he as it were moderating the opinions of his great counsellors, prouided out of them all, both for his own securitie and honour, and published a decree the fatall doome of that flourishing kingdome, where vnder it yet groneth at this day; That BVDA should from that day be kept with a garrison of Turks, and the kingdome conuerted into a prouince of the Turkish empire; and that the queene with her young sonne should presently depart the citie, and liue in LIPPA in a fertile and quiet countrie beyond the riuer of Tibiscus, which something to comfort her, was neere vnto the borders of her father Sigismund his kingdome, to be safely conducted thither with all her wealth and iewels by his Ianizaries. Wherefore the queene and her sonne according to this decree, with teares and mourning detesting in
B her heart the tyrants perfideous dealing (which necessitie enforced her then to dissemble) departed from BVDA, constrained by the Turkes to leaue behind her all the ordinance in the castle and citie, with all other the warlike prouision and store of victuall. The noblemen went with her also, who although they went sorrowfull for this wofull and vnexpected change of things, yet were they verie glad of their libertie and safetie, wherof they had for the space of three daies despaired. Only Valentinus was kept in safe custodie in the campe, becausse he was a martiall man, of greatest power amongst the Hungarians; and besides that, much hated of the Turks for the hard pursuit of Cason, and his horsemen, slaine at STORAMBERG in AVSTRIA. Thus the royall citie of BVDA fell into the possession of the Turkes, whereupon not long after ensued the finall ruine of that great kingdome, sometime the strong bulwarke of Christendome, but lost to the C great weakning of the Christian common-wealth; which may iustly be imputed to the pride, ambition, and discention of the Hungarians amongst themselues, and the calling in of the common enemie: the due consideration of whose onely comming, might well haue sufficed to haue set them agreed.

The doome of Hungarie.

The queene departeth out of Buda with her sonne.

Whilest these things were doing at BVDA, king Ferdinand expecting the euent of this warre at VIENNA, and hearing of the shamefull ouerthrow of his armie, and that the Generall deadly wounded was fled to COMARA, and that Solyman (fame encreasing the euill newes) was comming towards VIENNA; sent Leonardus Velsius (who neuer liked of the siege of BVDA) to COMARA to stay the further flight of the souldiours, and to gather togither so well as hee could the dispersed reliques of the scattered armie, and to comfort againe the discouraged men with the D hope of new supplies, & of a pay. And somewhat to stay Solyman, who as it was thought would suddenly come to VIENNA, he sent countie Salma and Sigismund Litheſtaine, a noble and graue counsellor, his embassadours, with presents and new conditions of peace to Solyman. The presents was a high standing cup of gold after the German fashion, curiously set with rich stones; and a wonderfull globe of siluer of most rare and curious deuise, daily expressing the hourely passing of the time, the motions of the planets, the change & ful of the moone, the motion of the superiour orbes, euen mouing by certaine wheeles and weights curiously conuaied within the same, and exactly keeping due time and motion; liuely expressing the wonderful motions and conuersions of the celestiall tarme. A most curious and strange piece of worke, deuised & perfected by the most cunning Astronomers for Maximilian the emperour, whose noble mind neE uer spared for any cost to obtaine things of rare and strange deuise. These embassadors passing downe the riuer of Danubius, were at their landing, first receiued by Cason the Admirall of Solymans fleet, and by him brought into a rich tent, the ground vnder their feet being all couered with rich carpets: to whom Rustan Bassa sent such good cheere as the campe affoorded, but especially most excellent wine, no lesse forbidden the Turks by their law, than desired of the Germans. The next day after, the great Bassaes feasted the embassadours, Solyman himselfe dining not farre off in his pauillion: at which feast the Bassaes for the more courtesie, dined with the embassadors, not sitting with their legs gathered vnder them flat vpon the ground, as their manner was, but sitting in chaires at a high table, after the manner of the Christians: onely Mahometes Gouernour of BELGRADE, for his age and valour an extraordinarie guest, sat downe vpF on a cushion beneath the Bassaes. Their cheere was only rice and mutton, and that so plainely and sparingly dressed, as if they had therby noted our gourmandise and excesse; who measure not our cheere by that which nature requireth, but that which greedie appetite desireth, as if therein consisted the greatest nobilitie: And the drinke for the great Bassaes themselues, right easie to be had, was faire water out of the riuer Danubius. After dinner the embassadours were brought in vnto Solyman, each of them lead betwixt two Baſſaes holding them faſt by the arms, G as if it had been for honour ſake, and ſo brought to kiſſe his hand. For the Turks ſuffer no ſtran-ger otherwiſe to come vnto the preſence of their ſuſpitious emperour, but firſt they ſearch him that he haue no weapon about him, and ſo claſping him by the armes vnder the colour of doing him honour, diſſemblingly bereaue him of the vſe of his hands, leaſt he ſhould offer him any violence: yet hath he alwaies as he ſitteth in his throane lying at hand readie by him, a tar-guet, a ſcimiter, an yron maſe, with bow and arrowes. The great globe was alſo brought in by twelue of the embaſſadors ſeruants, which with the ſtrangeneſſe thereof filled the mind of So- lyman, and the eyes of his Baſſaes with admiration: for Solyman was of ſo ſharpe a wit, that he was not learned onely in ſuch books as contained the lawes and rites of the Mahometane ſuperſtition, but had alſo curiouſly ſtudied Aſtronomie, and eſpecially Coſmographie: in which H profitable and pleaſant ſtudies, he much recreated himſelfe as his leaſure ſerued. The embaſſa-

the ſame conditions that Laſcus had before required it for him at Constantinople, paying him ſuch yerely tribute as king Iohn had vſually paid, and promiſing farther to draw Charles the emperour his brother into the ſame league: ſo that Solyman deliuered of all feare that way, might at his pleaſure turn his forces vpon the Perſian, which it was thought he moſt deſired. Be-ſides that, they ſaid he ſhould deale neither honourably nor indifferently, if he ſhould prefer the young child before king Ferdinand, who beſide his auncient right vnto that kingdome (which they were not now to vrge, as oppreſſed by his happie victories, but might in time be reuiued) had alſo a late intereſt by a league betwixt him and king Iohn, wherein he had expreſſely coue- I nanted by the ſolemne conſent of the greateſt part of the nobilitie, that king Ferdinand ſhould ſucceed him in the kingdome. Whereby they excuſed him of the late warre, as iuſtly taken in hand againſt the queen and her ſonne vſurping vpon his right; which king Iohn knowing to be good, and mooued with conſcience, had by his ſolemne act acknowledged, though to the great offence and preiudice of Solyman his ſetter vp and defender, as alſo to the touching of him-ſelfe in honour, to haue ſo vnthankfully and fraudulently dealt with his patrone, to whom hee was by the oath of obedience bound. Wherefore they requeſted, That ſith he being a prince of all others moſt mighty and magnificent, ſtanding vpon his vpright dealing both in peace and war, had ſo lightly regarded the ſlie dealing of ſo ingratfull a man: he would rather accept of king Ferdinand ſo many waies iniured, as his friend and tributarie, than to haue him his perpe- K tuall enemie. Concluding, that nothing could be vnto him for the good report of his iuſtice more commendable, or for the aſſurance of a perpetuall peace more profitable, or to the im-mortall praiſe of his bountie more honourable, than to call a king of a moſt auncient diſſent, famous for his vertue and fidelitie, choſen for a king by the Bohemians, deſired for a king by the Hungarians, emperor elect of the Roman empire by the Germans, and the naturall brother of Solymans proud anſwere to king Ferdinands embaſſadors. the great emperour, his tributarie king of Hvngarie. Solyman with cheerefull countenance accepting and commending of the preſents, anſwered them two daies after by Ruſtan the Baſſa his ſonne in law, that this was his reſolute condition of peace and friendſhip: If king Ferdinand would forthwith reſtore all the cities, towns, & caſtles which were before belonging to K. Lewes, and for euer after abſtaine from Hvngarie: and whereas hee had beene ſo often prouoked by L him to warre, and had therein beſtowed ſo great charges, and taken ſo much trauell, he could for that be content with an eaſie paine (which ſhould be for his greater honour) to impoſe an eaſie tribute vpon Avstria: vpon which conditions he was content to enter into league with them: but if ſo be that thoſe conditions ſeemed vnto them too heauie, and that they would rather make choice of warre than peace, hee would bring to paſſe by continuall warre, that ſuch things as they had taken from the kingdome of Hvngarie, ſhould be requited with the de-ſtruction of Avstria. But the embaſſadours, although they were much moued at the proud demaund of tribute for Avstria, as that wherein the two brethren of mightie power, Charles the emperor and king Ferdinand were diſdainfully abuſed: to keepe the beſt courſe of their negotiation, and to win ſome time in ſo hard eſtate of things; required a truce, vntill ſuch time as M king Ferdinand and the emperor his brother might be made acquainted with the matter. Which their requeſt (the Turke perceiuing their drift and purpoſe) would in no caſe grant, for Winter was now faſt comming on. It was lawfull for the embaſſadours, all the time they were in the Turks campe, to view euerie part thereof, Ruſtan Baſſa conducting them from place to place:

where

A where aboue all things, they most wondred at the perpetuall & dumbe silence of so great a multitude, the souldiors being so readie and attentiue, that they were no otherwise commanded but by the beckning of the hand, or a nod of their commanders: They maruelled also at the exquisite order and sweetnesse of the Turkes campe, finding therein nothing disordered or noisome; so that it seemed not the campe of such a rude and barbarous nation, but rather of them which were the authors of martiall discipline. The embassabours being rewarded and so sent away, Solyman commaunded the old Gouernour of BELGRVDE to spoile the borders of AVSTRIA all alongst Danubius: Cason also Generall of the voluntarie horseman, he sent into MORAVIA for like purpose; who neither of them did any great harme, by reason of the sudden rising of the great riuers, with the aboundance of raine then falling in Autumne. After that Solyman appoin-
B ted one Solyman an Hungarian (who taken prisoner in his youth by the Turkes, had from that time followed the Mahometane superstition) gouernour of BVDA: who by the vpright administration of iustice, and courteous vsing of the people, with Verbetius the old chancellor, should doe what was possible to put the people in hope of long peace and tranquilitie. Which things done, after he had stayed about twentie dayes at BVDA, he determined to returne againe into THRACIA, because the raine of Autumne, and the cold of Winter was now come in: and was also in doubt to be shut in with the rising of the great riuers, wherewith the countrey of HVNGARIE is in euerie place so watered, and on euerie side so compassed, that it is a hard matter to passe. By the way he set Lascus king Ferdinands embassadour againe at libertie, whom he had
C left in prison at BELGRADE: but he long enioyed not that benefit, for shortly after returning into POLONIA, he dyed of the flix; which caused many to suppose, that he was poisoned by the Turkes. A man for his vertue and learning famous, worthie of a longer life, whose death the king himselfe much lamented.

The Turkes campe well ordered.

Solyman returneth towards Constantinople.

Lascus set at libertie by Solyman, shortly after dieth.

As Solyman was returning into THRACIA, and was come to the riuer Dranus, it was told him, that Stephen Maylat Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA, who tooke king Ferdinand his part, a professed enemie of the Turkes, was taken, by the cunning of Peter of MOLDAVIA, and prince of VALACHIA; and that all the countrey of TRANSILVANIA was well pacified and yeelded to his obedience. Of which newes Solyman was passing glad, for he exceedingly hated Maylat: a martiall man of a froward nature, desirous of rule, and readie vpon any occasion to reuolt; forasmuch as he remembred Grittus his legat, and the Turkes by him slaine; and knew also, that the Tran-
D siluanians, an inuincible people, borne to trouble, and more delighting in vncertaine warre than assured peace, was by him stirred vp; whom he wished rather by gentlenesse to appease, than by force of armes and strong hand to subdue. But because we haue oftentimes before made mention of this Maylat, of whose taking Solyman so much reioyced, it shall not be amisse in few words to declare by what fineneſse he fell into the hands of this treacherous and bloudie man, Peter of MOLDAVIA.

This Moldauian by the commaundement of Solyman (as is aforesaid) had ioyned his forces with Achomates Gouernour of NICOPOLIS, against Maylat; which being vnited, were in number fiftie thousand horsemen, beside footmen, which after the manner of those countreys were not many, euerie man almost in the countrey be he neuer so poore, keeping a horse to E serue vpon. Maylat beset with the multitude of his enemies, and finding himselfe too weake to encounter them, despairing also of aid from king Ferdinand, whom he knew to be busied in a greater warre; forsooke the field, and fled againe into the strong towne of FOGARAS, as he had done the yeere before, when he was ouercharged by king Iohn his power: for there as in a most strong place both by nature & fortification, he had laid vp his greatest substance and prouision for the warres, but especially the rich spoile he had long before taken from Grittus. Achomates comming thither with his power, and perceiuing the place was not to be battered or taken by force, but with much labour and long time: thought it best, to assay if he could ouercome him by craft and deceit. Wherefore he sent a messenger vnto Maylat, to perswade him to yeeld himselfe vnto Solyman, and to make choise rather to be called of him his friend, than to be iudged
F his enemie; of whom he might well hope of all goodnesse, which had giuen whole kingdomes vnto his enemies: promising, that he would vse the vttermost of his credit, which was not smal, and labour for him as his friend, that he might feele the fruit of his clemencie and bountie, and still enioy the gouernment of TRANSILVANIA, paying him some small yeerely tribute, as he had before requested: for as much as he could take no course better, being beset with so many enemies,

Maylat the Vayuod not able to keepe the field against Achomates, and the prince of Moldauia, flieth to Fogaras.

enemies, than to make his peace vpon reaſonable conditions, and that with as much ſpeed as G were poſſible: in which doing, beſides that he ſhould well prouide for his own ſafetie, he ſhould alſo ſaue both his wealth and honour; for Solyman was comming (as he ſaid) with his victorious armie, who would with aſſured death reuenge his vaine hope of holding out the ſiege, if he ſhould vpon a ſtubborne and obſtinate mind then refuſe to obay his command. Whereunto Maylat, who foreſaw that it was better for him to make a certaine peace, than to endure an vncertain warre, anſwered, That he could be content to conclude a peace, ſo that it were not vpon any hard conditions; and would not greatly refuſe Solymans command, which was wont to be both reaſonable and iuſt: wherefore vpon ſufficient pledges he would come into the campe, in preſence to agree vpon the conditions of the peace, and demaunded to haue Achomates his ſonne, a valiant young gentleman, deliuered in hoſtage. Which thing Achomates denied, for H that he had (as he ſaid) before giuen him to Solyman, as the manner was, and therefore had ouer him no more power: but he promiſed for him, that was but one, to giue foure of his beſt captaines. Which offer Maylat (miſdoubting no deceit) accepted, and with a great and gallant retinue attended vpon, came into the euemies campe, where he was courteouſly and honourably receiued. But the parley, as it could not be conueniently begun immediatly after their firſt ſalutation, ſo could it by no meanes be then ended, but was deferred vntill the next day: to the intent, that the treacherous Moldauian might take his well acquainted and well knowne gueſt, whom he had againſt that time inuited to a ſolemne banquet. By that meanes, the next day about the middeſt of dinner, fortune ſo fauouring the intended treacherie, Maylat who was of ſo proud and cholericke a nature that he could not well brooke the leaſt indignitie, was by occaſi- I on of ſome inſolent ſpeech of purpoſe miniſtred by the Moldauian gueſts, put into ſuch a fret, that laying his hand vpon his ſword, he in a rage flung from the table: at which time all the other gueſts ſtarting vp alſo, laid hands vpon him and tooke him, fuming, and in vaine crying out, that he was ſhamefully betraied. His followers were all forthwith ſtript of all their brauerie by the needie Moldauians, and their horſes and armour taken from them. Whileſt Maylat was yet furiouſly exclaiming of this trſaſon, in came Achomates, who to ſeeme guiltleſſe of the matter, with deepe diſſimulation ſharpely reproued the falſe Moldauian, that he had in doing ſo foule a fact ſhamefully violated the lawes of hoſpitalitie, reuerenced of all nations, falſified the faith which he had giuen him for his ſafetie, and betraied the liues of ſuch notable captaines as lay in hoſtage for him. Whereunto the Moldauian (as if it had been in contempt) ſcornfully K anſwered, That he had vpon good cauſe taken Maylat priſoner, and ſo would in ſafetie keepe him for Solyman, vnto whom it onely belonged to iudge, whether he had iuſtly or vniuſtly detained him.

Maylat cōmeth into the Turkes campe.

Maylat treacherouſly taken priſoner by the Moldauian

Not long after, the ſtrong towne of FOGARIS was deliuered, with the hoſtages; but whether by feare or by corruption of Maylats lieutenant, is vncertaine. So Valentinus Turaccus, and Maylat, two of the greateſt noble men of HVNGARIE, ſufficient of themſelues to haue reſtored the Hungarian kingdome (firſt rent in ſunder with ciuill diſcord, and afterward with the inuaſion of the Turkes) fell into the hands of the enemie, not vanquiſhed in battell, but deceiued by treaſon. The towne being thus ſurrendred, almoſt all the countrey of TRANSILVANIA, was by Solymans conſent deliuered to the young king, vnto whom all the people moſt willingly ſubmitted themſelues, and tooke the oath of obedience, remembring that his father had almoſt for thirtie yeres ſpace with great iuſtice and quietneſſe gouerned that prouince; and with many preſents honored the young king lying in LIPPA, with the queene his mother, and his two tutors, the biſhop, and Vicche.

Tranſiluania giuen by Solyman to the young king.

At the ſame time, Charles the emperour at the importunate ſuit of his ſubiects of SPAINE, had prepared a great force both by ſea and land for the conquering of ALGIERS: from whence the Turkiſh pirats did ſo infeſt all that coaſt of the countrey, from GADES to the mountaines PYRENEI, that the Spaniards (all trade of merchandiſe being ſet apart) were glad to keepe continuall watch and ward all alongſt that coaſt for defence of the countrey. Wherefore although Charles the emperor returneth out of Germany to inuade Algiers. he well knew of the comming of the Turks to BVDA, and how hardly he was by the Lantgraue M and others ſpoken of, for leauing his brother ſo hardly beſtead, to goe againſt a ſort of pirats in AFFRICKE; yet perſiſting in his former determination, he departed out of GERMANIE into ITALIE, where by the way he was met by Octauius Farneſius his ſonne in law, Alphonſus Vaſtius his lieutenant, by the Venetian embaſſadours, neere to VERONA, and ſo brought to

MIL-

A MILLAINE, where he was with great ſolemnitie ioyfully receiued of the citiſens, and vnder a canopie of gold brought vnto the pallace: he himſelfe going in a plaine blacke cloake, and a homely cap in mourning wiſe; when as the women and vulgar people, vpon a curious ſimplicitie, expected to haue ſeene ſo great an emperour in his royall robes, gliſtering with gold and pretious ſtone, and the imperiall crowne vpon his head. His heauie countenance anſwerable alſo to his attire was much noted, as preſaging the wofull ouerthrow which was the day before receiued at BVDA, but not yet knowne in ITALIE. From MILLAINE he departed to GENVA, where he was aduertiſed by letters from his brother king Ferdinand, of the ouerthrow of the Germans, of the victorie of the Turkes, and the comming of Solyman. Vpon which newes, Vaſtius and Auria, his two chiefe commaunders, the one at land, the other at ſea, would haue per-
B ſuaded him to haue deferred his intended expedition for AFRICA vntill the next Spring: and with ſuch power as he had alreadie raiſed in ITALIE, and brought with him out of GERMANIE, to ſtay ſtill in ITALIE, ſo to make ſhew vnto the Turks as if he would haue returned and holpen his brother: and in the meane time to aſſure himſelfe of his ſtate in ITALIE againſt the French, who (as it was thought) would be readie to take all occaſion of aduantage, if any miſhap ſhould befall him, either by the force of the enemie, or violence of tempeſt. But he conſtant in his former reſolution, anſwered them as they ſate in counſell, that they had perſuaded him for great reaſons to ſtay in ITALIE; but that he was for farre greater to paſſe into AFFRICKE: for if he ſhould then ſtay in ITALIE, it would be thought, that he was for feare of the Turkes fled out of
C GERMANIE: which diſgrace could no otherwiſe be preuented, but by the preſent proſecuting of his former determination for ALGIERS, and ſatisfying the expectation of his ſubiects of SPAINE; and ſo by ſea valiantly to proue their better fortune, which had of late not ſo well fauoured them at land, in hope that ALGIERS might be woon before the ſeas ſhould grow rough and dangerous with Winter tempeſts: which if it ſhould fall out according to his mind, he would not, as he ſaid, greatly care what the French could doe. Yet was it thought, that the diſſembling friendſhip betwixt the French king and him, would not long endure: and the rather, for that there was a new grudge riſen betwixt them about the death of Antonius Rinuo, who for certaine yeres had lien embaſſadour for the French king at CONSTANTINOPLE to Solyman, and was a few moneths before ſent backe againe by him into FRANCE to the king: but retur-
D ning back again with new inſtructions from his maſter, for the confirmation of a further league betwixt the Turkiſh Sultan & him, he was by certain Spaniards of the emperors old ſouldiors, who had knowledge of his cõming, belaid vpon the riuer Padus as he was going down to VENICE, ſo to haue paſſed into EPYRVS, and ſlaine, togither with Cæſar Fregoſius: or as the common report went, firſt taken and tortured, to get from him the ſecrets of his negotiation, and afterwards ſlaine. Which report ſo much touched Vaſtius in credit, that in purgation of himſelfe, he offered the combat to any man of like qualitie to himſelfe, that durſt charge him with the truth thereof. But many were of opinion, that he was well and worthely taken away, for vndertaking ſo odious a charge, as to ſtirre vp the Turkes againſt the Chriſtians, and to ſhew vnto them ſuch opportunities as might beſt ſerue their purpoſe, by diſcouering vnto them the em-
E perours deſſeigns, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian commonweale. But were it well, or were it euill; as Paulus the third of that name then biſhop of ROME, meeting the emperour at LVCA as he came from GENVA, could not, or would not determine; ſure it ſerued as no ſmall occaſion to ſet thoſe two great princes againe at ods, whereby the wiſhed vnitie of the Chriſtian ſtate was ſore ſhaken, and a way opened for the Turke. The emperour at his comming to LVCA, was honourably receiued by the cardinals and biſhops, and lodged in the court: the great biſhop was before placed in the biſhops pallace, whither the emperour came thriſe to talke with him, and the biſhop to him once. But the biſhop hauing nothing at all preuailed with the emperour and the French embaſſador, for the appeaſing of the troubles euen then like to ariſe betwixt him and the French king: did what he might to perſuade him to employ ſuch forces as he was about to paſſe ouer with into AFFRICKE, againſt the Turkes in defence of his brother Ferdinand, and F of the countrey of AVSTRIA, if Solyman ſhould happely purſue his late obtained victorie at BVDA. But he ſtill reſolute in that fatall determination of inuading of AFFRICKE, reiected that the biſhops requeſt alſo. So the great biſhop hauing mooued much, and preuailed little, in the greateſt matters which moſt concerned the common good, taking his leaue of the emperour, returned by eaſie iournies to ROME.

The

The emperor in the meane time with certain bands of Italians, vnder the leading of Camillus Columna and Augustinus Spinula, and six thousand Germans, came from LVCA to the port LVNE and there embarking his souldiors in certaine marchant ships prouided for the purpose, and fiue and thirtie gallies, departed thence, commanding the masters of the ships to direct their course to the Islands of BALEARES: but after they had put to sea, they were by force of tempest suddenly arising, brought within sight of CORSICA: where after they had beene tossed too and fro two daies in the rough seas, and put out of their course, the wind something falling, they put into the hauen of SYRACVSA, now called BONIFACIVM. The dispersed fleet once come together into the port of SYRACVSA, and the rage of the sea well appeased, he put to sea againe for the Islands BALEARES, now called MAIORCA and MINORCA: where in his course he met with a tempest from the West, more terrible and dreadfull than the first: wherein diuers of the gallies hauing lost their masts and sailes, were glad with extreame labour and perill in striuing against the wrought sea to get into a harbor of the lesser Island, taking name of Barchinus Mago the famous Carthaginensian, who name it retaineth vntill this day. From hence the emperour with all his fleet passed ouer to the greater Island, being wonderfull glad that Ferdinand Gonzaga his viceroy in SICILIA was in good time come with the Sicilian gallies and ships of ITALIE, in number a hundred and fiftie saile, wherein he had brought such store of bisket and victuall, as might haue sufficed for a long warre. Mendoza was also expected to haue come thither with his fleet from SPAINE, but he by reason of contrarie winds being not able to hold that course, altered his purpose according to the tempest, & so happily cut ouer directly to ALGIERS. So the emperour nothing misdoubting the carefull diligence of Mendoza, and thinking that which was indeed alreadie changed, and the wind now seruing faire, by the persuasion of Auria his Admirall hoised saile, and in two daies came before ALGIERS, and there in goodly order came to ankar before the citie in the sight of the enemie. Whilest the fleet thus lay, two of the pyrats which had beene abroad at sea seeking for prize, returning to ALGIERS, not knowing any thing of the fleet, fell into the bay amongst them before they were aware: the bigger whereof Viscontes Cicada stemmed with his gallie and sunke him, the other with wonderfulll celeritie got into the hauen. In the meane time Mendoza with his gallies had passed the promontorie of Apollo, now called the cape of CASSINEVS, and in token of honour saluting the emperour after the manner at sea, with all his great Ordinance, gaue him knowledge that the Spanish fleet was not farre behind. In this fleet was aboue a hundred tall ships of BISCAY and the low countries, and of other smaller vessels a far greater number. In these ships besides the footmen was embarked a great number of braue horsemen out of all parts of SPAINE: for many noble gentlemen had voluntarily of their owncharge gallantly furnished themselues with braue armour and couragious horses, to serue their prince and countrie against the Infidels. Ouer these choice men commaunded Ferdinand of TOLEDO, duke of ALBA, for his approued valour then accounted a famous captaine. These ships going altogither with sailes, were not yet able to double the cape, as did Mendoza with his gallies, for now it was a dead calme: howbeit the billow of the sea went yet high, by reason of the rage of the late tempest, and did so beat against the plaine shore, that it was not possible to land the souldiors, but that they must needs be washed vp to the middle: which thing the emperour thought it not good to put them vnto, and so to oppose them seasicke and thorow wet against the sudden & desperat assaults of their fierce enemies. He also staied for the comming of the Spanish ships for two causes: first, that he might with his vnited power more strongly assault the citie, and terrifie the enemie; then, to communicat the whole glorie of the action with the Spaniards, at whose request and forwardnesse and greatest charge he had vndertaken that war. Which fatall delay of two daies, although it was grounded vpon good reason, did not only disturbe an assured victorie, but to the notable hurt of the whole armie, opened a way to all the calamities which afterward insued.

Delay in great affaires hurtfull

In the meane while the emperour sent a conuenient messenger to Assanagas, otherwise and more truely called Assan-Aga, or Assan the eunuch; who with a little flag of truce in his hand making signe of parley, and aunswered by the Moores with like, as their manner is, went on shore, and was of them courteously receiued and brought to Assan. This Assan was an eunuch, borne in SARDINIA, brought vp from his youth in the Mahometane superstition by Barbarussa, a man both politike and valiant, and by him left for the keeping of his kingdome of ALGIERS in his absence with Solyman. This messenger brought into his presence, required him forth-

But if he would now dallie on the time, and make proofe of the ſtrength of ſo great a preparation, he would vndoubtedly with the reſt of his followers receiue the ſame reward of his obſtinacie, which they had to the example of others receiued at TVNES. Whereunto the vngratious eunuch anſwered, That he thought him altogither mad, that would follow his enemies counſell: and with a grinning countenance aſked him, Vpon what hope the emperour truſted to be able to win the citie? the meſſenger pointing with his finger directly to the fleet, told him, That which you ſee, with his great artillerie, and valour of his ſouldiors,both horſe and foot: Whereat the eunuch ſcornfully laughing, replied, And we with like force and valour will defend this citie, and make this place, alreadie fa-

It is reported, that there was in ALGIERS an old witch, famous for her predictions,who had (as it was ſaid) foretold the ſhipwreckes and miſerie of Didaco Verra and Hugo Moncada to them of ALGIERS; and alſo prefixed a time when as the Chriſtian emperour aduenturing to beſiege that citie, ſhould there receiue great loſſe both by ſea and land: The fame of which blind prophecie ſeruing fitly to confirme the hope of good ſucceſſe in the minds of the vulgar multitude, Aſſan ſo fed and augmented (althought he himſelfe being a craftie wiſe fellow, belieued no ſuch vanitie)that he did therewith not only encourage his owne ſouldiors,but alſo ſtrucke a terrour into the minds of the weaker ſort of his enemies,ſeeing themſelues caſt vpon ſo dangerous a coaſt vpon the approch of Winter. There was in garriſon in the D citie but eight hundred Turks,and moſt of them horſemen, but ſuch,as whoſe valour and reſolution farre exceeded their number. For Aſſan had loſt many of his beſt men, ſome in fight againſt Mendoza; and otherſome at ſea,ſlaine or taken by Auria in CORSICA;and in other places by the Rhodian,Neapolitane,and Sicilian gallies; but many mo were by his league gone to aid the Moores againſt the Portingals: the other multitude did ſcarce make vp the number of fiue thouſand; which were partly naturall Moores borne in that countrie, and partly ſuch as were borne in GRANADO; to whom was ioined many fugitiues out of the Iſlands of MAIORCA and MINORCA,who in former time hauing entred into rebellion, and fearing condigne puniſhment,were fled to ALGIERS, and there reuolted to the Mahometane ſuperſtition. But the captaines of the wild Numidians made vp a great number both of horſe and foot: which lying
E ſtragling without the citie in the open fields, ſhould night and day vex and moleſt the Chriſtians. This brutiſh people, naturally enemies vnto the Chriſtians, had Aſſan with rewards and hope of a rich ſpoile,allured out of the countries thereabout to aid him: neither was it lawfull for any man to carrie his wife or children out of the citie into places of more ſaferie farther off, or to ſhew any ſmall token of feare,paine of death being by the imperious eunuch propoſed to whoſeouer ſhould but looke out heauily for feare of danger,or ſpeake a word ſauoring of cowardiſe. The emperor by Auria making choiſe of a moſt conuenient place for landing his men, laid his gallies ſo cloſe vnto his tall ſhips,that his armed ſouldiors might with eaſe come out of the high built ſhips into them,and ſo out of them into the long boats, to be forthwith ſet on
F ſhore. And ſuch was the ſpeedie diligence of them that had the charge of that matter, and the plentie of boats ſtill readie to receiue the ſouldiors as faſt as they could come out of the gallies, that the footmen were in a verie ſhort time all landed. The emperour hauing a little reſted and refreſhed his ſouldiors, diuided his armie into three equall battels,which was in number about twentie thouſand footmen, beſides horſmen, and others who of their owne voluntarie will then followed the emperours fortune. Vnto euery battell he appointed three field pieces, to terrifie the Numidian horſemen,which were ſtill pricking vp and downe about them,readie to charge,

The diſcription of Algiers. The citie of ALGIERS, ſometime the royall ſeat of the great king Iuba, called of the Romans IVLIA CÆSAREA, is in forme of a triangle, ſcituat faſt by the ſea towards the North, hauing a hauen, but neither great, neither ſafe from the North wind. The houſes farther off from the ſea, ſtand in ſeemly order vpon the riſing of a ſteep hill, as it were vpon degrees, in ſuch ſort, that the windowes of one row ſtill ouerlooke the tops of the next beneath it, into the ſea, moſt beautifull to behold. The emperour hauing deuided his campe into three parts, euerie nation by H themſelues, lying on the Eaſt ſide of the towne, was in great hope to win it; and the rather, for that whileſt he aſſaulted it on that ſide, his ſhips and gallies from the North ſide, might in time of the aſſault with their great ordinance beat the enemie all alongſt the wall: which ſtill riſing higher and higher according to the riſing of the ſteepe hill, could not conueniently be defended with one bulwarke, as we ſee it may in plaine ground. Neereſt vnto the riſing of the hils, lay the Spaniards: in the middeſt, the Germans with the emperour; and in the plaine neereſt vnto the

In the meane time whileſt the great ordinance was landing and the horſes vnſhipping, the Numidians with a hideous outcrie ſhewed themſelues vpon the tops of the mountaines aboue the Spaniards, and from thence eaſily gauled them with their darts and ſhot: for they nimbly running too and fro in the known paths of the rough mountaines, would ſuddenly I and fiercely aſſaile them, but after the manner of their nation skirmiſhing a far off, rather than neere at hand. In which manner of light skirmiſhes, all that day was ſpent vntill night with ſmall danger, but much trouble to the Spaniards. And when night was come, theſe wild people, one companie ſtill ſucceeding another in the place they had before taken, neuer left ſhooting; for whereſoeuer they ſaw any fire in the Spaniſh campe, thither came arrowes, darts, and ſtones flying as thicke as haile: for remedie whereof, the Spaniards were glad to put out their

Wherefore as ſoone as the ſunne was vp, the Spaniards by the perſuaſion of Aluares Sandes, maſter of the campe, valiantly climing vp the high mountaines, repulſed and put to flight the Numidians, and tooke the top of the hils, and there lay as it were incamped in the poore ſhepheards cottages. But the ſame day ſuch a multitude of the wild people was flockt about them, that they were compaſſed in round, and glad to fight on euerie ſide in a ring. Yet this fierceneſſe of this barbarous people, was by the valour of the Sicilian companies quickly repreſſed, whoſe pikemen gliſtering in their bright armour, made ſmall account of the Numidians arrowes and darts, but orderly ſtepping forwards with their pikes, and the harquebuſiers cloſe by their ſides, eaſily repul-

The Numidian footmen are for moſt part youths halfe naked, with long haire not vnlike the Iriſh, vſing no other weapons but darts: they fight mingled with their horſemen, truſting the one to the other, and are of a wonderfull ſwiftneſſe and agilitie of bodie. Their horſemen vſe long ſpeares, armed at both ends, which they with a maruellous dexteritie vſe to the endangering of their enemie purſuing them: they vſe alſo long and light targuets made L

In the mean time, whileſt this wild people thus skirmiſhed all the day, at night a ſudden miſchance ouerthrew all the emperors hope: for as he ſtood beholding the vnſhipping of his great ordinance, his horſes, victuall, and other neceſſaries of the armie, a ſtorme of wind and raine began about ſix a clock in the afternoone, holding on all the

That night three companies of the Italians, by M
the appointment of their Generall, lay without the trenches againſt the ſudden aſſault of ſo vncertaine an enemie, who when they had all the night endured the vehement raine and extreame cold, were ſo ouercome with the extreamitie of the weather, that neither was their minds able to relieue their weake bodies, neither their feeble bodies their diſcouraged minds: for they could neither

A neither conueniently ſtand nor lie downe, all the ground being ſo mirie, that at euerie ſtept they ſunke vp to the calfe of the legge. Vpon theſe ſtaruen companies, the Turkiſh horſemen and Moores footmen, who diligently obſerued the watch of the Chriſtians, perceiuing their diſtres, ſuddenly ſallied out in the dawning of the day; and ſo fiercely charged them, their match and pouder being now ſo wet that they could not vſe their pieces, that they all fled, except a few pikemen, who made a ſtand, and were all quickly ſlain by the Turks: who ſo deſperatly purſued the reſt in chaſe, that they followed them ouer the trench into the campe. This alarum being heard, Camillus Columna the Italian Generall came preſently thither, being ſent by the emperor, who with certaine companies iſſued out ouer the bridge againſt the enemie: who now in ſhew diſcouraged with the comming out of this new ſupplie, did in deed, or at leaſtwiſe made as if
B they did diſorderly retire for feare. At which time Ferdinand Gonzaga, viceroy of SICILIA, a man of greateſt account in the armie next vnto the emperour, comming in alſo, and angrie with them which had before fled; perſuading them as valiant men, to recompence their ſhamefull flight with a freſh charge, by driuing the enemie home to his owne doore: which thing Columna ſaid could not be done without great perill: But Gonzaga being a man of noble courage, deſired to haue the diſgrace which the Italians had receiued, ſalued ſome way, although it were with neuer ſo great danger; thinking alſo that it might happily fall out, that the enemie being put to flight, and haſtily purſued, they might together with them enter the citie, without danger of the artillerie. So without farther delay, the reſt of the Italian companies were led forth of their The Moores put to flight by the Italians.
trenches with great cheerefulneſſe by Auguſtine Spinula, who ſo valiantly charged the enemies
C that they put them to flight, and purſued them ſo hard, that they came with them to the verie gates of the citie: where many ſhut out for feare of letting in the Italians togither with them, eſcaped by knowne waies, ſome to another gate, and ſome into the mountaines. But then theſe barbarous people, with darts and ſhot from the wals, began to ouerwhelme the Italians which were vnaduiſedly come within their danger, and with terrible outcries to terrifie them: and they which before were fled without the wals, returned againe to fight. They alſo which had ſhut the The Italians diſcomfited by the Moores flie, and indanger the whole campe.
gate, ſallied out againe, and hardly charged the Italians, who alreadie galled with ſhot from the wals, and rent in ſunder with the great ordinance, fled moſt diſorderly; for why, they were but raw ſouldiors taken vp in haſt, little or nothing acquainted with the wars. At which time Aſſan alſo ſallying out, who was eaſily knowne by his countenance and rich attire, purſued the chaſe
D with his troupes of Turks and Moores footmen. Only certaine knights of the RHODES fought valiantly, and retired orderly: and Spinula with ſome other gentlemen making a ſtand at a little woodden bridge, ſomewhat ſtaied the enemie and ſaued the liues of many. So the Italians which firſt charged moſt valiantly, being in the flight become hindermoſt, the enemie ſtriking them downe as they fled, couered the fields with their dead bodies by the ſpace of halfe a mile, eſpecially they which fled towards the ſea: for there they were circumuented and ſlaine by the mercileſſe Numidians, who beholding the ſhipwrecke, were come downe to the ſea ſide for prey. But the formoſt companies of the Italians which firſt fled into the campe, fled in ſo much haſt and ſo great feare, that none of the leaders in ſo great and ſudden a perplexitie, remembred either the common ſafetie, or performed the duetie of an aduiſed captaine; ſo that all ſeemed at E once loſt, both by ſea and land. Only the emperour, armed with an inuincible courage againſt all the chances of fortune, and not to be diſmaied with any miſhap, was both vnto himſelfe and others that day the greateſt captaine; for when as all was almoſt loſt, he in good time ſtaied the matter by comming on with the ſquadron of Germans, whereof he ſent before three enſigns to ſtay the flight, and with them as a ſure and freſh ſupply to guard his campe beyond the bridge which was ouer the ditch, ſeruing his armie for a trench as we haue before ſaid. But ſuch a feare had poſſeſſed the minds of the flying Italians, and ſuch was the fierce purſuit of the enemie, that thoſe Germans (not before woont to turne their backs) as if they had been afraid of the Turkes white caps, or not able to abide their ſight, or to hold vp weapon againſt them; by and by turned their backes, and ſhamefully fled for companie with the Italians. Then the emperour gallo-
F ping forth with his horſe, and his ſword in his hand drawne, reprouing them of cowardiſe that fled, ſet forward with the German ſquadron, and with a ſtout and manly courage ſpake to them theſe few words in their owne language: When will you (fellow ſouldiors) ſhew your faces to your proud enemies; if now when you ſhould fight for the honour of the Chriſtian name, for the glorie of the German nation, for the ſafegard of your owne liues, in the preſence of your emperour, you feare a The notable courage of the emperor in ſtaying the flight of his armie.

few disordered and naked Barbarians? Immediatly when he had thus said, the Germans touched with shame, and disdaining that it should be thought they needed any exhortation to performe the parts of valiant souldiors, issued out against the enemie: who moued with their comming, and seeing the Italian battell againe restored by the valour and trauell of certain valiant and expert captaines, stood still a while, and began to retire; whether it were because they feared the great artillerie & assault of the Germans, or that they thought they had done enough for that sally: when as for the full accõplishment of the victorie they saw the Christian fleet ouercome with a most horrible tempest, miserably to perish before their faces; & many of their men, especially the Moores hasted to the sea side in hope of a more certaine prey, whereas was no enemie to be feared. For the blustring winds blowing from diuers quarters, as if they had conspired to raise a most horrible tempest, had made such a wrought sea, and the hugie billowes went so high, that the ships by the violence of the weather, & rage of the sea, put from their anchors, fell foule one of another, and were so lost; or else driuen vpon the maine, were there beaten in pieces in the sight of the armie: so that all the sea coast Westward, from ALGIERS to CERCELLO, lay full of dead men & horses, and the ribs of broken ships. The Numidians beholding this miserable wrecke, came down by great companies from the mountaines, and without mercie slew all that came aline to land. In the space of a few houres was lost about an hundred and fortie ships, and all the small boats and caruels, which were in number many. Some of the gallies, when they had from midnight to the next day at noone, by the painful labour of the mariners and skilfulnesse of the masters, rid it out; being no longer able to endure the rage of the tempest, and fearing to be eaten vp with the sea, with sailes and oares ran a ground: but the souldiors and mariners swimming to land in hope to saue their liues, and thinking that the greatest danger had bin now past, were by the Numidian horsemen which ran vp and downe the sea side, slaine. There might a man haue seene free men of all sorts, with teares commending their liues and libertie to their own gally-slaues; that by the speech and intreatie of them, which by the sudden change of fortune had but euen now shaken off their yrons, and with merrie hearts swam out to their libertie, they might be saued from the crueltie of the fierce Numidians. It was a most grieuous and wofull sight for diuers hard extremities; when as euerie man according to the dispositiõn of his mind and skill in swimming, standing doubtfull in most assured death, which to receiue or refuse, was by fatall destinie drawne to his end, and either drowned in the sea, or thrust thorow with the enemies launce: yet most made choise to abide the danger of the sea, and to expect the eueut of the tempest, rather than to hasten their end by the enemies mercilesse hand. By that meanes it came to passe, that that barbarous crueltie of the enemie (as a thing most feared of the mariners and souldiors) saued many gallies, which by the appointment of the fearefull mariners and passengers should otherwise haue been run on ground. But after that, a notable gallie wherin Iannettin Auria went, was seene to come neere vnto the shoare, and to be driuen vpon the sands by force of weather and the beating of other gallies. The emperour not enduring to see so valiant a young gentleman, captaine of many gallies, slaine without helpe by the Moores in the sight of Auria his vncle; sent by and by one of his captaines called Antonius of ARAGON, with three bands of Italians to the sea side: by whose comming the Moores were put to flight, and he with the rest in the gallie saued; but so, that the sauing of him was the losse of diuers other gallies. For many deliuered of the feare of the Numidians, & trusting to the rescue of the souldiors come downe to the sea side, desiring to saue themselues from the rage of the sea, ran their gallies on ground; and had not some bold captains (grieued to see so great a losse) run vp and downe the banks with their drawne swords in their hands, and by threatning death vnto the gally-slaues and mariners, staied their rowing, most part of the gallies had by the example of the others perished. Auria, not so angrie at himselfe as at the emperour (who, contrarie to the obseruation of skilful seamen, could not be dissuaded from taking in hand that great expedition in so suspitious a time of the yeare) with an inuincible courage striue against the violence of the tempest, and rage of the sea: insomuch, that being requested by some of his friends to saue himselfe whatsoeuer became of the gallie; he was so angrie thereat, that he commanded them to be bestowed vnder the hatches. Foure gallies also of Virginius Vrsinus, earle of ANGVILLARIA, and as many of the Rhodians, after his example rid it out, the reputation of their honour exceeding the feare of death. Certaine gallies also of SICILIA, NAPLES, and SPAINE, happily endured all the rage of the tempest: yet was there fifteene great gallies cast away; with the

A the losse whereof, besides the losse of so many ships, the tempest still enduring, so great sorrow and desperation in the wofull expectation of the wrecke of all, possessed the whole armie, that not only the young souldiours regarding onely their owne liues, but euen the most valiant captaines, carefull of the common estate, were vtterly discouraged: for neuer was armie in any memorie, ouerwhelmed with a greater concourse of calamities, when as all their victuals being lost in three daies, nothing was left to relieue them withall, and they wanted tents wherin to shroud and rest the souldiors spent with labour, hunger, cold, and wounds, in such perpetuall raine & so dirtie a countrie. In which so great miseries, a wonderful care heauier than the former fear exceedingly troubled the minds of all men, to think vpon that horrible wrecke; when as hauing lost so many ships, & they poore men landed in AFFRICK, were in doubt how euer to return again into their natiue countries. Yet the notable courage of the emperor still kept the distressed men in hope, which neuer altogether forsaketh wretched men in the midst of their calamities: for he with a couragious heart & cheerful countenance performed all the parts of a prouident & courteous Generall. For when he had againe made sure his camp against the assaults of the Barbarians, he commanded the wearied captains, especially the duke of ALBA (wonderfully wearied in the late skirmish, and dung wet) to spare themselues, and take their rest: he comforted the wounded men and caused them to be carried & cherished in the tents which by chance yet stood (for the tempestuous wind had almost ouerthrown them all) and so not sparing himselfe for any pains, being in his armour and thorow wet, woon the hearts of all his souldiors the more. In this conflict he lost about three thousand men, amongst whom was fiue of his forward captaines, and three knights of the RHODES: but many moe were hurt. The greatest losse was thought to be in losse of the ships and of the mariners, which was also increased by the losse of a wonderfull deale of great ordinance, reckoned so much the greater, for that it would come into the hands of the Moores, to the common harme of the Christians, so soone as the sea would giue them leaue to diue for it. Shortly after, Auria (as he was to foresee a tempest, a wonderfull obseruer of the sea, of the heauens, and of the clouds) mistrusting that place, departed with the remainder of the fleet to the cape called METAFVSIVM; because it was a place of safer riding for his gallies, and better for the taking in of the souldiors: aduising the emperor to march thither by land. Which his counsell the emperour liked well of, to relieue the hunger of his souldiors, commanded first all the draught horses which were first vnshipped for the drawing of the great Ordinance, and after them the horses for seruice, to be killed, and diuided for meat amongst the souldiors. As for wood to make fire of, they had plentie of the planks and ribs of the broken ships, fortune as it were with that one poore benefit recompensing so many calamities. The next day the emperor departed from ALGIERS, with his armie diuided into three battels, the sicke and wounded men being receiued into the middle: and when he had marched seuen miles (the enemies horsemen still houering about him) he came to a headie brooke, which the Moores call ALCARAZ: which was growne so high with the abundant raine and the checke of the wind and of the sea, that being but a shallow thing before, it was not now to be passed ouer by a good horseman. Wherefore the emperour of necessitie there encamped, in such sort, that lying with his armie in forme of a triangle, two sides of his armie was defended with the sea and the brook, and the other with a strong guard of armed men, for he thought it not good to depart from the sea, a sure defence for his armie on the left hand, to seeke a fourd further off: many aduenturing to swim ouer, were by the violence of the streame carried away and drowned. Wherefore the emperour caused a bridge to be made ouer it, of the masts & saile yards of the broken ships, which were by chance there taken vp, and so passed ouer the Italians and Germans. The Spaniards marching higher vp the brooke, found a fourd whereby they passed ouer. After which time the Turkes pursued them no further, being called backe againe by Assan their gouernour: as for the Moores and Numidians which still followed at hand, alwaies readie to skirmish, they were easily repulsed by the harquebusiers, and field pieces appointed to euery nation: but vpon such sicke & wounded men as were not able to keepe way with the armie, they exercised all manner of crueltie: for there was none which in that small hope, possessed with feare of their own safetie, was greatly moued with the compassion of their fellowes miserie. The next day passing ouer another little riuer, which the souldiours waded ouer vp to the breasts, they came in three daies march to the rode where the fleet lay, and encamped in the ruines of the old citie TIPASA, neere vnto the sea side, which serued them in stead of a fortresse against the Barbarians. The sea was now calme, the wind laied, and the weather ſo faire that all men thought the ſouldiours might now well be em- G barked and tranſported into EVROPE; wherefore the emperour to the great ioy of the whole armie commanded euerie man to make himſelfe readie to goe abourd, in ſuch ſort, that firſt the Italians, next the Germans, and laſt of all the Spaniards ſhould be embarked: but ſo many ſhips and gallies as is before ſaid, being loſt by ſhipwrecke, it was thought that thoſe which were left were not able to receiue the whole armie, although it was crouded togither as cloſe as were poſſible. Wherefore the emperour commanded the maſters and owners of the ſhips to caſt all the horſes ouerbourd into the ſea, reputing it an vnmerciful part to prefer the ſafegard of thoſe horſes, although they were of great worth, before the life of the baſeſt common ſouldiour or horſeboy in his campe; which thing much grieued the minds of the noblemen and owners of thoſe goodly beaſts, not only for that they were (not without extreame neceſſitie) for the preſent H depriued of ſuch an ineſtimable treaſure, but ſhould for euer, as they ſaid, loſe the moſt notable race of horſes in SPAINE: there, with griefe & vaine compaſſion, was to be ſeen goodly horſes of ſeruice, bearing high their proud heads, ſwimming all about the ſea vnto the ſhips neereſt vnto them for ſafegard, as if it had beene to the ſhore, and in the end wearied with long ſwimming to be there drowned. But ſcarce halfe the ſouldiors were yet embarked, when the Eaſt and North-eaſt wind, and ſtraightwaies after, diuers contrarie winds almoſt as great as the firſt, roſe: wherupon the ſhips which had alreadie taken in the ſouldiours, not expecting any commaund, for feare of being driuen vpon the rockes, directed their courſe according as the wind carried them with full ſailes alongſt the coaſt: They were quickly out of ſight and diſperſed with the tempeſt, ſome into one countrie, ſome into another, carrying the fame of that ſhipwrecke, and the report I that all was loſt, into all the Iſlands of the Mediteranean and ports of ITALIE. The force of this tempeſt was ſo great, and the billow went ſo high, that ſome of the ſhips were in the ſight of their fellowes ſwallowed vp of the ſea. But amongſt the reſt two Spaniſh ſhips full of ſouldiors were by wonderfull miſhap by contrarie winds driuen againe to ALGIERS, and there ſet faſt vpon that fatall ſhore, where the Numidian horſemen with a multitude of Moores following them, came running downe to the ſea ſide, to kill them as they ſhould come to ſhore: for the barbarous people thirſting after Chriſtian bloud, would not receiue them to mercie, although they were readie to yeeld themſelues, and couenanted nothing but the ſafegard of their liues. At which their crueltie the Spaniards diſdaining, with their weapons in their hands got to ſhore, and ſtanding cloſe togither as deſperat men, withſtood thē who had with their multitude quick- K ly compaſſed them in round: yet in deſpight of what that barbarous multitude (without regard of humanitie or law of armes) could doe, they made way thorow the midſt of them, from the place where they were caſt on ſhore, vnto the very gates of the citie. But ſeeing the Turks ſallie out, they called vnto them, offering to yeeld themſelues priſoners to Aſſan, without further reſiſtance, if they would aſſure them their liues, which they were in good hope of, for that he was born of Chriſtian parents in SARDINIA, and was attended vpon with many renegate Spaniards.

Aſſan taketh the Spaniards to mercie.

So Aſſan comming forth of the citie, gaue them his faith for their ſafetie, and beating away the Moores and Numidians, courteouſly ſaued them all, wiſely making great account of ſo great againe as would redound vnto him by ſo many priſoners, ioined with no ſmall commendation L of his clemencie in ſauing them. Of the Germans the third part neuer returned home, but were either loſt with ſhipwrecke, or els dead of the ſickneſs enſuing ſo great miſeries. The emperour perſuaded (or rather ouerruled) by Auria to auoid the violence of the tempeſt, ſailed alongſt the coaſt of AFFRICKE Eaſtward to BVZIA: the caſtle whereof was kept with a ſmall garriſon of Spaniards: where the emperor landing, found ſome freſh victuall, though not much, yet ſuch as did both him and the other noblemen no ſmall pleaſure. Whileſt the emperour lay at BVZIA expecting fairer weather, a great ſhip of GENVA, laded with victuall, chanced to come into the bay, to the great reioycing of the hungrie ſouldiours: but ſuch was the violence of the tempeſt, that her ankars came home, and ſhe driuen vpon the flats, was caſt away; yet ſo, as that part of the victuall driuen to ſhore, and halfe ſpoiled with the ſalt water, well relieued the encreaſing want. In the meane time the emperour when he had long looked for the aſſuaging of the tem- M peſt, and was now out of hope of any new ſupplie of victual, ſent away Gonzaga with the Sicilian and Rhodian gallies: for the wind before at North was now come to Northweſt, and put them in hope to aduenture againe to ſea, rather than to ſtay there longer. So although with a troubleſome yet a proſperous courſe they came in ſhort time into the port of VTICA, now cal-

A led FARINAS: where Muleasses king of TVNES bountifully relieued Gonzaga and his fleet with all kind of victuall and other necessaries. From whence they afterward departed, and landed all in safetie at DREPANVM in SICILIA. The blustering winds were now at length wearie of blowwing, and the raging sea became calme, so that the skilfull sea men for feare of new dangers, and wearie of those that were past, thought it best to aduenture againe to sea. Almost euery houre they were reasoning in councel, What course they were for most safetie best to take: when some were of opinion, that it was best to beare for SARDINIA or CORSICA: and other some would haue had them to haue kept alongst the coast of AFFRICA, and so directly for SICILIA. But the wind comming faire at East, the emperor directed his course to the Islands BALEARES, & from thence at length arriued at the port of new CARTHAGE in SPAINE, greatly commended euen of
B his enemies for the wonderfull courage and constancie in passing thorow so many extremities, in such sort, as if he had triumphed ouer the malice of fortune.

About this time the dissembled friendship betwixt Charles the emperour and Francis the French king brake out into open hatred. The king first thinking himselfe deluded by the emperor, who had long time fed him with the vaine hope of the restitution of the dukedome of MILLAN, when as he meant nothing lesse; and of late abused by the death of Rinco his embassadour, slaine by the Spaniards in passing down the riuer Padus, as is before declared. In reuenge wherof he raised a great power in FRANCE, and at such time as most men thought he would haue inuaded ITALIE, sent Charles his son with the one part of his forces into the low countries, which were then gouerned by Marie queene of HVNGARIE, the emperors sister; and Henrie his other
C sonne with the other part of his forces to inuade SPAINE, both young princes of great hope. And not so contented, but desirous by all means to trouble and molest the emperor, as he did in the low countries by setting on the duke of CLEVE: so by Antonius Polinus his embassadour, a man of great discretion, he earnestly solicited Solyman the great Turke, with whom he was then in league, to spoile the borders of SPAINE with his gallies, at the same time that Henrie his sonne was besieging PERPENNA in SPAINE. For which practise he was of most men discommended, as too much fauouring his own griefe; and especially by such as affected the emperour. But how this matter, which grew vpon the French king no small enuie, was carried in the Turkes court, shall not (as I hope) be vnto this historie impertinent to declare.

The French king the more to trouble the emperor solliciteth Soyman to inuade his countries.

After the death of Rinco slain by the Spaniards, Francis the French king sent Antonius Polinus, D a man of great dexteritie, his embassadour to Solyman: who passing by many by-waies to VENICE, and so ouer the gulfe to SIBINICVM, crossing ouer ILLYRIA, met with Solyman in MISIA, as he was comming from BVDA: and there first offered vnto him the present sent from the king his master (for with emptie hands no man might presume to come to those barbarous kings of the East) which present was a cupbord of plate, curiously wrought, in weight 600 pounds; and 500 rich garments of all sorts of silke & scarlet to be bestowed vpon the Bassaes and other great courtiers. Solyman after he had read the French kings letters, & heard what he had further to say, seemed to be greatly moued with the death of Rinco, & promised Polinus not to be wanting vnto the French king, by sea or land to giue him aid in his iust wars against Charles his enemie, for breaking of the league: but for as much as nothing could be well determined of such
E matters in his iourney of so great hast, he told him, that as soon as he was come to CONSTANTIOPLE, he should then haue answer by his Bassaes of all his demands. The embassador aboue all things desired, That he would send Hariadenus Barbarussa with his fleet against the next Summer into PROVINCE, there to be receiued into the French harbors, & to be imploied against the emperor as occasion should require: & further, That he would request the Venetians, with whom he was able to do much, to ioine in league with the king his master against Charles the emperor, whose power began now to be dreadfull to their estate. Polinus was not slacke in his busines, but all the way as he went sought to win the fauour of the Bassaes, still giuing them one present or other, & filling their minds with the hope of greater. But when they were come to CONSTANTINOPLE, in the latter end of December, Solyman promising what he had before said, aduised
F Polinus to returne to FRANCE with his letters, & to bring him certaine word backe againe from the king of the determinat time & full resolution of taking those wars in hand: & that he would in the meane time send Iunusbeius his embassador to VENICE, who had been there diuers times before; & would prouide to haue such a fleet in readines, as he desired. Polinus exceeding glad of that answer, with wonderful speed returned back again to the king, bringing with him as presents from Solyman two goodly Turkish horses, and a sword richly set with stones of great price. The G Polinus returneth into France French king hauing by his embassador receiued Solymans letters and presents, and three daies togither discoursed with him at large of the manner of his proceeding in the Turkes court, in short time after sent him back againe to Solyman with full instructions both of the time and places, and other circumstances of the intended warre. Polinus comming to VENICE, found not Iunusbeius there, as he had well hoped: yet to lose no time in expecting his comming, he with Pellicerius embassador Legier for the French king, and other of the French faction, laboured the Senatours in the behalfe of the king. For it was thought likely ynough, that the Venetians still measuring all their counsels by their profit, would easily consent to that league, especially being requested thereunto by Solyman, and put in hope to haue the port towne MARANVS deliuered vnto them in reward thereof; which otherwise the French, in whose possession it was, H

Wherefore Polinus hauing audience giuen him in the Senat, notably pleaded the French kings cause, grieuously lamented the death of the embassadour slaine by the Spaniards, and bitterly enueighed against the ambition of the emperour, who as he said aspired to the whole monarchie of all ITALIE, not by true vertue and valour, but by meere craft and deceit, encroching still vpon the liberties of the free states, and by little and little imposing vpon them the yoke of bondage: In confirmation whereof, hee produced many examples, to them well known, requesting them as ancient friends and confederats of the French, to ioine their forces with the kings, in which doing, they should assure themselues of such rewards of the vndoubted victorie, as they could not desire greater. Wheras if they should I refuse so to do, and would rather sit still and looke on as neuters, they should vndoubtedly, fortune hauing decided the quarrell, grieuously offend both, and might worthily expect of the vanquished, hatred; and of the conqueror, iniurie: Besides that, in taking vp of armes they should highly gratifie Solyman, who prouoked with late iniuries, had determined with a puissant armie to inuade HVNGARIE, and at the same time to send Barbarussa with a great fleet against the Spaniards their common enemies: for the imparting of which his designes, he would shortly send vnto them Iunusbeius his embassadour: As for the euent of the warre, they needed not to doubt, when as they of themselues were strong ynough quickly to thrust the emperour out of the dukedome of MILLAN, being generally hated of the people, feeding his souldiors with the spoile of the countrey, and on euery side beset both by sea and land by two of the greatest mo- K narchs of the world. Whereunto the Senat delaying the time for certaine daies, that Iunusbeius
The craftie answere of the Venetians to the French kings embassadour. might in the meane time come thither, grauely answered, That the amitie they held with king Francis, ought to be vnto them an ornament, but no burthen: the like also they held with the emperour, whom they would in no case seeme to cast off, although they had beene by him ouerraught: Wherefore the Senators and all the citisens generally were of opinion to preserue their peace, as they which in the hard times of war had endured great extremities, which would hardly be recouered with long peace: But if they did once see the ensigns displayed, and the wars begun, they would then take further aduice, Whether it were good for them to thrust themselues into those warres or not, when as they were in league and friendship with three of the greatest Solymans embassadors commeth to Venice. princes of the world. In the meane time Iunusbeius arriued at VENICE, and was there honou- L rably receiued. He requested, that the league before made at CONSTANTINOPLE by Badoerius their embassador, might by the authoritie of the Senat be confirmed: & so cõmended the French kings cause to the Senat, that he requested no more, but that vnto that amitie which they alreadie held with the French, they would ioine further curtesies, the rather for that Solyman had accounted him for his brother, and had vndertaken to aid him against Charles king of SPAINE: but as to ioine in league with him, or in his quarrell to take vp armes, he requested nothing. Which was quite beside the expectation of Polinus and Pellicerius, who by vrging of the matter, and by telling of al, had thought easily to haue persuaded the Senat to haue graunted what they requested, and therefore thought the Turk who had so coldly spoken in the cause, to be some way corrupted. But as it afterward appeared, there was such equity & modestie in Solymans letters, who was M Polinus comming to Constantinople, findeth not the Turke so readie to send his fleet to aid the French king as he had hoped otherwise of a proud and insolent nature, that he would not as then exact any thing of them, which should not stand with the good of their estate. Wherfore Polinus, hauing in vaine staied certaine daies at VENICE, was in one of their publike gallies transported to RAGVSIVM, and from thence trauelled by land to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he found all things more difficult

A than euer he dreamed of. For the great Baſſaes ſaid, There could no fleet be ſet out that yeare, by reaſon that he was come too late to ſue for ſuch a matter, the Spring of the yeare being now paſt, of all other times moſt fit for to take in hand ſo long a voyage. So that Polinus was aboue meaſure vexed with care and griefe, that he had ſo euill ſped, and was come ſo out of ſeaſon both to VENICE and CONSTANTINOPLE. Dixius alſo, one of the maſters of the Rhodian gallies, was come to CONSTANTINOPLE, to carie newes into FRANCE of the comming of the Turks fleet: who told Polinus, That the kings ſonnes were with ſtrong power far entred into the low countries, and had alreadie inuaded SPAINE, expecting nothing more than the comming of the Turks gallies. Wherefore Polinus (as it eaſily chanceth to men deceiued by truſt repoſed in any other mens promiſes, and bewailing the euill ſucceſſe of their vaine trauell) wonderfully tor-
B mented himſelfe, curſed the froward and vnconſtant manners of the Baſſaes, called vpon the faith of Solyman; and beſought the great Baſſaes one by one, that they would not contrarie to their promiſe, forſake the king, who vpon the hope of the comming of the Turks fleet, had now inuaded both the low countries and the kingdome of SPAINE: for as much as by that delay, which was vnto them neither honourable nor profitable, was (as he ſaid) betraied the maieſtie of his king, and a moſt aſſured victorie now as good as gotten, quite marred. In which his obteſtations, he was ſo importunat and tedious, that he became vnto thoſe proud Baſſaes rather loathſome than gratious; inſomuch that to end his ſute, they thought it beſt ſharply to take him vp, and ſo for that time to ſhake him off. And therefore ſending for him and the other French gentlemen which followed him to the court, the great Baſſaes then ſitting in counſell, and Bar-
C baruſſa with them for the honour of his place: as ſoone as they were come into the counſell chamber, Solyman Baſſa the eunuch, turning himſelfe about, ſpake vnto them in this ſort.

The ſharpe oration of Solyman the eunuch Baſſa to Polinus the French embaſſadour.

Frenchmen (ſaid he) this place for diſpatch of moſt waighty affaires, appointed by the graue iudg- ment of our moſt mightie emperour to vs his faithfull ſeruants, doth (as it beſt beſeemeth) receiue vs, daily comming vnto it, void of loue and hatred: and withall doth notably put vs in remembrance, to ſpeake our minds freely. Neither would I, that this frankneſſe of ſpeech (the meſſenger of truth, and therefore the faithfull keeper of friendſhip) ſhould be vnto your eares vnpleaſing or troubleſome: for ſithence your king hath beene called the friend and fellow of the Othoman name, we may not now ei- ther forget the duties of loue, or loath your friendſhip: ſeeing that our emperour doth maruellouſly D affect you, and is not a little deſirous to ſtrengthen you with his power, and by ouercomming your ene- mies to increaſe your power and honour. But in your demaunds is no equitie, no modeſtie, ſo that wee tearme you vnmodeſt and importunat: and others which fauour you not ſo well, call you plainly by your right names, vnreaſonable and ſhameleſſe men; who as too too forgetfull of your dueties, doe moſt fondly trouble the lawes of amitie and friendſhip. For leagues are confirmed by like profit, by making euen the charge and mutuall dangers: but if neglecting your friends kindneſſe and courteſie, you will make no requitall, they will quickly grow wearie of you. So happeneth it vnto you Frenchmen, who euer forgetfull and negligent in our dangers, but in your owne alwaies mindfull and diligent, haue ſhewed your ſelues friends vnto vs when need was, not in deeds and certaine aid, but onely in bare letters and embaſſages. Tell me I pray you where euer you ſhewed any ſigne or token of your good will or E aid? whereby the minds of our enemies might at the leaſt wiſe haue but beene kept in ſuſpence of ſome doubtfull feare, when as Charles with all the power of the Weſt came into HVNGARIE; and CO-RONE and PATRAS were in the meane time ſhaken in GRÆCE with the enemies fleet; and laſt of all TVNES taken with ſo great a fleet? But all this we pardon you: yet this it is which is hardly to be endured, that you did not ſo much as once grieue at our ſo great iniuries, as you ought to haue done; but ſent your gratulatorie embaſſadours vnto the bloudie common enemie, who had but euen then ſlaine ſo many of our people. At length our emperour came to AVLONA to your great profit, about to paſſe ouer into ITALIE: but neither then in the arriuall of your fleet appeared the good wils of the Apuli- ans towards you, which were of you ſo vainly promiſed, neither did you ſo much as once moue to inuade
the vpper part of ITALIE: ſo neither ſeruing our turne, nor well fitting your owne, you haue alwaies
F loſt the occaſion of the good ſucceſſe of your affaires. But neither then, neither at any time afterwards needed we your counſell or vnited forces: for the Venetians to their paine felt both our forces and our faith: as for the reſt, warre, the notable reuenger of our wrongs, moſt happily brought to paſſe, at ſuch time as you of your owne voluntarie made peace with the common enemie, to inuade vs; and did as vn-kindly as impudently as it were blow wind in his ſailes. But we, without your helpe, haue notably re-preſſed

preſſed ſo great aſſaults of our enemies: when as this ſame Hariaden Barbaruſſa put to flight their G fleet at Ambracia, and happily ſlew the ſpaniſh pirats of Castrvm, and hauing againe recouered our owne cities, tooke alſo from them ſome of theirs: wherefore we are bound vnto you for no deſert, but we had rather forget theſe vnkindneſſes, than to faile you whom we haue once receiued into our friendſhip. For we performe our fidelitie in deeds: but it is his part to regard the time, to way the danger, to wait occaſion; which will not raſhly commit his actions to the hazard of fortune. You are come later than you ſhould haue done for the ſetting forth of our fleet: for Sommer now well ſpent, followeth the peſtilent time of Autumne, ſo that marriners cannot in conuenient time be taken vp, or ſafely thruſt into the gallies: for in long ſailing, who would not thinke, but that ſuch a companie of ſailers vſually ſick at the change of an vnacquainted ayre, would be in danger of their liues? who would not feare ſhipwracke in their returne, when as this ſame Hariaden ſo great a maſter at ſea, driuen H vpon the Acroceraunian rockes in the moneth of Auguſt, loſt ſo many gallies? A fleet would be rigged in Winter, furniſhed and ſet forward in the Spring; in Sommer is ſafe ſailing and making warre. Which that it may be ſo done, we will for the common wealth ſake perſuade the emperour: for the nauie once loſt, cannot vpon the ſudden be againe reſtored for much gold, whereof the Othoman emperour wanteth no ſtore, heaped vp by many ages. If thou be wiſe take theſe things in good part as friendly ſpoken: but whether the emperor will pardon thy boldneſſe or not, let himſelfe conſider, truly we haue ſatisfied both him and our ſelues in ſpeaking to thee ſo plainly.

Theſe things ſeuerely ſpoken by the eunuch Baſſa, did ſo much the more trouble Polinus, for that they ſeemed to haue been ſent from the mouth of Solyman himſelfe, who was thought to I haue heard all that was ſaid. For behind the Baſſaes as they ſate in counſell, was a window with a braſen grate, and a curten drawne before it, that the emperour when he pleaſed, might vnperceiued heare the complaints and ſutes of all nations, and note the manners of his great counſellors; whoſe care for the adminiſtration of iuſtice was ſo much the greater, for feare of his preſence. Yet did not Polinus for this repulſe, deteſting the double dealing of the Baſſaes, ſo giue ouer his ſute; but winning by gifts the fauour of the Capiaga or chiefe porter, a man euer of great authoritie in the Turks court laboured by him to be brought to the ſpeech of Solyman himſelfe: who faithfully performed what he had vndertaken. So the French embaſſadour brought by him into the ſecreteſt place of the court, which few Chriſtians had euer been, and ſo vnto the preſence of Solyman, recounted vnto him how all matters had before paſſed, and moſt earneſtly beſought K him not to faile the kings expectation of the fleet he had before promiſed, who at that preſent was inuading his enemies in three places. Whereunto Solyman courteouſly and expreſſely anſwered, That the opportunitie of ſending out of his fleet was paſt; not by his will, which was alwaies immutable and firme, but by his late comming, and the time of the yeare halfe ſpent: but promiſed, the next Spring without doubt to ſend vnto the king his friend and brother, twiſe ſo great a fleet as he had deſired againſt Charles their enemie. With which anſwere, the embaſſadour diſpatched away Dixius into France, vpon whoſe arriuall, king Francis called backe againe Henrie his eldeſt ſonne with his armie, from the ſiege of Perpenna in Spaine.

Polinus by the meanes of the Capiaga is brought to the ſpeech of Solyman himſelfe.

Solymans anſwer to Polinus.

The Princes of Germanie ioine their forces with king Ferdinand againſt the Turke in Hungarie.

The princes and States of Germanie, at the requeſt of king Ferdinand and the nobilitie of L Hvngarie, about this time decreed with one conſent, to take vp armes againſt the Turks, for the recouering againe of Byda, and other the loſt parts of Hvngarie. For beſides the diſhonour done to their nation at Exek vnder the leading of Cazzianer, and againe at Byda vnder the leading of the Lo. Rogendorff; they well ſaw, that if they did not ſpeedily relieue the Hungarians ouerwhelmed with the calamities of the Turks forces, they ſhould in ſhort time be enforced to fight for their religion, children, wiues, and liues againſt the ſame mightie enemie, at their owne doores. For preuenting whereof, the princes and free cities of Germanie, ſet out thirtie thouſand footmen, and ſeauen thouſand horſemen: amongſt whom was Mauritius, afterwards duke of Saxonie, then a young gentleman about twentie yeares old. But the Generall of theſe German forces, was Ioachimus Marqueſſe of Brandenbvrg, a man more for the ho- M nour of his houſe than the valour of himſelfe preferred to that place: yet ſo, that vnto him was ioyned eight others, men of great yeares and experience, by whoſe counſell he was to be directed. When they were come to Vienna, king Ferdinands power met them: where, beſide ſuch as were taken vp in Avstria, Huganot Gouernour of Stiria came in with ten thouſand horſemen.

horſemen. Vnto theſe the noble men of HVNGARIE, Gaſper Seredius, Andreas Bathor, and Petrus Perenus, a man of the greateſt authoritie power and experience amongſt the Hungarians, ioyned themſelues, with fifteene thouſand horſemen; whither alſo Paulus the third of that name then biſhop of ROME, ſent three thouſand choſen footmen out of ITALIE, conducted to VIENNA by Alexander Vitellius, a moſt famous captaine. The Marqueſſe with this great army marched from VIENNA alongſt the riuer Danubius, but ſo ſoftly, that the Hungarian and Italian captains ſaid plainly, That the beſt part of the Sommer, and fitteſt time for warres, was paſſed ouer in loitering and dallying out the time to no purpoſe: eſpecially Iacobus Medices, who had long before perſuaded the king, to be readie to ſet forward his forces with the firſt of the Spring, before the Turks could either augment their garriſons, or put in any new forces; for that by ſuch reſolute and ſpeedie inuaſion, it was like enough hee might recouer both PESTH and BVDA. Which politike and wholſome counſell ſo well giuen, king Ferdinand too much crediting the great men of his court (liking nothing but what proceeded of themſelues) reiected, expecting the full aſſembly of all his forces, before the ſetting forth of his armie. At length the Marqueſſe was by ſoft marches come to STRIGONIVM (king Ferdinand himſelfe ſtaying behind at VIENNA) where it was commonly reported, That Solyman fearing to loſe BVDA, was either in perſon himſelfe comming into HVNGARIE, or elſe ſending down the Generall of his Europeian horſemen, who might neuer ſet foot forward to war without ſixtie thouſand horſemen. Which newes ſo troubled the Germans, that they made no great haſt forward, doubting how they ſhould returne againe if they chanced not to get the victorie: Beſide that, it was thought, that the Marqueſſe neuer purpoſed to fight a battell, or endanger himſelfe or his armie for the kingdome of HVNGARIE, but only to defend the bounds of AVSTRIA, and by ſhewing the ſtrength of GERMANIE, to terrifie (if he could) the Turks, if they not contented with HVNGARIE, ſhould alſo prouoke the Germans. But after it was by certaine eſpials from SAMANDRIA, knowne that all that report of the comming of the Turks great armie was but vaine, and that there was ſcarce a thouſand Ianizaries and twiſe ſo many horſmen come to BVDA, and that the Turks fleet was both for number and ſtrength farre inferiour to the kings, they ſet forward again with more cheerfulneſſe, much encouraged by the forwardneſſe of the Hungarians, eſpecially of Perenus; aſſuring them, that if they would without delay march on, and ſpend no more time in vaine, they ſhould not find at BVDA any ſuch number of Turks as was worth the name of an armie: for that Solyman vſing but euerie ſecond yeare to make war, did that yeare take his reſt, and was not like to vndertake any great expedition. For theſe reaſons all men being readie cheerfully to ſet forward, the Marqueſſe appointed to paſſe ouer Danubius: which this Perenus, Huganot and Medices, all expert captaines, liked not of; wiſhing him rather to hold on his way directly ſtill on that ſide the riuer to BVDA, the chiefe citie of the kingdome. But it was the mind of the Generall and all his counſellors, firſt to beſiege PESTH, which might be done with leſſe labor and danger, and there hauing made proofe of the enemies ſtrength and purpoſe, to come to the ſiege of BVDA: for then would the ſouldiers with much more courage and cheerfulneſſe endure the ſiege of BVDA, if they had by good fortune firſt beaten them out of PESTH: Which counſell was both beſt liked and followed, and the army by two bridges with great and painful labour made ouer Danubius (which was in that place deuided into two parts) tranſported. At the ſame time Medices an Italian captaine, Admirall of the kings fleete, came downe the riuer; and in deſpight of the Turks tooke the Iſland of Saint Margaret, lying in the riuer a little aboue BVDA, and by force repulſed the Turkes fleet vnto the ſuburbs of the citie. The Marqueſſe to auoid the danger of the great ſhot from BVDA, after he was paſſed the riuer, ſet a great compaſſe about, and ſo came to the North ſide of PESTH: for on the South it was defended with the riuer Danubius, running betwixt it and BVDA; and on the East and Weſt the great ordinance on the one ſide from the caſtle of BVDA, and on the other from mount S. Gerrard, did ſo ſcoure all alongſt the walls, that no man could without moſt manifeſt danger there abide. For BVDA ſtanding vpon the hill, and deuided from PESTH onely with the riuer, ſo ouerlooketh and commandeth all the plaine countrey about PESTH, that without perill no man can ſtirre on any ſide of the citie, but Northward towards AGRIA, couered by the citie from the ſhot out of BVDA. As the Marqueſſe was comming thither, he was told by certaine fugitiues, that Balis Gouernour of BVDA (who in that place ſucceeded Solyman the Hungarian renegate, lately before dead of the plague) had in garriſon in BVDA two thouſand horſemen: and that Ylames the Perſian Gouernour uernour of BOSNA, was come vnto him with three thousand mo: whereunto Amurathes had also ioyned another thousand which he brought out of DALMATIA: and that Segemenes was come thither also with a thousand Ianizaries from CONSTANTINOPLE: as for the rest of the footmen, that they were but wild countrey people, fitter for labour than for seruice in warres. They told him also, that the enemies fleet consisted of sixtie smal pinnaces, ten gallies, and a few other great boates: and that Solyman had commaunded his captaines in any case to defend BVDA and PESTH to the last man, without regard of any other place. And had proposed vnto the valiant, great rewards; and to the cowardly, extreame punishment: charging them further, that if need were, they should in time send for Achomates the Generall of his Europeian horsemen to SOPHIA, to aid them. The Turks vpon the approach of the Christians, issued out at one of the gates of the citie, and skirmished with the Hungarians: but after they had sufficiently proued one anothers strength, and some few were on both sides slaine, they retired into the citie, and the Hungarians to the campe. The next day after, Vitellius going out of the campe neere the citie with fiue companies, to chuse a place for planting the batterie; the Turks at one instant sallying out at two gates of the citie, gaue him a hoat skirmish, where at the first, the fight was begun with like courage and force: but the Turkes still sending forth new supplies both of horse and foot, first the Christian footmen, and after that the horsemen, not able longer to endure the force of the Ianizaries, were constrained disorderly to retire, hauing lost in that retrait foure of their captaines and two ensignes: and had not Vitellius with one companie of horsemen serred togither, valiantly repulsed the insolent Ianizaries, the losse had beene much greater. Vitellius exceedingly grieued with this losse, and perceiuing the manner of the enemies fight, encouraged his souldiors, purposing if he could to be fully reuenged: and aboue all others, requested Perenus to be readie to ioine with him as occasion should require. Vitellius lay encamped in the kings orchards, walled about as it were a mile, equally distant both from the great camp and from the citie; out of these orchards he went with twelue companies vnder their ensignes, commanding the rest to stand still within the wals, in readinesse at all assaies: and so fetching a great compasse about, marched alongst the riuer side towards the citie: Neither did the proud enemie (brag of the former daies victorie) make any delay, but brauely sallied out at the east side of the citie, and couragiously charged them. But Vitellius warned of his former harme, and seeing his enemies come on as he desired, couered his shot with his pikes, and standing close, receiued the enemies charge: his shot still playing vnder the pikes, oftentimes vpon their knees: many of the Turks were there laid on ground, whilest they desperatly fought to haue broken the order of the Christians. In the meane time, when many of the Turks horsemen and Ianizaries comming out of the gates, and diuers others beholding the fight were come ouer the riuer from BVDA, to be partakers of the victorie, had filled the hithermost banke; Vitellius in good time, of purpose by little and little retired, as if he had been ouercharged: Then began the enemie to giue a great shout, and more fiercely to assaile the Christians: their horsemen also clapt behind them, to haue there charged them. Which thing Perenus diligently noting, and that the Turks in following of Vitellius were drawne a great way from the gates, he suddenly with his light horsemen clapt in betwixt the citie & the Turks at their backs, after whom followed also Mauritius (afterwards duke of SAXONIE) with a strong troupe of German horsemen, of purpose to haue shut them in for retiring backe again into the citie. But then the Turks perceiuing the danger, and finding themselues shut in, stood as men more than halfe dismaied, bethinking themselues which way to take, and so began to retire. When Vitellius comming on couragiously with his pikemen and his harquebusiers, deuided into two wings, charged them fiercely; and the Hungarian and German horsemen breaking in amongst them on the other side, made great slaughter of them, and strucke such a feare amongst the flying Turkes, that many of them in running to the gate, thrust one another thorow with their pikes: diuers other were also by the horsemen driuen into the riuer, and there drowned. That day Segemenes lost aboue an hundred of his Ianizaries, and foure hundred others. The chiefest commendation for this piece of seruice was giuen to Vitellius, who had so well and so quickly reuenged himselfe of the Turkes: and next him to Perenus, who as a skilfull captaine had so well awaited the time to entrap the enemie: neither is Mauritius the young Saxon prince vnworthie his due praise, who valiantly charging the Turkes, and hauing his horse slaine vnder him, was in danger to haue beene there lost himselfe, had not Nicholas Ribische one of his followers, couered him with his owne bodie, vntill such

Mauritius in danger to be slaine.

A ſuch time as that hee was reſcued by others, Ribiſche himſelfe preſently dying of his wounds. This little victorie ſo encouraged the Germanes, that the Marqueſſe commaunded the great ordinance to be preſently brought forth, and the batterie planted, which was at the firſt placed ſo farre off, that it did little harme, although the wall were both old and thin, not aboue fiue foot thicke: and the ordinance laied either a little too low, or mounted too high, either ſhot ſhort, or quite ouer the citie into BVDA: which fault once perceiued, the batterie was remooued neerer, and a faire breach ſoone made in the wall, with the continuall beating of fortie great pieces of artillerie. Vitellius was the firſt that offered to aſſault the breach, ſo that the Germanes would preſently ſecond him, which thing they all by holding vp of their hands promiſed courageouſly, but cowardly about by and by to breake that promiſe: for oftentimes it chanceth, That they which
B before the danger are readieſt to promiſe their helpe, are in the very danger it ſelfe of all others moſt ſlacke. The Hungarians alſo for their parts promiſed not to be behind. The ſilence of the enemie at the breach and in the citie, was wonderfull, ſo that many thought hee had beene fled backe ouer the riuer to BVDA: for Segemenes captaine of the Ianizaries, an old beaten ſouldior, ordered all things with as little ſtir as was poſſible: He had receiued new ſupplies from Vlamas, and had caſt a deepe countermure within the wall againſt the breach, & on the inner ſide of the ſame had made a ſtrong barricado, with gabions and wine veſſels filled with ſand and earth: behind which ſtood the Ianizaries, & next vnto them the Turkiſh archers, and laſt of all the horſemen who had left their horſes to ſerue on foot. The ſignall for the aſſault once giuen, foure Itali-
C an captaines ran deſperatly with their companies by the ruines of the wall to the breach: but whileſt they there ſet vp their enſignes, and wondering at the enemies fortification, were readie betwixt hope and feare to leape downe, they were ſuddenly ouerwhelmed with a ſhoure of arrowes and bullets. Yet Vitellius ſtill encouraging them, brought them ſtill on, who did what they might to haue entred: but the Germane footmen with their Generall ſtood ſtill vnder the wals, looking on, as men nothing moued either with the hope of victorie or danger of their friends: and the Hungarians not ſo much as once looking vpon the enemie, retired: two of the Italian captaines, Rufus and Fiolla were there ſlaine, and Carolus, Vitellius his nephew, ſhot in the ſhoulder. The Turks with ſhot and ſtones ſtill repulſed and beat downe the Italians, whereof the Germanes alſo ſtanding ſtill, felt part, and were more gauled than a man would haue thought men could haue beene, that did nothing: for there they ſtill ſtood for ſhame, leaſt if they ſhould haue
D alſo firſt retired, they ſhould haue incurred a ſecond infamie as bad as the firſt. Which thing Vitellius perceiuing, would in no caſe depart from the breach, but wiſhed rather to loſe his men by whole companies, than to leaue the leaſt colour of excuſe to the Germanes, or that they ſhould ſay they ſtayed longeſt, of whom he with greater anger than greefe complained, that he was forſaken and cowardly betrayed. In time of this aſſault one of the Turks was heard to ſpeak aloud in the Italian tongue, Why doe not you valiant Italians ſpare your ſelues, and giue place to thoſe laſie Germanes. We all wiſh to ſpare you, and to beat the drunkenneſſe out of their moſt cowardly heads, that they ſhould no more hereafter prouoke vs. At length the Germanes wearie of their hot ſtanding and nought doing, got them farther off, after whom the Italians forthwith retired: but ſo
E diſorderly, to be quickly out of the danger of the enemies ſhot, that if the Turks had at the ſame time ſallied out at all the gates, it was thought that the whole campe had beene greatly endangered. In this attempt rather than aſſault, ſeuen hundred Chriſtians were ſlain outright, and many moe hurt, who died afterwards of their wounds.

The Germanes and the Italians retire without loſſe.

All this while the Marqueſſe and Hugonot the great commaunders of the armie, kept themſelues ſo farre from gunſhot, that they were no where to be ſeene, vntill that Torniellus and Fotiſcu, two valiant captaines, finding them out, wiſhed them for ſhame to ſhew themſelues for the comforting of the armie. A little before night they conſulted with the other captaines, Whether they ſhould forſake the ſiege, or continue it ſtill: whereof moſt of the Germanes beſt liked to be gone, as the ſafeſt way: though Vitellius & ſome others ſpake earneſtly to the contrarie. At which F time a ſpie comming in, brought newes that Achomates, Solymans lieutenant of the Europeian horſemen, had paſſed ouer the riuer Sauus at BELGRADE, and was comming to Dranus: whoſe cõming either cunningly fained, or vainly beleeued, cauſed the Germanes to make a ſhort concluſion, and to reſolue flatly to returne to VIENNA, fearing that if they ſhould longer continue the ſiege, they ſhould be ſtayed againſt their wils by Achomates. Which thing made many of the old Germane ſouldiors to hang their heads for ſhame, and the Hungarians to curſe both the

Germanes and the hard fortune of their nation, vainely wiſhing for a Generall in courage anſwerable to the ſtrength of that great armie. Segemenes perceiuing how much the Chriſtian armie was diſcouraged by the laſt dayes euill ſucceſſe, early in the morning couragiouſly ſent out all the horſemen, and after them certaine companies of footmen, to relieue them in their retire; who in many places skirmiſhed with the Hungarians, being nothing inferiour vnto them either in courage or skill: and the matter was brought to that paſſe, as if it had beene ſo agreed vpon, that many of the moſt notable and expert ſouldiours on either ſide encountered together hand to hand in the ſight of the Italians and Germanes, the Hungarians mixt with the Turks, and the Turkes with the Hungarians, with ſuch fidelitie, that they regarded no other enemie but him whom euerie one had ſingled out for himſelfe, as if it had been in a triumph for exerciſe hand to hand. It happened, that a notable captaine of the Turks, deſired to ſee Vitellius, who being ſhewed vnto him (for he was eaſie to be knowne by his armour) the Turke ran vnto him to embrace him for his honour, and ſo departed. About fiue hundred horſemen ſo encountered one another hand to hand that day, of whom many were ſlaine or hurt. The night following the batterie was remoued, and the armie marched towards the riuer to the fleet. The Turks perceiuing the Chriſtians to be departed, ſallied out of the citie on all hands, & with a great crie vpbraiding them of cowardiſe, hardly purſued the rereward of the armie. Vlamas was come ouer himſelfe from Bvda, and ſo eagerly followed the armie, that it could hardly haue eſcaped without great danger, had not Vitellius with his Italians made a ſtand, and requeſted the Hungarian & German horſemen to turne backe vpon the enemie: which they at his requeſt did, and not onely repulſed the enemie, but alſo put him to flight, and in the chaſe ſlew many. After which time the armie paſſed on quietly; yet ſeuen hundred Germanes which were ſicke and ſtragled behind the armie, were by the Turks horſemen miſerably ſlaine in the ſight of their fellowes. The Germans thrice foiled by the Turks, firſt at Exek, then at Bvda, and now at Pesth, returned full of heauineſſe and greefe, as they which were now to forget the ſubduing of Hvngarie, and to become carefull of Germanie it ſelfe. The armie comming to Vienna, was there broken vp, and the Italians ſent home into their countrey, who for moſt part died by the way, of infection taken in the campe in ſtrange aire, and a moſt queaſie time of the yeare.

But to couer the ſhame of this vnfortunat expedition, and to turne mens talke another way by ſome notable accident: Petrus Perenus the noble Hungarian was the man pickt out for the purpoſe to fill mens mouthes. He, belayed with the enuie of the court, was for ſuſpition of aſpiring to the kingdome of Hvngarie, by the commaundement of king Ferdinand apprehended by Liſcanus, a Spaniſh captaine, in the caſtle of Strigonivm as a traitor, and preſently deliuered to Medices the Admirall, to be conueyed vp the riuer to Vienna. Liſcanus at the time of his apprehenſion moſt couetouſly and vncourteouſly tooke from him his chaine, and a rich cloke lined with ſables: which indignitie done to ſo noble a gentleman, ſo much offended the minds of the reſt of the Hungarians, that aboue twelue thouſand of them thereupon preſently returned home to their owne dwellings, curſing the Germanes to the diuell. This Perenus was one of the greateſt peeres of Hvngarie, but of a moſt haughtie and magnificent mind, ſo that hee would ſomtime haue almoſt an hundred goodly ſpare horſes fit for ſeruice led before him without their riders; & would ſometime ſpeak too liberally againſt the bareneſſe of king Ferdinands court, who polled by his courtiers, hardly maintained his ſtate: which his ſurpaſſing magnificence & princely port was cauſe ynough for the other great courtiers to enuie at his eſtate, & to ſeeke his ouerthrow; who as men ouercharged with the burthen of another mans vertue, whereof they neuer bore the leaſt part, and alwayes gaining by the deprauing of other mens perfection, conſpired together his ouerthrow, and oftentimes pointing at him with their fingers, would ſay, That he ſauoured of a crown. This notable man, as he had many worthie vertues, ſo was he not without cauſe noted of ambition and vnconſtancie: For after that king Lewes was loſt, he diſdaining the preferment of Iohn the Vayuod to the kingdome of Hvngarie, tooke part with king Ferdinand againſt him, in hope as it was thought to be next in honour vnto himſelfe: but after he ſaw king Iohn againe reſtored, and his ſtate ſtrongly ſupported by Solyman, and that all things ſtood doubtfull and tickle with Ferdinand, he with like leuitie ſought meanes by Abraham the great Baſſa to be reconciled to king Iohn; which was hardly obtained of him by the interceſſion of Solyman himſelfe (as is before declared) to whom he gaue his ſonne as pledge of his fidelitie. After which time he liued in great honour and loyaltie all the raigne of king Iohn: but Perenus the noble Hungarian apprehended vpon ſuſpition of treaſon.

A but after he was dead, and ſaw George the biſhop the kings tutor, doing what he liſt to raigne like a king, he diſdained his gouernment, and ſollicited by king Ferdinand, reuolted again vnto him, and furthered him in what he could for the obtaining of the kingdome. But now falling into the enuie of the court, mallice found out matter ynough to worke his confuſion. Firſt it was giuen out, That his ſonne, who had many yeares beene detained in Solymans court, as pledge of his fathers faith, was euen then vnder the colour of a faigned eſcape come into TRANSILVANIA; when as he had ſecretly agreed with Solyman, that his father being a man much fauoured of the people, ſhould by promiſing them all poſſible freedome, allure them to the Turkiſh ſubiection: in reward of which good ſeruice he ſhould be made gouernor of the kingdom of HVNGARIE, and put in hope alſo to be made the tributarie king thereof, if it ſhould fortune the yong king to
B die: Beſides that, it was accounted a thing very ſuſpitious, that he had the Winter before vſed great kindneſſe and friendſhip toward the Turkiſh captains, by ſending them great preſents, and receiuing the like againe: And laſt of all, his letters directed to certaine Hungarian captaines were produced, wherein he ſeemed to promiſe them, as his friends and followers, greater entertainment than agreed with his preſent eſtate: All which things king Ferdinand (of his owne diſpoſition, not eaſily to be perſuaded to conceiue euill of the Germanes his countreymen, were it neuer ſo apparant or true, but of ſtrangers any thing) quickly beleeued, and therfore cauſed him (as is beforeſaid) to be apprehended. But Perenus as he was brought by Medices the Admirall to VIENNA, when he was come neere vnto the gate of the citie, and heard that Phillippus Torniellus, with certaine other braue captaines of his acquaintance, were come to meet the Admirall;
C he requeſted that the cloſe coach wherein he rid might be opened. and that he might haue leaue to ſpeake to thoſe noble and valiant gentlemen. Which thing was eaſily graunted, for that the nobilitie and approoued valour of the man ſeemed vnto them which had the charge of him, vnworthie of ſuch reſtraint of libertie or impriſonment, yea or of the leaſt ſuſpition thereof. So he turning himſelfe towards them, ſpake vnto them in this ſort.

Matteri ſurmiſed againſt Perenus.

Wretched I, noble gentlemen (ſaid he) whom deſpightfull enuie hath circumuented guiltleſſe: but much more miſerable king Ferdinand, whom domeſticall theeues bereaues of ſubſtance, friends, and honour all at once. For ſo it commeth to paſſe, that by this inconſiderat wrong done vnto me, he ſhall

For will theſe malicious pick-thanks, guiltie of their owne cowardiſe, the wicked contriuers and witneſſes of my wrongfull accuſation, ſpare me, being laid faſt and in durance, which neuer ſpared the kings honour? Yet my vpright mind and cleare conſcience, which onely thing God the moſt iuſt iudge leaueth as a comfort to men in miſerie wrongfully accuſed, deliuereth me of this care: and ſo will the Marqueſſe our Generall, to whom I before vpon a miſtruſt foretold, that ſuch a danger would ſhortly befall me, and that I had rather be ſlaine guiltleſſe, than to withdraw my ſelfe from triall: which thing I told him at ſuch time as I was ſo guarded with mine owne ſtrength, that I feared no mans force. I beſeech you, doe me this honourable fauour, as to requeſt king* Ferdinand in my behalfe quick-

As for the kingdome of* HVNGARIE, I might then well haue affected the ſame, and eaſily haue deſerued it at Solymans hands,

The lamentable ſpeech of Perenus to Tormiellus and the other captaines, concerning his apprehenſion.

Perenus his requeſt of the Admirall and the reſt of the captaines.

when as King Ferdinand, after the death of King Iohn, was making his preparation for that warre: G at which time my friends and followers at my deuotion, with the loue of the Hungarians towards mee, seeming of no small importance for the obtaining of the victorie, might haue ministred no vnreasona-ble or vnseasonable hope to haue drawne a man into courses not altogether beseeming a Christian.
Wherefore I haue, and will so long as I liue, fight against the Turkes, if King Ferdinand shall shew himselfe an indifferent Iudge in this accusation, falsely surmised against mee by the malice of mine enemies.

When he had made an end of speaking, the Admirall courteously persuaded him to haue good hope in the clemencie of the most just king; and shortly after performed his request: for he and Torniellus taking the king as he was hunting, entreated him to deale fauourably with Pe- H renus. For all that, Perenus could not obtaine that his cause might be openly heard; but was committed to safe keeping, there to remaine in perpetual prison: but whether it was for the mis-Perenus, Valentinus, and Maylat, three of the greatest nobility in Hungarie kept in perpetuall prison. prision of new treason, or for reuenge of his old inconstancy, is vncertaine. Thus, three the only great princes left of the Hungarian blood, equally worthy of the kingdome, Valentine, Maylat, and Perenus, snarled almost in like snares of enuy, cut off all hope of raising a king to their seditious and therefore miserable countrey men: when as Perenus lay too late bewailing his vnconstancie in perpetuall prison; and the other two fast in chaines neere vnto the Euxine sea, expected death the end of their miseries. This end had the wars, taken in hand against the Turks by the generall consent of the Germans in the yeare 1542; which many thought, might worthily be compared with the greatest losses of those times: When as king Ferdinand, hauing in vaine I spent a great masse of treasure, the fittest stay for the imminent warre; and lost the opinion before conceiued of the strength of GERMANIE; had now as a weake prince, and subiect to iniurie, prouoked him against the Turkes, bold enough otherwise, but as then insolent for their late victories.

Polinus the French kings embassadour still following the Turkes court, ceased not by all 1543 meanes to solicite Solyman, with his gallies to aid the king his master in the inuasion of the dominions of Charles the emperour, in ITALIE, SICILIE, and SPAINE. In which sute, he was so crossed by Solyman the eunuch Bassa, then Vesier, that he was almost in despaire of speed: for the malitious eunuch, being himselfe a great sea man, and enuying the honor of Barbarussa (who was to be imploied in that seruice) sought by keeping him out of all honourable actions, to di- K minish his former glorie; and concerning the present, protested openly as he sat in counsel, that he saw no other cause why the Turkish emperour should to his great charge, and the common danger, send out such a fleet, but to serue Barbarussa his own turne. But Solyman hauing diligently heard, and deeply considered of that the Bassaes had said; rejected their opinions, who would not he should haue giuen the French king aid: & honorably decreed, according to his promise, Solyman graunteth to send his fleet by Barbarussa to aid the French King against the emperour. whatsoeuer should ensue thereof, to send his fleet vnto the king by Barbarussa. Two dayes after the French embassador before in despaire, but now reuiued with that decree, was solemnly feasted by Rustan Bassa, Solimans sonne in law, and by Solyman the eunuch Bassa: for so it was their great masters pleasure, both of them ioying of him for the friendship confirmed betwixt the two princes by sending this fleet. After which; diuers gifts were bestowed vpon the embassador and L his chiefe followers; and at such time as he was to take his leaue, Solyman gaue him great charge of his nauie, that it might be safely kept, and so after the seruice done, againe returned: and withall, deliuered him letters vnto king Francis, wherein after the glorious rehearsall of his proud titles, he writ vnto him as followeth:

Solymans letters to the French king.

Wee haue vpon a brotherly bountie, graunted vnto Polinus your embassadour, such and so great a fleete as you haue desired, throughly furnished for all assayes: whose direction we haue commaunded Hariaden our Admirall to follow, and by your appointment to proceed against the enemie. But you shall doe well and friendly, the warres once happily ended, to send backe againe my fleet to CONSTAN-TINOPLE. All things shall vndoubtedly fall out according to your owne desire and mine, if you shall M carefully take heed, that Charles the Spanish king, your perpetuall enemie, doe not againe deceiue you with the motion of a deceitfull peace. For then shall you bring him to a most indifferent peace, when you haue brought vpon his countries all the calamities of warre.

Polinus

A Polinus taking his leaue of Solyman then lying at HADRIANOPLE, returned to CONSTANTINOPLE, where he found Barbarussa with an hundred and ten gallies, and fortie galliots readie to put to sea, which he had with incredible celeritie rigged vp and furnished. And so setting forward the eight and twentieth of Aprill, in the yeare 1543; and passing the straits of HELESPONTVS, he arriued first at CARISTIVS in EVBŒA; and from thence to MALEA, where he was by contrary winds cast into the bay of LACEDEMON, and there staied nine daies before he could double the cape of METAPANIVM, called in ancient time TENARVS: After that he came to METHON, and from thence crossing the Ionian, came to the strait of MESSANA; where the Turkish pirats being come with their galliots within the sight of RHEGIVM, began to land their men. They of RHEGIVM seeing so great a fleet, and the Turkes already landing, fled out
B of the city for feare: but the castle was still kept by Didacus Gaietanus a Spaniard, who refused to haue any parley with Polinus the French embassadour, and with shot out of the castle slew certaine of the Turks: wherwith the rest being inraged, brake into the citie, and finding it desolate, set it on fire; fore against the will of Polinus and Barbarussa, who sought to haue found out the authors thereof, and to haue punished them accordingly.

After that, certaine pieces of great ordinance were landed & planted against the castle, which with a few shot so terrified the captaine, already troubled with the crying out of his wife, that he without any more adoe, yeelded himselfe and the castle with all therin, into the the hands of the enemie: vnto whom with his wife and children, Barbarussa at the request of the French embassadour, granted both life and libertie: the rest he shut vp in a church, and gaue the spoile of the
C castle to his souldiors. There was in the garrison of the castle about seuentie Spaniards, but many mo citisens, which were all caried away prisoners. One of the captaines daughters, a yong gentlewoman of exceeding beautie, had with her good grace so warmed the withered affection of the old pirat Barbarussa, that he now fitter for the graue than for mariage, became amorous of her person: so that taking her from her father, and entring her into the Mahometane superstition, he made of her as of his wife: Insomuch, that certaine moneths after, he welcomed and bountifully entertained the captain as his father in law, comming to see his daughter at the port called PORTVS HERCVLIS in TVSCANIE, where the Turks fleet then lay. Barbarussa sayling alongst the coast of ITALIE, came to OSTIA, in the mouth of the riuer Tibur, and brought such a feare vpon the citie of ROME, that the citizens were ready generally to haue forsaken the D citie; had not Polinus by his letters to Rodolphus the cardinall, then the great bishop Paulus his legat in the citie, in part staied the sudden tumult. The bishop himselfe was then at BVXETVM, a tovvne betvvixt CREMONA and PLACENTIA, trauailing (in shew) vvith the emperour, to haue made a peace betvvixt him and the French king: but labouring in secret to haue bought of him the dukedome of MILLAN, for Octauius his kinsman, the emperours sonne in law. Polinus his letters written to the cardinall at ROME, and sent by the Gouernour of TARRACINA, were to this effect.

Barbarussa amorous of the captain of Rhegium his daughter.

The fleet which is by Solyman sent for the defence of FRANCE by Barbarussa his Admirall, is by his appoyntment at my commaund: so that it is not to hurt any but our enemies. Wherefore make it
E known to the Romans, and others dwelling alongst the coast of the Popes territorie, that they feare of vs no hostilitie. For the Turks will neuer violat the faith of their emperour solemnly giuen vnto me: and you know most assuredly, that the French king desireth nothing more, then that the estate of ROME might not onely bee kept in safetie, but also flouriſh most gloriously, and be therefore preserued from all iniurie. Fare you well.

The French embassadors letters to comfort Rodolph the cardinal, the Popes legat in Rome.

In like manner he also comforted vp them of NEPTVNIANVM and OSTIA, so that they brought vnto the Turkes all manner of victuall; and sometimes for foure sheepe, or a couple of oxen, redeemed a good prisoner taken in some place of the kingdome of NAPLES. Yet for all this, the Romans did not so much credit the embassadours promise in the behalfe of the Turks
F good dealing, but that many of the weaker sort fled out of the citie into the countrey by night, although the chiefe magistrates did vvhat they might to haue stayed them. When Barbarussa had thus lien three daies in the mouth of the riuer of Tibur, and there watered, he passed alongst the coast of ETRVRIA, and LIGVRIA, without doing any harme; and so sailed directly to MARSEILLES. Where leauing him vvith his fleet for a while, expecting the French kings

And because he would make all sure before him, hee sent Amurathes Gouernour of DALMATIA, and Vlamas the Persian gouernour of BOSNA, to besiege WALPO; a strong towne scituat vpon the riuer Dranus, not far from EXEK, famous for the ouerthrow of the Christian armie vnder Cazzianer: after whom followed also Achomates the great commander of his Europeian horsemen. This towne (part of Perenus his possessions) was against all these forces kept and worthily defended by Perenus his wife (her husband then lying in prison at VIENNA) & her friends, by the space of three months: but was at last by the treacherous souldiors deliuered to the enemie, togither with their general; whom when they could by no means H persuade to consent to the yeelding vp thereof, but that he would needs hold it out to the last, they tooke him perforce, and so deliuered him with the towne to the Turkes: who receiued
The castle of Walpo treacherously yeelded, and the traitors iustly rewarded him with all courtesie, and vsed him honourably: but those traiterous souldiors, whether it were in detestation of their treacherie, or for the spoile of them, were all put to the sword; the iust reward of their treason. The rest of the citisens were taken by the Turkes to mercie, and well vsed. The bishop and chiefe men of QVINQVE ECCLESIF, a famous citie not far off on the other side of Dranus, hearing of the losse of WALPO, and terrified with the greatnesse of the Turkes armie, fled for feare, leauing none but the meaner sort of the people in the citie, who willingly yeelded the same vnto the Turks. The next town of any strength was SOCLOSIA, belonging also to Perenus, which for a while held out against the Turkes, for that diuers gentlemen of the countrie which were fled into the citie, encouraged the citisens to stand vpon their defence. But after I much harme done on both sides, when they were no longer able to hold out, they retired into the castle in hope to haue so saued their liues and libertie by yeelding: but Amurathes was so offended with them, that he would come to no reasonable composition, or promise them any thing more than that they should at their pleasure come forth: and so as they came out at the gate, slew them euery mothers sonne, thereby to terrifie others from making like resistance.

Solyman commeth with his armie to Strigonium. Solyman vnderstanding all these things, gaue those townes which were taken to Amurathes the Generall: and hauing put all things in readinesse, departed fron BVDA with all his armie to besiege STRIGONIVM; which was then kept by Liscanus and Salamanca, two proud couetous Spaniards, with a garrison of thirteene hundred souldiours, whereof some few were Spaniards, K and Italians, and the rest Germans. Paulus bishop of STRIGONIVM, got himselfe out of the citie betimes, despairing of all mercie if he should haue fallen into the power of Solyman, by whose intermission he had been once before reconciled to king Iohn, and had againe reuolted from him to king Ferdinand. The castle of STRIGONIVM was scituat vpon a high hill, ouerlooking Danubius running vnderneath it, the wals were built euen without any flankers, after the old maner of building before the inuention of guns: For which cause, Vitellius and Torniellus, two expert captaines (the yeare before sent from the king to view the place, and the maner of the fortification) were of opinion, that the citie could hardly be defended, if it were besieged by any strong enemie: being subiect also vnto a hill not farre from the gates of the citie. Against L which inconueniences, the old garrison soudiors which wintered in STRIGONIVM, cast vp new bulwarks and fortifications, and after the manner of windie headed men, making great boast before the danger, what they would do, seemed to wish for the comming of Solyman. But after that the barbarous enemie had with his tents couered the fields and mountains round about the citie, and withal brought a gallant fleet vp the riuer, all those brags were laid in the dust, & euery man began to grow doubtful of his owne safetie: for that they being but few (although men of good worth) were to withstand the infinit number of such enemies, as oftentimes vsed most desperatly to expose their liues to all maner of dangers. This there feare was also increased by the comming of certain messengers from Solyman, who vnderstanding of what nations the garrison consisted, sent vnto the citie three of his owne guard, one a Spaniard, another an Italian, and the third a German, all renegate Christians; that euerie one of them might without an interpretor, speake M vnto their countriemen in their owne language: These men admitted into the citie, offered great rewards and large entertainement in the name of Solyman, to such as would in time yeeld; denouncing all torture and extremities vnto them which should endure the summons of the cannon. Whereunto it was answered by the captaines, That those faithfull and valiant souldi-

With which anſwere the meſſenger returned, and the ſame day the Turkes great ordinance was planted vpon the hill before the gate of the citie, and the weakeſt parts of the walls round about the citie, ſo well pickt out by the Turks to be aſſaulted, as that they could not more skilfully or commodiouſly haue bene choſen out of them which had within moſt diligently viewed euery thing: ſo that it is to be thought, that the Chriſtians wanted not only fortune againſt the Turks, but alſo faith amongſt themſelues. Salamanca diſtruſting the fortifications of the ſuburbs, retired into the citie, contrary to that he had before vainly boaſted. Achomates Generall of the Europeian horſemen, laid ſiege to that part of the wall which was next to the biſhops gardens: Vlamas the Perſian beſieged the towre neere vnto the gate towards B v-
B DA: The Aſapi or common ſouldiors were by their captaines brought on to dig trenches and caſt vp mounts, as was thought moſt conuenient. It is incredible to be ſpoken with what furie the great ordinance was diſcharged, without ceaſing; inſomuch, that the towre with a great part of the wall neere vnto it, ſhaken with continuall batterie, fell downe with ſuch violence, as if all had bin ſhaken with a moſt terrible earthquake: neither was any man able to ſtand vpon the wals, but that the Ianizaries with their harquebuſiers out of their trenches, and from their mounts, would moſt certainely fetch him off: and many which ſtood within farther off, were The terrible battery of the Turks at Stigonium.
with the Turkes arrowes falling from high, as if it had beene out of the ayre, grieuouſly wounded. But that which moſt troubled the defendants, and did them greateſt harme, was the ſtones,
C which beaten in ſunder with the great ſhot, and not to be auoided, did with their pieces kill or maime the ſouldiers neere hand: With which dangers they were enforced to forſake the vttermoſt wall, and to caſt vp new fortifications within, that they might with leſſe danger defend the place. Neither in the enemy wanted courage to aſſaile the breach: thriſe they deſperatly attempted to haue entred, and were alwaies with loſſe repulſed. In which aſſaults amongſt others, Bultaces Sanzacke of SELYMBRIA, a man of great account among the Turkes, was loſt. Whileſt The Turks repulſed thriſe at the aſſault of the breach.
the defendants were thus buſied, many of the ſouldiors and mariners which came vp the riuer, with all things neceſſary for the armie from BVDA, went on ſhoare, and lay in the ſuburbs of the citie, in ſuch ſecuritie, as if there had been no enemie nigh: which thing they in the citie perceiuing, ſuddenly ſallied out vpon them fearing no ſuch matter, and ſlew many of them before they could arme themſelues, and draue the reſt to their fleet: ſo that betwixt fighting and flying,
D there was about two hundred of them ſlaine. Zymar a Perſian, Admirall of the fleet, in reſcuing of them which to ſaue their liues fled vnto the riuer, was ſhot thorow with a ſmall ſhot, and ſlaine. Whileſt theſe things were in doing, and the Turkes hauing in many places ſore ſhaken the wall, did with greater force daily aſſaile the citie, and the defendants with their continuall loſſe and out of all hope of reliefe were more and more diſcouraged: an old Calabrian enginer A fugitiue Chriſtiã diſcouereth the ſtrength and ſtate of the citie to the Turks.
which had long time ſerued king Ferdinand, fled out of the citie to the Turkes, vvho being courteouſly entertained by Solyman, and examined by the Baſſaes of many things concerning the ſtrength and ſtate of the citie, ſatiſfied them in all that they deſired; and farther, directed them in planting their batteries in places moſt conuenient for the ſpeedy taking of the towne. In the meane time, whileſt the Turkes were with reſtleſſe labour battering the walls, and working in E their mines, it fortuned that a gilt brazen Croſſe which ſtood vpon the top of the ſteeple of the Cathedrall Church, was by the continuall ſhooting of the Turkes thereat, at length beaten downe: at the ſight whereof, it is reported that Solyman after the ſuperſtitious manner of that nation, taking the chance as a token of good lucke, cried out preſently, STRIGONIVM is woon.

Liſcanus and Salamanca fearfully conſulting of the euent of the ſiege, and ſecretly conferring together, reſolued to ſaue themſelues, and to giue vp the towne. Liſcanus was no great ſouldior, and yet by continuall ſpoile growne exceeding rich, and therfore thought it but folly to buy the name of reſolute captaine at too deare a price, with the loſſe of his life and wealth. The like
F feeling was alſo in Salamanca, who preferred the ſafetie of himſelf and of that which he had got in long ſeruice, before all credit and honour, were it neuer ſo great. This their purpoſe was not kept ſo ſecret, but that it was noiſed abroad amongſt the common ſouldiors, of whom almoſt the third part was novv either ſlaine, or with wounds or ſickneſſe grown weake: yet were they all of opinion generally, That they were ſtill ſtrong ynough to defend the town. expecting nothing but ſome cruell execution to bee done vpon them by the barbarous enemie.
Which their feare was the more encreaſed by a ſtrange accident, then vnluckily chancing: For happened rather by chance than malice, commanded his Ianizaries to ſtay their fury. This tu- K bountifull entertainment: yet of all the Chriſtian ſouldiors were found onely ſeuentie, which carefull of their liues, accepted the offer; fearing that the Turks would vpon ſuch as refuſed, ex-

Not long after, Solyman leauing Oſſainus a valiant captaine gouernour of STRIGONIVM, and ſending his Tartarian horſemen to ſpoyle the countrey on the left hand, as farre as ALBA REGALIS; went himſelfe to beſiege the caſtle of TATTA, called in ancient time THEODOTA. The garriſon ſouldiours terrified with the loſſe of STRIGONIVM, and the ſight of the Turks armie, vpon the firſt ſummons yeelded the caſtle without reſiſtance, and were ſo ſuffered quietly to depart. That caſtle after the maner of the Turkiſh diſcipline (who with few and thoſe very ſtrong holds keepe their prouinces in ſubiection) was by Solymans commandement preſently raſed downe to the ground. Torniellus Generall of the Ita-

TATTA thus laid in the duſt, Solyman marched with his armie towards ALBA, ſurnamed REGALIS, for that the kings of HVNGARIE by an ancient cuſtome vſed to be there crowned, and alſo buried. In the citie lay in garriſon two companies of Germans, and two hundred horſmen, vnto whom were ioyned fiue hundred Hungarian horſemen, ſuch as in time of peace liued by robbing, and are by an infamous name called Vſarous: vnto theſe, the Italian countie Torniellus, who with his Italians was come as farre as IAVARINVM, or RAB, ſent foure captains with their companies, ſuch as were moſt forward in that ſeruice: after whom followed Barcocius, captaine of the kings guard, with a companie of horſemen, appointed by the king for Generall. This queſtion was ſeriouſly debated, and great reaſons alledged on both ſides: at laſt the citiſens cried out with one voice againſt the matter, and ſaid, That they would neuer ſuffer thoſe goodly ſuburbs, wherein were ſo many churches and faire buildings as might compare with the city it ſelfe, to be ſo ſhamefully deſtroied, to the vtter vndoing of ſo many rich citiſens: for what could be (ſaid they) more diſhonourable or lamentable, than to the encouraging of the barbarous enemy, to ſhew ſuch a token of extreame feare; and with their owne hands to burne and deſtroy thoſe ſtately buildings, which might by

Verily you ſhall doe nothing, either in the ſeruice of the king or the honour of your ſelues, except this citie (if God ſo pleaſe) be of you whole and ſound valiantly defended. Vpon this ſpeech they all ariſe, the wiſer ſort and of greateſt experience giuing place to the importunitie of the ignorant and ſimple. Barcotius himſelfe full of care, and ouercome with the vaine opinion of the greater part, yeelded alſo vnto that fatall reſolution of ſauing the ſuburbes. For it often falleth out, that they who wiſely weighing dangers in the ballance of reaſon, and doe therefore fearefully reſolue of the euent of things, and doe thereupon oftentimes giue more hard and reſolute iudgement of things than men of greater courage; yeeld neuertheleſſe to bee H partakers of other mens follies, yea euen to moſt aſſured death, rather than by maintaining their fearefull opinion to be deemed cowards: So fell it out with Barcotius the Generall, who ſetting a good countenance on the matter which nothing liked him,went out to the ſouldiours,declaring vnto them the reaſons why the ſuburbs were to be defended:exhorting them with like valor on their parts to anſwere that honourable reſolution,promiſing to prouide whatſoeuer ſhould be neceſſarie for the obtaining of the victorie; aſſuring them of great rewards and preferment, which ſhould by their good ſeruice deſerue the ſame. Hereupon the ſuburbes were by the common labour of the ſouldiors & the citiſens quickly fortified, the great ordinance in places conuenient orderly planted,and watch and ward kept by the captaines and their companies by their turnes day and night. But the Turks drawing neere to the citie, bent their forces onely againſt the ſub- I urbes of the gate leading towards BVDA: for that they perceiued the marriſh was in that place drier than in the other,and the ſandie grownd more vnfit for the making of bulwarkes and other fortifications for the ſafetie of the defendants,than in the other places where the ground yeelded better turfe. Barcotius perceiuing the enemies purpoſe,drew all the Italians and Germanes from the other gates into the ſuburbes of the gate of BVDA, leauing the countrey people which were fled into the citie,and the citiſens,in their places.At the firſt comming of the Turkes, the Hungarian and Germane horſemen,with the Italian footmen,ſallied out of the ſuburbes,and after certaine light skirmiſhes retired. Which manner of fight was continued by the ſpace of three daies without any great harme done on either ſide: for the captaines had warily commaunded, That the ſouldiors ſhould not aduenture out too farre. But after that Solyman himſelfe was come,and K had with the multitude of his tents beſet the citie farre and neere,to the terrour of the beholders; the Chriſtians ſhut vp all the gates,and ſallied out no more. Which thing cauſed the wild Hungarian Vſarous,vſed to open skirmiſhes,to prouide for themſelues in time,and not to ſuffer themſelues to be coupt vp (as they termed) within the wals of the citie: So for faſhion ſake, asking leaue to be gone(who were not againſt their wils to be ſtayed)they by night departed,being not to bee entreated by the Generall or citiſens to ſtay, and by knowne wayes eſcaped thorow the woods from the enemie. In the meane time the Turkes were come with their winding trenches within ſhot,and with their arrowes and ſmall ſhot ſo ſcoured the top of the bulwarke, that no man could there poſſibly appeare but he was ſtraight wounded: and ſuch was the furie of the great artillerie, that it had in ſhort time battered in ſunder the plankes and timber which kept in L
the ſandie mould,whereof the fortreſſe was made,more for ſhew than for ſtrength; in ſuch ſort, that the great ſhot flying quite thorow all,ſlue and wounded many that were a far off: in which diſtreſſe of the defendants, the Turkes Aſapi with ſmall danger filled vp the ditches of the bulwarke, and diuers places of the marriſh with earth and wood, which they brought continually from a wood thereby with ſix hundred waggons, ſo that in the ſpace of twelue dayes they had made a firme way for them to paſſe ouer vpon,both to the bulwarke and the ſuburbes; a worke before thought impoſſible to haue been performed. The ditches thus filled vp, the Turkes valiantly came on,ſeeking by plaine force to enter the bulwarke. Firſt came on the Aſapi, whom as men of leaſt worth the Turks captaines vſe to thruſt to the firſt danger: After whom followed the horſemen,now on foot,with ſwords and targuets,or elſe their horſmens ſtaues,couering the M Ianizaries,who vpon their knees with their harquebuſiers ſore gauled the defendants. This hot fight endured aboue three houres with equall hope and courage: but the Turkes ſtill relieued with freſh ſouldiors, repulſed the Chriſtians,and gained the vttermoſt bulwarke: neuertheleſſe, the Italian fort was that day valiantly defended,the very women and religious helping to defend it:

The Turks with incredible labour fill vp the ditches & take, and by plaine force aſſault the bulwarke of the ſuburbs towards Buda.

A it: in which assault a tall Hungarian woman, whose courage farre exceeded the weakenesse of her sex, thrusting in amongst the souldiours vpon the top of the fort, with a great sythe in her hand, at one blow stroke off two of the Turks heads, as they were climing vp the rampier. This assault was giuen the nine and twentieth of August, on which day the Turkes had before taken BELGRADE, and also slaine king Lewes at the battell of MOHACHZ; and were therefore after their superstitious manner in obseruation of their fortunat and vnfortunat dayes, in good hope to haue then taken the citie: wherein they were much deceiued, being not able at that time further to enter, but enforced againe to retire. Wherewith Solyman offended, sent for Abraham, Achomates, and Halis (the cheefe captaines in that assault) into his tent, and reproued them sharpely, for that the bulwarke being so valiantly and fortunatly woon, they had not with more
B courage prosecuted the victorie, but cowardly (as he thought) giuen it ouer, being in a manner alreadie woon: and therefore with sterne countenance commaunded them to prepare all things readie within three dayes for a fresh assault, and neuer to returne vnto him, except they did win the citie. Whereunto the captaines answered no more (for were they neuer so guiltlesse, they might not before him stand to excuse themselues) but that they would in short time accomplish his desire. Wherefore hauing made all readie, and encouraged the souldiors to this last assault, they terribly assailed the rampiers, and brought a great feare vpon the defendants: for taking the benefit of a thick mist (as it oftentimes chanceth in marrish grounds) they were with great silence (contrarie to their manner) got vp to the top of the rampiers, and come to handy blows, before they were well discouered. The fight was for the time fierce and terrible: but the Ianizaries pre-
C uailing, at length put the Germanes to flight, and after them the Italians also, so that now well was he that could run fastest towards the citie. But that their hastie flight little auailed, when as they were to passe out by a little narrow gate in manner of a wicket: and they in the citie, without regard of them that fled, had plucked vp the draw bridge ouer the ditch. For naturally it commeth oftentimes to passe, that the feare of the present danger, without blushing excuseth our foule dealing. So the barbarous and fierce enemie pursuing the flying Christians at the heeles all the length of those suburbes with most cruell execution, many notable men, some fighting, some flying, were there slaine: amongst whom was Octauianus Serosactus, author of the euill counsell whereof ensued that calamitie. Barcotius the Generall flying on horseback to the little gate, which was not to be passed thorow, and crying in vaine to them that fled, to haue the great
D gate opened, was by the comming of the Ianizaries slain: whose head and right hand full of rich rings, was by the barbarous enemie carried about in derision vpon a launce. The rest of the flying multitude finding the little gate shut vp with the bodies of the dead, and the bridge maliciously drawne vp, desperatly threw threw themselues into the deepe ditch; where some of them labouring to swim out, were caught by the legs and armes by other that could not swim, and both together drowned. Some hardly crauling ouer, were shot in the head or backe with the Turkes arrowes: othersome sticking fast in the mud, were as if it had beene in sport shot to death by the Turkes: some few there was which got ouer, and were saued.

The miserable slaughter of the flying christians

There was yet left in the citie the Generall of the German horsemen, and Vscasades of CREMONA, an Italian captaine; these two gathering the remainder of the souldiors which were left,
E placed them vpon the wals: but the citizens were strucke with such a feare, that they could not tell which way to turne themselues. For now Birrous the maior, with the aldermen and other chiefe citizens, seeing the slaughter of the Italians & Germans, were so ouercome with despaire, that they thought no hope of their well doing was to be reposed in making of any farther resistance, but onely in the mercie of Solyman. Wherefore Birrous spake vnto the Turks from the wall, That he might safely send embassadours to Solyman, to intreat with him vpon reasonable conditions, for the yeelding vp of the citie: which thing Achomates easily granted. With these embassadours for the citizens, went also the generals of the German horsemen, and Carolus Rufus an Italian captaine (who of all others had borne himselfe most valiantly in all the assaults, to the great admiration of the Turks) to intreat for the safetie and libertie of the souldiors. The em-
F bassadours being brought before the great Bassaes, requested, That yeelding the citie, the citizens might enioy their liues and libertie: whereunto they were so answered, as that it seemed they should not all be pardoned, yet was the generall feare well diminished, for that the punishment respected but some few. Rufus was courteously entertained; and easily obtained, that the Italians might in safetie depart with bag and baggage to VIENNA: the like grace also obtained the Gene-

Embassadours sent to Solyman, to entreat vpon conditions for the yeelding of the citie.

Generall of the Germans for his ſoldiors. Solyman the eunuch Baſſa, offered vnto Rufus honourable entertainment, if he would haue ſerued Solyman: which when he refuſed as bound to king Ferdinand by oath, in honour of his valour he gaue him a rich cloake wrought with flowers of gold. The embaſſadours returning into the citie, and telling how they had ſped, deliuered the citiſens of a great feare. Shortly after the citie being yeelded, Achomates by open proclamation in the market place, commaunded the Italians and Germans to make themſelues readie againſt the next day to depart, and to take good heed that no Hungarian went with them: hee alſo ſtraightly charged the citiſens to keepe their houſes, vntill the ſtrange ſouldiors were departed. At the time appointed, the Italians and Germans ſet forward, conducted by Homares with a companie of the Turks horſemen, who faithfully defended them againſt the Tartares, running vp and downe the countrey after ſpoile: neither was any thing taken from them but their dags, which the German horſemen after a new faſhion carried at their ſaddle bowes; theſe the Turks greatly deſired, delighted with the noueltie of the inuention, to ſee them ſhot off with a firelocke without a match. But after the departure of Homares, they were in their trauell ſet vpon by the Hungarians, with whom they had many hoat skirmiſhes, and had hardly eſcaped vnſpoiled, had they not beene reſcued by the kings ſouldiors lying in garriſon in the caſtles as they paſſed alongſt the countrey. The few which remained, after many troubles came at laſt to VIENNA, more like ghoaſts than men. G H

Solyman entreth into Alba Regalis.

Solyman entring quietly into the citie, firſt viſited the ſepulchers of the Hungarian kings, and gaue out proclamation, That the Hungarians ſhould feare of him no harme; for that he was not come to conquer them, but to deliuer them from the bondage of the Germans, and ſo to reſtore againe that entire kingdome vnto Stephen the right heire of king Iohn. But within three or foure daies after, he called out the chiefe citiſens into a field not farre off, wherein the bodies of condemned men were woont to be buried, as if he would haue there taken an oath of them for their fidelitie: whither, after they were all aſſembled in the beſt manner they could, as to ſome ſolemn feaſt, the cruell tyrant (without regard of his faith or promiſe) cauſed them all to be ſlain. Howbeit ſome report, that he cauſed them onely to be put to death which bare office in the citie, at ſuch time as they reuolted from the obedience of the queen and the infant king, vnto Ferdinand, and had then brought in German ſouldiors; and that he ſent the reſt into exile to BVDA and BELGRADE. So Solyman leauing Balibeius gouernour of ALBA REGALIS; and Mahometes ſometime gouernour of BELGRADE, his lieutenant generall for the whole gouernment of that kingdome, returned againe toward CONSTANTINOPLE, Winter now beginning to approach: after he had that Sommer woon STIGONIVM and ALBA REGALIS, two of the chiefeſt cities of HVNGARIE. All this while king Ferdinand had raiſed no power worth the ſpeaking of, to withſtand ſo mightie an enemie; onely at VIENNA lay ſeauen thouſand Germans and foure thouſand Italians, at ſuch time as Solyman departed from ALBA REGALIS, which were ſhortly after diſcharged. I K

Solyman cauſeth the chiefe citiſens of Alba galis to be ſlain.

Solyman returneth to Conſtantinople.

Whiles Solyman thus lay at the ſiege of ALBA REGALIS, he ſent his Tartarian horſemen which ſerued him to ſmall purpoſe in the ſiege, to ſpoile the countrey round about: theſe ſauage people doing much harme, were in diuers places circumuented by the Hungarians, and about three thouſand of them ſlaine: one of them being taken priſoner, had found in his knapſacke halfe a child, of about two yeares old, the loathſome remainder of his barbarous feeding. L

Barbaruſſa all this while lying with his fleet (as we haue before ſaid) at MARSEILLES, fretted exceedingly, that he had to his diſhonour vndertaken ſo long a voyage by ſea, to pleaſure him which was not able (as he ſaid) to direct his owne deſignes to any certaine reſolution, but ſhamefully ſuffered the beſt time of the yeare for ſeruice, negligently to paſſe away without any thing doing; the blame whereof would (as he ſaid) be imputed to him at CONSTANTINOPLE: and that Solyman, who deſired to aid the king his friend and confederat, and by all meanes to annoy his enemies, would take in euill part to haue it reported, that he had with ſo great charge ſet out ſo great a fleet, and ſo far off, to help his friend hardly beſet with his enemies, and to haue done nothing: beſides that, he tooke on like a Turke, that he who in time of ſeruice, neuer vſed negligently to let ſlip the leaſt opportunitie, ſhould now blemiſh his former credit and eſtimation, by lying ſtill all that Sommer in the harbour of MARSEILLES, where his ſouldiors grew lazie with doing nothing. Wherefore Polinus going to the king, told him of the proud Turkes great diſcontentment for lacke of imployment: and returning to Barbaruſſa, brought order from M

A the king, that he ſhould lay ſiege to NICE a citie of PROVINCE, then holden by the Duke of SAVOY. This citie ſtanding vpon the ſea, was by one of the French kings for a great ſum of money pawned vnto the Duke: which mony king Francis had many times offered to haue repaied, but could neuer get the citie out of the dukes hands. Vnto which ſeruice, the French king ſent alſo his fleet of two and twentie gallies and eighteene ſhips, wherein were embarked eight thouſand footmen, and victuall for many daies. This fleet departing from MARSEILLIS, keeping cloſe by the ſhoare, came to the port called MONOC; whether two daies after came Barbaruſſa alſo with an hundred and fiftie gallies. From thence Polinus by commaundement from the king, writ vnto the State of GENVA, That they ſhould not feare of that great fleet any hoſtilitie, which was not to hurt any but them of NICE, and not them neither if they would yeeld themſelues.

B For more aſſurance whereof, he obtained of the Turkes diuers GENVA captiues, which had long time been chained in their gallies, and courteouſly ſet them at libertie, & ſent them home without ranſome. After that, he friendly exhorted the citiſens of NICE, to yeeld themſelues againe vnto their ancient and lawfull prince, renowned for his bountie and power; rather than to aduenture their ſtate to all extremities for that poore and diſtreſſed duke, who betweene the emperor and the French king, diſpoiled of the greateſt part of his dominions, ſaw no other end of his miſeries, but to leaue that little which yet remained, as a prey to the one or the other that ſhould firſt lay hand thereon. Whereunto the magiſtrats of the towne anſwered, That they knew no other prince or ſoueraigne, but Charles their duke: wherefore hee ſhould deſiſt farther to ſolicite them by letters or meſſengers, whom they would make no other account of but as of their

C enemies. Wherefore the Frenchmen and Turkes landing their forces, laid ſiege to the towne in three places. The citizens had but a little before newly fortified their wals, by the direction of Paulus Simeon, captaine of the caſtle, and one of the kinghts of the RHODES, a man of great experience; who long before taken at ſea by pyrats, had ſometime ſerued Barbaruſſa, and therefore perſuaded the citizens at reſolute men to withſtand the Turkes. Which, that they ſhould more conſtantly performe, he tooke their wiues and children, and weaker ſort of the people into the caſtle; and from thence furniſhed the citizens with all things neceſſary for their defence. The citie was at once in diuers places battered by the Turks and French, both by ſea and land: ſo that at laſt the Turks had beaten downe one of the new built bulwarks, and made ſo faire a breach, that with their enſigns diſplaied, they attempted to haue entred: whoſe forwardnes Leo Strozza

D (then ſeruing the French king with a band of Italians) imitating, ſought to haue entred alſo: but the citizens ſtanding valiantly vpon their defence, manfully repulſed both the Turks and Italians, and cauſed them with loſſe to retire. In this aſſault were ſlaine about an hundred Turkes; and of Strozza his ſoldiors two and twentie. Preſently after, Barbaruſſa with all his force began a freſh batterie, in ſuch terrible maner, that the citizens ſeeing their wals in diuers places opened, and the few ſouldiors they had, ſore wounded, and no hope to be in conuenient time relieued; began to parley with the French General from the wall, concerning the yeelding vp of the citie; vpon condition, that they might in all reſpects liue vnder the French king as they had done vnder the duke: for performance whereof, the Generall gaue them his faith. But Polinus fearing

E leaſt the Turks ſhould violate this compoſition, and for griefe of the loſſe of their fellowes, or for hope of the ſpoile brake into the citie, entreated Barbaruſſa to recall his ſouldiours, and to cauſe them to go abourd his gallies. For which cauſe not long after, the Ianizaries, as men deceiued of their hoped prey, were about to haue ſlain both Polinus and Strozza, as they came from talking with Barbaruſſa.

Nice in Prouince beſieged by the French and the Turkes.

The citizens craue parley, and after yeeld the citie.

The citie thus yeelded, they began to conſult for the taking of the caſtle: the performance whereof conſiſted firſt in the aſſailing of the caſtle it ſelfe, and then in defending of the citie from the ſudden ſallies of them in the caſtle; and likewiſe in defending of them which beſieged the caſtle, ſo that no enemie ſhould come to raiſe the ſiege: of which two things, Barbaruſſa put the Frenchi to choice which they would take, ſhewing himſelfe readie either to beſiege the caſtle, or

F to keepe the field. The French ſtanding in doubt of which to make choice, the prould old Turk ſcorning their ſlow reſolution, and them alſo, as men vnfit for the ready accompliſhment of any martiall exploit; cauſed ſeuen pieces of batterie, wherof two were of wonderful greatneſſe, to be placed in a trice in a place moſt conuenient, and the ſame quickly entrenched and fortified, to the great admiration of the French: with which pieces he had quickly beaten down the battlements of the wals, and centenel houſes, ſo that no man was able to ſhew himſelf vpon the wals.

The caſtle beſieged.

The

The Frenchmen likewiſe on the other ſide did with their great ordinance continually batter the G caſtle: but with long ſhooting they came to ſuch want of ſhot and pouder, that Polinus was glad to requeſt, that he might either borrow or buy ſome of Barbaruſſa: whereat the Turke fretted and fumed exceedingly, That they ſhould in their owne country ſtand in need of his prouiſion, who at MARSEILLES had better fraughted their ſhips with wine, than with neceſſaries for the warres. For the rough and ſeuere old Turke could not forbeare to taunt them, and oftentimes complained, that he was deluded with the hope of great matters which Polinus had promiſed at CONSTANTINOPLE; and that in ſuch a rage, that he would threaten to lay hands vpon Polinus, who had brought him from CONSTANTINOPLE thither, whereas he muſt either loſe his Barbaruſſa in his rage threatneth to lay hands on Polinus, and to returne forthwith to Conſtantinople. honour, or hauing ſpent his ſhot and pouder, expoſe himſelfe and his fleet to all dangers. Wherefore being exceeding angry with the French, he ſuddenly called a Counſell of his captaines, H and other chiefe officers, giuing it out, That he would preſently returne toward CONSTANTI-NOPLE, ſeeing that among theſe cowardly and vnskilful men (as it pleaſed him to terme them) he found nothing ready or according to promiſe. Yet for all that, when he had chafed his fill, by the faire entreatance and large promiſes of the French Generall and Polinus together, the wayward old man was perſuaded to change his mind, and to continue the ſiege. But hee was yet ſcarcely well pacified, and his mind ſet againe vpon the ſiege, but letters were intercepted from the great captaine Alphonſus Vaſtius, to Paulus captaine of the caſtle, wherein he requeſted him to hold out a while againſt the enemy, vntill that he, who had already ſent before his light horſmen, might come alſo himſelfe with his men at armes, who were vpon the way alongſt the Alps by the ſea ſide, and would in two dayes with the ſlaughter of the Turkes put him and his caſtle I out of all feare and daunger. Which thing once bruted in the campe, ſuch a great and ſudden feare came vpon the Turks and Frenchmen, the night following (the more to terrifie them) prouing by chance very rainie and tempeſtuous; that they all forſooke their trenches and great ordinance, and laying downe their weapons, by narrow pathes climing ouer the top of the high mountaine, came down headlong to the ſea ſide to the fleet. But the day appearing, and no ene-mie to be ſeene, they were aſhamed of that they had done, and came againe to the ſiege. Not The Turkes and French giue ouer the caſtle of Nice, and ſet fire on the citie. long after, when as the caſtle in all mens iudgment was hardly to be battered, and ſtanding vp-on a firme rocke, was not but in long time with hard labour and doubtfull ſucceſſe to be vndermined, it was generally thought good to raiſe the ſiege. The Turkes vpon their departure brake into the citie, and when they had taken the ſpoile thereof, ſet it on fire. K

Barbaruſſa retiring with his fleet to ANTIPOLIS, came to anker at the Iſland LERINA, called of the marriners MARGARITA; at which time Vaſtius and the duke of SAVOY, with Auria his fleet arriued at VILLA FRANCA: in the entrance of which hauen, the gally wherein Va-ſtius went, was like to haue bene loſt. Foure other gallies by force of ſudden tempeſt were driuen vpon the rockes, and ſo ſuddenly beaten in pieces with the ſurge of the ſea, that the gallyſlaues had not leiſure to ſtrike off their yrons, but were there all drowned, and all the ordinance loſt. Polinus vnderſtanding this diſtreſſe of the enemy, ſent one Petrus Angelus to Barbaruſſa, to ſhew him the occaſion offered, and to perſuade him with all ſpeed to haſt thither with his fleet, as to a moſt aſſured victory. Barbaruſſa ſeemed to like well of the motion, and promiſed to goe, yet he mooued not, letted as it was thought with the contrary wind, which then blew hard L at Eaſt, and with the roughneſſe of the ſea. But the wind being fallen, and the ſea become calme, and he contrary to his wonted manner making no haſt, ſet ſlowly forward, and being a little on his way, came againe to an anker, and went no further; the Sanzackes and other captaines firſt Barbaruſſa derided by the Turks captaines marualling, and afterward laughing thereat, ſcoffingly ſaid, That Barbaruſſa did but reaſon to deale kindly with Auria, as his brother and friend of his owne profeſſion, for that he had ſome yeares before receiued the like friendſhip at his hands, in letting him eſcape at HIPPONA, which he now honeſtly paid him againe. Whereunto Barbaruſſa both then and afterwards at CON-
His anſwere to their taunts. STANTINOPLE anſwered no otherwiſe, but, That he being an old commander, & halfe blind, ſaw more in the matter than all thoſe greene captaines with their ſharpe ſight. Not long after, he returned againe towards MARSEILLES, and put into the hauen of TOLON, called in ancient M time TAVRENTA. Vaſtius and the duke comming to NICE, commended the captaine of the caſtle, and wondring at the cunning manner of the Turks fortifications, preferred them in that point before the Chriſtians. Barbaruſſa lying with his fleet at TOLON, and by the kings officers entertained with all poſſible courtiſie, deliuered fiue and twentie gallies to Salec the famous py-rat,

A rat,and Assanes his nigh kinſman,who paſſing the bay of NARBONA,rifled certaine townes in SPAINE,ſtanding vpon the ſea coaſt,and about the promontorie of Venus, called of the marriners CREVM,tooke great prize, and in the hauen of PALAMOS tooke one merchant ſhip and a gallie: with which prey they paſſed ouer to ALGIERS,as they were commanded,there to winter,and with the firſt of the Spring to returne againe to Barbaruſſa in PROVINCE. That Winter Barbaruſſa repairing his fleet, was furniſhed with many neceſſaries by the Genowaies,and eſpecially by Auria himſelfe,who vnder the colour of redeeming of priſoners, willingly furniſhed the Turke with ſuch things as he wanted: for although he profeſſed himſelfe one of the emperors captains,yet would he not ſhew an enemies mind by the vnſeaſonable deniall of a little ſea furniture,leaſt in ſo doing he ſhould haue hurt his natiue countrie of GENVA, which he ſaw then
B ſubiect to the iniurie of ſo great a fleet ſo nigh at hand.But leaue we now Barbaruſſa to Winter in PROVINCE,and with the courſe of time turne a little out of the way,to ſee in Muleaſſes king of TVNES the ſmall aſſurance the greateſt haue in higheſt place of worldly honour.

This Mahometane king once before thruſt out of his kingdome by Barbaruſſa, and reſtored againe by Charles the emperour (as is before declared) hearing of his comming with this great fleet, and imagining nothing leſſe than that hee ſhould come to the aid of the moſt Chriſtian king,doubted(not without cauſe)leaſt it was prepared againſt himſelfe.Beſides that,diuers great cities of his kingdome,namely CONSTANTINA, MAHEMEDIA, and MAHOMETA (called in auncient time CYRTHA)LEPTIS and ADRVMENTVM, were then holden by the Turkes, Barbaruſſa his fauorites: wherefore fearing the worſt, about the ſame time that Barbaruſſa was
C ſayling alongſt the coaſt of ITALIE, he paſſed ouer into SICILIE,to haue met the emperour at GENVA,and to haue obtained of him greater aid againſt the Turkes. At his departure out of AFFRICKE, hee committed the tuition of his kingdome to ſuch valiant men as hee ſuppoſed would haue beene vnto him moſt faithfull: Firſt he appointed Mahometes, then Maniphæt, to gouerne the citie, and Corſus otherwiſe called Fares,his old ſeruant,to keepe the caſtle; leauing Mahometes his brother and Fares his ſonne, with Touarres a Spaniard (captaine of the caſtle of GVLETTA)as pledges, the one of his brothers,the other of his fathers faith: but vnto Amida (his ſonne)he committed the leading of his men of war for the defence of his kindome againſt the Turkes and Numidians. As hee was paſſing out of SICILIA to haue met the emperour at D GENVA,he was by contrarie winds driuen firſt to CAIETA, and afterwards to NAPLES, where he was by the viceroy honourably entertained,and a houſe appointed for him richly furniſhed. The Neapolitanes wondering at the ſtrange attire of the people, with the manner of their feeding,and curious plentie of all maner of ſweet perfumes: for into euery diſh they put in odors of exceeding price; ſo that it was well known,that a peacocke and two feſants,dreſſed after the manner of the kings kitchin,coſt aboue an hundred duckats: ſo that not only the dining chamber,when they were carued vp,but all the houſe was ſo filled with the ſtrange and fragrant ſmel, that all they that dwelt neere thereabouts, were partakers of the pleaſure of that vnuſuall & delicat perfume. From NAPLES hee was about to haue trauelled by land to the emperour, being then in conference with the Pope at BVXETVM (fearing to aduenture the ſea, poſſeſſed by the enemies fleet) had not the emperour by his letters willed him to ſtay ſtill where he was. But
E whileſt he made his abode at NAPLES, and carefully attended what courſe Barbaruſſa would take,who furniſhed with ſo great a fleet was departed from NICE,diſappointed of his purpoſe, he was by certaine meſſengers aduertiſed out of APFRICKE,That Amida his ſonne was riſen vp againſt him,and poſſeſſing himſelfe of the kingdome, had ſlaine his captaines, polluted his wiues,and taken the caſtle of TVNES. With which newes he being exceedingly troubled, determined without delay to paſſe our into APFRICKE, and though late, yet as hee might to remedie his domeſtical troubles,in hope to oppreſſe that rebellion in the beginning,and his ſonne alſo,before he could gather any ſtrength to reſt vpon. Wherefore he with all the haſt hee could opened his cofers,and entertained ſoldiors,the viceroy giuing leaue to all ſuch baniſhed men as F would to come and giue their names, to paſſe ouer as ſouldiours into APFRICKE: vpon report whereof, ſuch a number of malefactors & condemned perſons came flocking to NAPLES,that it was thought a ſufficient armie might haue been made of ſuch kind of men; euery one of them chuſing rather to enter into pay,and blot out the infamie of baniſhment,and proue the fortune of warres, than to liue wandring vp and downe in the woods, and in danger euery houre to be hanged. Of theſe infamous men, one Ioannes Baptiſta Lofredius (a man well borne, but of a fierce and couetous diſpoſition (vndertooke the leading: hee couenanting with Muleaſſes to haue three moneths pay before hand, leuied eighteene hundred men, which he preſently ſhipped; and keeping the greateſt part of their pay to himſelfe, paſſed ouer with the king into AFRICKE, and landed at GVLETTA. But how Amida riſe vp againſt his father, and what was the end of that bloudie rebellion, ſhall not be amiſſe briefely to rehearſe. There were certaine noblemen of great authoritie about Amida when Muleaſſes departed, which at their pleaſure ruled the young prince, who eaſily harkened vnto their counſell, and followed the ſame: the chiefe of theſe was one Mahometes, ſonne of Bohamer, who in the raigne of Mahometes, Muleaſſes his father, was Maniphet, whom Muleaſſes (poſſeſſed of the kingdome) put ſhamefully to death by cutting off his priuities, becauſe he had by haſtie mariage deceiued him of Rhahamana, a maiden of incomparable beautie, the daughter of Abderomen captaine of the caſtle, whom he moſt paſſionatly loued: for which cruell fact, Mahometes his ſonne had of long time conceiued a deadly hatred againſt Muleaſſes, which he had many yeares diſſembled, that he might as occaſion ſerued bee the more cruelly reuenged. Next vnto him was another Mahometes ſurnamed Adulzes, whom Muleaſſes was wont commonly to call his worſt ſeruant. Theſe two with a few others conſpiring together, gaue it out, that Muleaſſes was dead at NAPLES, and before his death had moſt irreligiouſly (as they accounted it) reuolted to the Chriſtian religion. With which report they perceiuing Amida moued, came vnto him and perſuaded him quickly to enter into his fathers ſeat, leaſt Mahometes his younger brother then lying in hoſtage with the Chriſtians at GVLETTA, ſhould by the fauour and helpe of Touarres, whoſe garriſon was euer readie, be preferred before him. For Mahometes was eighteene yeares old, reſembling his grandfather in name, fauour, and diſpoſition, and therefore of the citizens of TVNES beſt beloued: wherefore Amida came in poſt haſt out of the campe to TVNES, to lay firſt hand vpon his fathers kingdome. The people which as yet had heard nothing of the kings death, receiued him with doubtful countenance: and as many ſtood maruelling that he was ſo raſhly come into the citie without his fathers commaundement, Mahometes (appointed by Muleaſſes to gouerne the citie) came out and ſharpely reproued him as guiltie of high treaſon, perſuading him to returne againe vnto the campe: and ſeeing him ſtay, by force of multitude thruſt him out of the citie. Amida deceiued of his expectation, got him out of the way into the pleaſant countrie of MARTIA, betweene VTICA and the ruines of old CARTHAGE. But Mahometes Gouernour of the citie, after he had repulſed Amida, got him with all ſpeed by water to Touarres at GVLETTA, to know of him more aſſuredly, if any ſuch euill newes were brought from SICILIE of the death of the king; and to complaine of the raſhneſſe and intollerable preſumption of Amida. Where ſtaying ſomewhat long in diſcourſing with the captaine, and afterwards returning to the citie, hee was ſuſpected to haue practiſed with the captaine, to make Mahometes (the pledge in GVLETTA) king in his fathers ſteed; for ſo the common voice went. The Moores are by nature a faithleſſe people, vnconſtant, haſtie, ſuſpitious, deſirous of newes, which true or falſe, they for the time interpret as ſerueth beſt their factions, whereunto the are exceedingly giuen: So at the firſt there riſe in the citie a doubtfull rumour of the making of a new king; the ſuſpition whereof more and more encreaſing, ſet all the citie on an vprore. By occaſion whereof, certaine of the citizens to whom the verie name of Muleaſſes was odious, ſpeedily certified Amida (then in the gardens of MARTIA, ſighing and grieuing at his hard fortune) how all ſtood, and that now was the time to do himſelfe good. He reuiued with that vnexpected newes, and encouraged by the perſuaſion of Bohamar and Adulzes, and other his followers; reſolued to take hold vpon that good offer of fortune which would not alwaies frowne, and to follow his good hap. So in haſt returning to TVNES, and entring in at the gate which he then found open, ran preſently to the gouernours houſe; and finding him not at home, cruelly ſlew all his houſhold, and with his bloudie companie went preſently to the caſtle: where Fares the captaine ſeeking to haue kept him out, and boldly laying hands vpon his horſes bridle to haue thruſt him backe, was by a deſperat Ethiopian, one of Amida his followers, thruſt thorow with a ſword and ſlaine: ouer whoſe bodie yet ſprawling, Amida forcing his horſe, brake into the caſtle with his friends; and finding Mahometes gouernour of the citie, preſently ſlew him alſo. And ſo by this meanes Amida in the ſpace of an houre (a little before, a man in deſpaire) obtained the citie, the caſtle, and the kingdome togither. After that, he murthered his younger brethren; and embrued with bloud, without ſhame polluted his fathers concubines. Muleaſſes landed (as we haue before ſaid) at GVLETTA,

A LETTA, with ſuch forces as he had brought with him out of ITALIE; was aduiſed by Touarres the Spaniard, not to aduenture with ſuch a handfull of men to goe to TVNES, before he were wel aſſured of the good diſpoſition of the citizens towards him: And was the more earneſt with Lofredius not to go, becauſe the Viceroy had expreſſely written, that he ſhould in no caſe go any further than GVLETTA, except the king according to his promiſe, had a good ſtrength of the Numidians to ioine with him. But certaine of the noble men amongſt the Moores, which vnder the colour of friendſhip were fled out of the citie, and had after the ſolemne maner of their nation put their ſwords vnto their throats, and ſworn to be faithful vnto him; wonderfully prickt forward both the king and Lofredius, too haſtie of themſelues to their owne deſtinie, bearing them in hand, That Amida vpon the firſt ſight of his father, would forſake the citie, and betake
B himſelfe to flight: ſo without more ſtaying, Muleaſſes with enſigne diſplaied ſet forward towards TVNES, Lofredius cheerefully following him, Touarres requeſting them in vaine to beware of the Moores treacherie. Muleaſſes marching ſtill forward, was come ſo nigh the citie, that they might from the wals deſcrie him: when ſuddenly a ſtrong troupe of Moores ſallied out of the gate with a terrible crie, and fiercely aſſailed him, whom the kings horſemen valiantly receiued: many falling on both ſides. Muleaſſes in this hoat skirmiſh, fighting couragiouſly againſt his enemies, was wounded in the face and bled exceedingly; which diſcouraged them about him, that they doubting of his life, turned their backes and fled: when preſently a wonderfull number of horſe and foot, ſuddenly iſſuing out of the oliue gardens, had beſet Lofredius and his ſouldiors round: vpon whom the Italians diſcharged certaine field pieces, but after they
C had once diſcharged them, they had no leaſure to charge againe; for the barbarous enemie came on ſo thicke and ſo faſt, that the Italians ſeeing themſelues too weake, and compaſſed in round, let fall their weapons as men diſcouraged, & caſt themſelues into the lake, ſo by ſwimming and taking hold of the little boats to ſaue themſelues from the enemies ſword: which boats ſtood thoſe diſtreſſed men in great ſteed, for being furniſhed with ſmall pieces, they did beat backe the Moores, who eagerly purſued them euen into the lake with their horſes. Lofredius as a man amaſed with the ſudden comming of the enemie, tooke the lake with his horſe, and was there vnhorſed by the enemie and ſlaine, as were diuers with him. Some few there were that fought couragiouſly, chuſing rather honourably to die in the middeſt of their enemies, than ſhamefully to be ſtrangled in the ſtinking lake. Muleaſſes ſoiled with his owne bloud and with the duſt,
D flying amongſt the reſt, was knowne and taken: nothing more bewraying him than his odoriferous perfumes. In this conflict thirteene hundred Italians were loſt; the reſt which eſcaped Touarres relieued, and ſhortly after ſhipped them ouer into SICILIE, from whence they trauelled home to NAPLES, but ſo poore, as well ſhewed the miſerie of their fortune. Amida hauing thus obtained the victorie, was more carefull of nothing than to make his father vnfit for gouernment, which he did by cutting the ſight of both his eyes with a hoat penknife: the like crueltie he vſed vpon Nahaſar and Abdallas his brethren, then taken with his father. After that, he certified Touarres captaine of GVLETTA, That he had taken a few youths priſoners, which he would deliuer vnto him; and that he had bereft his father of his ſight, who had deſerued a worſe puniſhment, as he that had long before done the like to his brethren; but had yet left him
E his life, as an example to other tirants, and to ſhew that he dealt not altogither vnmercifully with ſo perfidious a father: Laſt of all, he confirmed (vpon certain conditions) the ſame league which his father had with him: which he well ſaw was to great purpoſe, eſpecially in the newneſſe of his kingdome. Neither did Touarres refuſe the ſame, as ſtanding with his preſent profit: for vpon this agreement, Amida was to giue him certaine money to pay his ſouldiors, and to deliuer him the priſoners he had taken, with the enſignes and bodie of Lofredius: For more aſſurance whereof, he gaue Sehites his ſonne, then nine yeares old in hoſtage; yet vpon condition, that if an aſſured peace could not be agreed vpon, but that they muſt needs enter into warre, then Touarres ſhould forthwith reſtore him his ſonne Sehites in ſafetie. Theſe capitulations, although they ſeemed not vnreaſonable, and were of them well liked; yet Touarres thought it not altogether a-F greeing with the honour of the emperor, that he ſhould enioy the kingdome who by moſt horrible treaſon and deteſtable villanie had thruſt himſelfe thereinto without the emperors leaue. Wherfore he entred into a new deuiſe, to call in the rightful heire, who might at the emperours pleaſure (offended with the iniurie done by Amida) raigne in TVNES.

celes fled to Barbaruſſa. Him, becauſe he was Muleaſſes naturall brother, Touarres ſent for, put- G ting him in hope of the kingdome, ſupported by Anemſeha, a great prince amongſt the Numidians, who had all that long time courteouſly entertained him. Neither was Abdamalech ſlow to accept the occaſion preſented, eſpecially encouraged thereunto by the Numidian prince his good friend, and the predictions of the Aſtrologers, who had foretold him, That he ſhould die king of TVNES. Which vaine kind of diuination hauing in it no maner of aſſurance, yet cauſeth great minds oftentimes to vndertake great attempts beyond reaſon, which falling out with more hap than they were with reaſon foretold, giueth ſome credit to that vanitie, and cauſeth thoſe cold prophets to be of ſome accounted as great wiſards. And to work this feat, ſuch a time was offered, as a better could not be wiſhed: for Amida hauing ſet all things in order as he pleaſed in the citie, and caſting no perill, was gone to BISERTA, to take order for his cuſtomes, which H was there great vpon fiſhing. Wherefore Touarres to keepe his promiſe, ſent backe Sehites, Amida his ſonne, in a boat to TVNES, and receiued Abdamalech: who trauelling moſt part by night, was ſecretly come to GVLETTA, and there reſting himſelfe and his horſes a few houres; to preuent the fame of his comming, poſted in haſt with a troupe of his Numidian followers to Abdamelech by policy obtaineth the kingdome of Tunes.

TVNES, and paſſing thorow the citie, went directly to the caſtle, which he entred without reſiſtance of the warders, ſuppoſing him to haue beene Amida come from BISERTA: for Abdamalech had after the manner of the Moores couered his face with a ſcarfe, as if it had beene to haue kept him from the Sunne and the duſt, and by that happie ſlight got into the caſtle, before it was knowne who he was. The warders perceiuing their error, began as men amaſed now too late to betake themſelues to their weapons, for in making reſiſtance, they were quickly ſlaine by I the Numidians which came in with Abdamalech: who thus poſſeſſed of the caſtle (the chiefe ſtrength of that kingdome) let in his friends, which were many in the citie, by whom he was preſently ſaluted king, the reſt of the citizens either well liking of the matter, or at leaſt not daring for feare to ſtir. But as in theſe worldly things, for which men ſo vainly toile, is no aſſurance: ſo this new king ſhortly after fel ſicke and died, when he had raigned but ſix and twentie daies, and was afterwards roially enterred. After whoſe death, his mightie friends, with the chiefe of the citiſens (perſuaded and encouraged by Touarres the Spaniard) choſe Mahometes his ſon, a child ſcarſe twelue yeares old, to reigne in his fathers place: appointing Abdalages Maniphat (brother to him whom Amida ſlew) Abdelchirinus Meſuar, Schyriffus (a great man in their Mahometane ſuperſtition) & Perellus a Chriſtian knight, to be his directers and gouernors: which foure ſwayed all at their pleaſure. But Abdelchirinus tendering the welfare of his countrey, and deuiſing out of ſeaſon how to ſet vp one of the royall bloud, that were of himſelfe able to gouerne the kingdome, ſaying, That it was not for the common good to be ruled by a child: was for his labor by his other three fellowes ſuddenly ſlaine, with all his kindred and knowne friends. After whoſe death the other three erected a manner of Triumvirat gouernment, euery one of them laying hand vpon one part of the ſtate or other, as liked him beſt. Amida thus ſhut out of TVNES, and hauing loſt his kingdome, wandered vp and downe to LEPTIS, CYRAPOLIS, and many other places, crauing aid of euery man to recouer his kingdome, miſerably rent in ſunder (as he ſaid) by moſt wicked men, who inſolently triumphed ouer the boy king. Which they of TVNES knew well to be true, and daily complained of the death of Abdelchirinus, whom they called the faith- L full counſellor and father of his country. Whileſt Amida is thus trudging vp and down, crauing helpe of this and that prince, prooving his friends, and ſounding his ſubiects affection towards him; Muleaſſes growne miſerable with long impriſonment and the calamitie of his diſaſter fortune, obtained of the young king his nephew ſo much fauour, as that hee might ſometime goe out of the caſtle to the church: vnder colour whereof hee tooke ſanctuarie, a place in TVNES holden in ſuch reuerence amongſt the Moores, as that it was a moſt inuiolate refuge to all ſuch as fled thereunto. Not long after, at ſuch time as Bernardinus Mendoza, the Admirall of SPAIN, came to GVLETTA with the Spaniſh fleet, Muleaſſes at the requeſt of Touarres was conueyed out of the Sanctuarie to the lake, and ſo by water to GVLETTA, there to be preſent at the conſultation there holden for the vtter ſubuerſion of Amida, and the driuing out of the Turks out of M ſuch cities as they yet held alongſt the ſea coaſt in AFFRICA. Muleaſſes had hardly before eſcaped the hands of certaine of his enemies in TVNES, who ſought after his life, preſerued by an old woman, who mooued with pitie, hid him from their furie vnder a great heape of garlike: and had he not now in good time eſcaped to GVLETTA, he had againe fallen into the hands of his Abdamelech dieth, and Mahometes his ſonne is choſen king in his place.

merci-

A mercileſſe ſonne Amida, who ſhortly after recouered againe his kingdome, and would not as he ſaid himſelfe haue ſpared him for the reuerence of any ſanctuarie. For the citizens of TVNES, wearie of the euill gouernment of ſuch as were in authoritie about the yong king, and not a little offended with the king himſelf, for eſpouſing Meluccа his couſin, one of Muleaſſes his daughters, ſecretly encouraged Amida by letters to repaire to the citie, promiſing to aid him in recouering his kingdome. Wherupon he came in ſuch haſt, that the young king had ſcarce time to get out of the citie: and Amida entring without reſiſtance, and holpen by his friends, eaſily obtained againe the kingdome, and exerciſed moſt exquiſit crueltie vpon his enemies: of whom he cauſed ſome to be torne in pieces, and deuoured of fierce maſtiues, kept hungerie for that purpoſe. Perellus he cauſed to be tortured, his ſecrets to be cut off, and himſelfe afterwards burnt to aſhes
B in the market place.

Amida recouereth the kingdome of Tunes, and taketh ſharp reuenge vpon his enemies.

But Muleaſſes ſtaied not long at GVLETTA, offended with the couetouſneſſe of Touarres, who (as he ſaid) had not faithfully reſtored ſuch things as he had before put him in truſt withall, but had auaritiouſly in his miſerie deceiued him of part of his rich houſholdſtuffe, with certain notable pretious ſtones, and ſome of his treaſure: wherof the blind king ſo grieuouſly complained to Charles the emperor, that for deciding the matter, they were both commanded to repaire vnto him into GERMANIE: where in concluſion to end the ſtrife, Touarres was diſcharged of his gouernment, and Muleaſſes ſent into SICILIE there to be kept of the common charge of that rich iſland. Muleaſſes by the way comming to ROME, was honourably feaſted by Cardinal Ferneſius: at which time he ſhewed himſelfe both in his apparel and behauiour not forgetfull of his better
C fortune: and being brought vnto the preſence of Paulus the great biſhop, would doe him no greater honour but to kiſſe his knee, accounting it too great an indignitie to haue kiſſed his foot. He was of ſtature tall, and of a princely diſpoſition, vnworthie of ſo hard a fortune, had he not in like maner before vnmercifully dealt with his owne brethren.

Muleaſſes diſdaineth to kiſſe the Popes foot.

Barbaruſſa wearie of his long lying to ſo ſmall purpoſe in PROVINCE, requeſted the French king either thorowly to employ him, or elſe to giue him leaue to depart: offering if he ſo pleaſed, to ſpoile all alongſt the coaſt of SPAINE, from the mountaine PYRÆNEI to CADIZ. But he not ignorant what hard ſpeeches ran of him alreadie in all parts of Chriſtendome, for bringing in the Turkes, was loath to leaue vnto the memorie of all poſteritie the foule remembrance of ſo woful a ſlaughter: beſides that, he was aduiſed to diſburden his countrie of ſuch troubleſome
D gueſts, who rouing about, did much harme in the prouince where they lay, and as it was reported, now and then ſnatcht vp one countrie peiſant or other, and chained them for ſlaues in their gallies. Wherefore in ſupplie of the Turkes that were dead, the king gaue vnto Barbaruſſa all the Mahometan ſlaues in his gallies, to the number of about foure hundred, and furniſhing him with all kind of prouiſion, and beſtowing great gifts vpon him and his captains, ſent him away: and with him Strozza with certaine gallies, his embaſſador to Solyman. So the Turks departing out of PROVINCE, kept alongſt the coaſt, vntill they came neere vnto SAVONA, whither the Germans ſent diuers preſents and freſh victuals to Barbaruſſa, which he tooke ſo thankfully, that he proteſted not to hurt any of their territorie. From thence he kept a right courſe to the Iſland of E ELBA, belonging to the duke of FLORENCE, ouer againſt POPVLONA; where vnderſtanding that one of the ſonnes of Sinan his old friend was there kept priſoner, he writ vnto Appianus gouernour of the Iſland for his deliuerance to this effect:

Barbaruſſa his letters to Appianus Gouernor of Elba.

I know, that a young man a Turke ſerueth thee, the ſonne of Sinan ſurnamed the Iew, a famous captaine, taken of late at TVNES: him I would haue thee friendly to reſtore: which gift I will make thee vnderſtand to be vnto me moſt acceptable; for this our great fleet in paſſing by you, ſhall faithfully forbeare to vſe any hoſtilitie. But if thou ſhalt in this ſo ſmall a matter refuſe to gratifie me, expect vpon the coaſt of thy countrie all the harmes which an angrie enemie can doe.

Whereunto Appianus ſhewing his men vpon the wals, in token that hee was not afraid, an-
F ſwered, That the young man was become a Chriſtian, and therefore might not in any caſe bee deliuered to the Turks: but that he would in any other thing gratifie him in what he could, and for his ſake vſe the young man as his ſonne. And to mollifie the vnkindneſſe of his anſwere, hee ſent him freſh victuall with other preſents. But Barbaruſſa offended with the anſwer, landed his men round about the iſland, and commanded them to make what ſpoile they could: which they performed accordingly, hunting the Island people vp and down the rocks and mountains like Hares, vntill that Appianus not without cause doubting the vtter spoile of the Island, redeemed his peace by deliuering the young man to Salec the pyrat, who brought him to Barbarussa gallantly attired after the Italian manner, of whom he was ioyfully receiued, as the sonne of a most valiant captaine, his old friend: and thereupon Barbarussa staied his souldiors from doing any further harme vpon the Island, and gaue Appianus great thanks for him. This young man Barbarussa honoured with the commaund of seuen gallies, and afterwards sent him to his father then lying at SVETIA, a port of the red sea, Admirall for Solyman against the Portingals, who greatly troubled those seas. But the old Iew, ouerioyed with the sudden and vnexpected returne of his sonne, whom he had for many yeares before giuen as lost, in embracing of him fainted, and so presently for ioy died.

Appianus glad to deliuer the captiue whom Barbarussa required.

Sinan the Iew dieth for ioy.

This man for valour was accounted little inferiour to Barbarussa, but for discretion and iust dealing farre beyond him, nothing of so furious and wayward a disposition as was he. Barbarussa departing from ELBA, came into the bay of TELAMON in TVSCANY, and in short time took the citie, which he spoiled and burnt, but especially the house of Bartholomeus Telamonius; whose dead bodie but a little before buried, he caused to be pluckt out of the graue, & his bones to be scattered abroad, because he being admirall of the bishop of ROME his gallies, had in the Island of LESBOS wasted Barbarussa his fathers poore possession: and marching by night eight miles further into the land, surprised MONTENVM, and carried almost all the inhabitants away with him into captiuitie. The like mischiefe he did at the port called PORTVS HERCVLIS, but purposing to haue taken ORHATELLO, and there to haue fortified, he was by Luna and Vitellius (two valiant captaines before sent thither, the one by the State of SIENA, and the other by the duke of FLORENCE) repulsed. So though disappointed of his purpose, yet hauing done great harme, and put the whole countrie of TVSCANY in exceeding feare, he departed thence and landed againe at IGILIVM, now called GIGIO, an Island about twelue miles distant from PORTVS HERCLIS, where he quickly battered the towne, and carried a wonderfull number of all sorts into miserable captiuitie: keeping on his course, he passing the cape LINAR, & comming ouer against CANTVMCELLE, had burnt that citie for the same reason he did TELAMON, had he not bin otherwise persuaded by Strozza the French embassador, fearing to draw the French king into further obliquie. From thence he came with a direct course to the Island of ISCHIA; where landing in the night, he intercepted most part af the inhabitants of the island, as they were flying into the mountains: and in reuenge of the hatred he had conceiued against Vastius at the siege of NICE, he burnt FORINO, PANSA, and VARRANIVM, three chiefe townes of that island: but PITHACVSA, the dwelling place of Vastius, standing vpon a broken rocke, somewhat distant from the sea, he durst not aduenture vpon. Then scraping along the Island PROCHITA with lesse hurt, because most part of the inhabitants were before fled to PITHACVSA, he put into the bay of PVTEOLI, and sent Salec the pyrat with part of his fleet to make proofe if the citie of PVTEOLI, might from sea be battered. Salec drawing neere the citie, shot into it with his great ordinance, and by chance slew one Saiauedra, a valiant Spaniard, vpon the wals, & put the citisens in a great feare least the whole fleet should haue landed, they themselues as then vnprouided: but the viceroy came presently with a power both of horse and foot from NAPLES, which Barbarussa discouering from sea as they came downe the mountaines, called back Salec: and leauing the island of CAPRI, and passing by the promontorie ATHENEVM, was about to haue seised vpon SALERNVM, when a tempest suddenly arising, dispersed his fleet, and driue him beyond the promontorie PALINVRVS vpon the coast of CALABRIA, where he did exceeding much harme, especially at CARREATO. From thence he departed to the island of LIPARI, betwixt ITALIE and SICILIE, which island he miserably spoiled, and with fortie great pieces so battered the citie, that the citisens were constrained for feare to yeeld, whom he carried away all prisoners about the number of seuen thousand, of one sort of people and other, and burnt the citie. So loaded with the rich spoile of ITALIE and the islands vpon the coast, hee returned towards CONSTANTINOPLE with such multitude of poore Christian captiues, shut vp so close vnder hatches amongst the excrements of Nature, that all the way as he went almost euery houre some of them were cast dead ouer boord: euery man detesting the endlesse hatred betwixt the emperour and the French king, the very ground of all this and many thousand other most wofull and vndeserued calamities of their poore subiects. With this rich prey and an infinit

Barbarussa in his returne toward Constantinople, doth much harme vpon the coast of Italie.

A finit number of captiues, Barbaruſſa arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE in the beginning of Au- tumne, in the yeare 1544: where he was honourably receiued of Solyman, and highly commended for his good ſeruice both by ſea and land. Barbaruſſa arriueth at Conſtantinople.

Solyman triumphing at CONSTANTINOPLE of the good ſucceſſe he had in HVNGARIE, in the middeſt of all his glorie, was aduertiſed of the death of Mahomet his eldeſt ſonne, whom of all his children he held deereſt: whoſe dead bodie was ſhortly after brought from MAGNESIA, and with wonderfull ſolemnitie, and no leſſe mourning, buried at CONSTANTINOPLE. How entirely Solyman loued this his ſonne, well appeared by the great ſorrow he conceiued of his death; and not contented to haue built him a ſtately tombe, erected alſo in memoriall of him a Mahometane church, called the church of Mahomet the leſſer: for the difference of Mahomet Mahomet Solymans eldeſt ſon dieth.

B the great, who woon CONSTANTINOPLE. Whereunto he alſo annexed a monaſterie and a colledge, with many things mo after the groſſe maner of their ſuperſtition, for the health of his ſoule, as he vainly ſuppoſed. After that, Solyman according to his wonted manner, which was but euery ſecond or third yeare to take in hand ſome notable expedition, ceaſed from warres by the ſpace of two yeares: in which time many of the great princes and worthie men of that age died; amongſt whom was Francis the French king. Hariadenus Barbaruſſa that famous Turke of whom we haue ſo often ſpoken, who being of great yeares and no leſſe fame, left this life in the yeare 1547, and was buried at a houſe of his owne called Beſictas, neere vnto BOSPHORVS THRACIVS on EVROPE ſide, not farre from the mouth of Euxinum, about foure miles from The death of the famous pirat Barbaruſſa.

C PERA, where he had but few yeares before at one time ſold about ſixteene thouſand Chriſtian captiues, taken out of CORCYRA: and to make famous that place appointed for his buriall, he of his owne coſt built there a Mahometane temple, there yet with his ſepulchre to be ſeene: that place was in auntient time called IASONIVM. About which time alſo, died of conceit that famous captaine Alphonſus Daualus Vaſtius, taken away by vntimely death when he had liued but Vaſtius dieth. fortie fiue yeares. At which time, Charles the emperour by his embaſſadour Gerardus Veltunich, concluded a peace with Solyman for fiue years, wherein king Ferdinand was alſo included: which peace was afterwards before the expiration thereof, by Solyman (at the requeſt of Henrie the French king) broken. 1548

Solyman had now almoſt three yeares taken his reſt, when it fortuned that Ercaſes Imirza 1549

D king of SIRVAN, moued with the often iniuries of Tamas his brother the great Perſian king, fled to Solyman at CONSTANTINOPLE, to craue aid of him againſt his brother. Solyman glad of ſuch an occaſion to worke vpon, entertained him with all courteſie, and promiſed to take vpon him his quarrell, and to protect him againſt his vnnaturall brother. And when he had made all things readie for ſo great an expedition, paſſed ouer into ASIA; and after long and painfull trauell entred at laſt with a puiſſant armie into ARMENIA, and there in the borders of the Perſian kingdome, firſt beſieged the citie of VAN, which after ten daies ſiege was yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, that the Perſian ſouldiors there in garriſon, might with life and libertie depart with their armes as ſouldiors: which was at the firſt by Solyman granted, and ſo the citie ſurrendred. From thence Solyman ſent his chiefe commanders with a great part of his armie, to burne Van yeelded to the Turkes.

E and ſpoile the enemies countrey, which they for a time cheerefully performed; and running far into the countrey, ſtriue as it were amongſt themſelues who ſhould doe moſt harme: where Imirza amongſt the reſt, for whoſe ſake Solyman had vndertaken this warre, was as forward as the beſt to waſt and ſpoile his brothers kingdome, ſparing nothing that came to hand; the beſt and richeſt things he got, he preſented to Solyman, to draw him on ſtill in that warre. But that ſerued not his turne to recouer againe his kingdome of SIRVAN: for Tamas, without ſhewing any power to withſtand the Turks, had after his wonted manner, cauſed his people to withdraw themſelues far into the mountaine country, leauing nothing behind them in that waſt countrey to relieue them, but the bare ground: ſo that the farther the Turks went, the more they wanted, without hope of better ſucceſſe than ſuch as they had before to their loſſe made proofe of, in their former expeditions into that great kingdome. The conceit whereof ſo much pierced not

F the common ſouldiors onely, but euen the captaines themſelues; that to make an end of that long and vnprofitable warre, taken in hand for another mans good, they conſulted amongſt themſelues, either to kill Imirza, or elſe to diſgrace him with Solyman: Which they ſo cunningly wrought; ſome ſuggeſting falſe ſuſpitions of his treacherous dealing in the proceeding of that warre; and others with like craft, vnder colour of friendſhip giuing him warning in ſecret of the danger danger he was in: the one filling Solymans head with diſtruſt, and the other Imirzas with feare: briefly to ſhut the matter vp in their owne tearmes, They perſwaded the hare to flie, and the hounds to follow. Imirza doubting ſome ſudden miſchiefe, fled for ſuccour to an old acquaintance of his one of the princes of CHALDEA, who moſt treacherouſly ſent him in bonds to Tamas his brother, his moſt cruell enemie, who glad to haue the authour of all his troubles with the Turks, deliuered into his hands, caſt him in priſon: and that Solyman nor any other ſhould in his behalfe further proſecute the warre, or by his meanes hope for victorie, cauſed him to be in priſon murthered. In this expedition againſt the Perſian king, Solyman was occupied a yeare and nine moneths; all which time the Turkes endured great troubles, and were oftentimes hardly diſtreſſed by the Perſians: vntill at laſt Solyman himſelfe wearie of that tedious warre, wherein he had got neither honour nor profit, thought it beſt ſo to make an end; and thereupon returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE in the yeare 1549.

Imirza murthered in priſon.

Solyman returneth to Conſtantinople.

In the meane time it fortuned, that one Dragut Raiſes a notable pirat of the Turks, had craftily ſurpriſed the citie of AFRICA in the kingdome of TVNES (called in ancient time APHRODISEVM) and alſo LEPTIS PARVA (and now of the Moores called MAHAMEDIA) and there ſetling himſelfe, as in a place both commodious and of good aſſurance, exceedingly troubled the Chriſtians both by ſea and land, eſpecially ſuch as traded in the Mediterranean. So that the emperour, moued as well with the manifold iniuries done by that arch-pirat vpon the frontiers of his dominions, as by the daily complaint of his poore ſubiects, commanded the Viceroy of SICILIE, and Auria his Admirall, to leuie a ſufficient power in time to repreſſe that pirat, before hee grew to farther ſtrength. Whereupon, they with a ſtrong fleet well manned and thorowly appointed for that purpoſe, and aided by the knights of MALTA, paſſed ouer into AFRICKE; and landing their forces, by the ſpace of three moneths beſieged the citie before poſſeſſed by the pirat, which with continuall batterie they had at length made faultable. And hearing that Dragut was comming with a new ſupply to relieue it, they with all celeritie aſſailed it both by ſea and land, and in the ſpace of a few houres tooke it by force the tenth day of September in the yeare 1550. in which aſſault many of the enemies were ſlaine, and the reſt taken. Auria hauing thus diſpoſſeſſed the pirat, and aduiſedly conſidering that the city was not without an infinit charge to be holden by the Chriſtians, among ſo many of the infidels, raſed it downe to the ground, carrying away with him ſeauen thouſand captiues, and all the ſpoyle of the citie. And not ſo contented, did all the harme he could with fire and ſword all alongſt the coaſt of AFRICA, to the intent that the Turks ſhould there find no reliefe; and tooke 12. priſoners out of MONASTERIVM, a towne not farre from the citie of AFRICA: and ſo hauing done that he came for, returned againe into SICILY. Dragut thus at once thruſt out of all he had, with a few of his friends fled to Soliman to CONSTANTINOPLE, and ſo incenſed him with the grieuous complaint of the wrong done vnto him by the Chriſtians; that in reuenge therof, he reſolued to make warre both vpon the emperour and king Ferdinand, notwithſtanding that the fiue yeares league he had before taken with him at his going into PERSIA, was not yet expired. So with cheereful words and courteous entertainment comforting vp the deſperat pirat, the Spring following (which was in the yeare 1551.) he furniſhed him with a great fleet in moſt warlike manner appointed, to reuenge the iniurie done to him by Auria in AFFRICKE. With this fleet in number one hundred and fortie ſaile, Sinan one of the Turks great Baſſaes, accompanied with Dragut the pirat, by the appointment of Solyman, departed from CONSTANTINOPLE: and cutting thorow the ſeas, arriued at length in SICILY, where they ſuddenly ſurpriſed the towne and caſtle of AVGVSTA, which they preſenty ſacked. Departing thence, they came to the Iſland of MALTA, and there landed their men in the port of MARZA, otherwiſe called MOXET, neere vnto the caſtle, which they battered with certaine pieces of great ordinance, but ſo as was to no great purpoſe. At which time diuers companies of the Turkes running farther into the iſland, made hauocke of whatſoeuer came in their way. After they had thus few daies in vaine battered the caſtle, and ſaw themſelues both there valiantly repulſed, & in other places by ambuſhes and ſuch like meanes cut off by the ſouldiors and inhabitants of the iſland, they remoued thence to the road of S. Paul, where they landed their ordinance with purpoſe to haue beſieged the citie: but perceiuing by a little, what ſmall hope there was to preuaile, and ſeeing diuers of their men dying thorow the extreamitie of the heat, they forſooke the iſland and went to GAVLES now called GOZA, a little Iſland about thirtie miles in compaſſe, fiue miles diſtant from MALTA Weſt-

Malta attempted by the Turks

A Weſtward, ſubiect vnto the knights of the Religion: and there landing their men, miſerably ſpoiled the Iſland, and whatſoeuer they light vpon, and carried away with them of one ſort of people and other ſixe thouſand and three hundred captiues into moſt wofull bondage. With which bootie they put again to ſea, and ſailed directly to TRIPOLIS in BARBARIE, called of old LEPTIS MAGNA: which citie Charles the Emperour had before giuen to the knights of MALTA, and was at that time by them kept. This citie was the marke whereat the Baſſa and the pirat ſhot; for taking whereof they landed their forces, and by long and winding trenches approched as neere the ſame as they could: which they did not without great loſſe of their people; for they of the caſtle hauing good ſtore of great ordinance, and moſt expert canoniers did with continuall ſhot ſo annoy the Turks, that they were oftentimes enforced to retire; yet with
B much troubleſome labour and no leſſe peril they came at laſt within eight hundred paces of the wals: where the Baſſa cauſed his gabions made of thicke plankes, to be placed in the night, and his batterie planted. And the next day (which was the eighth of Auguſt) the cannon began to play, which was againe anſwered from the caſtle with like, and euery houre ſome of the Turkes ſlain, the great ſhot ſtill flying into their trenches, ſo as that day foure of the beſt canoniers in the armie were ſlaine, with certaine other men of good account alſo: and the clearke general of the armie, a man of great eſtimation and welbeloued of the Baſſa, had his hand ſhot off, and many other of the Ianizaries and common ſouldiors either ſlain or hurt: moreouer they brake one of their beſt pieces, and diſmounted foure others, which for that day made them to leaue the batterie. The next night the Turks approached yet neerer vnto the caſtle, vpon whom the Chriſti-
C ans in the breake of the day ſallied out euen vnto their verie trenches, and afterwards retired. With the riſing of the ſunne (which the Turks haue in great reuerence) they renued their batterie with greater force then before; yet with ſuch euill ſucceſſe, that the Baſſa was almoſt mad for anger: for about the euening the fire by miſchance got into their pouder, wherewith thirtie of the Turkes were burnt, many hurt, and one piece broken. At length the Turks were come ſo neere, that they had planted their batterie within an hundred and fiftie paces of the wall; which they continued with ſuch fury, that they had made a faire breach euen with the ditch: but what was beaten downe in the day time, the defendants repaired againe by night, in ſuch ſort, as that it was not to be aſſaulted. Yet in concluſion, a traiterous ſouldior of PROVINCE, before corrupted by the Turkes, found meanes to flie out of the caſtle into the campe, where he declared
D vnto the Baſſa the weakeſt places of the caſtle, by which it might be moſt conueniently battered and ſooneſt taken: and eſpecially one place aboue the reſt which was againſt the gouernors lodging, which ſtanding towards the ditch, and hauing vnderneath it ſellars to retire the munition into, could not if it were once battered, well be repaired againe or fortified. Which the Baſſa vnderſtanding, cauſed the battery there to be planted, laying the pieces ſo low, that they did eaſily beat the ſellars and vaults in ſuch ſort, that in ſhort time the walls were ſo ſhaken, that the rampiers aboue thorow the continuall battery, began greatly to ſinke: which ſo amaſed the ſoldiors, ſeeing no conuenient means to repaire the ſame, that ſetting all honour aſide, they requeſted the Gouernour, That ſithence the matter began now to grow deſperat, and that the place was not longer to be holden, he would in time take ſome good order with the enemie for their
E ſafetie, before the walls were further endamaged. With which motion, Vallier the Gouernour (an auncient knight of DAVLPHINIE, and one of the Order) was exceedingly troubled: which Peiſieu another of the knights perceiuing, he as a man of a great courage, and of all others there preſent moſt ancient, in the name of the other knights declared vnto them, That the breach was neither ſo great, nor ſo profitable for the enemy, but that it was defenſible enough, if they would as men of courage repaire the ſame; ſaying, That it was more honourable for worthy Knights and luſtie ſouldiors, to die valiantly with their weapons in their hands, fighting againſt the infidels for the maintenance of their law and Chriſtian religion, than ſo cowardly to yeeld themſelues to the mercie of thoſe, at whoſe hands nothing was to be looked for but moſt miſerable ſeruitude, with all kind of crueltie: and therefore perſwaded the Gouernour to hold it out to the F laſt. For all that, he ouercome with the importunitie of ſuch as would needs yeeld, who with all vehemencie vrged the imminent danger wherewith they were all like to be ouerwhelmed, and finding himſelfe bereft both of heart and fortune, and forſaken of his ſouldiers; without farther conſideration, conſented that a white enſigne ſhould be diſplayed vpon the walls, in token that they deſired parley: when a Turk preſenting himſelfe, they requeſted him to vnderſtand of the the Baſſa, if he could be contented that ſome of them might come to intreat with him of ſome good order to be taken for the yeelding vp of the caſtle. Whereunto the Baſſa willingly conſenting, two of the knights were forthwith ſent out, to offer vnto him the caſtle with the artillerie and munition, ſo as he would furniſh them with ſhips to bring them with bag and baggage ſafely to MALTA. Whereunto the Baſſa briefly anſwered, That (foraſmuch as they had as yet deſerued no grace, preſuming to keep ſo ſmall a place againſt the army of the greateſt prince on earth) if they would pay the whole charges of the armie, hee would condiſend to their requeſt; or if they would not thereunto conſent, that for recompence all they within the caſtle ſhould continue his ſlaues and priſoners: notwithſtanding if they incontinently and without delay did ſurrender the place, he would exempt out of them two hundred. Whereupon the meſſengers returning in diſpaire, were ſtaied by Dragut and Salla Rais, with flatring words and faire promiſes, that they would ſo much as lay in them, perſuade the Baſſa to condiſcend to a more gratious compoſition: fearing indeed that the beſieged through diſpaire would reſolue (as their extreme refuge) to defend to place euen to the laſt man. Wherefore they went preſently to the Baſſa, to declare vnto him his ouerſight in refuſing them who volũtarily would haue put themſelues into his hands, whom reaſon would he ſhould with all courteſie haue receiued: for that after he had the caſtle & the men in his power, he might diſpoſe of them as he ſhould think good. The Baſſa liking well of his counſell, cauſed the meſſengers to be called again, and with fained and diſſembling words told them, That at the inſtance of Dragut and Salla Rais there preſent, hee did diſcharge them of all the coſts and charges of the army, ſwearing vnto them (the better to deceiue them) by the head of his lord and his owne, inuiolably to obſerue all that he had promiſed vnto them: which they (too eaſily) beleeued, and forthwith went to declare the ſame vnto the Gouernour, and others within the caſtle. The Baſſa, the better to come to the effect of his deſire, after theſe meſſengers ſent a craftie Turke, whom he charged expreſſely to perſuade the Gouernour to come with him into the campe, for the full concluſion of the giuing vp of the caſtle, and for the appointing of ſuch veſſels as ſhould be needfull for their ſafe conduct to MALTA; and that if he made any doubt to come, he ſhould make ſhew as if he would there remain in hoſtage for him: but aboue all things, to conſider of the ſtrength and aſſurance of the beſieged, and of the diſpoſition of all things there. Which the ſubtile Turke ſo finely handled, that the Gouernour by the counſell of thoſe who had perſwaded him to yeeld, notwithſtanding the reaſons of wars and dutie of his office forbad him in ſuch manner to abandon the place of his charge, reſolued vpon ſo ſmall an aſſurance of the Baſſa, and gaue eare to the miſerable end of his fortune. So taking with him a knight of his houſhold (to ſend backe vnto thoſe of the caſtle, to declare vnto them how he ſped in the camp) vnder the conduct of the Turke that was come to fetch him, he went ſtraight to the tent of the Baſſa: who by the Turke that went firſt in, was aduertiſed of the ſmall courage of the defendants, which he aſſured him to be no better, but that if he thought it good, he might bring them to ſuch order and agreement as hee would himſelfe. Vpon whoſe perſuaſion calling in the Gouernour Vallier, after he had rigorouſly reproued his raſhneſſe, ſaid vnto him, That foraſmuch as he had once giuen his word, if hee would pay the charges of the armie, he was content to let them go with bag and baggage, otherwiſe hee would diſcharge but two hundred. Whereat the Gouernour greatly mooued, anſwered, That that was not according to his laſt promiſe vnto the knights before ſent. But when he ſaw it would be no better, he requeſted him that he might againe returne to the caſtle to know the minds of the reſt: which the falſe Baſſa would by no meanes grant, but only permitted him to ſend backe the knight that he had brought with him, to make report of theſe hard newes to the beſieged: as for the Gouernour, he was ſent to the gallies with yrons on his heeles. When they of the caſtle vnderſtood what had paſſed betwixt the Baſſa and the Gouernour, they began exceedingly to feare the miſchiefe then at hand: yet tooke no other reſolution, but to returne the ſaid knight to the Baſſa, to know whether they ſhould expect from him no better anſwere. Who as ſoone as he was come before him, the captaine of the caſtle was brought in, of whom the Baſſa asked, Which of the two he would chuſe, either to pay the expences of the army, or elſe both he and all the reſt to remaine his priſoners? Whereunto the Gouernour anſwered, That a ſlaue had no other authoritie than that which by his maſter was giuen him; and that hauing loſt (beſides his libertie) the power to command, if any thing were yet reſerued in him, could not counſell him to comaund others to agree vnto any thing, but that which was concluded with them which were before ſent.

Hard conditions offered by the Baſſa to the beſieged.

More eaſie conditions offred by the Baſſa, which he confirmeth by his oath.

The warie anſwere of the gouernour to the Baſſa.

A ſent. Which thing the Baſſa hearing, for feare that ſuch a reſolute anſwere ſhould come to the knowledge of the beſieged, and cauſe them to become deſperat; hauing taken counſell with his other captaines, hee tooke the Gouernour by the hand, and with a ſmiling and diſſembling countenance told him, That he would without any doubt let them depart as he had promiſed; and that therefore without fearing any thing, hee ſhould cauſe them all to come out of the caſtle. But the Gouernour, becauſe he had beene before deceiued, would not truſt to his word, but ſaid vnto him, That he might commaund him that was come from the caſtle, for that he knew they would now doe neuer a whit the more for him. So the Baſſa turning towards the other knight, commaunded him forthwith to goe vnto them in the caſtle, and to cauſe them to come forth, ſwearing againe as before, by the head of his great lord, and his
B owne, That they ſhould all be deliuered and ſet at libertie, according to the conuentions firſt agreed vpon. Which the knight beleeuing, went to report to them this good newes: which they receiued with ſuch ioy, that without further care or conſideration of their miſhap ſo neere, they ran in preaſe with their wiues children and beſt mooueables, ſtriuing who ſhould firſt get out. But they were no ſooner iſſued, but they were by the enemies ſpoiled of all they had, and taken priſoners; part of the knights were ſent to the gallies, and the reſt to the Baſſa. Who being by the Gouernour put in remembrance of his faith twice giuen, anſwered, That there was no faith to be kept with dogs, and that they had firſt violated their oath with his great lord, vnto whom at the giuing ouer of the RHODES, they had (as he ſaid) ſworne neuer more to beare armes againſt the Turkes. The caſtle was forthwith taken and ſpoiled, and about
C two hundred Moores of that countrey that had ſerued the knights, cut in peeces, and thereupon a great peale of ordinance diſcharged, with great cries and ſhouts in ſigne of their victorie. Thus the ſtrong caſtle and auntient citie of TRIPOLIS in BARBARIE was deliuered to the Turks the fifteenth day of Auguſt, in the yeare 1551. Whilſt the Baſſa lay at this ſiege, the lord of ARRAMONT, who had many yeares lien embaſſador from Francis the French king at CONSTANTINOPLE, and was now ſent againe by Henrie the ſecond, came to the Turks campe, being requeſted ſo to doe by the Great Maſter of the RHODES, to haue diſſuaded the Baſſa from that ſiege: wherein he nothing preuailed. Yet now greeued to ſee how the faithleſſe Turke, contrarie to his oath, moſt villanouſly entreated the Gouernour and the other knights, lying at his feet as men halfe deſperat, was ſo bold as to put him in mind of his promiſe, confirmed by his oath;
D which if he would not keep, that yet at the leaſt according to his own voluntarie offer, he would releaſe two hundred of them: but he excuſed himſelfe as before, ſaying, That no faith was to be kept with dogs, which had firſt broken their owne faith. Yet afterwards he condiſcended, that two hundred of the eldeſt and ſuch as were moſt vnfit for ſeruice (amongſt whom was comprehended the Gouernour and certaine other old knights) ſhould be ſet at libertie, who were forthwith ſent aboord the French embaſſadours gallies, and by him tranſported to MALTA: where they were but hardly welcome, for that they had ſo cowardly ſurrendered a place, which they might much longer haue defended. The next day after the caſtle was deliuered, which was the 16 of Auguſt, the proud Baſſa for ioy of this victorie made a ſolemne dinner, wherunto he inuited the French embaſſadour, and Vallier the late Gouernour: which they refuſed not to come
E vnto, in hope to recouer ſome moe priſoners. This great feaſt for the more magnificence was kept in the caſtle ditch againſt the breach, where were ſet vp two ſtately pauillions, the one for the Baſſa, and the other for the embaſſadour and his companie, where he was honourably feaſted with wonderfull plentie both of fleſh and fiſh and good wines, which they had found in the caſtle; which ſeruice was done with muſicke of diuers ſorts, and officers in number aboue a hundred, apparelled for moſt part in long gowns of fine cloth of gold, tuffed or fringed; & the other of veluet or damaske. The Baſſa was no ſooner ſet downe, but all the ordinance of the fleet was diſcharged with ſuch a noiſe and thundering, that it ſeemed the heauens and skies did ſhake. The table being taken vp, the embaſſadour and the late Gouernour Vallier, entred into the pauillion
F of the Baſſa, and beſide the two hundred men which he had promiſed, obtained twentie moe, vpon the embaſſadors promiſe, That he ſhould for them cauſe to be releaſed thirtie Turks taken at MALTA, at the landing of the armie there. The Turks hauing in their hands an antient gunner of the caſtle, called Iohn de Chabas borne in DAVLPHINE (to the end that this triumphant feaſt ſhould not be vnfurniſhed of ſome cruell ſacrifice of the Chriſtian blood) for that he had in time of the ſiege ſhot off the hand of the clarke generall of the armie, brought him into the towne, towne, and when they had cut off his hands and his nose, put him quicke into the ground to the waist, and there for their pleasure shot at him with their arrowes, & afterward to make an end of him cut his throat. The Bassa shortly after departing out of BARBARIE, left Dragus the pyrat Gouernour of TRIPOLIS, honouring him with the title of the Sanzacke of that place: from whence he many yeares after grieuously molested the Moores neere vnto him by land, and the Christians by sea. The same yeare 1551, Solyman notwithstanding the fiue yeares peace before taken with king Ferdinand at his going into PERSIA, sent Achomates his lieutenant in EVROPE with a great power into HVNGARIE, who with Haly the Bassa of BVDA inuaded the vpper part of HVNGARIE, and first tooke the citie of TEMESVVARE, and contrarie to their faith giuen, slew the garrison souldiours: after that they tooke also the castle of ZOLNOK, forsaken by the Christians, and certaine other small castles. But laying siege to ERSAM, they were partly by the valiantnesse of the defendants, & partly by the comming on of Winter enforced to forsake the siege, and to get themselues into their wintering places.

Queene Isabell, king Iohn his widdow, seeing the Turkes dayly encroching vpon that little they had left her, and that she was not able by any meanes to defend TRANSILVANIA against them; by the aduise of George bishop of VERADIVM her old counsellor, agreed with king Ferdinand to deliuer vnto him the gouernment of the countrey, with all the royall dignitie of HVNGARIE, for which she was to haue of him CASSOVIA, and a yearely pension of an hundred thousand duckats. Which agreement made and thorowly concluded by Baptista Castallius (an Italian, whom Charles the emperour had but a little before sent to aid king Ferdinand) the queen returned into POLONIA, her natiue countrey: and so king Ferdinand by that meanes obtained almost all the prouince of TRANSILVANIA, and what else the queene had in HYNGARIE. But the bishop, a little before made a cardinall, being suspected by Baptista the Italian, that he fauoured the Turks faction more than king Ferdinand, and by that meanes sought to get the gouernment to himselfe, was by the Italians deuice suddenly murthered in his owne house at VERADIVM: an end good ynough for so troublesome a prelat.

Haly the Bassa of BVDA proud of the good successe he had the yeare before, vnderstanding that diuers of the cheefe Hungarians had withdrawne themselues into the castle of AGRIA, purposed in himselfe with all his power to besiege it, and there to take them. So aided by Achomates, Chasan, and other of the Turks Sanzakes and captaines by Solymans appointment readie at his call, he came with an armie of fiue and thirtie thousand Turkes, and the 10 of September in the yeare 1552, encamped round about the castle: where after he had placed his artillerie, he began a most furious batterie. But doubting to preuaile that way, he attempted also to vndermine the castle, omitting nothing that could be deuised for the taking thereof: but all in vaine, for the Hungarians by the good direction of Stephanus Dobus their captaine, couragiously endured the siege, and very manfully repulsed the enemie. At length, the nine and twentieth of September the enemie with eight and twentie ensignes of select souldiours gaue a fresh assault to the castle, and were by the defendants enforced shamefully to retire: at which time foure and twentie barrels of gunpouder by mischance caught fire, & besides that it blew vp diuers captains and souldiours, did much harme in the castle, to the great dismaying of the defendants. After that, the Turkes with incredible pertinacie the twelfth of October fiercely assaulted the castle from morning vntill night, and for desire of reuenge and hope of spoile left nothing vnattempted for the gaining of the place; but were by the greater valour of the Hungarians beaten backe, and with great losse enforced at last to giue ouer the assault. Thus the Bassa nothing preuailing by force, attempted by great promises and large offers to haue bought them out: which he vnderstanding to be nothing regarded, and his letters scornfully burnt, brought on his souldiors again, & gaue vnto them in the castle a most furious assault, but with no better successe than before: for hauing lost many of his best souldiors, he was enforced to retire. So after he had in vaine six weekes besieged the castle, he was glad to raise his siege, and to retire to PESTVM. After whose departure there was found twelue thousand great shot, wherewith he had battered the wall. In this siege six thousand Turkes were slaine, and of the Hungarians but three hundred. King Ferdinand glad of this victorie, made Stephanus the worthie captaine, Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA, and bountifully rewarded the other captaines and souldiors as they had well deserued.

The Turkes giue ouer the siege of Agria.

Henrie the French king, who together with his kingdome had as it seemed receiued the hereditarie quarrels of Francis his father against Charles the emperour, had by his embassadour the lord

A lord of ARAMONT ſo wrought the matter with Solyman, that the more to trouble the emperour, he ſent a great fleet into the Tyrrhenum or Tuſcane ſea, which in the yeare 1553 and the yeare following, did great harme vpon the coaſts of CALABRIA, SICILIA, SARDINIA, as alſo in the iſlands of ELBA, CORSICA, GERBE, and MAIORCA, and ſuch like places on the frontiers of the emperours dominions: yet were the Turkes in moſt places notably againe repulſed by the people of thoſe countries. The ſame yeare Solyman ſeduced by Roxolana (ſometime his faire concubine, but then his imperious wife) and Ruſtan Baſſa his ſonne in law, moſt vnnaturally murdered his eldeſt ſonne Muſtapha, the mirrour of the Othomon familie: Which tragicall fact, the like whereof both for the trecherous contriuing and inhuman execution hath ſeldome times beene heard of, I haue thought good heere in due time to ſet downe, in ſuch ſort
B as it is by moſt credible writers of that time reported.

Solyman after the manner of the Othoman kings, who to auoid the participation of their ſoueraigntie, vſe not oftentimes to marrie (but otherwiſe to ſatisfie their pleaſure which ſuch beautifull concubines as it pleaſeth them to make choiſe of, out of the faireſt captiues of all nations, moſt daintily brought vp for that purpoſe in the court) had by a Circaſſian bondwoman, a ſon called Muſtapha; who for his wonderfull towardlineſſe and rare perfection was amongſt the Turkes had in ſuch expectation and admiration, as that they in nothing accounted themſelues more happie, than in the hope laid vp in him: whoſe noble carriage was ſuch, as thereby hee ſo poſſeſſed the minds of all men in generall, but eſpecially of the men of warre, that he was
C reputed the glorie of the court, the floure of chiualrie, the hope of the ſouldiors, and ioy of the people. Whileſt he thus grew, encreaſing both in yeares and fauour: it fortuned with Solyman as it doth with men delighting in change, that he became amorous of Roxolana, of ſome called Roſa (but more truly Hazathya) by condition a captiue, but ſo graced with beautie and courtly behauiour, that in ſhort time ſhe became miſtreſſe of his thoughts, and commaundreſſe of him that all commaunded: And that which more eſtabliſhed her in poſſeſſion of his loue, ſhe had in time made him father of foure faire ſonnes, Mahomet, Selymus, Baiazet, and Tzihanger, and one daughter called Chameria married to Ruſtan or Ruſtemes the great Baſſa. In this height of worldly bliſſe nothing troubled her more than the exceeding credit of Muſtapha, Solymans eldeſt ſonne by the Circaſſian woman; who honoured of the greateſt, and beloued of the reſt, ſtood onely in D her light, embarring her and hers (as ſhe thought) of the hope of the empire, which ſhee now aboue all things ſought to bring to one of her owne ſonnes: which the better to compaſſe, ſhe vnder the colour of great good will and loue, procured that Muſtapha the young prince and his mother ſhould as it were for their greater honour and ſtate with a princely allowance be ſent into CARAMANIA to gouerne that great country, far from the court. Which was no great matter for her to bring to paſſe: for that the Turkiſh emperors vſually ſend their ſonnes after they come to any yeares of diſcretion vnto ſuch prouinces as are farre from the court, attended vpon with one great Baſſa and ſome graue doctor of their law, ſo to acquaint them with the manner of gouernment; the Baſſa inſtructing them in matters of ciuile policie, and the doctor in matters concerning their ſuperſtition: and yet by ſending them a farre off, to keep them from aſpiring to the empire by the fauour of the court (a thing by the Turkiſh emperors not vnworthely feared, euē
E in their own and beloued children.) Roxolana hauing at once thus cunningly rid the court of the great competitours both of her loue and of the empire (things of all others enduring no partners) reſted not ſo, but began ſtraightway to plot in her malitious head the vtter deſtruction of him, to whom all others wiſhed all happineſſe. This ſhe ſaw was not to be brought to paſſe without ſome complices: wherefore after ſhe had in her ſecret conceit diſcarded many, of whom at firſt ſhe had reaſonable good liking; at laſt ſhe made choice of Ruſtan Baſſa her ſonne in law, vpon whom ſhe would ſet vp her reſt. This Ruſtan was a man baſely borne in EPIRVS, altogether compoſed of diſſimulation and flatterie, euer ſeruing his owne turne, were it neuer ſo much to the hurt or greeuance of others; by which meanes he, although none of the beſt ſouldiors, was yet by many degrees growne vp to be the greateſt man in the court, and Solymans ſonne in law:
F him ſhe probably thought to wiſh the ſucceſſion of the empire to one of her owne ſonnes, his wiues full brethren, rather than to Muſtapha her halfe brother. Beſide that, ſhe was not ignorant how that Ruſtan as one careful of the emperors profit, the readieſt way to preferment, had abridged the penſions and fees of the officers and ſeruitours in court: which he perceiuing to pleaſe the emperour, proceeded ſo farre therein, that he attempted to haue cut off, if it had beene poſſible, ſome part of Muſtapha his princely allowance: for which doing, ſhe knew how odious he was to all the courtiers (wherof he made ſmall reckoning) but eſpecially to Muſtapha, inſomuch that it was thought he would not forget ſo notorious an iniurie, if euer he ſhould obtain the empire. Hereupon ſhe brake with Ruſtan vpon the matter, whom ſhe found readie ynough of himſelfe, to do what in him lay to further her miſchieuous deſire. G

Roxolana conſpireth with Ruſtan Baſſa her ſonne in law againſt Muſtapha.

To begin this intended tragedie, ſhe vpon the ſudden became very deuout, and being by the fauour of Solyman growne exceeding rich, pretended as if it had beene vpon a deuout zeale, for the health of her ſoule; after the manner of their Turkiſh ſuperſtition to build an Abbey with an Hoſpitall and a Church: which ſo godly a purpoſe ſhe imparted to the Muphti or chief Mahometane prieſt, demaunding of him, If ſuch workes of charitie were not acceptable vnto God, and auaileable for her ſoules health. Whereunto the Muphti anſwered, That thoſe workes were no doubt gracious in the ſight of God, but nothing at all meritorious for her ſoules health, being a bondwoman; yet very profitable for the ſoule of the great emperour Solyman, vnto whom as vnto her lord both ſhe and all ſhe had appertained. With which anſwere of the great prieſt ſhe ſeemed to be exceedingly troubled, and therupon became wonderfull penſiue & melancholie, her cheerefull countenance was replete with ſadneſſe, and her faire eies flowed with teares, her mirth was mourning, and her ioy heauineſſe. Which thing Solyman perceiuing, and ſorrie to ſee his loue vpon conceit ſo to languiſh, ſent her word to be of good cheere, and to comfort herſelf, promiſing in ſhort time to take ſuch a courſe as ſhould eaſe her of all her griefs: which he forthwith did, ſolemnly manumiſing her from her bond eſtate. So great a fauour obtained, Roxolana with great cheerefulneſſe began thoſe meritorious works by her before intended, as if ſhe had thought of nothing but heauen, whereas indeed her thoughts were in the depth of hell. When ſhe had thus a good while buſied herſelfe in pauing the way to heauen, as was ſuppoſed, Solyman not able longer to forbeare the companie of her, in whom his ſoule liued, after his wonted maner ſent for her by one of his eunuchs, who ſhould haue brought her to his bed chamber: to whom ſhe with her eies caſt vp to heauen, demurely anſwered, That her life and whatſoeuer els ſhe had, was at her dread ſoueraignes commaund, but againe to yeeld her bodie vnto his appetite, ſhe might not in any caſe do, without the great offence of the high God, and manifeſt breach of his ſacred laws, which permitted her not now voluntarily to yeeld him that, being free, which he before without offence might commaund of his bondwoman: and becauſe ſhe would not ſeeme to vſe this as an excuſe, ſhe referred herſelf in all things to the graue iudgement of the learned and reuerend Muphti, with whom ſhe had before at full conferred. This ſhe did, preſuming of the ſoueraigntie ſhe had ouer that great Monarch, whom ſhe right well knew ſhe had ſo faſt bound in the pleaſing fetters of his affection towards her, as that ſhe was ſure ynough of him without a keeper. Solyman rauiſhed with her loue, and well the more for her deniall, ſent for the Muphti, requiring his iudgement in the matter; who before inſtructed in all points, agreed with that Roxolana had ſaid, agrauating the heinouſneſſe of the fact, if he ſhould proceed to enforce her as his ſlaue, whom being now free, he might not without great offence touch vnmarried. Whereupon Solyman more and more burning in his deſires, became a freſh ſuter to her for mariage, whom he had ſo often before commaunded: which his ſuit eaſily obtained (as the marke ſhe had all this while aimed at) he with all ſpeed to the great admiration of all men, and contrarie to the maner of the Mahometan emperors, ſolemnly maried her; appointing for her yearely dowrie fiue thouſand Sultanyns. But here before we proceed any farther, ſtay a while and take the view of that faire face whereon this great Monarch ſo much doted, as it is by the skilfull workemans hand moſt liuely expreſſed.

Roxolana plot-teth the confuſi-on of Muſtapha.

Thiswoman of late a ſlaue, but now become the greateſt empereſſe of the Eaſt, flowing in all worldly felicitie, attended vpon with all the pleaſures her heart could deſire, wanted nothing
F ſhe could wiſh, but how to find means that the Turkiſh empire might after the death of Solyman be brought to ſome one of her owne ſonnes. This was it that had (as we haue before ſaid) long troubled her aſpiring mind; and in the middeſt of all her bliſſe, ſuffered her yet to take no reſt. Noble Muſtapha, Solymans eldeſt ſonne, and heire apparant of the empire, although farre abſent, was yet ſtill before her eies preſent; his credit, his valour, his vertues, his perfections were all bars to her deſires: he was the only cloud that kept the ſunne from ſhining on her; if he by any any meanes might be taken away, then wanted nothing that ſhe deſired. Which to bring to G paſſe, the wicked woman laboured cunningly by little and little to breed in Solymans head no ſmall ſuſpition of Muſtapha, That he being a young man of a hautie ſpirit, deſirous of ſoueraigntie, generally beloued, and ſwelling with the immoderat fauour of the men of war, which were all at his diuotion, left nothing elſe to be expected of him, but when he ſhould (as did his grandfather Selymus) lay hand vpon the empire, and worke his aged fathers deſtruction. This miſ-

For he, as a great ſecret, craftily told all them that were ſent gouernours into SYRIA, that Muſtapha was ſecretly ſuſpected by his father of aſpiring to the kingdome; and therefore charged them particularly, carefully to obſerue all his actions, with the H maner of his life and gouernment, and by their letters diligently to aduertiſe him of whatſoeuer they ſhould ſee or heare; bearing them in hand, that the more ſuſpitiouſly or odiouſly they ſhould write of him, the more gracious and acceptable it would be vnto the great Sultan. Wherfore he by theſe men, oftentimes certified of the princely diſpoſition, courage, wiſedome, valour, and bountie of Muſtapha, whereby he had woon all mens hearts; ſaw plainly, that he would at length be vndoubtedly preferred to the empire: yet durſt he not for all that, aduenture to temper with Solyman about that deteſtable conſpiracie againſt the inocent prince, but ſtill deliuering the letters to the malitious woman, left the reſt by her vngratious head to be wrought. And ſhe ſtill as occaſion beſt ſerued her purpoſe, ceaſed not with pleaſing allurements and flatterie (wherein ſhe was moſt excellent) to infect Solymans mind, that whenſoeuer he ſhould chance to haue any I ſpeech of Muſtapha, ſhe might take the fitter occaſion to bring forth thoſe letters. Neither was ſhe in her drift deceiued, but hauing found a fit opportunitie, with teares trickling downe her cheekes (which to ſerue their turns ſubtile women ſeldome want) ſhe told the emperour in what danger he ſtood, recounting amongſt other things, how Selymus his father had by ſuch meanes depriued Baiazet his grandfather, both of his life and empire togither: and therefore moſt inſtantly beſought him, as if it had altogither proceeded of a careful loue, by that example warned to looke to himſelfe. But theſe light arguments of ſuſpition, ſeemed as they were indeed vnto Solyman ſcarce probable; ſo that ſhe little preuailed thereby. Which thing ſhe well perceiuing, and inwardly grieued thereat, conuerted her cruel mind to other miſchieuous deuiſes, & ſought Muſtapha in danger to haue been poiſoned by Roxolana. by all meanes how to poyſon the young prince: neither wanted there wicked men (as it were K vowed to all kind of miſchiefe and villanie) readie to haue performed what ſhe deſired, had not Gods prouidence withſtood ſo horrrible a practiſe. For whereas certaine rich apparell was by her ſent vnto him in his fathers name, he fearing the worſt, would not touch it before he had cauſed it to be worne by one of his ſeruants; by which curious warineſſe (as it was thought) he for that time preuented the treaſon of his wicked ſtepdame, and made her malitious practiſe manifeſt to the world. Yet reſted ſhe not ſo, but was ſtill plotting new deuiſes tending all to one purpoſe: for being growne to that height of honour and power as neuer was woman in the Othoman court, and by the meanes of Trongilla a Iew (as it was thought) hauing bewitched the mind of the Turkiſh emperour, ſhe ſtill grew more and more in fauour, and obtained that her ſonnes might by turnes be ſtill preſent in the court: of purpoſe, that by their daily preſence L and continuall flatterie, they ſhould more & more procure their fathers loue; and if by chance Muſtapha ſhould come thither, ſhe might haue the better meanes to diſpatch him: if nor, to expect ſome other fit time, when ſhe might by ſome one or other meane take him away. But Muſtapha neuer comming (for why, the emperors ſons vſe not without their fathers leaue to go out of the prouinces aſſigned vnto them, or to come to CONSTANTINOPLE, but after the death of their father to receiue the empire, attended vpon with a number of ſouldiors) ſhe eaſily deuiſed another practiſe: that her ſonnes ſhould wait vpon their father, not in the citie onely, but in the prouinces alſo; ſo that Tzihanger ſurnamed Crouchbacke, alwaies followed his father in the campe. Certaine yeares thus ſpent, and ſhe ſtill hammering her miſchieuous deuiſes: at length fortune fauouring her wicked deſire, got from the Baſſa which had the gouernement of Muſta- M pha and the prouince of AMASIA (for as we haue ſaid, euery one of the kings ſons hath with him one Baſſa, which is as it were his lieutenant in adminiſtration of juſtice and martiall affaires) certaine ſuſpitious letters; wherin was contained, that there was a ſpeech of a marriage to be made betwixt Muſtapha and the Perſian kings daughter: which thing he thought good to giue knowledge

A ledge of to the Counſel,that if any harme ſhould enſue thereof,he might be out of all ſuſpition. Theſe letters being brought to Ruſtan,he thought he had now as good as halfe brought to end the long deſired ruine of Muſtapha: ſo making no ſtay, he opened the matter to Roxolana,and afterwards both together went to the court,and declared all the matter to the emperour; in doing whereof, they forced both their vngratious wits to fill his head, yet doubtfull with ſuſpition,and to poſſeſſe his mind with the feare of his owne moſt dutifull ſonne: ſaying, That he as a proud and ambitious yong man,rauiſhed with the deſire of ſo glorious an empire, ſought againſt the lawes both of God and nature,to take his father out of the way,that ſo he might with more ſpeed ſatisfie his aſpiring mind. And to giue the more credit to this their moſt falſe ſuggeſtion,they warned him of the alliance by him purpoſed with the Perſian king,the auncient ene-
B mie of the Othoman emperors,wiſhing him to beware, leaſt Muſtapha ſupported by the ſtrength of PERSIA,and the fauor of the Sanzacks and Ianizaries,whoſe loue he had by bountie purchaſed,ſhould in ſhort time when he feared leaſt,together depriue him both of his life and empire. With theſe and ſuch like accuſations,they ſo preuailed with the aged man whom they neuer ſuffered to reſt in quiet,that he at length reſolued to worke his ſafetie (as he ſuppoſed) by the death of his owne ſonne,in this ſort.

In the yeare 1552,he cauſed proclamation to be made almoſt in all the prouinces of his empire, That for as much as the Perſians without reſiſtance with a great armie inuaded SIRIA, burning and deſtroying the countrey before them, hee to repreſſe that their ouragious inſolence, was enforced to ſend thither Ruſtan Baſſa with an armie: which according to his appointment
C was in ſhort time raiſed. Now when all things were in readineſſe, as if it had been for ſuch a warre as was pretended, he commaunded Ruſtan, with as much ſecrecie, and as little tumult as vvas poſſible, to lay hands vpon Muſtapha, and to bring him bound to CONSTANTINOPLE: which if he could not conueniently effect, then, by any other meanes to take him out of the way.

Solyman ſendeth Ruſtan Baſſa with an army to take Muſtapha.

With this wicked and cruell charge Ruſtan with a ſtrong armie marched towards SIRIA. Muſtapha vnderſtanding of his comming,without delay with 7000 of the beſt horſemen in all Turkie,made towards SIRIA alſo: whereof Ruſtan hearing,and perceiuing that he could not(as he deſired)conueniently execute the cruell command of the vnnatural father,forthwith turned his backe,and treading the ſame ſteps he came, returned with his armie to CONSTANTINOPLE
D with ſuch ſpeed, that he endured not to behold the very duſt raiſed by Muſtapha his horſmen, much leſſe his preſence: giuing it out, That he certainely vnderſtood,that the prouince was in quiet(as indeed it was) and that he thereupon returned. But vnto Solyman he told another tale in ſecret,which he maliciouſly had deuiſed, That he by moſt apparant ſignes and manifeſt preſumptions had perceiued the whole armie ſo enclined towards Muſtapha, that if hee ſhould haue attempted any thing againſt him by plaine force,he ſhould haue beene vtterly forſaken, and had therefore in ſo dangerous a caſe left the matter as it was to his graue further direction. This tale ſuſpitiouſly told, raiſed in the wicked and vnnaturall father (nothing degenerating from the naturall crueltie of his auncеſtors) new and great ſuſpitions,whereof to disburden his diſquieted mind,he conceiued with himſelfe a moſt horrible deuice. Wherefore the yeare fol-
E lowing, which was the yeare 1553, he raiſed a great armie,giuing it out, That the Perſians had with greater power then before inuaded SIRIA, and that therefore he for the loue of his countrey,and defence of his empire was determined to go thither with his armie,and in perſon himſelfe to repreſſe the attempts of his enemies. Wherfore the armie being aſſembled,and all things neceſſarie orderly prouided, he commaunded to ſet forward, and in few dayes after followed himſelfe: who comming at length into SIRIA, preſently by truſtie meſſengers commaunded Muſtapha to come vnto him at ALEPPO,for there he lay encamped. And yet for all theſe ſhaddowes,the matter was not ſo cloſely by Solyman conueyed(although he was exceeding carefull thereof) but that his mortall and deadly hatred againſt his ſonne was perceiued by the Baſſaes and other great men about him: inſomuch, that Achmat Baſſa by a ſecret and truſtie meſſenger
F gaue him warning thereof,that ſo he might in time the better prouide for the ſafegard of his life. Neither could Muſtapha himſelfe but maruell, that his aged father without any apparent reaſon ſhould come ſo far with ſo great an armie: yet truſting to his owne innocencie,though wonderfully troubled and perplexed in mind, he reſolued (although it were with the extreame danger of his life) to obey and yeeld to his fathers command: for he thought it more commendable and

In ſo great a perplexitie of mind, after he had with himſelfe much diſcourſed too and fro what courſe hee were beſt to take, at length he boldly and reſolutely asked the doctor whom (as we haue before ſaid) he had alwaies with him in his court, Whether the empire of the world or a bleſſed life were of man more to be deſired? to whom the doctor frankly anſwered, That the empire of the world, to him that would enter into the due conſideration thereof, brought with it no felicitie, more than a vain ſhew & vtter apparance of good, nothing being more fraile or vncertaine than wordly honour, bringing with it feare, vexation of mind, tribulation, ſuſpition, murder, wrong, wickedneſſe, ſpoile, ruine and captiuitie, with infinit miſchiefs of like nature not to be deſired of him that would attaine to true felicitie, by which means the bleſſed life was to be loſt and not gained: But they vnto whom God had giuen the grace, rightly to conſider and H weigh the fragilitie and ſhortneſſe of this our eſtate (which the common ſort deemeth to be the onely life) and to ſtriue againſt the vanities of this world, and to embrace and follow an vpright kind of life, had vndoubtedly a place aſſigned for them in heauen, & prepared by the great God where they ſhould at length enioy life and bliſſe eternall. This anſwer of the great doctor wonderfully ſatiſfied the troubled mind of the yong prince, foreſeeing as it were the approch of his

But this his ſo haſtie comming the more increaſed the ſuſpition in the mind of his wicked father: neither ſpared Ruſtan in the mean time with his craftie and ſubtile deuiſes to augment the ſame: for by a ſigne giuen he cauſed the Ianizaries and chiefe men in the armie to goe I as if it had beene for honours ſake to meete Muſtapha; which they all without delay preſently did at his commaund, and ſo altogither ſet forward. In the meane time, he the moſt craftie varlet with troubled countenance (for he could notably diſſemble) as a man halfe diſmaied came

Which newes ſo troubled the old tyrant, that he became pale for feare, and going out of his tent, and finding them gone, eaſily beleeued all to be true that the falſe Baſſa had told him. Neither wanted Muſtapha ſtrange warning of his end ſo neere at hand, for the third day before his ſetting forwards towards his father, falling a ſleepe in the euening, he

into a moſt pleaſant place, beautified with moſt glorious and ſtately pallaces, and moſt delicate and pleaſant gardens; and pointing to euerie thing with his finger, to ſay thus vnto him, Here reſt they for euer, which in this world haue led an vpright and godly life, following vertue and deteſting vice: and after that turning his face to the other ſide, to haue ſhewed him two great and ſwift riuers, wherof the one boyled with water blacker than pitch, and in them appeared (as he thought) numbers of men wallowing and tumbling ſome vp, ſome downe, crying horribly for mercie: And there (ſaid he) are puniſhed all ſuch as in this fraile life haue bin the malicious workers of iniquitie, the chiefe of whom (as he ſaid) were emperors, kings, princes, and other great men of the world. Muſtapha awaking, and troubled with this melancholie dreame, called vnto L him his doctor: and hauing told him all the matter, asked him what the ſame might ſignifie? who ſtanding a great while in a muſe (for the Mahometans are exceeding ſuperſtitious, attributing much vnto dreames) full of ſorrow and griefe, at length anſwered, That this viſion (for ſo it pleaſed him to tearme it) was vndoubtedly to be feared, as preſaging vnto him the extreame peril of his life, and therfore requeſted him to haue great care both of his life and honour. But Muſtapha as he was of a notable ſpirit and courage, regarding nothing that anſwer, ſtoutly replied: What, ſhall I ſuffer my ſelfe to be terrified and ouercome with childiſh and vaine feare? why rather haſt I not couragiouſly and reſolutly to my father? and ſo much the more boldly, becauſe I know aſſuredly I haue alwaies (as reaſon vvas) reuerenced his maieſtie, that againſt his will I neuer turned mine eies or foot againſt his moſt roiall ſeat, much leſſe affected his empire, except the moſt high God had called him to a better life, neither then vvithout the generall good liking & choiſe M of the whole armie, that ſo I might at length vvithout murder, without bloud, vvithout tyranny, well and iuſtly raigne, and in loue and peace inuiolate liue with my brethren: for I haue ſet down vvith my ſelfe, & choſen, if it be my fathers pleaſure ſo, rather to die in his obedience, then raigning many yeares, to be reputed of all men, eſpecially my competitours, a rebell or traitor.

Hauing

A Hauing thus ſaid, he came vnto his fathers camp, and pitching his tents (as we haue before ſaid) ſuted himſelfe all in white, in token of his innocencie, and writing certaine letters (which the Turks when they are about to go to any place of danger, vſe to write, and alwaies to carry with them, for they are wonderfull fooliſh in their ſuperſtition) and putting them in his boſome, attended vpon with a few of his moſt truſtie followers, came with great reuerence towards the tent of his father, fully reſoluing to haue kiſſed his hand, as their vſuall manner is. But when he was come to the entrance of the tent, remembring that he had yet his dagger girt to him, hee entred not vntill he had put it off; becauſe hee would not come into his fathers ſight with any weapon, if happily ſo hee might cleare himſelfe of his fathers needleſſe ſuſpition. So when he was come into the more inward roomes of the tent, he was with ſuch honour as be-
B longed to his ſtate cherefully receiued by his fathers eunuchs. But ſeeing nothing elſe prouided but one ſeat whereon to ſit himſelfe alone, he perplexed in mind, ſtood ſtill a while muſing, at length asked where the emperour his father was? Whereunto they anſwered, That he ſhould by and by ſee him: and with that caſting his eye aſide, hee ſaw ſeauen Muts (theſe are ſtrong men, bereft of their ſpeech, whom the Turkiſh tyrants haue alwayes in readineſſe, the more ſecretly to execute their bloudy butcherie) comming from the other ſide of the tent towards him: at whoſe ſight ſtrucken with a ſudden terrour, ſaid no more, but Lo my death, and with that, ariſing, was about to haue fled: but in vaine, for he was caught hold on by the eunuch and Muts, and by force drawne to the place appoynted for his death: where without further ſtay, the Muts

All which the murtherer (for no addition is ſufficient ſignificantly to expreſſe his vnnaturall villanie) both heard and ſaw by a trauers from the other ſide of the tent: but was ſo farre from being moued vvith compaſſion, that thinking it long till he were diſpatched, with a moſt terrible and cruell voyce he rated the villaines enured to blood, ſaying, Will you neuer diſpatch that I bid you? will you neuer make an end of this traitor, for whom I haue not reſted one night theſe tenne yeares in quiet? Which horrible commaunding ſpeeches yet thundring in their eares, thoſe butcherly Muts threw the poore innocent prince vpon the ground, and with the helpe of the eunuchs forcibly drawing the knotted bow ſtring both wayes, by the commaundement of a moſt wicked father, ſtrangled him. With like barbarous crueltie, he ſhortly after cauſed Mahomet his nephew (Muſtapha his ſonne) to be ſtran-

This vnnaturall and ſtrange murther committed, he preſently commaunded the Baſſa of AMASIA Muſtaphaes lieutenant to be apprehended, and his head in his owne preſence to be ſtrucke off. Which done, he ſent for Tzihanger the crooked, yet ignorant of all that was happened; and in ſporting wiſe, as if hee had done a thing worth commendations, bid him go meet his brother Muſtapha: which thing Tzihanger with a merry and cheerefull countenance haſted to doe, as one glad of his brothers comming. But as ſoone as he came vnto the place where hee ſaw his brother lying dead vpon the ground ſtrangled, it is not to be ſpoken how he was in mind tormented. He was ſcarcely come to the place where this deteſtable murther was committed, when his father ſent vnto him certaine of his ſeruants to offer vnto him all Muſtaphaes treaſure,
E horſes, ſeruants, jewels, tents, and withall the gouernement of the prouince of AMASIA: but Tzihanger filled with extreame heauineſſe for the vnmercifull death of his welbeloued brother, ſpake vnto them in this ſort. Ah wicked and vngodly Cain, traitor (I may not ſay father) take thou now the treaſures, the horſes, the ſeruants, the iewels and the prouince of Muſtapha. How came it into thy wicked, cruell, and ſauage breaſt, ſo vngratiouſly and contrarie to all humanitie, I will not ſay the reuerence of thine owne bloud, to kill thy worthie, warlike and noble ſonne, the mirrour of courteſie, and prince of greateſt hope, the like of whom, the Othoman family neuer yet had, nor neuer ſhall? I will therefore my ſelfe prouide that thou, nor none for thee ſhall euer heereafter in ſuch ſort ſhamefully triumph ouer a poore crooked wretch. And hauing thus much ſaid, ſtabd himſelfe with his owne dagger into the bodie, whereof he in ſhort time died: which ſo ſoone

His dead body was by his fathers commaundement carried from ALEPPO in SYRIA to CONSTANTINOPLE, and afterwards honourably buried on the other ſide of the hauen at PERA. For all this bloudie tragedie, his couetous mind was not ſo troubled but that he could forthwith command all Muſtophaes treaſures and riches to bee brought to his tent: which his ſouldiors in hope to haue

A bloudie tumult betwixt the ſouldiors of Solyman and Muſtapha.

At length, the noiſe of this ſtirre was heard by the reſt of the kings ſouldiors, who ſeeing the tumult to increaſe more and more, ran in to helpe their fellowes; ſo that in ſhort time there began a hoat skirmiſh and cruell fight on both ſides, inſomuch that two thouſand were ſlaine and mo wounded: neither had the broile ſo ended, had not Achomat Baſſa a graue captaine, and for his long experience of no ſmall authoritie amongſt the ſouldiors, kept backe the Ianizaries and ſtaied their furie; and turning likewiſe to Muſtaphaes ſouldiors, by gentle and mild words and H courteous perſuaſions, in this manner appeaſed their rage. What my brethren (ſaid he) will you now (degenerating from your auntient loyaltie, for which you haue beene for ſo many ages commended) impugne the commaund of the great Sultan our dread ſoueraigne? Truely I cannot ſufficiently marueil what thing ſhould moue you, whom I haue hitherto proued to haue beene moſt worthy and valiant ſouldiors, in this ciuile conflict to draw thoſe weapons againſt your fellowes and brethren, which you haue moſt fortunatly vſed againſt the enemies of the Othoman kings: except you meane thereby to make your ſelues a ioyfull ſpectacle vnto your enemies, who grieuing to ſee themſelues ouercome by your victorious weapons, may yet reioice among themſelues to ſee you turne the ſame one vpon another. Wherefore my ſonnes, for your auntient honours ſake, be carefull that you doe not by this your I

This ſpeech of the old Baſſa, ſo mollified the ſtout ſouldiors, that they freely permitted all that was in Muſtaphaes tents to be carried to Solymans: but as ſoone as the death of Muſtapha was blowne into the eares of the Ianizaries and the reſt of the armie in Solymans campe, another tumult riſe among them worſe than the firſt. They vvere quickly all vp in armes againe, and with a great noiſe confuſed with teares and lamentation, as they were in rage and furie, breake violently into Solymans pauillion vvith their drawne ſwords: vvhich ſtrucke the tyrant into ſuch a feare, that deſtitute of all counſel in himſelfe, he vvas about with the extreame perill of his life to haue fled: but being holden of his friends; and making a vertue of neceſſitie, vpon the ſudden aduentured K to do that which at better leaſure he would ſcarcely haue thought vpon: for going forth out of his tent, but with a pale and wan countenance he ſpake vnto the enraged ſouldiours thus. What broile is this? what ſturre? what ſo great inſolencie? what meane your inflamed, fierce, and angrie lookes? know you not your ſoueraigne? and him that hath power to commaund you? Haue you ſo reſolued to ſtaine the auncient and inuincible honour of your ſelues and your anceſtors, with the bloud of your lord and emperour? Whileſt he was yet thus ſpeaking, the ſouldiours boldly anſwered, That they denied not, but that he vvas the man whom they many yeares before had choſen for their emperour: but in that they had by their owne valour got for him a large and mightie empire, and in like manner preſerued it; that was therefore of them done, that hee ſhould for the ſame L gouerne them vertuouſly and iuſtly, and not to lay his bloudie hands vvithout diſcretion vpon euerie iuſt man, and moſt wickedly embrue himſelfe with innocent bloud: and that they came thither armed, they did it (as they ſaid) moued with iuſt cauſe, to reuenge the vnworthie death of guiltleſſe Muſtapha; and that for that matter, he had no iuſt cauſe to be angrie vvith them. Wherefore they required, that they might publickely cleere themſelues of the treaſon whereof they were accuſed by Muſtaphes enemies, and that the accuſer might be brought forth to iuſtifie his accuſation: proteſting, that they would neuer lay downe their weapons, vntill the accuſer made his appearance in iudgement, and commenced his accuſation iudicially, vpon pain to endure the like puniſhment if he failed in proofe. Whileſt theſe things were in doing, the hainouſneſſe of the late committed fact cauſed euerie man to ſhed teares, ſo that Solyman himſelfe M ſeemed to be ſorie for the murther ſo lately by himſelfe committed: wherefore he promiſed vnto the ſouldiors whatſoeuer they required, and did what he could to appeaſe their angrie minds. A Solyman to appeaſe this furie of the Ianizaries, depriued Ruſtan Baſſa of all his honours, and tooke from him his ſeale whereof he had the keeping, and deliuered it to Achomates Baſſa. But Ruſtan worthely ſtrucken with feare and horrour, ſeeing himſelfe now in no ſafetie in his owne tents, fled ſecretly to Achomates, asking his counſell what were beſt for him to doe, and what courſe to take in ſo doubtfull and dangerous a caſe? To whom the Baſſa anſwered, That it were beſt for him to vſe the great emperours aduiſe, and to doe what he commaunded. Which anſwere well ſatisfied Ruſtan: and ſo he which of late gaue other men acceſſe vnto the emperour at his pleaſure, was now glad by his old acquaintance and friends to preferre this poore ſute, To know his pleaſure what he would haue him to doe. From whom he receiued this anſwere, That he ſhould incontinently without farther delay get him out of his ſight, and out of the campe: B which the Baſſa ſaid he could not conueniently doe, being by his diſpleaſure and the ſouldiors rage diſfurniſhed of all things neceſſarie for his departure. Whereunto Solyman ſent him anſwere againe, That he could giue him neither longer time nor delay, and that it were beſt for him without more adoe to be gone for feare of farther harme. Whereupon Ruſtan, guiltie in conſcience of moſt horrible villanie & treacherie, accompanied but with eight of his moſt faithfull friends in ſteed of his late world of followers; poſted in haſt to CONSTANTIOPLE, and there (not without danger of his head) with Roxolana and other the complices and contriuers of the treaſon againſt Muſtapha in great feare expected the euent of his fortune.

Ruſtan diſgraced by Solyman, flieth to Conſtantinople.

This young prince Muſtapha thus ſhamefully murthered by his owne father, was for his rare vertues generally beloued of the Turkes; but of the ſouldiors moſt for his martiall diſpoſition, C and readineſſe for the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud. The opinion they had conceiued of him was ſuch, and their loue ſo great, that they neuer thought there was any in the Othoman family, of whom they expected ſo much for the enlarging of their empire: inſomuch, that euer ſince, when in their priuat or publike actions they faile of any great hope, they vſe this prouerb euen at this day taken from him, Gietti Sultan Muſtapha; Sultan Muſtapha is dead: as who ſhould ſay, our hope is all loſt. Achomates baſſa the great champion of the Turkes, a man of exceeding courage, not ignorant of the ſmall aſſurance of the great honors of that ſtate, at ſuch time as he receiued the ſeale from Solyman, boldly told him, That as he did then franckly beſtow it vpon him, ſo he would at one time or other to his no leſſe diſgrace take it from him: to whom Solyman ſolemnly promiſed with an oath not to diſplace him ſo long as he liued. For all that, he had not long en- D ioyed that honour, but that Solyman falling in diſlike with him, & willing again to promote Ruſtan baſſa to that great honour, greater than which there is none in the Turkes court, which by reaſon of his oath he could not do ſo long as Achomates liued: To ſaue his oath, and to preferre his ſonne in law (whom he had indeed diſplaced onely to pleaſe the tumultuous Ianizaries) reſolued to haue Achomates put to death. Of which his purpoſe Achomates altogither ignorant, and one morning after his wonted manner comming into the Diuano in all his honour, vpon the ſudden receiued word from Solyman, that he muſt preſently die, and forthwith was the hangman readie to haue ſtrangled him, as was giuen him in charge: whom the ſtout Baſſa thruſt from him with his hand, with countenance and cheere in ſhew no more troubled than if the matter had nothing concerned him. And looking a good while round about him, eſpied at laſt an ho- E neſt man whom he had before many times pleaſured, whom he moſt earneſtly requeſted for all the kindneſſe ſhewed vnto him, to do him that laſt fauour as to ſtrangle him with his own hand, which ſhould be vnto him the greateſt good turne that he could poſſibly deuiſe, deteſting nothing more than to die with the hand of the executioner. Which thing when he after much intreatie had vndertaken to performe, Achomates willed him, that he ſhould not at one twitch ſtrangle him outright, but letting the bow ſtring ſlake againe, giue him leaue once to breath, and then to diſpatch him: which his requeſt was by his friend accordingly performed, and he in that ſort ſtrangled: wherein it ſeemeth that he was deſirous, firſt to taſt of death, and not to die all at once. Immediatly after whoſe death, Ruſtan baſſa was againe reſtored to his place of chiefe Viſier, and had the great ſeale deliuered vnto him: which honour he enioyed about ſix years after, and ſo at F laſt died of the dropſie. This was the end of theſe two great Baſſaes Achomates and Ruſtan, who in that time ſwaied that great empire vnder Solyman, and of whom we haue ſo much ſpoken. It is reported, that Solyman hauing appointed Achomates to die, ſhould ſay, It is better for his great heart once to die, than to die a thouſand times, in ſeeing his honour taken from him and beſtowed vpon another.

1554 The Turkes gallies by the ſollicitation of the French before brought down into the Tuſcane ſea, did much harme vpon the coaſts of CALABRIA and SICILIA in this yeare 1554, as they had the yeare before, and ſo did diuers yeares after. At which time alſo Pandulphus Contarenus the Venetian Admirall ſcouring alongſt the ſeas, carefully looking to the frontiers of the Venetian eſtate, chanced to meet with the Baſſa of CALIPOLIS (who the yeare before had rifled certaine Venetian merchants) in reuenge of which iniurie he ſet vpon him, and after a great ſpoile made both of the Turks and their gallies, he ranſacked DIRRACHIVM, then one of the Turkes port townes in DALMATIA. G

1555 The next yeare 1555, the ſame Baſſa recouered his ſtrength, but not daring to be too buſie with the Venetians, ſurpriſed the Iſlands of PLVMBIS and ELBA, ſubiect to the duke of FLORENCE, and withall ſent letters to Solyman, to perſuade him to take vp armes againſt the Venetians, as they which had broken the league. H

1556 At the ſame time Haly the Baſſa of BVDA by policie ſurpriſed the ſtrong caſtle of BABOZA in HVNGARIE: and was in good hope by the like fineneſſe to haue taken the towne and caſtle of ZIGETH, a place of great importance: but failing of his purpoſe, he came the next yeare 1556 with a great armie, and the 13 day of Iune encamped before the towne, wherein was Gouernor Marcus Horwath a valiant captaine, with a garriſon of notable ſouldiors. Shortly after he began a moſt terrible batterie: during which time the Chriſtians ſallying diuers times out, ſlew many of his men, who for all that vſed ſuch diligence, that the twentieth of Iune they woon the vttermoſt wall, and after fiue hot aſſaults were in hope at the ſixt to haue woon the caſtle alſo: but the Chriſtians perceiuing the danger, reſolutely ſallied out, and hauing ſlaine eight hundred of them, draue the reſt againe from the wall: yet the Turks gaue it not ſo ouer, but with a great number of carts laboured to haue filled vp the marriſh and ditches about the town: which their attempt was by the induſtrie of the defendants alſo defeated. The Baſſa perceiuing how hardly the towne would be woon by force, attempted to haue perſuaded them to haue yeelded it vp by compoſition: but fayling therein of his purpoſe, began againe the twelfth of Iulie to aſſault the citie, which aſſault he maintained fiue daies togither without intermiſſion, ſtill ſending in freſh men in ſtead of them that were wearied or ſlaine: yet was the citie for all that by the valour of the Chriſtians notably defended. So when he had in vaine proued the vttermoſt of his forces, he raiſed his ſiege the one and twentieth day of Iuly, and departed: but within ſix daies after he returned againe from the citie QVINQVE ECLESIE, and aſſaulted the citie afreſh, but was at length glad to giue ouer the ſiege and be gone, when he had loſt of his beſt ſouldiors aboue two thouſand, and of the defendants ſlain but a hundred and twentie. After his departure there was ten thouſand great ſhot found, wherewith he had battered the towne and the caſtle, which was for this time thus worthily defended. The Turks in the meane time after their wonted manner ceaſed not to do what harme they could in the Tuſcane ſea, and had againe miſerably ſpoiled the Iſland of CORSICA: for withſtanding of whom, the biſhop of ROME exacted of his people a great ſubſidie, and finely ſtript the Iews of their money, and ſeized vpon their rich merchants goods in his territorie: at whoſe earneſt ſuit Solyman in their behalfe writ vnto the biſhop as followeth. The ninth of March, Ann. 1556.*

Haly Baſſa beſieged Zigeth againe.

Haly Baſſa grieued with the late repulſe hee had receiued at ZIGETH, came againe the next yeare,

A yeare, and beſieged it, at which time king Ferdinand ſent Nicholaus Polwiler and the countie Serinus with a power raiſed in SVEVIA and AVSTRIA, to recouer BABOZA, a caſtle betwixt ZIGETH and STIRIA, before ſurpriſed by the Turks: of whoſe comming the Baſſa hauing intelligence, riſe with his armie and departed from ZIGETH, which he had for certaine moneths hardly beſieged, and not farre from BABOZA met with Polwiler and Serinus; who ioyning battell with him, after a hard and ſharpe fight ouerthrew him and put him to flight. This victorie with the comming downe of yong Ferdinand, king Ferdinands ſonne, Archduke of AVSTRIA with new ſupplies, ſo terrified the Turks in that part of HVNGARIA alongſt the riuer Dranus, that they for feare forſooke BABOZA, SAMMARTIN, SAN-LAVRENCE, and diuers other ſmall caſtles which they had before taken, and fled to QVINQVE ECCLESIÆ. Haly Baſſa ouerthrowne.

B The Gouernour of ZIGETH encouraged herewith, ſallying out with his garriſon, ſlew many of the Turkes in their flight towards QVINQVE ECCLESIÆ, and meeting by chance with a troupe of horſemen which were bringing the Turks pay, ouerthrew them, tooke the mony, and ſo with an exceeding rich prey returned to his caſtle. At which time alſo Adam the Gouernour of RAB, otherwiſe called IAVARINVM, hauing burnt the ſuburbes of ALBA REGALIS, and driuen away many thouſands of cattell; at a towne called SIAN ouerthrew fiue hundred Turks, and as many fugitiue Chriſtians, and ſo with a great prey and little or no loſſe at all of his men returned.

Henrie the French king at the ſame time in warres with Philip king of SPAINE, and troubled with the loſſe of his armie ouerthrowne not farre from S. QVINTAINS (at which time the C duke Montmorencie conſtable of FRANCE and Generall of the armie with his ſonne and diuers other of the nobilitie of FRANCE were taken priſoners) by his embaſſadour Michaell Condignac ſollicited Solyman to haue by ſea inuaded NAPLES and SICILIA, ſo to haue withdrawn the Spaniſh forces out of FRANCE, to defend their owne frontiers. Which thing Solyman, offended with the inſolencie of the embaſſadour, refuſed to doe: yet neuertheleſſe commaunded his aduenturers all alongſt the coaſt of AFFRICKE, to infeſt thoſe ſeas, and to doe what harme they could vpon the coaſt of ITALIE and SICILIA; which they ſo diligently performed, that the viceroy of SICILIA was faine for defence of thoſe countries to lie in readineſſe with his gallies in the ports of CAIETA and NAPLES. Henry the French king ſollicited Solyman to inuade the king of Spaine his territories.

In the meane time the Guiſe, lord Grand Prior of the knights of S. Johns in FRAVNCE (and D brother of Francis the duke of Guiſe, Generall of the French kings armie in ITALIE, who vpon the ouerthrow receiued at S. QVINTINS, called out of ITALIE, ſhortly after tooke CALLIS) Admirall of the gallies of MALTA, went out toward the Eaſt with foure gallies well appointed to lie in wait for the Turkes, and by fortune met with two great ſhips laded with the Turks marchandiſe, which he tooke; and by and by after light vpon foure of the Turks gallies, with whom he had a great fight: yet at length hauing ſunke one of them and burnt another, he tooke the other two. After which victorie returning towards MALTA to haue repaired his gallies and cured his wounded men, he was met with foure other great gallies of the Turkes: who deſirous to reuenge the loſſe of their fellowes, ſet vpon him, and he ſeeing now no remedie, but that he muſt needs fight courageouſly, encountered them. But for as much as he had in the two fights E before loſt ſome of his men, and 72 of the knights in the gallies lay ſore wounded, hee by the counſell of the captaines retired towards MALTA: but by the way one of his gallies was taken by the Turks, with 52 knights of the Order: yet with the reſt and the prizes before taken, he recouered the iſland of MALTA, where he ſtayed that Winter, and the next Spring ſayled into FRAVNCE to be partaker of thoſe troubles, which beginning ſhortly after, haue but of late taken end. The Guiſe, lord Grand Prior in France, admiral of Malta, taketh certaine of the Turks gallies.

The immoderat fortune of the great Sultan Solyman, was not in any thing more contrarie to his deſire, than in the proofe of thoſe his children, of whom the world held the greateſt expectation. Muſtapha his eldeſt ſonne, the mirrour of courteſie and rare hope of the whole Turkiſh nation, the ſuſpitious tyrant had moſt vnnaturally cauſed to be murdered in his owne preF ſence, to the greeſe of all his ſubiects in generall, as is before declared: poore Tzihanger was dead for ſorrow: and Mahometes his eldeſt ſonne by his beſt beloued the faire Roxolana, was departed this life alſo. So that now remained vnto him onely Selymus, the vnworthie heire of ſo great an empire, and Baiazet his yonger brother, the liuely image of his father, both men grown, and the ſonnes of the ſame Roxolana: but ſo farre differing the one from the other both in feature Solyman in nothing more vnfortunat than in the proofe of his children.

of body and diſpoſition of mind, as if they had not bene of the ſame kindred and line. Selymus the elder brother moſt like vnto his mother, was in the ſecret determination of the aged emperor his father appointed heire of that moſt mightie empire. Baiazet much reſembling his father, was on the other ſide ſtrongly ſupported by the care and entire loue of his mother: which whether it proceded of a ſecret commiſaration of his ineuitable deſtiny, or that he had by loyaltie or other meanes ſo woon her fauour, is not knowne; but euery man ſaw, that if it had lien in her power, ſhe would vndoubtedly haue preferred him before his elder brother Selymus, and haue placed him in the empire: but ſhe muſt needs giue way to her old huſbands will, firmely and irremouably ſet down, that the deſtinies ſo permitting, none ſhould raigne after him but his eldeſt ſonne Selymus. Of which his purpoſe and reſolution Baiazet being not ignorant, began moſt circumſpectly to looke about him, if he could by any meanes fruſtrate that forcible neceſſitie, and exchange his certaine deſtruction with an empire: in which his deepe and dangerous cogitations he was not a little comforted by the fauour and loue of Roxolana his mother, and of Ruſtan the great Baſſa his brother in law, who together had in any other matter been able to haue ouerruled the aged emperour. Whereupon he reſolutely ſet downe himſelfe, rather to end his dayes by making proof of his good or bad fortune, than vpon the death of his father (which by courſe of nature could not now be far off) to be as a ſacrifice baſely butchered by ſome vile hangman of his brothers. Baiazet ſo reſolued, and now already fallen out with his brother Selymus, tooke occaſion vpon the generall diſcontentment of the people and others, for the vnworthy death of Muſtapha their late ioy to begin thoſe ſtirres which he had before with himſelfe plotted, and ſo to make a head, whereunto he might afterward ioyne the body alſo: for why that worthy Muſtapha had left behind him ſo great deſire of himſelfe, that now it wearied many to liue after him, they had ſo placed al the hope of their good fortune in him; vnto whom nothing was more deſired than to reuenge the wrong done vnto him, or els to run the ſame hard fortune with him: Otherſome guiltie of the immoderat affection they had borne vnto him yet liuing, and fearing to be called to giue an account therof, thought any ſtate better & more aſſured than that wherein they preſently ſtood, and therefore ſought all occaſions of new ſtirres, and how to ſet all on a hurly burly: onely a captaine was wanting, Muſtapha could not be againe reuiued, ye might he be ſtrongly ſuppoſed to liue. This deuice pleaſed Baiazet, as beſt fitting his purpoſe, being not ignorant of this diſpoſition of the people. Wherefore by certaine of his moſt faithfull and truſtie followers he found out a certaine obſcure fellow of a notable audacitie, which ſhould take vpon him the name and perſon of Muſtapha, whoſe ſtature alſo and countenance and proportion of bodie differed not much from Muſtapha himſelfe: He, as if hee had by chance eſcaped, firſt began to ſhew himſelfe in that part of THRACIA, vvhich is aboue CONSTANTINOPLE, and lieth toward Danubius, not farre from the countries of MOLDAVIA and VALACHIA, and was for that cauſe both fitteſt for rebellion, and alſo beſt ſtored with horſemen, who of all others moſt honoured Muſtapha. Hither he comes as if it had been from a long iourney, ſlenderly accompanied, and as if he had been deſirous at the firſt not to haue been knowne: his followers being demanded (as it chanced) who he was, did rather fearfully giue them that asked occaſion to gheſſe, then plainely to tell them, that it was Muſtapha: neither did he himſelfe much denie it: wherby the people became more and more deſirous to know him. Which beginning thus laid, he afterward began to reioyce of his fortunate comming thither, and to giue God thanks for his ſafe arriuall there amongſt his friends: hee tels them, That at ſuch time as he was ſent for by his father, hee durſt not come into his ſight, or commit himſelfe vnto him in his furie, but by the counſell of his friends to haue with great promiſes perſwaded one that was marueilous like vnto himſelfe, to goe in his ſtead; by whoſe danger hee might make proofe of his fathers mind towards him: who before he vvas admitted to the ſpeech of his father, was without hearing miſerably ſtrangled, and ſo caſt out before his pauillion: at which time there vvas many (as he ſaid) vvhich perceiued the deceit, but the greater part remained in errour, deceiued with the lineaments and countenance of the miſerable dead man, vvho vvas much altered with the terrible paines of death, and ſuppoſing it to haue beene him indeed that vvas ſlaine. Which thing as ſoone as he vnderſtood, he thought it not good longer to ſtay, but preſently to flie and to prouide for his ovvne ſafetie: and ſo flying vvith a fevv of his ovvne followvers, thereby the more ſecretly and ſafely to eſcape; and hauing paſſed aboue PONTVS by the people of BOSPHORVS, vvas now come thither, vvhere as he was in good hope to find much helpe and comfort

The craſty dealing of the ſuppoſed Muſtapha to deceiue the people.

A counterfeit Muſtapha ſet vp to make a head of rebellion.

A fort in the fidelity of his friends, whom he requeſted not now to forſake him, or to make leſſe account of him diſgraced by the malice of his ſtepmother, than they had before in time of his proſperitie. For that hee was aminded to reuenge the iniurie done vnto him, and by force of armes to defend himſelf: for what elſe had he now left? being by no other means preſerued but by the death of another man: that he had ſufficiently proued how his father ſtood affected towards him, and that he now liued by his miſtaking, not by his kindneſſe. The cauſe of all which his troubles was his ſtepdame, who (as he ſaid) with her inchantments led the ſilly old man (now almoſt doting for age and mad for loue) vvhither ſhe would at her pleaſure, and by her agent Ruſtan baſſa forced him forward headlong into al kind of miſchiefe: but that God be thanked he wanted not his friends, by whoſe help he vvould find a way out of theſe miſeries, & take reuenge
B of his enemies: for why, he had as yet couragious hearts, and the Ianizaries, with the greater part of his fathers family on his ſide, & that great multituds of people would flock vnto him vpon the brute of his name: ſo that they which did now mourn for him as dead (in number many) would by heaps run to help him being aliue: ſo that they there preſent would only courteouſly receiue him as a gueſt, and protect him now diſtreſſed, vntil ſuch time as his welwillers & friends might repaire vnto him. And this at laſt he gaue out, not in ſecret, but openly vnto all men wherſoeuer he came. The ſame things did they alſo report, whom he made the people to beleeue to haue bin the companions of his flight: which was alſo confirmed by diuers of good account and authoritie, whom Baiazet had before dealt withall to that purpoſe. So that a great number of men altogether vnknown to Baiazet, were by that means ſeduced: for this matter was ſo cunningly
C wrought, that many euen of them that had known Muſtapha aliue, and ſeene him laid dead before his fathers pauilion; yet lifted not greatly to beleeue that which they knew, but eaſily ſuffered themſelues to be perſuaded, that this was the true Muſtapha. But the companions and followers of Muſtapha, in whoſe minds the liuely countenance and remembrance of him was thorowly engrauen, nothing could deceiue: yet blinded partly with feare, partly vvith griefe & deſire of reuenge, & vviſhing rather to aduenture any thing, than longer to liue vvithout Muſtapha, vvere the firſt men that came to offer their ſeruice to this counterfeit Muſtapha: and vvould not ſuffer other men to doubt but that this was the very Muſtapha, vvhich it vvas falſely reported to haue been ſlaine. As for the deceiuer himſelfe, he either kept vvith him, or entertained them that came, ſome with faire promiſes, ſome with courteous ſpeeches, and many alſo with money and
D rewards, vvhich he made them to beleeue he had reſerued of the relikes of his better fortune: for Baiazet had before notably prouided, that nothing ſhould in this behalfe bee wanting vnto him for the countenancing of his credit. So within the ſpace of a few daies, ſuch a multitude of men was reſorted vnto him, as might almoſt haue made a whole armie. When Solyman vpon the ſudden was aduertiſed by the fearfull meſſengers and letters of the Sanzacks therabouts, what a danger was like to enſue by the concourſe of ſo great a multitude of people vnto this counterfet Muſtapha: he preſently ſuſpecting (as the truth was) that this was not done without the priuitie of one of his ſonnes, thought it not a thing to be neglected: and therfore by his letters reproued the Sanzacks thereby, that they had ſuffered the matter to run ſo farre, and had not in the beginning as their dutie was ſuppreſſed the ſame; grieuouſly threatning them, if they did not with all
E ſpeed ſend vnto him in bonds that counterfet companion with the reſt of his complices. Which that it might be the eaſilier by them performed, he promiſed to ſend one of the chiefe Baſſaes, namely Partau Baſſa (who had married the widow of Mahometes the eldeſt ſonne of Roxolana, of whom we haue before remembred) and with him a ſtrong power of the ſoldiors of the court: but if they would haue themſelues excuſed, that they ſhould of themſelues diſpatch the matter, before the comming of that aid. This Partau lead after him certaine ſquadrons of ſouldiors, not ſo many in number, as notable for their fidelitie: for Solyman had cauſed the moſt faithful of his colonels, captaines, and corporals to be called out; wiſely doubting leaſt his ſouldiors, either led with affection, or corrupted with reward, might take part with him againſt whom they were ſent. For the common ſort of the Ianizaries, ſtanding in ſuſpence at the fame of Muſtapha, and F expectation of ſome great noueltie, fauoured that broile, and wiſhed all on a hurly burly: neither was the matter in deed without danger. The Sanzackes after they had receiued this ſtraight charge from Solyman, conſidering how much it ſtood them vpon to make a ſpeedie diſpatch, began now to encourage one another to beſtirre themſelues, to make all the ſpeed poſſible, & with all their power on euery ſide to oppoſe themſelues againſt the attempts of this new found Muſtapha: labouring to ſtay ſuch as were comming vnto him, and to diſperſe ſuch as G were alreadie come, by ſhewing vnto him the greatnes of the danger, & threatening them with all extreamities. In the meane time Partan Baſſa came on with his armie, and was not now farre off: when (as in like caſe it oftentimes falleth out in things not yet ſufficiently confirmed, and by celeritie preuented) the ſouldiors of the counterfeit Muſtapha ſeeing themſelues beſet on euerie ſide, began to feare, and at firſt ſome few to ſlip away; but afterwards, all, without regard of ſhame or of their promiſe to forſake their captaine, and flie euerie man whither he thought beſt.

The captaine ſeeking likewiſe to haue made ſhift for himſelfe, was with the chiefe of his counſellors and followers taken by the Sanzackes & deliuered to the Baſſa, who with a ſtrong guard ſent them all in bonds to CONSTANTIOPLE: where Solyman by moſt exquiſite torments drew from them all the ſecret deuiſes of his yong ſonne Baiazet, and that he had purpoſed after H ſuch a head made by this ſuppoſed Muſtapha as hee thought conuenient, to haue vpon the ſud-den ioined himſelfe with a great power, and ſo as ſhould beſt ſerue for his purpoſe, to haue gone directly to CONSTANTINOPLE, or elſe againſt his brother Selymus. But whileſt he goeth Muſtapha and his companions drowned by night. ſomewhat too ſlowly about his buſineſſe, his vnripe counſels were by his fathers celeritie op-preſſed. Of all which matter Solyman now thorowly aſſured, cauſed the ſuppoſed Muſtapha and his companions at midnight to be drowned in the ſea; thinking it not good to haue theſe things commonly knowne, and to haue his domeſticall wounds yet bleeding, laid open to the view of his neighbour princes. Neuertheleſſe being mightily offended with Baiazet for ſo great an inſolencie, he ceaſed not to caſt in his mind how to be reuenged vpon him; which his wife Roxolana Roxolana intreateth Solymã for Baiazet her yonger ſon, and obtaineth his pardon. a woman of great wiſedome, was not ignorant of. Who after a few daies, at ſuch time as the I old mans furie was ouerpaſt, falling of purpoſe into talke with him about the matter, ſhe laid togither in her ſons behalfe, and alleadged the vndiſcreetneſſe of youth, the neceſſitie of the fact, and the example of his anceſtors in like caſe, that it was ſo prouided for by nature, that euerie man ſhould be carefull of himſelfe and his, and that all men did indifferently ſhun death, that young men were by euill counſell eaſily ſeduced and made to forget their duetie. That it were reaſon he ſhould forgiue him this firſt fault; which if he amended, then was it a great gaine for the father to haue ſaued his ſonne: but if he ſhould againe fall into relapſe, there would not want time to puniſh him ſufficiently for both faults. And that if ſo be he would not pardon him for his owne ſake: yet he would vouchſafe to pardon him for hers, entreating now for him for whom ſhe had before groaned, and not to be cruell vpon him one of the pledges of their loue, K in whom reſted the bloud of them both: for in what wofull caſe ſhould ſhe be, if of thoſe two ſons (all that God had left her) the fathers ſeueritie ſhould bereaue her of the one? Wherfore ſhe requeſted him to moderat his anger, and to preferre his clemencie before his iuſt indignation:
foraſmuch as God himſelfe of all power and might, did not alwaies deale with ſinners in ſeueri-tie, but for moſt part in mercie; wheras otherwiſe all mankind would not ſuffice his wrath. And would mercie in any place be more fitting, than in the father towards his child? She promi-ſed further, that Baiazet ſhould from thenceforth remaine in moſt dutifull obedience towards his maieſtie; and vpon his ſo great clemencie, to conuert the feare wherein he now liued into a world of dutie and deuotion. Honourable minds (ſhe ſaid) were retained with nothing more than with kindneſſe and courteſie; that the remembrance of that his fatherly forgiuenes, ſhould L be a ſtay vnto him for euer doing the like againe: at laſt that ſhe would promiſe for him, and take vpon her, that he ſhould euer afterwards ſatisfie his fatherly expectation in all kind of dutie and loyaltie. Which vvords mingled vvith teares and other womanly geſtures, ſo wrought with Solyman, being otherwiſe too much in her power, that he reſolued to forgiue the fault; yet ſo, that he ſhould come and ſubmit himſelfe, and receiue from him his charge. This carefull mother Baiazet goeth to his father in feare. foreſlowes no time, but by letters ſecretly aduertiſed Baiazet, not to feare to come vnto his father at ſuch time as he ſhould be ſent for: aſſuring him that there vvas no danger, for that his father vvas by her meanes appeaſed, and he againe brought into his fauour. With vvhich good news Baiazet vvell comforted, reſolued to go at ſuch time as he vvas ſent for: yet ful of feare, and oftentimes looking backe vnto his brother Muſtapha, vvhoſe dreadful example ſufficiently war- M ned him vvhat a danger he aduentured himſelf vnto. Yet he came to the place appointed for the parley, vvhich vvas in a common Inne at a place called CARESTRAN, a few miles from CON-STANTINOPLE: for ſuch is the ſuſpitious maner of the Turkiſh tyrants of theſe times, not to ſuffer any of their ſonnes that be men growne, to ſet their foot within the gates of CONSTANTI-

NOPLE

A NOPLE, as dangerous for ſoliciting the ſouldiors of the court, and ſo conſequently for the altering of the ſtate. Baiazet was no ſooner lighted from his horſe, but his fathers guard were preſently readie to receiue him, commaunding him to lay aſide his ſword and dagger: which thing although it be an vſuall matter in others that are admitted to the preſence of the Turkiſh emperour, yet might it then in the mind of his guiltie ſonne raiſe a great feare. But his kind mother (who had before foreſeene in what feare and perplexitie he would come) had conuaied her ſelfe into a chamber faſt by the entrie of the ſame houſe as Baiazet was to paſſe, where out at a little caſement couered with a thin linnen cloth, ſhe called vnto him in paſſing by in theſe few words: Corcoma oglan Corcoma (which is as much as to ſay) feare not my ſonne, feare not: with which ſhort ſpeech Baiazet was not a little both comforted and encouraged. But as ſoone as he was
B come into his fathers preſence and had done his dutie, Solyman commaunded him to ſit downe by him: then began the grim ſire grieuouſly to reproue him of raſhneſſe and want of diſcretion in taking vp armes, which he could not otherwiſe conceiue of, but as taken vp againſt himſelfe. And admit they were as he would haue it, and the beſt that he could make of it, taken vp againſt his elder brother; yet was it neuertheleſſe a great preſumption and moſt wicked fact. Neither was there any want in him, but that the whole ſtate of the Mahometane religion (which at this day reſteth vpon the Othoman family) had by his domeſticall diſcord beene ſore ſhaken, and brought in perill of vtter ruine, to the great iniurie reproach and contempt of his maieſtie, a moſt deteſtable and horrible crime, which could not with condigne puniſhment be reuenged. Yet for all that, he had determined to pardon him, and to ſhew himſelfe rather a kind father than
C a ſeuere iudge; ſo that he would from thenceforth leaue the care of future things to God: foraſmuch as none of theſe things are done by our appointment, but that kingdomes & monarchies are beſtowed as pleaſeth him: So that if it were his deſtinie to enioy the empire after his death, he ſhould be moſt ſure thereof as of a thing that would of it ſelfe come vnto him, and was not by any mans power to be kept from him, as that which was by God ordained for him: but if it were otherwiſe appointed by God, then were it a mad thing for him to labour in vaine to ſtriue againſt the will of God, and as it were to fight with God. Wherefore he ſhould now as one well warned, ceaſe to rage and ſtorme, and not to moleſt his quiet brother, or trouble him his aged father: for that if he ſhould againe fall, and raiſe new ſtirs, it would aſſuredly fall vpon his owne head, neither would any place of mercie bee found for his ſecond offence, and that hee
D ſhould then find him not as now his gentle father, but a moſt ſeuere and reuenging iudge. Which when he had ſaid, and Baiazet had thereunto briefely anſwered as the time would permit, rather crauing pardon for his treſpaſſe, than excuſing that was not to be excuſed, and promiſing from thenceforth to liue moſt loyally at his commaund: Solyman according to the manner of that nation called for drinke, which he commaunded to be giuen to Baiazet, who not daring to refuſe it although he had rather haue ſo done, dranke thereof what he thought good, doubting leaſt that ſhould haue beene his laſt: of which feare his father forthwith deliuered him by drinking a good draught of the ſame cup. So Baiazet though guiltie, hauing with better ſucceſſe ſpoken with his father than had his brother Muſtapha, returned againe to the former place of his charge.

Roxolana comforteth her ſon Baiazet.

Solyman reproueth Baiazet of diſloyaltie, and afterward pardoneth him.

Baiazet returneth to his charge.

E This happened in the yeare 1555, from which time Baiazet ſo long as Roxolana his mother liued, behaued himſelfe with all dutifull and brotherly kindnes both towards his father and his brother; and that rather for to keepe her fauour, and not to cut off the hope which he had onely in her affection towards him, than for any confidence he had in his fathers kindneſſe, or for any loue he bare to his brother; the regard of her being the only thing that kept his fierce nature in quiet. But ſhe dead about two yeres after, he as a man bereft of all hope of long life, and diſcharged of all bonds of dutie, fell to his former courſe, and began more grieuouſly than before to reuiue the old grudges betwixt him and his brother, ſomtime ſeeking by ſecret practiſes to haue him made away, and otherſome times by open force entring into his prouince which was not farre off, there euill entreated ſome of his brothers followers as he light vpon, for their maſters
F ſake, omitting nothing which he thought might tend to the diſgrace of him whom of all other he wiſhed dead. Hee had alſo certaine of his fauourites at CONSTANTINOPLE, by whom hee cunningly wrought by all means to gaine the loue of the ſoldiors of the court, and doubted not as occaſion ſerued to paſſe ouer thither himſelfe, and there to lurke in ſecret with ſuch as were of his faction, and priuie to his deſignements. Of all which things Solyman had knowledge, but especially by letters from Selymus, wherein he was also aduised to haue care of his owne safetie; G for that he was farre deceiued, if he perceiued not, that these preambles of Baiazet his wicked intentions, would at last turn vpon his head, who regarded neither God nor man, so that he might alone raigne: vnto whose vnruly desires his fathers welfare was no lesse a barre than was his brothers, and that therefore through his sides was his life shot at: which treason had (as he said) beene of long time plotted, and now occasion sought to haue the same performed: wherefore he should take heed that he were not by such trecherie ouerwhelmed before he were aware thereof: That for himselfe he could easily beare with the iniuries of his brother Baiazet, yet could not chuse but be moued with the greatnesse of his fathers dangers. By which meanes Solymans hatred against Baiazet was still more and more encreased. Wherefore he by letters put him in remembrance of his dutie, how courteously he had vsed him, and againe what he had on his part H promised; that there would not alwaies be place for forgiuenesse; that he should therefore cease to wrong his brother and trouble his father; that he had but a short time to liue; and that after his death God would assigne vnto each of them their fortunes. But all this was to no purpose with Baiazet, fully set downe to hazard whatsoeuer, rather than as a beast to haue his throat cut by his brother: which thing he as plainly saw would betide him in the raigne of Selymus, as if it had beene euen then in execution. Yet he answered to his fathers commaunds not impertinently, but his deeds agreed not with his sayings, neither did he alter any thing of his intended purpose.

Solyman remoueth his two sons further asunder

Which thing as soone as Solyman perceiued, he thought it best to take another course, and to remoue his sonnes both further from himselfe, and also further the one from the other. Wherefore he gaue them to vnderstand, That it was his pleasure, that both of them within a certaine I prefixed time should depart out of their gouernments (Baiazet being then Gouernour of CVTAI, and Selymus of MAGNESIA) and that now Baiazet should remoue to AMASIA, and Selymus to ICONIVM. Selymus was without imputation and altogether in fauour with his father: yet because no occasion should be giuen Baiazet to fall into extremities, if he should haue beene remoued alone, Solyman to seeme indifferent, commaunded them both to remoue: vnto which commaund it was adioyned, that the farther they were off one from another, they should be so much the neerer in mind and brotherly loue: for as much as neerenesse of dwelling of the Great, did many times hinder their good agreement, whilest by frowardnesse of officers and seruants many things are on both sides done to the grieuing of their masters: and that they should in any case doe as they were commaunded, and that he which stayed longest, should not be free from K
the suspition of contempt. Selymus made no long stay, as he that knew a great part of all this to be done for his sake: but Baiazet hung backe, and being gone a little on his way, stayed, complaining the vnluckie prouince of AMASIA, stained with the bloud of his late brother the noble Mustapha, to be assigned vnto him as ominous, and that he could be better contented with any prouince whatsoeuer than that, where the deadly remembrance of the miserable end of the neerest to him in bloud, should be euer before his eyes, to the wounding of his heart: Wherfore he requested, that he might at least Winter in those places, or else there from whence his brother was now departed: but Solyman would in no wise hearken vnto him. Now Selymus gone before certain dayes journies with such troups as his father had sent him beside his owne, for feare L of Baiazet, who yet stayed loitering and trifling on the time, suddenly returning and fetching a compasse about, shewed himselfe at his brothers backe, marching towards PRVSA in BITHINIA, the auntient seat of the Turkish kings; which he did not without the priuitie of his father, who liked not of the lingering of Baiazet: for what if he hauing gained the good will of the Ianizaries, should haue gone either to PRVSA, or directly to CONSTANTINOPLE? what a danger might haue growne thereby to Selymus, yea vnto the whole state in generall? In this common feare Solyman thought it best for Selymus there to stay, from whence they might most conueniently help one another, if Baiazet should (as was feared) turn himselfe vpon either of them. Yet was not Selymus so strong as to aduenture to ioine battell with his brother, whom he knew readie to put all to the hazard of one day. But whē Baiazet (contrarie to his expectation) saw Selymus behind him, and that he had got nothing by his long delay, but that his brother should be M
the vndoubted heire of the empire, if his father should die, vvhich vvas thē by reason of his sickly constitution of bodie daily more & more feared: he vvrit vnto his father, accusing his brother that he could not more manifestly in any thing declare how maliciusly he was affected towards him, than by taking that indirect course, to no other purpose but to aspire vnto the empire, & to haue

Baiazet vnwilling to goe to Amasia, seeketh delayes.

A haue a ſhort cut ouer to CONSTANTINOPLE, if he ſhould haue any newes of his fathers death, which he ſtill gaped after: which his longing, if his fathers longer life ſhould delay, then by the ſecret miniſters of his treaſon to diſpatch him, and by the murdering of him to poſſeſſe himſelfe of the empire; and yet neuertheleſſe, this man as a moſt dutifull and obedient ſonne, ro be of him much made of, and as it were put in his boſome: Wheras he on the contrarie part meaning well, into whoſe conceit neuer any ſuch thought came, but was euer at commaund, was not had in any regard, but caſt off and contemned, whoſe greateſt requeſt was but to ſhun an vnfortunat ominous prouince. After that, he conuerted his ſtile to prayers, requeſting againe of his father to gratifie him with ſome other prouince, if it were but that from which his brother was departed, or with any other whatſoeuer, ſo that it were more luckie than that of AMASIA: for an-
B ſwere whereof he ſaid he would ſtay where he was, to the end that finding fauour in his requeſt, he ſhould not haue need further to retire: but if he ſhould not obtaine his requeſt, that then he was readie to go whither ſoeuer his father ſhould commaund. It was not altogither for nought that Baiazet found fault with AMASIA; being the manner of the Turks, of the ſmalleſt things of all to diuine vpon the greateſt. But Solyman vnderſtood the matter otherwiſe: who not ignorant of his ſonnes teares, knew right well, that he in them ſought for nothing els but a more commodious place for him to raiſe new ſtirs in, than was AMASIA, ſo farre diſtant from CONSTANTINOPLE. So Baiazet by many delaies did what he could to fruſtrate his fathers appointment, ceaſing not in the meane time to augment his ſtrength with new ſouldiors, to prouide armour, money, and whatſoeuer els, ſeruing for defence of himſelfe, and the impugning of his brother.
C Which Solyman tooke in no other part, than as intended againſt his owne perſon: yet would he ſeeme as not to haue any ſuch vnderſtanding of the matter: for why the warie old ſire would not by taking knowledge thereof, driue headlong his ſonne, who was alreadie running too faſt of himſelfe. Beſides that, he was not ignorant that the eyes of all nations were bent vpon this diſcord of his two ſonnes: and therefore he deſired by all meanes, that theſe grudges might be with as little ſtir as was poſſible appeaſed. Wherefore he anſwered Baiazet courteouſly, That concerning his gouernment of AMASIA, he could not alter it, as reſolutly ſet downe as well for his brother as himſelfe, and that therefore they ſhould do well to goe both to their appointed places, as he had before commanded. As for the reſt, they ſhould be of good comfort, for that he would take ſuch order, as that neither of them ſhould haue iuſt cauſe to complaine. Partau
D Baſſa the fourth of the great Baſſaes of the court was appointed to go with this meſſage to Baiazet, and Mehemet third of the ſame great Baſſaes with like charge to Selymus, becauſe the matter ſhould ſeeme to be done with all indifferencie: and both of theſe great men commaunded not to depart from them they were ſent vnto, before they were both come vnto the places of their gouernment, whereunto they were aſſigned. Which Solyman wiſely did, to keepe them both within the compaſſe of dutie by the preſence of ſuch two graue counſellors. Which thing Selymus tooke in good part, but Baiazet not ſo: who hauing reſolued with himſelfe to ſet all on a hurly burly, thought nothing more vnfit for his deſignes, than to haue one of his fathers greateſt counſellors ſtill at his elbow as Cenſor of all his ſpeeches and doings: wherefore hauing courteouſly entertained him, & rewarded him according to his ability, he diſmiſſed him (though
E vnwilling to depart) making this excuſe, That he would vſe him as his patrone and defendour with his father, for as much as he had no other in court to defend his cauſe, promiſing not to be vnto him an vnworthie or vnthankfull client: and to carrie word back againe vnto his father, That he would aboue all things haue care of his commaund, if he might ſo doe for his brother Selymus, whoſe iniuries and trecheries he had much adoe to brooke. Partau the great Baſſa ſo ſent away, aſſured Solyman what the verie mind and purpoſe of his younger ſonne was. And albeit, that Baiazet to make it ſeeme as if ſomething had been done by that embaſſage, made ſhew as if he would haue preſently gone towards AMASIA: yet Solyman neuertheleſſe fearing the worſt, made all the preparation he could againſt him, commanding the Beglerbeg of GREECE, although then ſicke of the gout, to make haſt and with his horſemen to paſſe ouer with all ſpeed
F to aid Selymus: and Mehemet Baſſa but lately returned, hee ſent forthwith backe again for the ſame purpoſe to Selymus, with certaine of the moſt truſtie companies of the Ianizaries: and the old man in readineſſe made ſemblant as if he would himſelfe in perſon haue gone ouer alſo. But the Ianizaries and other ſouldiors of the court came with euill will togither, deteſting that warre betweene the brethren, as altogither abhominable: for againſt whom ſhould they draw their ſwords? was it not againſt the emperours ſonne, and happily the heire of the empire? Where- G fore this warre might(as they ſaid)well ynough be let alone, as altogither vnneceſſarie, and not they to be inforced to embrue their hands one in anothers bloud, & to pollute themſelues with ſuch impietie: as for that which Baiazet did,was to be holden excuſed,as proceeding from ne-ceſſitie. Which ſpeeches of the Ianizaries being brought to Solymans eares,he forthwith declared them to the Muphti (whom in all matters of doubt they flie vnto, as vnto a moſt ſacred Oracle)demanding of him, How he was to be intreated who of himſelfe preſumed whiles he yet liued,to leuie ſouldiors,raiſe an armie, ranſacke townes, and trouble the ſtate of the whole empire? and what alſo he deemed of them that were his followers and tooke part with him?and laſt of all of them alſo that refuſed to beare armes againſt him, and ſaid that he had in ſo doing nothing offended? Whereunto the Muphti anſwered, That both the man and his part-takers H were all worthie of death;& that ſuch as refuſed to take vp armes againſt him,were as prophane and irreligious men,to be accounted inteſtable. Which the great prieſts anſwere, was publiſhed vnto the people: and by the chiefe Chiaus ſent to Baiazet, to ſee if he might be therewith moued. Within a few daies after there came to CONSTANTINOPLE one of the Chiaus (whom Baiazet his meſſage to his father requeſting him not to intermedle betwixt him and his brother. Baiazet had intercepted,being ſent from Solyman to Selymus) by whom Baiazet gaue his father to vnderſtand, That he was in all dutie his,and that he had not taken vp armes againſt him, neither refuſed to be vnto him in all things obedient: but that he had onely to do with his brother and with him to fight for his life, by whoſe ſword he muſt needs die, or elſe he by his,for that a miſchiefe was to bee by one of them performed; which quarrell he was reſolued to trie whiles he yet liued, and that therefore he ſhould doe beſt not to meddle in the quarrell, or giue aid to I either: But if ſo be he would needs(as the report was)paſſe ouer the ſea to aid Selymus,he ſhould not thinke eaſily to get him into his hands,for that he knew right well,if the worſt came,how to eſcape and ſaue himſelfe; and would(before he could get ouer into ASIA)make ſuch ſpoile with fire and ſword, as neuer had Tamarlane or other the cruelleſt enemie of the Turks that euer was.

Which meſſage did not a little trouble Solyman. And withall it was reported,that the towne of AXVAR,where one of Selymus his ſonnes ruled as Sanzacke,was alreadie taken by Baiazet, and Selymus departeth toward Iconium. ſhamefully ſacked. But Selymus hearing that his brother was gone toward AMASIA, and now on his way as far as ANCYRA, being out of all ſuſpition of danger which he feared vpon the way,ſo long as his brother was yet lingering in thoſe quarters, haſted now towards ICONIVM, which was with a ſtrong garriſon kept for him: for amongſt other cares wherwith Solyman was K vexed,it was not the leaſt, That Baiazet intercepting ICONIVM,ſhould get into SYRIA, and from thence into ÆGYPT,an open countrie,and not yet throughly eſtabliſhed vnder the Turkiſh go-uernment,neither forgetfull of the old gouernment of the Mamalukes,and therfore deſirous of change; from whence it would haue beene an hard matter to haue driuen Baiazet, eſpecially the Arabians being alwaies readie and at hand at euery light ſtirre, where any hope of prey was: out of which prouince alſo in caſe of extremitie hee might eaſily tranſport himſelfe into any of the Chriſtian kingdomes. Solyman therefore tooke great care, that this paſſage, which might ſeeme the laſt refuge of Baiazet his deuiſes, might be ſtopped: and concerning the ſame had giuen commaundement vnto moſt of his commanders in ASIA to be alwaies in readineſſe L to aid Selymus whenſoeuer he ſhould call. With them Selymus lay encamped vnder the wals of ICONIVM, attending euerie ſtirring of Baiazet, reſolued there to expect farther aid from his father,and not by vntimely fight to commit his ſafetie to the hazard of one doubtfull battell. But Baiazet on the other ſide,not vnmindfull what a matter he had taken in hand,ſlept not thereupon,but firſt entertained a valiant ſort of horſemen which the Turks call Chiurts, and are ſuppo-ſed to be of that people which were ſometimes called Gordij, men for their knowne valour fa-

(which were indeed great)he made great vſe: In the caſtle thereof he beſtowed his concubines and children; of the rich merchants he tooke vp mony,to be repaid with the vſe vpon the good ſucceſſe of the war; and from thence he tooke whatſoeuer was needfull for the arming and furniſhing of his men. Beſides his own familie,which was verie great,and thoſe Chiurts which we M ſpoke of,many repaired vnto him, which had beene in former time beholden to his mother,his ſiſter,and Ruſtan the great Baſſa; many alſo of the reliques of the valiant Muſtapha, and Ache-mates the great Baſſa,valiant men and expert ſouldiours, who deſired to reuenge the vnworthie death of their lords and maſters,euen with their own. Neither was there wanting an exceeding rablement

A rablement of ſuch as weary of the preſent ſtate, deſired ſome new innouation and change. The commiſeration alſo of the ſtate of the vnfortunat Baiazet, eaſily drew many to take part with him, whoſe whole truſt was in his valour: they fauoured the yong prince, liuely reſembling his father: when as in Selymus appeared no likeneſſe of himſelfe, but the expreſſe lineaments of his mothers face and bodie, a woman whileſt ſhe liued generally hated of all the people: he went heauily as ouercharged with his greaſie paunch, blub cheeked, and exceeding red faced; ſo that the ſouldiors in ſport would ſay, he was fed with greene mault: he vvas altogether giuen to his eaſe, and ſpent his time in drunkennеſſe and ſleepe, neither was he courteous of ſpeach, nor willing to deſerue vvell of any man; for he would not (as he ſaid) offend his father by being popular, ſo was he onely of his father beloued, and of all other men hated: of all kind of men, he moſt
B miſliked of them that ſet all their hope in a bountifull and couragious prince. The ſame ſouldiors were alſo wont to call Baiazet, Sofue (that is to ſay) a man giuen to quietneſſe and ſtudie: but after that they ſaw him take vp armes, and for the ſafegard of himſelfe and his children ready to aduenture any thing, they began to admire him as a man of valour and courage: and to aske among themſelues, Why his father ſhould reiect him of ſuch worth, the expreſſe image of himſelfe, and preferre before him that gorbellied ſluggard, in whom no ſparke of his fathers valour was to be ſeene? This his entring into armes vvas no fault, being thereunto by neceſſitie enforced, for, had not Selymus their grandfather done the like? vvhereof no better example could be found; whom the force of neceſſity conſtrained not onely to take vp armes againſt his brother, but alſo to haſten the death of his father; and by ſo doing, purchaſed vnto himſelfe and his po-
C ſteritie the empire: which ſo gotten, if Solyman did not vniuſtly poſſeſſe, why might not his ſon vſe the ſame courſe? why ſhould he ſo rigorouſly reuenge that in his ſonne, that was ſo lawfull in the grandfather? Although there was (as they ſaid) great difference betweene that Selymus and this Baiazet; for that this man intended no harme againſt his father, but wiſhed him long to liue; neither yet againſt his brother, if he might by his leaue but liue, if he would but once ceaſe to doe him wrong: that it was alwayes accounted lawfull to repell force by force, and to ſhun preſent death, if the deſtinies would ſo permit. By ſuch affections and motiues, Baiazet his power increaſed daily: which being now growne almoſt to the greatneſſe of a full armie, he thought it not beſt to vſe longer delay, but to march forthwith againſt his brother to fight with him one battell for his life, ſtate, and empire: accounting it ſome commendation (although in D vaine) to haue attempted ſo great an enterpriſe. His purpoſe was (as Solyman feared) to get into SYRIA, which if he could bring to paſſe, he then doubted not of the reſt. Selymus ſtrengthened with his fathers power, lay vvaiting for his comming before ICONIVM, well appointed of all warlike prouiſion: his armie was exceeding ſtrong, and in it many notable commaunders, martiall men of great experience, whom his father had ioyned vnto him; who all lay couered with their great ordinance planted in places moſt conuenient. But Baiazet nothing terrified therewith, as ſoone as he came within ſight of his brothers armie, exhorted his ſouldiors in few words to play the men, for that now was come the time they wiſhed for, and place for them to ſhew their valour in: wherefore they ſhould ſhew themſelues couragious and valiant, and he would make them all rich and fortunat: He told them, that their fortune was now in their owne
E hands, to frame it euery man as he would himſelfe; ſo that if any of them were vvearie of their preſent ſtate, there was the field wherein they might exchange it with better, and therein lay downe the miſeries of their former liues: that of him they ſhould if they ouercame, expect riches, promotions, honours, and whatſoeuer elſe, the rewards of valiant men: That with the victorie of one battell, all their deſires ſhould be ſatisfied, vvere they neuer ſo great: which victory was by the valour vvhich reſted in them to be gotten, and his brothers armie, the heartleſſe followers of a heartleſſe captaine, ouerthrovvne; for as his fathers ſouldiers that vvere with his brother, they were in body preſent, but in mind altogether on his ſide: That it vvas onely Selymus that vvithſtood his welfare and their felicitie, vvhom they ſhould therfore valiantly ſeek for in field as their common enemie; and not to be afraid of his multitude, foraſmuch as victorie
F vvas to be gained, not by number, but by valour: and the moſt mighty God of heauen and earth vvas ſtill preſent, not with the moſt, but with the beſt: Beſides that, he vvilled them to remember with vvhat a cruell enemy they were to fight, who thirſted after nothing more than their bloud: And to conclude, he vvilled them all, not to looke vpon his vvords, but his deeds; and ſaid, If as you ſhal ſee me fighting for your profit, you ſhall likewiſe fight for mine honour, I dare then aſsure you of the victory. Which said, hee with great courage charged the enemie, and fighting himselfe long time amongst the formost, and there performing all the parts of a valiant souldior, and worthy captaine, was for his notable valour no lesse commended of his enemies than of his owne souldiors. The battell was bloudie and terrible, and many fell on both sides. But after that they with wonderfull obstinacy had a great while fought with doubtful victory, so that for- G

tie thousand Turkes lay there dead vpon the ground; at length the victory began to encline to that side vvhereon stood the greater strength, the iuster cause, and better counsell. Many of the enemies being slaine, and many of his owne people also lost, Baiazet was enforced to retire; which he did so leisurely, and without shew of any feare, that it seemed to the beholders, he had welneere as well gained as lost the field: neither durst Selymus pursue him, but stood still fast in the same place, neuer more glad of any thing than to see his brothers backe. But Baiazet after H he had in contempt of his fathers commaund thus run his owne course, and satisfied his owne desire, though disappointed of his purpose, and not able to performe the iourney by him intended into SYRIA; turned now his course, and began in good earnest to goe to AMASIA his appointed prouince.

Baiazet goeth to Amasia.

Solyman speedily aduertised of the euent of this battell, forthwith passed ouer into ASIA: for as the great Bassaes his counsellors thought it not conuenient for him to go ouer the strait before the victorie: so after it was certainly knowne, they thought it not good longer to stay, least the ouerthrow of Baiazet might giue occasion to such as secretly fauoured his quarrel to shew themselues, and so to raise greater troubles. Besides that, the fame of his passage ouer, would (as they said) much auaile both to the discouragement of Baiazet, and the terrifying of his friends: and I therefore it was by them thought good, hastely to pursue him, now ouerthrowne, and not to suffer him to gather courage by the example of his grandfather Selymus, Solymans father; who had been more terribly vanquished then when he stood in his whole strength, and might seeme by that meanes to haue especially preuailed, for that he was at first vnfortunatly ouerthrowne: Neither were these things without reason foreseene: for it is almost incredible what admiration and loue, this battell (although vnfortunat) did get to Baiazet; men wondred that he durst with so small a power, and as it were but a handfull of men, encounter with his brother farre better appointed, and also supported by his fathers strength: not fearing either the disaduantage of the place, or the furie of the great artillerie; and to haue behaued himselfe in the battell not like a young souldior, but like an old and expert commaunder. Selymus might at his pleasure boast K of himselfe as they said (to his father) for the victorie: but Baiazet was the man that deserued to haue ouercome: and that Selymus might to any thing ascribe the victorie, rather than to his owne valour.

These and such like speeches, as they made Baiazet gratious amongst the people generally; so doubled they his fathers cares, and increased his hatred, to wish him the rather dead. For why, he was resolutely set down, not to leaue any other heire of his empire than Selymus his eldest son, alwaies loiall & obedient vnto him: whereas the other he abhorred as stubborne and rebellious, gaping after the empire whilst he yet liued; of whom he was therfore so much the more to stand in dread, by how much he was reputed to be of more valor; & for the aid he had now so openly giuen to Selymus. For these causes he passed ouer the strait into ASIA, with purpose not to go far L from the sea coast, but as it were a farre off with his fauorable aspect to countenance Selymus his proceedings: doubting by comming too neere with his army, to endanger himselfe by the sudden reuolt of the Ianizaries, which he aboue all things feared.

Augerius Busbequius epist. 2. legationis Turcicæ.

I my selfe (saith the author of this historie) saw him departing out of CONSTANTINOPLE the first of Iune in the yeare 1559, when as within a few dayes after I my selfe was also sent for thither: for the Bassaes thought it not amisse to haue me in the campe, and to vse me courteously as their friend, for which cause I was assigned to lodge in an Inne in a village neere vnto the campe, where I lay very well. The Turkes lay in the fields round about: but lying there three moneths, I had good leisure and opportunitie to see the manner of their campe, and in part to know the order of their martiall discipline. So I attiring my selfe in such apparell as the Christi- M ans commonly vse in those places, went vp and down with one or two companions at my pleasure vnknown. First I saw the soldiors of all sorts most orderly placed, & that, vvhich he vvould scarcely beleeue that knoweth the maner of our war, there vvas in euery place great silence, and as a man may say, dumbe quietnesse, no bravvling, no insolencie, no not so much as a vvord or laughter

The order of the Turks campe.

A laughter paſſing in ſport or drunkenneſſe. Beſides that wonderfull cleanelineſſe, no dunghils, no excrements that might offend either the eyes or noſe, for all ſuch things the Turkes doe either burie or carrie them far out of ſight. They themſelues ſo often as they are enforced to diſcharge the burthen of nature, dig an hole with a ſpade and burie it, ſo is all their campe without filth. There was not to be ſeene any drinking or feaſting, no dicing (the great ſhame of our wars) the loſſe of money or time at cards or dice, the Turks know not. I met onely with a rough Hungarian and his companions, a ſouldior, who heauie himſelfe, to the Lute rather houled than ſung a dolefull dittie, containing the laſt words of a fellow of his dying of his wounds vpon the greene banke of Danubius, wherein he requeſteth the riuer, becauſe it ran to the place where hee was born, to carrie newes to his friends and countrymen, that he died an honourable death and not
B vnreuenged, for the encreaſe of his religion, and honour of his countrey: whereunto his fellows ſighing bare a foot: O happie and thrice happie wight, would fortune with thee change we might. For the Turks are of opinion, That no mens ſoules goe more ſpeedily to heauen, than of ſuch valiant men as die in battell, for whoſe welfare their maidens dayly make prayers and vowes. I would alſo needs goe through their butcherie, where their beaſts were killed, to ſee what fleſh was to be ſold; where I ſaw but foure, or at moſt fiue weathers hanging readie dreſſed, and that was the butcherie for the Ianizaries, which I deemed to be in that campe not fewer than foure thouſand. I maruelled that ſo little fleſh ſhould ſuffice ſo many mē: but I was anſwered, That few of them did eat fleſh, for that moſt part of them had their victuals tranſported from CONSTANTINOPLE. Then I demaunding what it was, they ſhewed me a Ianizarie ſitting by who in an
C earthen diſh had killed a turnep, an onion, a head of garlike, a parſenep, and a coucumber, al ſauced with ſalt and vineger, or more truly to ſay with hunger, whereon he fed as ſauorly, as if they had beene feaſants or partridges: his drinke was the common drinke of all liuing creatures, euen faire water. By which frugall kind of diet they prouide both for the health of their bodies, and the ſparing of their purſe: and that I maruelled the more at, it was the time that their great faſt, or to ſpeake after our faſhion, their Lent was at hand: at which time with vs Chriſtians, euen in well ordered cities, much more in campes, all rings with playing, daunсing, ſinging, crying, quaffing, carouſing, and in breefe, with madding and phrenſie. So that it is not vainely reported, That a Turke ſent about that time embaſſadour into GERMANIE, comming home, reported, That the Chriſtians on certaine dayes did riot and became mad, vntill they, beſprinckled with a certaine
